"Though we ſhall, with humility and alacrity, be always forward to acknowledge the infinite mercy and providence of Almighty God, vouchſafed ſo many ſeveral ways to ourſelf and this nation, yet ſince God himſelf doth not allow that we ſhould fancy and create dangers to ourſelf, that we might manifeſt and publiſh his mercy in our deliverance, we muſt profeſs we do not know thoſe deliverances mentioned in the beginning of that declaration, from ſo many wicked plots and deſigns ſince the beginning of this parliament, which if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and deſtruction upon this kingdom. We well know, the great labour and ſkill hath been uſed to amaze and affright our good ſubjects with fears and apprehenſions of plots and conſpiracies, the ſeveral pamphlets publiſhed, and letters ſcattered up and down, full of ſuch ridiculous contemptible animadverſions to that purpoſe, as (though they found, for what end God knows, very unuſual countenances) no ſober man would be moved with them. But we muſt confeſs, we have never been able to inform ourſelf of any ſuch pernicious formed formed design againſt the peace of this kingdom, ſince the beginning of this parliament, as is mentioned in that declaration, or might be any warrant to thoſe great fears, both our houſes of parliament ſeem to be tranſported with; but we have great cauſe to believe, more miſchief and danger hath been raiſed and begotten to the diſturbance of this kingdom, than cured or prevented by thoſe fears and jealouſies. And therefore, however the rumour and diſcourſe of plots and conſpiracies may have been neceſſary to the deſigns of particular men, they ſhall do well not to pay any falſe devotions to Almighty God, who diſcerns whether our dangers are real or pretended.

" For the bringing up of the army to London, as we have heretofore (by no other direction than the teſtimony of a good conſcience) called God to witneſs, we never had, or knew of ſuch reſolution; ſo upon the view of ſuch depoſitions now publiſhed with that declaration, it is not evident to us, there was ever ſuch a deſign, unleſs very looſe diſcourſe or argument be inſtance enough of a deſign. (3.)

Rem. (3.) The king ſeems to vindicate himſelf very weakly upon this article. His whole anſwer lies in the ambiguity of the word deſign, which may ſignify, either a bare project, or a ſettled and formed deſign. It is certain, there was a deſign or project to bring up the army to London, which the king knew of and was propoſed by Jermyn; but no reſolution was taken thereon. The king denies, he knew of any ſuch reſolution, becauſe indeed there was none. But he dares not deny, he was informed of the deſign or project to march the army to London. Wherefore, after having ſpoken of the deſign in general, he immediately changes the word into that of reſolution. Charles I. was very ſkilful in ſuch ſort of ambiguities.

" And it is apparent, that what was ſaid of it, was near three months before the diſcovery to both houſes of parliament: ſo that if there were any danger threatened that way, it vaniſhed without any reſiſtance or prevention, by the wiſdom, power, or authority of them. (4.)

Rem. (4.) The parliament inſiſted chiefly upon the king's intention, and endeavoured to prove the fact, in order to ſhew the intention. So it was not a proof of the king's having no ill intention, that the deſign of ſeducing the army, and bringing it up to London, was not purſued.

" It ſeems the intention of that declaration (whatſoever other end it hath) is to anſwer a declaration they received from us, in anſwer to that which was preſented to us at New-market the 9th of March laſt; and likewiſe to our anſwer to the petition of both houſes, preſented to us at York the 26th of March laſt. But before that declaration falls upon any particulars of our ſaid declaration or anſwer, it complains, that the heads of the malignant party have, with much art and induſtry, adviſed us to ſuffer divers unjuſt ſcandals and imputations upon the parliament, to be publiſhed in our name, whereby they might make it odious to the people, and by their help deſtroy it: but not inſtancing in any one ſcandal or imputation ſo publiſhed by us, we are ſtill to ſeek for the heads of that malignant party. But our good ſubjects will eaſily underſtand, that if we are guilty of that aſperſion, we muſt not only be active in raiſing the ſcandal, but paſſive in the miſchief begotten by that ſcandal, we being an eſſential part of the parliament. (5.)

Rem. (5.) This is only a ſubtility grounded upon the ambiguity of the word parliament. In the declaration which the king is anſwering, by the term, 'parliament,' is meant both houſes, excluſive of the king, and here the king means both houſes and the king together.

" And we hope the juſt defence of ourſelf and our authority, and the neceſſary vindication of our innocence and juſtice, from the imputation laid on us by a major part then preſent, by either or both houſes, ſhall no more be called a ſcandal upon the parliament, than the opinion of ſuch a part be reputed an act of parliament. And we hope our good ſubjects will not be long miſled by that common expreſſion, in all the declarations, wherein they uſurp the word parliament, and apply it to countenance any reſolution or vote ſome few have a mind to make, by calling it, the reſolution of parliament, which can never be without our conſent; neither can the vote of either, or both houſes, make a greater alteration in the laws of this kingdom (ſo ſolemnly made by the advice of their predeceſſors, with the concurrence of us and our anceſtors) either by commanding or inhibiting any thing (beſides the known rules of the law) than our ſingle direction or mandate can do, to which we do not aſcribe the authority. (6.)

Rem. (6.) This reaſon is invincible, ſuppoſing the government in its natural ſtate. But it could not make any impreſſion upon thoſe who believed the king intended to eſtabliſh an arbitrary power.

" But that declaration informs our people, that the malignant party hath drawn us into the northern parts far from our parliament: it might more truly and properly have ſaid, that it hath driven, than drawn us hither. (7.)

Rem. (7.) The parliament underſtood by the malignant party the kings party, and here the king gives the ſame name to that of the parliament.

" For we confeſs our journey hither (for which we have no other reaſon to be ſorry, than with reference to the cauſe of it) was only forced upon us by the true malignant party, which contrived and countenanced thoſe barbarous tumults, and other ſeditious circumſtances, of which we have ſo often complained, and hereafter ſhall ſay more, and which indeed threatens ſo much danger to our perſon, and laid ſo much ſcandal upon the whole privilege and dignity of parliament, that we wonder it can be mentioned without bluſhes or indignation: but of that anon. But why the malignant party ſhould be charged with cauſing a preſs to be tranſported to York, we cannot imagine; neither have any papers or writings iſſued from thence, to our knowledge, but what have been extorted from us by ſuch provocations, as have not been before offered to a king. And no doubt it will appear a moſt trivial and fond exception, when all preſſes are open to vent whatſoever they think fit to ſay to the people, (a thing unwarranted by former cuſtom) that we ſhould not make uſe of all lawful means to publiſh our juſt and neceſſary anſwers thereunto. As for the authority of the great ſeal, (though we do not know that it hath been neceſſary to things of this nature) the ſame ſhall be more frequently uſed hereafter, as occaſion ſhall require; (8.) to which we make no doubt the greater and better part of our privy-council will concur, and whoſe advice we are reſolved to follow, as far as it ſhall be agreeable to the good and welfare of the kingdom.

Rem. (8.) The parliament's declaration was publiſhed the 19th of May, and three days after the lord-keeper Littleton went privately from London with the great ſeal to the king. So the king had it in his hands when he publiſhed his anſwer. For this reaſon, he ſays, the ſame ſhall be more frequently uſed hereafter.

" Before that declaration vouchſafes to inſiſt on any particulars, it is pleaſed to cenſure both our declaration and anſwer, to be filled with harſh cenſures, and cauſeleſs charges upon the parliament (ſtill miſapplying the word parliament to the vote of both houſes) concerning which they reſolve to give ſatisfaction to the kingdom, ſince they find it very difficult to ſatisfy us. If, as in the uſage of the word parliament, they have left us out of their thoughts; ſo by the word kingdom, they intend to exclude all our people, who are out of their walls, (for that's grown another phraſe of the time, the vote of the major part of both houſes, and ſometimes of one, is now called, (The reſolution of the whole kingdom) we believe it may not be hard to give ſatisfaction to themſelves; otherwiſe we are confident (and our confidence proceeds from the uprightneſs of our own conſcience) they will never be able ſo to ſerve the affections of us and our kingdom, that what cannot be ſatisfaction to the one, ſhall be to the other. Neither will the ſtile of 'humble and faithful,' and telling us, 'That they will make us a great and glorious king,' in their petitions and remonſtrances, ſo deceive our good ſubjects, that they will paſs over the reproaches, threats, and menaces they are ſtuffed with, which ſure could not be more gently reprehended by us, than by ſaying, their expreſſions were different from the uſual language to princes, which that declaration tells you we had no occaſion to ſay. But we believe, whoſoever looks over that declaration preſented to us at New-market, to which ours was an anſwer, will find the language throughout it to be ſo unuſual, that before this parliament, it could never be paralleled; whilſt under pretence of juſtifying their fears, they give ſo much countenance to the diſcourſe of the rebels of Ireland, as if they had a mind our good ſubjects ſhould give credit to it: otherwiſe, being warranted by the ſame evidence, which they have ſince publiſhed, they would have as well declared, That thoſe rebels publicly threaten the rooting out the name of the Engliſh, and that they will have a king of their own, and no longer be governed by us; as that they ſay, that they do nothing but by our authority, and that they call themſelves 'the queen's army.' And therefore we have great reaſon to complain of the abſence of juſtice and integrity in that declaration, beſides the unfitneſs of other expreſſions. Neither did we miſtake the ſubſtance or logic of the meſſage to us at Theobalds concerning the militia, militia, which was no other, and is ſtated to be no other (even by that declaration which reproved us) than a plain threat, 'That if we refuſed to join with them, they would make a law without us.' Nor hath the practice ſince that time been other, which will never be juſtified to the moſt ordinary (if not partial) underſtandings, by the mere averring it to be according to the fundamental laws of this kingdom, without giving any direction, that the moſt cunning and learned men in the laws may be able to find thoſe foundations. (9.)

Rem. (9.) There is here an ambiguity in the term Fundamental law. The parliament had clearly expreſſed what they meant by this fundamental law, viz. if the king failed in the diſcharge of his duty, the nation ought not, however, to be without defence, and in that caſe, it belonged to the parliament to take care of it. Inſtead therefore of aſking where this law was, it ſeems, that the king ſhould have ſhewn, either that, though he neglected his duty, it belonged not to the parliament to meddle with the government of the ſtate, or that he never had neglected, nor did ſtill neglect it. For, according to the parliament, though this law was not expreſſed in any particular ſtatute, it naturally flowed from the conſtitution of the government. The king ſeems, by requiring this law to be produced, to inſinuate, that the parliament, in no caſe whatever, could intermeddle with the government of the ſtate, unleſs authoriſed by an expreſs law: and yet the parliament had alleged two caſes, namely, the captivity and nonage of a king, wherein they might have the management of the government, and they reckoned the king's negligence in the ſame claſs. To this the king ſhould have returned an anſwer.

"And we muſt appeal to all the world, whether they might not, with as much juſtice, and by as much law, have ſeized upon the eſtate of every member of both houſes, who diſſented from that pretended ordinance, (which much the major part of the houſe of peers did two or three ſeveral times) as they have invaded that power of ours over the militia, becauſe we (upon reaſons they have not ſo much as pretended to anſwer) refuſe to conſent to that propoſition. (10.)

Rem. (10.) The authority aſſumed by the parliament, was not an ordinary authority, nor pretended to be ſo. It was extraordinary for the preſent ſuppoſed caſe, that there was great danger from the king. As therefore they had not the ſame ſuſpicions of thoſe who had at firſt refuſed their conſent to the ordinance, they could not ſeize their eſtates, upon the ſame foundation. Thus the conſequence drawn by the king from the parliament's uſurpation, does not ſeem juſt.

"And if no better effects, than loſs of time, and hindrance of the public affairs, have been found by our anſwers and replies, let all good men judge, by whoſe default, and whoſe want of duty, ſuch effects have been: for as our end (indeed only end) in thoſe anſwers and replies, hath been the ſettlement and compoſure of public affairs, ſo we are aſſured, and moſt men do believe, That if that due regard and reverence had been given to our words, and that conſent and obedience to our counſels, which we did expect, there had been before this time a chearful calm upon the face of the whole kingdom, every man enjoying his own, with all poſſible peace and ſecurity that can be imagined; which ſurely thoſe men do not deſire, who (after all thoſe acts of juſtice and favour paſſed by us this parliament, all thoſe affronts and ſufferings endured and undergone by us) think fit ſtill to reproach us with ſhip-money, coat and conduct-money, and other things ſo abundantly declared (as that declaration itſelf confeſſes) in the general remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, publiſhed in November laſt, which we wonder to find now avowed to be the remonſtrance of both houſes, and which we are ſure was preſented to us only by the houſe of commons; and did never, and we are confident, in that time could never have paſſed the houſe of peers; the concurrence and authority of which was not then thought neceſſary. Shall we believe thoſe reproaches to be the voice of the kingdom of England? That all our loving ſubjects, eaſed, refreſhed, ſtrengthened, and abundantly ſatisfied with our acts of grace and favour towards them, are willing to be involved in theſe unthankful expreſſions? We muſt appeal to the thanks and acknowledgements publiſhed in the petitions of moſt of the counties of England, to the teſtimony and thanks we have received from both houſes of parliament, how ſeaſonable, how agreeable this uſage of us is to our merit, or their former expreſſions.

"We have not in the leaſt ſwerved or departed from our reſolution, or words, in the beginning of this parliament. We ſaid, we were reſolved to put ourſelf freely and clearly upon the love and affection of our Engliſh ſubjects; and we ſay ſo ſtill, as far as concerns England. And we call Almighty God to witneſs all our complaints and jealouſies, which have never been cauſeleſs, not out of our houſes of parliament, (but of ſome few ſchiſmatical, factious, and ambitious ſpirits, upon ſuch grounds, as ſhort time, we fear, will juſtify to the world) our denial of the militia, our abſenting ourſelf from London, have been the effects of an upright and faithful affection to our Engliſh ſubjects, that we may be able (through all the inconveniences we are compelled to wreſtle with) at laſt, to preſerve and reſtore their religion, laws, and liberties unto them.

"Since the proceedings againſt the lord Kimbolton, and the five members, is ſtill looked upon, and ſo often preſſed as ſo great an advantage againſt us, that no retraction made by us, nor no actions ſince that time committed againſt us, and the law of the land, under the pretence of vindication of privilege can ſatisfy the contrivers of that declaration, but that they would have our good ſubjects believe, the accuſation of thoſe ſix members muſt be a plot, for the breaking the neck of the parliament, (a ſtrange arrogance, if any of thoſe members had the penning of that declaration) and that it is ſo often urged againſt us, as if, by that ſingle caſual miſtake of ours, (in form only) we had forfeited all duty, credit and allegiance from our people; we muſt, without endeavouring to excuſe that, which in truth was an error, (our going to the houſe of commons) gave our people a clear and full narration of the matter of fact, aſſuring ourſelf, that our good ſubjects will not find our carriage in that buſineſs ſuch as hath been reported.

"When we reſolved upon ſuch grounds, as, when they ſhall be publiſhed, will ſatisfy the world, that it was fit for our own ſafety and honour, and the peace of the kingdom, to proceed againſt thoſe perſons; (11.) though we well know there was no degree of privilege in that caſe, yet (to ſhew our deſire of correſpondency with the two houſes of parliament) we choſe, rather than to apprehend their perſons by the ordinary miniſters of juſtice, which, according to the opinion and practice of former times, we might havedone) to command our attorney-general to acquaint our houſe of peers with our intention, and the general matter of our charge, (which was yet more particular than a mere accuſation) and to proceed accordingly; and at the ſame time ſent a ſworn ſervant, a ſerjeant at arms to our houſe of commons, to acquaint them, That we did accuſe, and intended to proſecute the five members of that houſe for high-treaſon, and did require that their perſons might be ſecured in cuſtody.

Rem. (11.) I have already ſaid, that the parliament was chiefly offended, that the articles of the accuſation exhibited by the attorney-general, were levelled at the whole houſe of commons, and a great number of lords, as much as at the perſons accuſed. Here, the king maintains the matter of the accuſation, ſince it was for the peace of the kingdom, and paſſes over in ſilence the reaſons which he reſerved for another time, and thereby his vindication cannot be full and perfect.

"This we did, not only to ſhew that we intended not to violate or invade their privileges, but to uſe more ceremony towards them, than we then conceived in juſtice might be required of us; and expected at leaſt ſuch an anſwer as might inform us, if we were out of the way: but he received none at all; only in the inſtant, without offering any thing of their privileges to our conſideration, an order was made, (and the ſame night publiſhed in print) That if any perſon whatſoever ſhould offer to arreſt the perſon of any member of that houſe, without firſt acquainting that houſe therewith, and receiving further orders from that houſe, that it ſhould be lawful for ſuch members, or any perſon, to aſſiſt them, and to ſtand upon his, or their guard of defence, and to make reſiſtance according to the proteſtation taken to defend the privileges of parliament. And this was the firſt time that we heard the proteſtation might be wreſted to ſuch a ſenſe; or that in any caſe, (though of the moſt undoubted and unqueſtionable privilege) it might be lawful for any perſon to reſiſt, and uſe violence againſt a public miniſter of juſtice, armed with lawful authority, though we well knew, that even ſuch a miniſter might be puniſhed for executing ſuch authority.

"Upon viewing this order, we muſt confeſs we were ſomewhat amazed, having never ſeen or heard of the like, though we had known members of either houſe committed, without ſo much formality as we had uſed, and upon crimes of a far inferior nature to thoſe we had ſuggeſted, and having no courſe propoſed to us for our proceeding, we were upon the matter only told, that againſt thoſe perſons we were not to proceed at all: That they were above our reach, or the reach of of the law. It was not then eaſy for us to reſolve what to do. (12.)

Rem. (12.) This is a little diſguiſed. The king was not told, that theſe members were above the reach of the law: but only, that the parliament ſitting, the members could not be impriſoned without the conſent of their houſe, and that it was expected the grounds of the accuſation ſhould be made known, in order to this conſent.

"If we employed our miniſters of juſtice in the uſual way for their apprehenſion, (who, without doubt, would not have refuſed to execute our lawful commands) we ſaw what reſiſtance and oppoſition was likely to be made, which very probably might coſt ſome blood. If we ſtood ſtill, and deſiſted upon this terror, we ſhould at the beſt have confeſſed our own want of power, and the weakneſs of the law. In this ſtrait we put on a ſudden reſolution to try, whether our own preſence, and a clear diſcovery of our intentions (which haply might not have been ſo well underſtood) could remove thoſe doubts, and prevent thoſe inconveniencies, which ſeemed to have been threatened; and thereupon we reſolved to go in our own perſon to our houſe of commons, which we diſcovered not till the very minute of our going; when we ſent out, That our ſervants, and ſuch gentlemen as were then in our court, ſhould attend us to Weſtminſter: but giving them expreſs command (as we have expreſſed in our anſwer to the ordinance that no accident of provocation ſhould draw them to any ſuch action as might imply a purpoſe of force in us: and ourſelf, requiring thoſe of our train not to come within the door) went into the houſe of commons: the bare doing of which, we did not then conceive would have been thought more a breach of privilege, than if we had gone to the houſe of peers, and ſent for them to come to us, which is the uſual cuſtom. We uſed the beſt expreſſions we could, to aſſure them, how far we were from any intention of violating their privileges, that we intended to proceed legally and ſpeedily againſt the perſons we had accuſed, and deſired therefore, if they were in the houſe, that they might be delivered to us; or, if abſent, that ſuch courſe might be taken for their forthcoming, as might ſatisfy our juſt demands: and ſo we departed, having no other purpoſe of force, if they had been in the houſe, than we have before proteſted before God, in our anſwer to the ordinance. You have an account of our part of the ſtory fully, let our people judge freely of it. What followed on their part, (though this declaration tells you, 'It could not withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from us;' it may be any part of theirs it did not) we ſhall have too much cauſe hereafter to inform the world.

"There will be no end of the diſcourſe, and upbraiding us with evil counſellors, if, upon our conſtant denial of knowing any, they will not vouchſafe to inform us of them; and after eight months amuſing the kingdom with the expectation of a diſcovery of a malignant party, and of evil counſellors, they will not at laſt name any, nor deſcribe them. Let the actions and lives of men be examined, who have contrived, counſelled, actually conſented to grieve and burden our people: and if ſuch as be about us, or any againſt whom any notorious malicious crime can be proved; if we ſhelter and protect any ſuch, let our injuſtice be publiſhed to the world: but till that be done, particularly and manifeſtly, (for we ſhall never conclude any man, upon a bare general vote of the major part of either or both houſes, till it be evident, that major part be without paſſion or affection) we muſt look upon the charge this declaration puts on us, of cheriſhing and countenancing a diſcontented party of the kingdom againſt them, as a heavier and unjuſter tax upon our juſtice and honour, than any we have, or can lay, upon the framers of that declaration. (13.)

Rem. (13.) With ſuch reſtrictions one may eternally diſpute: for who ſhould be judge, whether the major part of the houſe were without paſſion or prejudice?

"And now to countenance thoſe unhandſome expreſſions, whereby uſually they have implied our connivance at, or want of zeal againſt, the rebellion of Ireland, (ſo odious to all good men) they have found a new way of exprobation; 'That the proclamation againſt thoſe bloody traitors came not out till the beginning of January, though that rebellion broke out in October; and then by ſpecial command from us, but forty copies were appointed to be printed.' It is well known where we were at that time, when that rebellion broke forth in Scotland; that we immediately from thence recommended the care of that buſineſs to both houſes of parliament here, after we had provided for all fitting ſupplies from our own kingdom of Scotland: that after our return hither, we obſerved all thoſe forms for that ſervice, which we were adviſed to by our council of Ireland, or both houſes of parliament here; and if no proclamation iſſued out ſooner (of which for the preſent we are not certain, but think that others before that time were iſſued by our direction) it was, becauſe the lords juſtices of the kingdom deſired them no ſooner, and when they did, the number they deſired was but twenty, which they adviſed might be ſigned by us; which we for expedition of the ſervice commanded to be printed, (a circumſtance not required by them) thereupon we ſigned more than our juſtices deſired. All which was very well known to ſome members, of one or both houſes of parliament, who have the more to anſwer, if they forbore to expreſs it at the paſſing of this declaration: and if they did expreſs it, we have the greater reaſon to complain, that ſo envious an aſperſion ſhould be caſt on us to our people, when they know well how to anſwer their own objections. (14.)

Rem. (14.) This anſwer appears ſomething weak; for ſuppoſing forty copies would have been ſufficient for Ireland, why was not the proclamation publiſhed in England? The king returns no anſwer to what the parliament ſaid of the proclamation againſt the Scots.

"What that complaint is againſt the parliament, put forth in our name, which is ſuch an evidence and countenance to the rebels, and ſpeaks the ſame language of the parliament which the rebels do, we cannot underſtand. All our anſwers and declarations have been, and are owned by us, and have been atteſted under our own hand; if any other had been publiſhed in our name, and without our authority, it would be eaſy for both houſes of parliament to diſcover and apprehend the authors. And we wiſh, that whoſoever was truſted with the drawing and penning of that declaration, had no more authority or cunning to impoſe upon or deceive the major part of thoſe votes by which it paſſed, than any man hath to prevail with us to publiſh in our own name any thing, but the ſenſe and reſolution of our own heart: or, that the contriver of that declaration could, with as good a conſcience, call God to witneſs, that all his counſels and endeavours have been free from all private aims, perſonal reſpects or paſſions whatſoever, as we have done and do, that we never had or knew of ſuch reſolutions of bringing up the army to London. And ſince this new device is found out, inſtead of anſwering our reaſons, or ſatisfying our juſt demands, to blaſt our declarations and anſwers, as if they were not our own (a bold ſenſeleſs imputation) we are ſure, that every anſwer and declaration publiſhed by us, is much more our own, than any one of thoſe bold, threatening, and reproachful petitions and remonſtrances are the acts of either, or both houſes. And if the penner of that declaration had been careful of the truſt repoſed in him, he would never have denied, (and thereupon found fault with our juſt indignation) in the text or margin, that we had never been charged with the intention of any force; and that in their whole declaration, there is no word tending to ſuch a reproach; the contrary whereof is ſo evident, that we are in expreſs terms charged in that declaration, that we ſent them gracious meſſages, when, with our privity, bringing up the army was in agitation. And even in this declaration they ſeek to make our people believe, ſome ſuch thing to be proved in the depoſitions now publiſhed, wherein, we doubt not, they will as much fail, as they do in their cenſure of that petition ſhewed formerly to us by captain Legg, and ſubſcribed by us with C. R. which, notwithſtanding our full and particular narration of the ſubſtance of that petition, the circumſtances of our ſeeing and approving it, this declaration is pleaſed to ſay, was full of ſcandal to the parliament, and might have proved dangerous to the whole kingdom. If they have this dangerous petition in their hands, we have no reaſon to believe any tenderneſs to us-ward hath kept them from communicating it: if they have it not, we ought to have been believed. But that all good people may compute their other pretended dangers by their clear underſtanding of this, the noiſe whereof hath not been inferior to any of the reſt, we have recovered a true copy of the very petition we ſigned with C. R. which ſhall in fit time be publiſhed; and which we hope will open the eyes of our good people. (15.) Concerning our warrant for Mr. Jermin's paſſage, our anſwer was true and full: but for his black ſattin ſuit, and white boots, we can give no account.

Rem. (15.) This whole article of the anſwer ſeems very weak, ſince the king's defence conſiſts only of his own teſtimony. There could not be a more proper occaſion to publiſh the petition, of which he ſaid he had a true copy. But in deferring the publication to a more convenient time, he gave room to ſuſpect, there were ſome things in the petition which were not favourable to him.

"We complained in our declaration, and as often as we have occaſion to mention our return and reſidence near London, we ſhall complain, of the barbarous and ſeditious tumults at Weſtminſter and Whitehall, which indeed was very full of ſcandal to our government, and danger to our perſon, that we ſhall never think of our return thither, till we have juſtice for what is paſt, and ſecurity for the time to come. And if there were ſo great a neceſſity, or deſire of our return as is pretended, in all this time, upon ſo often preſſing our deſires, and upon cauſes ſo notorious, we ſhould at leaſt have procured ſome order for the future. But that declaration tells us, we are upon the matter miſtaken; the reſort of the citizens to Weſtminſter was as lawful as the reſort of great numbers every day in the term to the ordinary courts of juſtice. They knew no tumults. Strange! Was the diſorderly appearance of ſo many thouſand people with ſtaves and ſwords crying through the ſtreets, Weſtminſter-hall, the paſſage between both houſes, (inſomuch as the members could hardly paſs to and fro) 'No biſhops, down with the biſhops;' no tumults! What member is there of either houſe that ſaw not thoſe numbers, and heard not thoſe cries? And yet lawful aſſemblies! Were not ſeveral members of either houſe aſſaulted, threatened and ill-treated? And yet no tumults! Why made the houſe of peers a declaration, and ſent it down to the houſe of commons, for the ſuppreſſing of tumults, if there were no tumults? And if there were any, why was not ſuch a declaration conſented to and publiſhed? When the attempts were ſo viſible, and the threats ſo loud to pull down the abbey at Weſtminſter, had we not cauſe to apprehend that ſuch people would continue their work at Whitehall? Yet no tumults! What a ſtrange time are we in! That a few impudent, malicious (to give no worſe term) men, ſhould caſt ſuch a ſtrange midſt of error before the eyes of both houſes of parliament, as that they either cannot, or will not ſee, how manifeſtly they injure themſelves by maintaining theſe viſible untruths? We ſay no more. By the help of God, and the law, we will have juſtice for thoſe tumults. (16.)

Rem. (16.) The parliament's declaration contained two things upon this article; firſt, That the concourſe of people at Weſtminſter was no tumult. Secondly, That the king's perſon was in no danger, ſince on the morrow he went through the city without a guard, and moreover ſtaid ſeveral days at Whitehall in ſafety. The king anſwers here to the firſt of theſe things, and leaves the other without reply. Only he draws a conſequence, that Whitehall was in danger, becauſe the people threatened to pull down Weſtminſter-abbey, a circumſtance which no where appears in the accounts of theſe tumults.

"From excepting (how weightily let every man judge) to what we have ſaid, that declaration proceeds to cenſure us for what we have not ſaid, for the prudent omiſſions in our anſwer: We forebore to ſay any thing of the words ſpoken at Kenſington, or the articles againſt our deareſt conſort, and of the accuſation of the ſix members: of the laſt we have ſpoken often, and we thought enough of the other two; having never accuſed any (though God knows what truth there might be in either) we had no reaſon to give any particular anſwer.

"We do not reckon ourſelf bereaved of any part of our prerogative, which we are pleaſed freely for a time to part with by bill; yet we muſt ſay, we expreſſed a great truſt in our two houſes of parliament, when we diveſted ourſelf of the power of diſſolving this parliament, which was a juſt, neceſſary, and proper prerogative: but we are glad to hear their reſolution, that it ſhall not encourage them to do any thing, which otherwiſe had not been fit to have been done; if it do, it will be ſuch a breach of truſt, God will require an account for at their hands.

"For the militia, we have ſaid ſo much in it heretofore, and the point is ſo well underſtood by all men, that we will waſte time no more in that diſpute. We never ſaid there was no ſuch thing as an ordinance, (though we know that they have been long diſuſed) but that there was never any ordinance, or can be, without the king's conſent; and that is true, and the unneceſſary precedent cited in that declaration doth not offer to prove the contrary. But enough of that, God and the law muſt determine that buſineſs.

"Neither hath this declaration given us any ſatisfaction concerning the votes of the 15th and 16th of March laſt, which we muſt declare, and appeal to all the world in the point, to be the greateſt violation of our privilege, the law of the land, the liberty of the ſubject, and the right of parliament, that can be imagined. One of theſe votes is (and there needs no other to deſtroy the king and people) 'That when the lords and commons (it is well the commons are admitted to their part in judicature) ſhall declare what the law of the land is, the ſame muſt be aſſented to, and obeyed;' that is the ſenſe in few words. Where is every man's property; every man's liberty? If a major part of both houſes declare that the law is, that the younger brother ſhall inherit, what is become of all the families and eſtates in the kingdom? If they declare, that by the fundamental law of the land, ſuch a raſh action, ſuch an unadviſed word ought to be puniſhed by perpetual impriſonment, is not the liberty of the ſubject, 'durante bene placito,' remedileſs? That declaration confeſſeth, They pretend not to a power of making new laws; that without us they cannot do that. They need no ſuch power, if their declaration can ſuſpend this ſtatute from being obeyed or executed, and make this order, which is no ſtatute, to be obeyed and executed. If they have power to declare the lord Digby, waiting on us to Hampton-court, and thence viſiting ſome officers at Kingſton, with a coach and ſix horſes, to be levying war and high-treaſon; and ſir John Hotham's defying us to our face, keeping our town, fort, and goods againſt us by force of arms, to be an act of affection and loyalty, what needs a power of making new laws? Or is there ſuch a thing as law left? We deſired our good ſubjects to mark the reaſon and conſequence of theſe votes, the progreſs they have already made, and how infinite that progreſs may be. Firſt, they vote the kingdom is in imminent danger (it is above three months ſince they diſcern it) from enemies abroad, and a popiſh and diſcontented party at home: this is matter of fact, the law follows. This vote hath given them authority by law (the fundamental laws of the kingdom) to order and diſpoſe of the militia of the kingdom, and with this power, and to prevent that danger, to enter into our towns, ſeize upon our magazine, and by force keep both from us. Is not this our caſe? Firſt, They vote we have an intention to levy war againſt our parliament[h], that is matter of fact: then they declare, ſuch as ſhall aſſiſt us, to be guilty of high-treaſon; that is the law, and proved by two ſtatutes, themſelves known to be repealed: no matter for that, they declare it. Upon this ground they exerciſe the militia, and ſo actually do that upon us, which they have voted we intend to do upon them. Who doth not ſee the confuſion that muſt follow upon ſuch a power of declaring? If they ſhould now vote, that we did not write this declaration, but that ſuch an one did it, which is ſtill matter of fact; and then declare, that for ſo doing he is an enemy to the common-wealth; what is become of the law that man was born to? And if all their zeal for the defence of the law, be but to defend that which they declare to be law, their own votes, it will not be in their power to ſatisfy any man of their good intentions to the public peace, but ſuch who were willing to relinquiſh their titles to Magna Charta, and hold their lives and fortunes by a vote of the major part of both houſes. In a word, we deny not, but that they may have power to declare, in a particular doubtful caſe, regularly brought before them, what law is; but to make a general declaration, whereby the known rule of the law may be croſſed or altered, they have no power, nor can exerciſe any, without bringing the life and liberty of the ſubject, to a lawleſs and arbitrary ſubjection. (17.)

Rem. (17.) It muſt have been a great mortification to the king, to be forced to ſhew by ſuch good arguments, the miſchiefs that flow from arbitrary power. The ſame reaſons uſed by the king, to demonſtrate that arbitrary power was a natural conſequence of the parliament's maxims, ſerved to prove, that it was equally hazardous to leave, not every king of England, but Charles I. in particular, inveſted with the royal authority allowed him by the laws, conſidering the uſe he had already made of that power.

"We complained, (and let the world judge of the juſtice and neceſſity of that complaint) of the multitude of ſeditious pamphlets and ſermons. And that declaration tells us, they know we have ways enough in our ordinary courts of juſtice to puniſh thoſe; ſo we have to puniſh tumults and riots, and yet they will not ſerve our turn to keep our towns, our foreſts, and parks from violence[i]. And it may be, though thoſe courts have ſtill the power to puniſh, they may have loſt the ſkill to define what riots and tumults are: otherwiſe a jury in Southwark, legally impannelled to examine a riot there, would not have been ſuperſeded, and the ſheriff enjoined not to proceed, by virtue of an order from the houſe of commons, which it ſeems at that time had the ſole power of declaring. But it is no wonder, that they who could not ſee the tumults, do not conſider the pamphlets and ſermons, though the author of the Proteſtation proteſted, be well known to be Burton (that infamous diſturber of the peace of this church and ſtate) and that he preached it at Weſtminſter, in the hearing of divers members of the houſe of commons; but of ſuch pamphlets, and ſeditious preachers (divers whereof have been recommended, if not impoſed upon ſeveral pariſhes, by ſome members of both houſes, by what authority we know not) we ſhall hereafter take a further account. (18.)

Rem. (18.) Theſe ſermons contained, for the moſt part, the maxims which the parliament would have eſtabliſhed, or pretended to be agreeable to the laws; but which the king looked upon as ſeditious, and for that reaſon affirmed, the parliament ought to puniſh the authors. This Burton was the ſame whoſe ears were cut off by the Star-chamber, and who was baniſhed to Guernſey, for publiſhing a treatiſe againſt the church of England. It ſeems here, that, the king was not pleaſed with the parliament's reverſing his ſentence.

"We confeſs we have little ſkill in the laws, and thoſe that have had moſt, we now find are much to ſeek. Yet we cannot underſtand or believe, that every ordinary court, or any court, hath power to raiſe what guard they pleaſe; and under what command they pleaſe; neither can we imagine what dangerous effects they have found by the guard we appointed them, or (indeed) any the leaſt occaſion why they needed a guard at all.

"But of all the imputations ſo cauſeleſsly and unjuſtly laid upon us by that declaration, we muſt wonder at that charge ſo apparently and evidently untrue, That ſuch are continually preferred and countenanced by us, who are friends or favourers or related unto the chief authors and actors of that arbitrary power, heretofore practiſed or complained of: and on the other ſide, that ſuch as did appear againſt it, are daily diſcountenanced and diſgraced. We would know one perſon that contributed to the ills of thoſe times, or had dependence upon thoſe that did, whom we do, or lately have countenanced or preferred. Nay, we are confident (and we look for no other at their hands) as they have been always moſt eminent aſſertors of the public liberties; ſo, if they found us inclined to any thing not agreeable to honour and juſtice, they would leave us to-morrow: whether different perſons have not and do not receive countenance elſewhere, and upon what grounds, let all men judge; and whether we have not been forward enough to honour and prefer thoſe of the moſt contrary opinion, how little comfort ſoever we have had of thoſe preferments; in beſtowing of which hereafter we ſhall be more guided by mens actions than opinions. And therefore we had good cauſe to beſtow that admonition (for we aſſure you it was an admonition of our own) upon both our houſes of parliament, to take heed of inclining, under the ſpecious ſhews of neceſſity and danger, to the exerciſe of ſuch an arbitrary power they before complained of: the advice will do no harm, and we ſhall be glad to ſee it followed.

"And are all the ſpecious promiſes, and loud profeſſions of making us a great and glorious king, of ſettling a greater revenue upon us than any of our anceſtors have enjoyed; of making us to be honoured at home, and feared abroad; reſolved into this, that they will be ready to ſettle our revenue in an honourable proportion, when we ſhall put ourſelf in ſuch a poſture of government, that our ſubjects may be ſecure to enjoy our juſt protection for their religion, laws, and liberties? what poſture of government they intend we know not, nor can we imagine what ſecurity our good ſubjects can deſire for their religion, laws and liberties, which we have not offered, or fully given. (19.)

Rem. (19.) Unhappily, ſince the violation of the petition of right, neither the king's word nor promiſes, nor even acts of parliament, had been deemed a ſufficient ſecurity. At leaſt, plauſible reaſons were alleged not to confide in them. Nothing but the militia could ſatisfy the parliament, and there was what the king would not willingly grant.

"And is it ſuitable to the duty and dignity of both houſes of parliament, to anſwer our particular weighty expreſſions of the cauſes of our remove from London (ſo generally known to the kingdom) with a ſcoff, that they hope we were driven from thence, not by our own fears, but by the fears of the lord Digby, and his retinue of Cavaliers? Sure the penner of that declaration inſerted that ungrave and inſolent expreſſion, (as he hath done divers others) without the conſent or examination of both houſes, who would not ſo lightly have departed from their former profeſſions of duty to us.

"Whether the way to a good underſtanding between us and our people, hath been as zealouſly preſſed by them, as it hath been profeſſed and deſired by us, will be eaſily diſcerned by thoſe who obſerve, that we have left no public act undone on our part, which in the leaſt decree might be neceſſary to the peace, plenty, and ſecurity of our ſubjects, and that they have not diſpatched one act, which hath given the leaſt evidence of their particular affection and kindneſs to us; but on the contrary, have diſcountenanced and hindered the teſtimony other men would give to us of their affections; witneſs, the ſtopping and keeping back the bill of ſubſidies granted by the clergy almoſt a year ſince; which, though our perſonal wants are ſo notoriouſly known, they will not to this time paſs: ſo not only forbearing to ſupply us themſelves, but keeping the love and bounty of other men from us, and afford no other anſwers to all our deſires, all our reaſons, (indeed not to be anſwered) than, that we muſt not make our underſtanding or reaſon, the rule of our government, but ſuffer ourſelf to be aſſiſted (which we never denied) by our great council. We require no other liberty to our will, than the meaneſt of them do, (we wiſh they would always uſe that liberty) not to conſent to any thing evidently contrary to our conſcience and underſtanding; and we have and ſhall always give as much eſtimation and regard to the advice and counſel of both our houſes of parliament, as ever prince hath done; but we ſhall never (and we hope our people will never) account the contrivance of a few (factious, ſeditious perſons, a malignant party, who would ſacrifice the common-wealth to their own fury and ambition) the wiſdom of parliament: and that the juſtifying and defending ſuch perſons, (of whom, and of their particular ſiniſter ways to compaſs their own bad ends, we ſhall ſhortly inform the world) is not the way to preſerve parliaments, but is the oppoſing and preferring the conſideration of a few unworthy perſons, before their duty to their king, or their care of the kingdom. They would have us remember, that our reſolutions do concern kingdoms, and therefore are not to be moulded by our own underſtanding. We well remember it, but we would have them remember, that when their conſultations endeavour to leſſen the office and dignity of a king, they meddle with that which is not within their determination, and of which we muſt give an account to God, and our other kingdoms, and muſt maintain with the ſacrifice of life.

"Laſtly, That declaration tells you, of a preſent deſperate, and malicious plot, the malignant party is now acting, under the plauſible notions of ſtirring men up to a care of preſerving the king's prerogative, maintaining the diſcipline of the church, upholding and continuing the reverence and ſolemnity of God's ſervice, and encouraging learning, (indeed plauſible and honourable notions to act any thing upon) and that upon theſe grounds divers mutinous petitions have been framed in London, Kent, and other places. Upon what grounds would theſe men have petitions framed? Have ſo many petitions (even againſt the form and conſtitution of the kingdom, and laws eſtabliſhed) been joyfully received and accepted? And ſhall petitions framed upon theſe grounds be called mutinous? Hath a multitude of mean, unknown, inconſiderable, contemptible perſons, about the city ſuburbs of London, had liberty to petition againſt the government of the church, and againſt the book of Common-prayer, againſt the freedom and privilege of parliament, and been thanked for it? And ſhall it be called mutiny in the graveſt and beſt citizens of London, in the gentry and commonality of Kent, to frame petitions upon theſe grounds[k], and to deſire to be governed by the known laws of the land, not by orders or votes of either, or both houſes? Can this be thought the wiſdom and juſtice of both houſes of parliament? Is it not evidently the work of a faction within or without [k] The petitions here mentioned, from London and Kent, were about the militia. For the London petition, George Binion, a rich citizen, was committed to priſon: where, after he had lain ſome time, the lords bailed him; but the commons committed him again the next day.—When the Kentiſh petition was brought, which was by ſome gentlemen of that county, with a great number of the ſubſtantial inhabitants, the city of London was put in arms; ſtrong guards placed at London bridge, were the petitioners were diſarmed, and only ſome few ſuffered to paſs with their petition to Weſtminſter. Upon the delivery thereof to the houſe of commons, the bringers of the petition were ſharply reprehended; two or three of them committed to ſeveral priſons; the principal gentlemen of the county, who had ſubſcribed and deſired it, ſent for as delinquents; charges and impeachments drawn up againſt them; and a declaration publiſhed, "That whoſoever ſhould henceforth adviſe, or contrive the like petitions, ſhall be proceeded againſt as enemies to the common-wealth. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 381, 382.

both houſes, who receive the truſt repoſed in them, and have now told us, what mutiny is? To ſtir up men to a care of preſerving our prerogative, maintaining the diſcipline of the church, upholding and continuing the reverence and ſolemnity of God's ſervice, encouraging of learning, is mutiny. Let heaven and earth, God and man, judge between us and theſe men. And however ſuch petitions are there called mutinous, and the petitioners threatened, diſcountenanced, cenſured, and impriſoned; if they bring ſuch lawful petitions to us, we will graciouſly receive them, and defend them and their rights againſt what power ſoever, with the uttermoſt hazard of our being.

"We have been the longer (to our very great pain) in this anſwer, that we might give the world ſatisfaction, even in the moſt trivial particulars which have been objected againſt us; and that we may not be again reproached with any more prudent omiſſions. If we have been compelled to ſharper language than we affect, let it be conſidered, how vile, how inſufferable, our provocations have been: and except to repel force, be to aſſault, and to give punctual and neceſſary anſwers to rough and inſolent demands, be to make invectives, we are confident the world will accuſe us of too much mildneſs, and all our good ſubjects will think we are not well dealt with, and will judge of us, and of their own happineſs and ſecurity in us, by our actions; which we deſire may no longer proſper, or have a bleſſing from God upon them and us, than they ſhall be directed to the glory of God, in the maintenance of the true Proteſtant profeſſion, to the preſervation of the property, and the liberty of the ſubject, in the obſervation of the laws, and to the maintainance of the rights and freedom of parliament, in the allowance and protection of all their juſt privileges."

After all theſe papers in this ſecond part of the reign of Charles I. one ſhould, it ſeems, have a perfect knowledge of the differences between the king and the parliament, and the ſubject be exhauſted. Nevertheleſs, if the reader ſhould keep to the papers publiſhed on both ſides, he would not have a very clear idea of the cauſe of theſe differences. To this end he muſt underſtand the motives which they took care not to diſcover in their manifeſtos, publiſhed only with deſign to gain the approbation of the people. The following deduction, will, in my opinion, ſerve to give a clear and plain idea of theſe differences. I ſhall ſay nothing but what has been ſaid in ſeveral places, and yet, I believe, it will not be ſuperfluous, briefly to recapitulate the whole, which may be of ſervice to ſhew the grounds and cauſes of the civil wars.

It muſt be laid down as an undeniable fact, after what has been ſaid, that the king had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government in England. They who deny this, have only to ſeek in their imagination a more natural cauſe of the people's diſcontent againſt his government. But it is certain, whatever their ſyſtem may be, they will never be able, without this, ſo to reconcile it with the events as to ſatisfy the impartial. The four preceding parliaments conſidered all the king's proceedings, from the beginning of his reign, as tending to eſtabliſh an abſolute power. This was what they called their grievances, the redreſs whereof they had frequently, though in vain, demanded.

Charles I. inherited the king his father's mortal averſion to the puritans or preſbyterians. He was, like him, perſuaded that their principles concerning church-government, were directly oppoſite to monarchy. They both went ſtill farther. They believed not only, that all the puritans were antimonarchical, but alſo, that all thoſe who were againſt a deſpotic power were truly puritans. This made Charles I. reſolve to ruin ſuch as were not ſubmiſſive enough to his will, by confounding them all under the name of puritans. To that purpoſe he admitted into his council and public-offices, ſuch only as were of his principles. Hence ſprung all the ſeverities exerciſed by the council, the ſtar-chamber, the high-commiſſion, the judges, and all the magiſtrates, upon thoſe that, according to the notions of the court, were infected with puritaniſm, though many of theſe men were ſincerely attached to the church of England. Herein the king, contrary to his intention, did a very conſiderable ſervice to the true preſbterians, ſince he confounded their intereſts with thoſe of a great number of people, who otherwiſe would have had no inclination to preſbyterianiſm. The truth is, they were both threatened with the ſame deſtruction. And therefore, in the elections for this laſt parliament, many were returned of contrary principles to the king and court. Among theſe, the preſbyterians were the moſt ardent, perceiving their ruin was determined, and would ſoon approach if the king ſucceeded in his deſigns. Thus, the preſbyterian party, which before made an inconſiderable figure in the kingdom, grew very powerful by the junction of the other ſort of puritans, whom the court was pleaſed to confound with them.

On the other hand, archbiſhop Laud and ſome of the court-biſhops, deviſed a means, which could not fail to afford them occaſions to perſecute the puritans. This was to enjoin with great rigour the obſervances of certain practices, which moſt people looked upon as indifferent. Nay, they added ſundry innovations, which offended not only the preſbyterians, but alſo many church-of-England-men. This produced great murmurs. But people were not ſatisfied with complaining, they openly diſobeyed, and their diſobedience afforded a pretence to puniſhment. Hereby the biſhops, who were the chief authors of theſe innovations, made themſelves ſo odious, that many believed to have juſt reaſon to ſuſpect a deſign to reſtore the popiſh religion, ſince the eſtabliſhment of theſe innovations was ſo ardently purſued, which ſeemed to tend only to draw the church of England nearer to that of Rome. If to this diſcontent be added that occaſioned by the king's government with regard to the liberties of the people and the privileges of the parliament, it will not be difficult to conceive, that the nation in general was extremely diſſatisfied.

Though, in this laſt parliament there were many preſbyterians for the reaſon above-mentioned, they were not however ſtrong enough to form a party capable of oppoſing that of the church, had they at firſt diſcovered their intentions. So, it may be affirmed, that in general the deſign of this parliament, when they met, was not to overthrow the church of England, and eſtabliſh preſbyterianiſm in its room, though it can ſcarce be doubted, that this was the private aim of the preſbyterians. But as their numbers were too ſmall to oppoſe all the reſt of the parliament, they reſolved to join with the oppoſite party to the king, for procuring the redreſs of grievances. Among theſe grievances, ſome concerned religion, as the innovations which offended the church-men no leſs than the preſbyterians themſelves. Upon that ſubject, theſe ſcrupled not to declaim ſtrenuouſly when occaſion offered, and to repreſent theſe grievances as being of very dangerous conſequence. They could do it without diſcovering themſelves too openly, becauſe, as I ſaid, moſt of the members of parliament were already prejudiced againſt the innovations and the conduct of the biſhops. As the king was extremely zealous for the church of England, and in the number of thoſe who conſidered the innovations and ſome other trifles as neceſſary to the ſolemnity of the public worſhip, he oppoſed their ſuppreſſion as much as poſſible, not directly, but by means of the biſhops, popiſh lords, and others of his party. Wherefore the preſbyterians endeavoured to convince all the reſt of the contrary party, that as long as the biſhops ſhould ſit in the houſe of lords, it would be almoſt impoſſible to obtain an entire redreſs of grievances. The houſe of commons perſiſted therefore in ſo ordering it, that the biſhops votes ſhould be taken away, wherein they met with great obſtacles. But at length, by means of the tumults they frightened them away, and induced them to preſent the proteſtation, which occaſioned the ſending of twelve of them to the Tower. By the ſame means, the popiſh lords were alſo forced to abſent themſelves from the parliament. From that time the king's party became very weak, and the preſbyterians acquired new ſtrength.

Afterwards, the preſbyterian party having gained ſo much ground, diligently applied themſelves to cheriſh the diſſention between the king and the parliament. It was they that cauſed the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom to be paſſed, which was preſented to the king at his return from Scotland, and was as the ſignal of the rupture. Unhappily, there was in the preſbyterian party, another party which concealed themſelves, and were afterwards known by the name of Independents. This party, as they could not accompliſh their ſecret deſigns without diſorder and confuſion, affected a rigid preſbyterianiſm, and ſtrove to carry things to extremities, under colour of maintaining preſbyterianiſm, though in truth their intention was to deſtroy it as well as the church of England.

Mean while, the king retiring to York, and perceiving a war unavoidable, ſent private notice to all whom he thought his friends in both houſes, to leave the parliament and retire to York or elſewhere. Many obeyed, and by their retreat, the preſbyterian party became ſuperior in the two houſes. Before that time, when any thing was moved by the preſbyterians, tending to the ſubverſion of the church of England, thoſe who had any regard for the church did not fail to oppoſe it, and of this number were all the king's friends.

friends. But as ſoon as theſe were retired, the preſbyterian party, by their ſuperiority in both houſes, paſſed whatever they pleaſed. This is what the king obſerved in ſeveral paſſages of his anſwer. Thus, the preſbyterian party prevailing in both houſes, and ſecretly intending to alter the church government, but the thing being impracticable ſo long as the king ſhould preſerve his power, it is evident, that according to this project it was the parliament's intereſt, which was directed by the preſbyterians, carefully to avoid whatever tended to an accommodation, which would have broken all their meaſures. But they took care not to diſcover intirely their deſigns. It was not yet time, till they had put it out of the king's power to prevent the execution. So, though they rendered their fears and jealouſies of the king as plauſible as poſſible, and though it be granted, they had reaſon to ſuſpect and fear, there is however room to think that the danger they repreſented as being ſo near and imminent, was not ſo real as they pretended. Their grand aim, was to induce the king to begin the breach, wherein the king ſeems not to have ſoon enough perceived the ſnare that was laid for him.

As for the king, it is almoſt impoſſible to know perfectly his ſecret motives and intentions, becauſe, ſince the opening of the parliament, it had never been in his power to ſhew them evidently by any effects. It is true, he gave his aſſent to ſeveral advantageous bills to the people, and thereby ſeemed to expreſs a kind of repentance for his paſt conduct. But his ſituation, when he paſſed theſe acts, made it doubtful, whether he ſincerely conſented to the redreſs of grievances, or whether it was only to accommodate himſelf to the times. He aſſured, that his intentions was to govern for the future according to law, and called God to witneſs his ſincerity. But they would not rely on his word. Thus much is certain, that whatever he ſaid or did in favour of the laws, was little agreeable to the principles he had followed for fifteen years. If any were perſuaded, that his aſſeverations and promiſes were ſufficient for the nation's ſecurity, others thought to have juſt cauſe to queſtion their ſincerity, becauſe they came at a time when he had no other refuge than the laws to ſupport himſelf, nor other means than his promiſe to obſerve them, to hinder the whole nation from entirely deſerting him. I ſhall not pretend to decide ſo difficult a queſtion, which is beyond human reach, there being none but God alone who knows perfectly what paſſes in the heart. I believe it raſh to affirm, that Charles I. was not ſincere in his promiſes. But I believe alſo, his ſincerity may be doubted, ſince he had never opportunity to demonſtrate it by effects.

Whatever was the king's private intention, he fully perceived that of the prevailing party in the parliament, and ſaw that force alone could free him from his danger. His propoſals for an agreement were rejected, and his promiſes to keep the laws for the future conſidered as ſo many ſnares, and unfortunately for him he had given but too much cauſe for diſtruſt. He could not diſown it with reſpect to what had paſſed before this parliament; and even during this parliament, he had taken ſome ſteps, which his enemies knew how to turn to their advantage. Such was the plot to ſeduce the army, in which probably he was concerned, though he could affirm, he knew of no reſolution to bring up the army to London. Such was the accuſation of the ſix members of parliament, which could not but breed a ſuſpicion of ſome hidden deſign. The project to ſecure Hull, his withdrawing to York, the queen's voyage into Holland, the motive whereof was diſcovered in time, were things that helped not to cure the people's ſuſpicions. So both houſes ſteadily keeping to the occaſions of jealouſy, fear and diſtruſt, which they had, or pretended to have of the king, made uſe of them to convince the people, that there was no depending on his promiſe, unleſs it was put out of his power to break them. This occaſioned the affair of the militia, on account of which the king was drawn into a ſtrait, from whence he could not get clear. For, by granting the militia, he would himſelf have been ſubſervient to the execution of the parliament's deſigns, and by refuſing it, he gave occaſion to ſay, he was willing to agree with both houſes, without giving them other ſecurity than his word, which, as they pretended, could not be relied on. It is alſo true, that the king would not recede from any of his rights, neither would he offer other aſſurance than his word, to ſatisfy the parliament.

After what has been ſeen, it will not be hard to perceive the ground of the quarrel, and the difficulties of an accommodation. That concerning the government of the church, was one of the principal, though it may not be clearly explained in the manifeſtos of both parties. If the king's intereſts had been ſolely in queſtion, perhaps he would have agreed to ſome conceſſions, at leaſt, for a time. But he found, that one chief reaſon of his enemies deſiring to leſſen his authority, was the more eaſily to accompliſh a change in the eccleſiaſtical government, which he thought himſelf bound in conſcience to oppoſe to the utmoſt of his power. He was ſo ſtrongly, and ſo ſincerely attached to the church of England, that he looked upon any condeſcenſion which might tend to her ruin, as the blackeſt crime he could be guilty of, and perſiſted in this opinion, even when his affairs were grown deſperate. All his counſellors were of the ſame principles. They believed the epiſcopal government of the church ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that a church without biſhops was no true church in their opinion. On the other hand, the preſbyterians were no leſs poſſeſſed with their notions, and without diſtinguiſhing what is eſſential in religion from what is only external, they conſidered the uſages and practices of the church of England as a ſort of popery. Beſides, they were ſo convinced of the king's enmity to them, that they could not think themſelves ſafe, ſo long as it was in his power to oppreſs them. Matters ſtanding thus, it is evident, that force of arms alone was capable of obliging one or other party to yield.

A war being almoſt unavoidable, the earl of Briſtol, though he had no great reaſon to be pleaſed with the king, made his laſt effort to procure an accommodation, by a ſpeech in the houſe of peers. He repreſented, that the thing was not impoſſible, if it was ſincerely endeavoured. After having enumerated all the miſchiefs of a civil war, and the calamities it is uſually attended with, he moved to appoint a ſelect committee of both houſes, truly to ſtate all the differences betwixt the king and the parliament, with the moſt probable ways of reconciling them; what the king ought to do to ſatisfy the people, and what ſecurity he ſhould give. He added ſeveral other things, which plainly ſhewed, he inclined to the king's ſide, and becauſe, withal, he mentioned religion but very ſlightly and in general terms, his ſpeech had no great effect.

The ſame, or the next day, the commons voted:

"1. That it appeared, that the king, ſeduced by wicked counſels, intended to make war againſt the parliament, who, in all their conſultations and actions, had propoſed no other end unto themſelves, but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his perſon.

"2. That whenſoever the king made war upon the parliament, it would be a breach of the truſt repoſed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the diſſolution of the government.

"3. That whoſoever ſhall ſerve or aſſiſt him in ſuch wars, would be traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom; and had been ſo judged by two acts of parliament, and ought to ſuffer as traitors, 11 Rich. II. 1 Hen. IV." [l]

May the 22d, the lord-keeper Littleton delivered the great ſeal to be carried to the king, and followed it himſelf the next morning, before the parliament had any knowledge of it.

The 23d, both houſes ſent a petition to the king, to deſire him to diſband the horſe and foot raiſed under colour of a guard for his perſon. They told him, if he did not diſmiſs theſe forces, they ſhould be obliged to preſerve the peace of the kingdom by the moſt proper means. The king returned a very ſharp anſwer to this petition, reproaching both houſes, that they had raiſed a guard for themſelves, and ordered the ſheriffs to oppoſe with the power of the counties, ſuch as ſhould be drawn together by the king's command [m].

A war, as I ſaid, was reſolved on both ſides; but each ſtill proceeded with ſome caution, in order to caſt the blame on the contrary party. For, in a civil war, it is chiefly the people that are wanted, becauſe in them lies the ſtrength of the two parties. The earl of Briſtol, in his ſpeech to the lords the 20th of May, obſerved, that it was not impoſſible to propound and ſettle the differences betwixt the king and the parliament; but that the great difficulty conſiſted in finding ſuch ſecurity, as might ſtand with the king's honour, and the people's ſatisfaction. He chiefly inſiſted upon this, that the king offering to give reaſonable ſecurity, they were not to reject the offer, and charge themſelves with the events of a war. As this offer, though made in very general terms, appeared plauſible, the parliament was apprehenſive it would make ſome impreſſion on the people. And therefore they judged it neceſſary to ſhew that the king, by this general

[m] This order was dated May 17, and was repeated again May 28, together with an order to all high-ſheriffs, juſtices of peace, and other officers, within one hundred and fifty miles of York, to ſtay all arms and ammunition going to that city. Ruſhworth, tom. IV. p. 721, 722.

offer, did however offer only his word for ſecurity, which could not be a firm foundation of a good agreement. To this end, they ſent him, the 2d of June, nineteen propoſitions, which they conſidered as proper to eſtabliſh a good peace and ſtrict union between the king and the parliament. The propoſitions were theſe:

"1. That the lords, and others of your majeſty's privy-council, and ſuch great officers and miniſters of ſtate, either at home or beyond the ſeas, may be put from your privy-council, and from thoſe officers and employments, excepting ſuch as ſhall be approved of by both houſes of parliament; and that the perſons put into the places and employments of thoſe that are removed, may be approved of by both houſes of parliament: and that the privy-council ſhall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in ſuch forms as ſhall be agreed upon by both houſes of parliament.

"2. That the great affairs of this kingdom may not be concluded or tranſacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unſworn counſellors, but that ſuch matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, which is your majeſty's great and ſupreme council, may be debated, reſolved, and tranſacted only in parliament, and not elſewhere; and ſuch as ſhall preſume to do any thing to the contrary, ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and judgment of parliament; and ſuch other matters of ſtate, as are proper for your majeſty's privy-council, ſhall be debated and concluded by ſuch of the nobility and others, as ſhall from time to time be choſen for that place, by approbation of both houſes of parliament: and that no public act concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which are proper for your privy-council, may be eſteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unleſs it be done by the advice and conſent of the major part of the council, atteſted under their hands; and that your council may be limitted to a certain number, not exceeding five and twenty, nor under fifteen. And if any counſellor's place happen to be void in the interval of parliament, it ſhall not be ſupplied without the aſſent of the major part of the council; which choice ſhall be confirmed, at the next ſitting of parliament, or elſe to be void.

"That the lord high-ſteward of England, lord high-conſtable, lord-chancellor, or lord-keeper of the great ſeal, lord-treaſurer, lord privy-ſeal, earl-marſhal, lord-admiral, warden of the cinque-ports, chief governor of Ireland, chancellor of the exchequer, maſter of the wards, ſecretaries of ſtate, two chief-juſtices and chief-baron, may always be choſen with the approbation of both houſes of parliament, and, in the intervals of parliament, by aſſent of the major part of the council, in ſuch manner as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors.

"4. That he or they, unto whom the government and education of the king's children ſhall be committed, ſhall be approved of by both houſes of parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the aſſent of the major part of the council, in ſuch manner as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors; and that all ſuch ſervants as are now about them, againſt whom both houſes ſhall have any juſt exceptions, ſhall be removed.

"5. That no marriage ſhall be concluded, or treated for any of the king's children, with any foreign prince or other perſon whatſoever, abroad or at home, without the conſent of parliament, under the penalty of a Præmunire, upon ſuch as ſhould conclude, or treat of any marriage as aforeſaid; and that the ſaid penalty ſhall not be pardoned or diſpenſed with, but by the conſent of both houſes of parliament.

"6. That the laws in force againſt jeſuits, prieſts, and popiſh recuſants, be ſtrictly put in execution, without any toleration or diſpenſation to the contrary; and that ſome more effectual courſe may be enacted by authority of parliament, to diſable them from making any diſturbance in the ſtate, or eluding the law by truſts, or otherwiſe.

"7. That the votes of popiſh lords in the houſe of peers may be taken away, ſo long as they continue papiſts; and that your majeſty will conſent to ſuch a bill as ſhall be drawn, for the education of the children of papiſts by proteſtants, in the proteſtant religion.

"8. That your majeſty will be pleaſed to conſent, that ſuch a reformation be made of the church government, and liturgy, as both houſes of parliament ſhall adviſe; wherein they intend to have conſultations with divines, as is expreſſed in their declaration to that purpoſe; and that your majeſty will contribute your beſt aſſiſtance to them, for the raiſing of a ſufficient maintenance for preaching-miniſters through the kingdom; and that your majeſty will be pleaſed to give your conſent to laws, for the taking away of innovations and ſuperſtition, and pluralities, and againſt ſcandalous miniſters.

"9. That your majeſty will be pleaſed to reſt ſatisfied with that courſe that the lords and commons have appointed for the ordering of the militia, until the ſame ſhall be farther ſettled by a bill, and that your majeſty will recal your declarations and proclamations againſt the ordinance made by the lords and commons concerning it.

"10. That ſuch members of either houſe of parliament, as have, during the preſent parliament, been put out of any place or office, may either be reſtored to that place and office, or otherwiſe have ſatisfaction made for the ſame, upon the petition of that houſe, whereof he or they are members.

"11. That all privy-counſellors and judges may take an oath, the form whereof to be agreed on, and ſettled by act of parliament, for the maintaining of the petition of right, and of certain ſtatutes made by the parliament, which ſhall be mentioned by both houſes of parliament; and that an enquiry of all the breaches and violations of thoſe laws may be given in charge, by the juſtices of the king's-bench every term, and by the judges of aſſize in their circuits, and juſtices of the peace at the ſeſſions, to be preſented and puniſhed according to law.

"12. That all the judges, and all the officers placed by approbation of both houſes of parliament, may hold their places, 'quamdiu bene ſe geſſerint.'

"13. That the juſtice of parliament may paſs upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom, or fled out of it; and that all perſons cited by either houſe of parliament, may appear and abide the cenſure of parliament.

"14. That the general pardon offered by your majeſty may be granted, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be adviſed by both houſes of parliament.

"15. That the forts and caſtles of this kingdom may be put under the command and cuſtody of ſuch perſons as your majeſty ſhall appoint, with the approbation of your parliament; and in the intervals of parliament, with the approbation of the major part of the council, in ſuch manner as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors.

"16. That the extraordinary guards, and military forces now attending your majeſty, may be removed and diſcharged; and that for the future you will raiſe no ſuch guards or extraordinary forces, but according to the law, in caſe of actual rebellion or invaſion.

"17. That your majeſty will be pleaſed to enter into a more ſtrict alliance with the ſtates of the United Provinces, and other neighbour princes and ſtates of the proteſtant religion, for the defence and maintenance thereof, againſt all deſigns and attempts of the pope and his adherents to ſubvert and ſuppreſs it, whereby your majeſty will obtain a great acceſs of ſtrength and reputation, and your ſubjects be much encouraged and enabled in a parliamentary way, for your aid and aſſiſtance, in reſtoring your royal ſiſter and her princely iſſue to thoſe dignities and dominions which belong unto them, and relieving the other proteſtant princes who have ſuffered in the ſame cauſe.

"18. That your majeſty will be pleaſed, by act of parliament, to clear the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the houſe of commons, in ſuch manner, that future parliaments may be ſecured from the conſequence of that evil precedent.

"19. That your majeſty will graciouſly be pleaſed to paſs a bill, for reſtraining peers made hereafter, from ſitting or voting in parliament, unleſs they be admitted thereunto with the conſent of both houſes of parliament.

"And theſe our humble deſires being granted by your majeſty, we ſhall forthwith apply ourſelves to regulate your preſent revenue, in ſuch ſort as may be for your beſt advantage; and likewiſe to ſettle ſuch an ordinary and conſtant increaſe of it, as ſhall be ſufficient to ſupport your royal dignity in honour and plenty, beyond the proportion of any former grants of the ſubjects of this kingdom, to your majeſty's royal predeceſſors. We ſhall likewiſe put the town of Hull into ſuch hands as your majeſty ſhall appoint, with the conſent and approbation of parliament, and deliver up a juſt account of all the magazine; and chearfully employ the uttermoſt of our power and endeavours in the real expreſſion and performance of our moſt dutiful and loyal affections, to the preſerving and maintaining the royal honour, greatneſs and ſafety of your majeſty and your poſterity."

The king made to theſe propoſitions, a long anſwer, that is to ſay, with ſo long periods, and ſo frequent parentheſes, that it is no eaſy taſk to tranſlate it without loſing ſomething of its force[n].

[n] The original is here inſerted.

The king's anſwer to the nineteen propoſitions.

" BEFORE we ſhall give you our anſwer to your petition and propoſitions, we ſhall tell you, that we are now clearly ſatisfied, why the method which we traced out to you by our meſſage of the 20th of January, and have ſince ſo often preſſed upon you, as the proper way to compoſe the diſtractions of this kingdom, and render it truly happy, hath been hitherto declined, and is at length not thought fit to be looked upon. We now ſee plainly, (and deſire that you and all other our good ſubjects ſhould do ſo too) that the cabaliſts of this buſineſs have with great prudence reſerved themſelves, until due preparations ſhould be made for their deſign. If they had unſeaſonably vented ſuch propoſitions, as the wiſdom and modeſty of your predeceſſors never thought fit to offer to any of our progenitors; nor we in honour or regard to our regal authority (which God hath intruſted us with for the good of our people) could receive without juſt indignation (and ſuch many of your preſent propoſitions are) their hopes would ſoon have been blaſted, and thoſe perſons, to whom offices, honours, power, and commands were deſigned, by ſuch ill-timing of their buſineſs, would have failed of their expectation, not withont a brand upon the attempt. Therefore, before any thing of this nature ſhould appear, they have (certainly, with great wiſdom in the conduct of it) thought fit to remove a troubleſome rub in their way, the law, to this end, (that they might undermine the very foundations of it) a new power hath been aſſumed to interpret and declare laws without us by extemporary votes, without any caſe judicially before either houſe, (which is in effect the ſame thing as to make laws without us:) orders and ordinances made only by both houſes, (tending to a pure arbitrary power) were preſſed upon the people as laws, and their obedience required to them.

" Their next ſtep was, to erect an upſtart authority without us (in whom, and only in whom the laws of this realm have placed that power) to command the militia, (very conſiderable to this their deſign.) In farther order to it, they have wreſted from us our magazine and town of Hull, and abetted ſir John Hotham in his bold faced treaſon. They have prepared, and directed to the people, unprecedented invectives againſt our government, thereby (as much as lay in their power) to weaken our juſt authority and due eſteem among them; they have, as injuriouſly, as preſumptuouſly, (though we conceive by this time, impudence itſelf is aſhamed of it) attempted to caſt upon us aſperſions of an unheard-of nature, as if we had favoured a rebellion in our own bowels. They have likewiſe broached a new doctrine, that we are obliged to paſs all laws that ſhall be offered to us by both houſes, (howſoever our own judgment and conſcience ſhall be unſatisfied with them) a point of policy as proper for their preſent buſineſs, as deſtructive to all our rights of parliament, and ſo with ſtrange ſhameleſſneſs will forget a clauſe in law ſtill in force, made in the ſecond year of king Henry V. wherein both houſes of parliament do acknowledge, that it is of the king's regality to grant or deny ſuch of their petitions as pleaſeth himſelf. They have interpreted our neceſſary guard, legally aſſembled, for the defence of us and our childrens perſons, againſt a traitor in open rebellion againſt us[o], to be with intent to levy war againſt the parliament, (the thought whereof our very ſoul abhorreth) thereby to render us odious to our people.

" They have ſo awed our good ſubjects with purſevants, long chargeable attendances, heavy cenſures, and illegal impriſonments, that few of them durſt offer to preſent their tenderneſs of our ſufferings, their own juſt grievances, and their ſenſe of thoſe violations of the law, (the birth-right of every ſubject in this kingdom) though in an humble petition directed to both houſes; and if any did, it was ſtifled in the birth, called ſedition, and burnt by the common hangman.

" They have reſtrained the attendance of our ordinary and neceſſary houſhold ſervants[p], and ſeized upon thoſe ſmall ſums of money, which our credit had provided to buy us bread, with injunctions that none ſhould be ſuffered to be conveyed, or returned to us to York, or any of our peers or ſervants with us; ſo that, in effect, they have blocked us up in that county.

" They have filled the ears of the people with the noiſe of fears and jealouſies, though taken up upon truſt, tales of ſkippers, ſalt-fleets, and ſuch like, by which alarms they might prepare them to receive ſuch impreſſions as might beſt advance this deſign when it ſhould be ripe. And now it ſeems they think we are ſufficiently prepared for theſe bitter pills. We are in a handſome poſture to receive theſe humble deſires, which probably are intended to make way for a ſuperfetation of a (yet) higher nature, if we had not made this diſcovery to you, for they do not tell us this is all. In them we muſt obſerve, that theſe contrivers, the better to advance their true ends, diſguiſed as much as they could their intents, with a mixture of ſome things really to be approved by every honeſt man; others, ſpecious and popular; and ſome which are already granted by us, all which are cunningly twiſted and mixed, with thoſe other things of their main deſign of ambition and private intereſt; in hope that at the firſt view, every eye may not ſo clearly diſcern them in their proper colours.

" We would not be underſtood, that we intend to fix this deſign upon both or either houſe of parliament: we utterly profeſs againſt it, being moſt confident of the loyalty, good affection, and integrity of the intentions of that great body; and knowing well, that very many of both houſes were abſent, and many diſſented from all thoſe particulars we complain of: but we do believe, and accordingly profeſs to all the world, that the malignity of this deſign as (dangerous to the laws of this kingdom, the peace of the ſame, and the liberties of all our good ſubjects, as to ourſelf and our juſt prerogative) hath proceeded from the ſubtle informations, miſchievous practices, and evil counſels of ambitious turbulent ſpirits, diſaffected to God's true religion, and the unity of the profeſſors thereof, our honour and ſafety, and the public peace and proſperity of our people, not without a ſtrong influence upon the very actions of both houſes. But how faulty ſoever others are, we ſhall, with God's aſſiſtance, endeavour to diſcharge our duty with uprightneſs of heart; and therefore, ſince theſe propoſitions come to us in the name of both houſes of parliament, we ſhall take a more particular notice of every of them.

" If the 1ſt, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 9th, 10th, 15th, 16th, 19th demands, had been writ and printed in a tongue unknown to us and our people, it might have been poſſible we and they might have charitably believed the propoſitions to be ſuch, as might have been in order to the ends pretended in the petition (to wit) the eſtabliſhing of our honour and ſafety, the welfare and ſecurity of our ſubjects and dominions, and the removing thoſe jealouſies and differences, which are ſaid to have unhappily fallen betwixt us and our people, and procuring both us and them a conſtant courſe of honour, peace, and happineſs: but being read and underſtood by all, we cannot but aſſure ourſelf, that this profeſſion, joined to theſe propoſitions, will rather appear a mockery and a ſcorn, the demands being ſuch; as though we were unworthy of the truſt repoſed in us by the law, and of our deſcent from ſo many great and famous anceſtors, if we could be brought to abandon that power, which only can enable us to perform what we are ſworn to, in protecting our people and the laws, and ſo aſſume others into it, as to diveſt ourſelf of it, although not only our preſent condition (which it can hardly be) were more neceſſitous than it is, and we were both vanquiſhed, and a priſoner, and in a worſe condition than ever the moſt unfortunate of our predeceſſors have been reduced to, by the moſt criminal of their ſubjects. And though the bait laid to draw us to it, and to keep our ſubjects from indignation at the mention of it, the promiſes of a plentiful and unparelleled revenue were reduced from generals (which ſignify nothing) to clear and certain particulars; ſince ſuch a bargain would have but too great a reſemblance of that of Eſau's, if we ſhould part with ſuch flowers of a crown, as are worth all the reſt of the garland, and have been tranſmitted to us from ſo many anceſtors, and have been found ſo uſeful and neceſſary for the welfare and ſecurity of our ſubjects, for any preſent neceſſity, or for any low and ſordid conſiderations of wealth and gain, and therefore all men knowing that thoſe accommodations are moſt eaſily made, and moſt exactly obſerved, that are grounded upon reaſonable and equal conditions, we have great cauſe to believe, that the contrivers of theſe had no intention of ſettling any firm accommodation, but to increaſe thoſe jealouſies, and widen that diviſion, which (not by our fault) is now unhappily fallen between us and both houſes.

" It is aſked, that all the lords and others of our privy-council, and ſuch (we know not what you mean by ſuch, but we have cauſe to think you mean all) great officers and miniſters of ſtate, either at home or beyond the ſeas, (for care is taken to leave out no perſon or place, that our diſhonour may be ſure not to be bounded within this kingdom, though no ſubtle inſinuations at ſuch a diſtance can probably be believed to have been the cauſe of our diſtractions and danger) ſhould be put from our privy-council, and from thoſe offices, and employments, unleſs they be approved by both houſes of parliament, how faithful ſoever we have found them to us and the public, and how far ſoever they have been from offending againſt any law, the only rule they had, or any others ought to have, to walk by. We therefore to this part of this demand, return you this anſwer, that we are willing to grant, that they ſhall take a larger oath than yourſelves deſire in your 11th demand, for maintaining not of any part, but of the whole law. (1.)

Remark (1.) This is ſaid, becauſe, in the whole body of the law were contained thoſe laws, which aſcribed to the king the prerogatives they had a mind to deprive him of.

"And we have and do aſſure you, that we will be careful to make election of ſuch perſons in thoſe places of truſt, as ſhall have given good teſtimony of their abilities and integrities, and againſt whom there can be no juſt cauſe of conception, whereon reaſonably to ground a diffidence; that if we have or ſhall be miſtaken in our election, we have and do aſſure you, that there is no man ſo near to us in place or affection, whom we will not leave to the juſtice of the law, if you ſhall bring a particular charge and ſufficient proofs againſt him; and that we have given you (the beſt pledge of the effects of ſuch a promiſe on our part, and the beſt ſecurity for the performance of their duty on theirs) a triennial parliament, the apprehenſion of whoſe juſtice, will, in all probability, make them wary how they provoke it, as wary how we charge ſuch, as by the diſcovery of their faults may in any degree ſeem to diſcredit our election, but that without any ſhadow of a fault objected, only perhaps becauſe they follow their conſciences, and preſerve the eſtabliſhed laws, and agree not in ſuch votes, or aſſent not unto ſuch bills, as ſome perſons, who have now too great an influence even upon both houſes, judge, or ſeem to judge to be for the public good, and as are agreeable to that new Utopia of religion and government, into which they endeavour to tranſform this kingdom. (2.)

Rem. (2.) This alludes to ſir Thomas Moor's Utopia.

"For we remember what names, and for what reaſons, you left out in the bill offered us concerning the militia, which you had yourſelves recommended in the ordinance. We will never conſent to the diſplacing of any, whom, for their former merits from, and affection to us and the public, we have intruſted; ſince we conceive, that to do ſo would take away both from the affection of our ſervants, the care of our ſervice, and the honour of our juſtice; and we the more wonder it ſhould be aſked by you of us, ſince it appears by the 12th demand, that you yourſelves count it reaſonable, after the preſent turn is ſerved, that the judges and officers who are then placed, may hold their places 'Quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint;' and we are reſolved to be as careful of thoſe we have choſen, as you are of thoſe you would chooſe, and to remove none till they appear to us to have otherwiſe behaved themſelves, or ſhall be evicted by legal proceedings to have done ſo.

"But this demand, as unreaſonable as it is, is but one link of a great chain, and but the firſt round of that ladder, by which our juſt, ancient, regal power, is endeavoured to be fetched down to the ground. For it appears plainly, that it is not with the perſons now choſen, but with our chuſing, that you are diſpleaſed; for you demand, that the perſons put into the places and employments of thoſe who ſhall be removed, may be approved by both houſes; which is ſo far (as to ſome at firſt ſight it may appear) from being leſs than the power of nomination, that of two things (of which we will never grant either) we would ſooner be content, that you ſhould nominate, and we approve, than you approve, and we nominate; the mere nomination being ſo far from being any thing, that if we could do no more, we would never take the pains to do that, when we ſhould only hazard thoſe whom we eſteemed, to the ſcorn of a refuſal, if they happened not to be agreeable, not only to the judgment, but to the paſſion, intereſt, or humour, or the preſent major part of either houſe.

"Not to ſpeak now of the great factions, animoſities, and diviſions, which this power would introduce in both houſes, between both houſes, and in the ſeveral counties, for the choice of perſons to be ſent to that place where that power was, and between thoſe perſons that were ſo choſen. Neither is this ſtrange potion preſented to us only for once, for the cure of a preſent preſſing deſperate diſeaſe, but for a diet to us and our poſterity: it is demanded, that our counſellors, all chief officers, both of law and ſtate, commanders of forts and caſtles, and all peers hereafter made (as to voting, without which, how little is the reſt?) be approved of (that is, choſen) by them from time to time; and rather than it ſhould ever be left to the crown, to whom it doth and ſhall belong, if any place fall void in the intermiſſion of parliament, the major part of the approved council is to approve them; neither is it only demanded, that we ſhould quit the power and right our predeceſſors have had, of appointing perſons in theſe places, but for counſellors we are to be reſtrained, as well in the number as in the perſons, and a power muſt be annexed to theſe places, which their predeceſſors had not; and indeed, if this power was paſſed to them, it were not fit we ſhould be truſted to chuſe thoſe who were to be truſted as much as we.

"It is demanded, that ſuch matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, which is our great and ſupreme council, may be debated, reſolved and tranſacted, only in parliament, and not elſewhere; and ſuch as preſume to do any thing to the contrary, ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and judgment of the parliament; and ſuch other matters of ſtate, as are proper for our privy-council, ſhall be debated and concluded, by ſuch of our nobility, (though indeed, it being made by us, they may not vote without the conſent of both houſes, we are rather to call them your nobility) and others, as ſhall be from time to time choſen for that place, by approbation of both houſes of parliament; and that no public act concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which are proper for our privy-council, may be eſteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unleſs it be done by the advice and conſent of the major part of our council, atteſted under their hands; which demands were of that nature, that to grant them, were in effect, at once to depoſe both ourſelf, and our poſterity.

"Theſe being paſt, we may be waited on bare headed, we may have our hand kiſſed, the ſtile of majeſty continued to us, and the king's authority declared by both houſes of parliament, may be ſtill the ſtile of your commands; we may have ſwords and maces carried before us, and pleaſe ourſelf with the ſight of a crown and ſcepter; (and yet even theſe twigs would not long flouriſh, when the ſtock upon which they grew were dead) but as to true and real power, we ſhould remain but the outſide, but the picture, but the ſign of a king. We were ever willing that our parliament ſhould debate, reſolve, and tranſact, ſuch matters as are proper for them, as far as they are proper for them, and we heartily wiſh, that they would be as careful not to extend their debates and reſolutions beyond what is proper to them, that multitudes of things puniſhable, and cauſes determinable by the ordinary judicatures may not be entertained in parliament, and ſo cauſe a long, chargeable and fruitleſs attendance of our people, and (by degrees) draw to you, as well as all the cauſes, as all the faults, of Weſtminſter-hall, and divert your proper buſineſs: that the courſe of law be no ways diverted, much leſs diſturbed, as was actually done by the ſtop of the proceedings againſt a riot in Southwark, by order of the houſe of commons, in a time ſo riotous and tumultuous, as much increaſed the danger of popular inſolencies, by ſuch a countenance to riots, and diſcountenance of law: that you deſcend not to the leiſure of recommending lectures to churches, nor aſcend to the legiſlative power, by commanding (the law not having yet commanded it) that they whom you recommend be received, although neither the parſon nor biſhop do approve of them; and that the refuſers (according to the courſe ſo much formerly complained of to have been uſed at the council-table) be not ſent for to attend to ſhew cauſe at leaſt, that you would conſider conveniency, if not law, and recommend none but who are well known to you to be orthodox, learned, and moderate, or at leaſt ſuch as have taken orders, and are not notorious depravers of the book of Common-prayer; a care which appeareth by the diſcourſes, ſermons, and perſons of ſome recommended by you, not to have been hitherto taken; and it highly concerns both you in duty, and the commonwealth in the conſequences, that it ſhould have been taken: that neither one eſtate tranſact what is proper for two, nor two what is proper for three; and conſequently, that, contrary to our declared will, our forts may not be ſeized, our arms may not be removed, our monies may not be ſtopt, our legal directions may not be countermanded by you, nor we deſire to countermand them ourſelf; nor ſuch entrances made upon a real war againſt us, upon pretence of an imaginary war againſt you, and a chimera of neceſſity. So far do you paſs beyond your limits, whilſt you ſeem by your demand, to be ſtrangely ſtraitened within them; at leaſt we could have wiſhed, you would have expreſſed what matters you meant as fit to be tranſacted only in parliament, and what you meant by only in parliament.

"You have of late been perſuaded, by the new doctrine of ſome few, to think that proper for your debates, which hath not uſed to be at all debated within thoſe walls, but

been truſted wholly with our predeceſſors and us; and to tranſact thoſe things, which, without the regal authority, ſince there were kings of this kingdom, were never tranſacted: it therefore concerns us the more, that you ſpeak out, and that both we and our people may either know the bottom of your demands, or know them to be bottomleſs. What concerns more the public, and is more, (indeed) proper for the high court of parliament, than the making of laws, which not only ought there to be tranſacted, but can be tranſacted no where elſe? But then you muſt admit us to be a part of the parliament; you muſt not (as the ſenſe is of this part of the demand, if it have any) deny the freedom of our anſwer, when we have as much right to reject what we think unreaſonable, as you have to propoſe what you think convenient or neceſſary: nor is it poſſible our anſwers, either to bills, or any other propoſitions, ſhould be wholly free, if we may not uſe the liberty of every one of you, and of every ſubject, to receive advice (without their danger who ſhall give it) from any perſon, known or unknown, ſworn or unſworn, in theſe matters, in which the manage of our vote is truſted by the law, to our own judgment and conſcience; which how beſt to inform, is (and ever ſhall be) left likewiſe to us: and moſt unreaſonable it were, that two eſtates propoſing ſomething to the third, that third ſhould be bound to take no advice, whether it were fit to paſs, but from thoſe two that did propoſe it. We ſhall ever in theſe things, which are truſted wholly to us by the law, not decline to hearken to the advice of our great council, and ſhall chuſe to hear willingly the free debates of our privy council, (whenſoever we may be ſuffered to have them for ſending for, and they ſhall not be terrified from that freedom by votes, and brands of malignants and enemies to the ſtate, for adviſing what no law forbids to adviſe) but we will retain our power, of admitting no more to any council than the nature of the buſineſs requires, and of diſcourſing with whom we pleaſe, of what we pleaſe, and informing our underſtanding by debate with any perſons, who may be well able to inform and adviſe us in ſome particulars, though their qualities, education, or other abilities, may not make them ſo fit to be of our ſworn council; and not tie ourſelf up not to hear any more than twenty-five (and theſe not choſen abſolutely by us) out of a kingdom ſo repleniſhed with judicious and experienced perſons of ſeveral kinds. And though we ſhall (with the proportionable conſideration due to them) always weigh the advices both of our great and privy-council, yet we ſhall alſo look upon their advices as advices, not as commands or impoſitions; upon them as our counſellors, not as our tutors and guardians; and upon ourſelf as their king, not as their pupil or ward: for whatſoever of regality were, by the modeſty of interpretation, left us, in the firſt part of the ſecond demand as to the parliament, is taken from us in the ſecond part of the ſame, and placed in this new-fangled kind of counſellors, whoſe power is ſuch, and ſo expreſſed by it, that in all public acts concerning the affairs of this kingdom, which are proper for our privy-council, (for whoſe advice all public acts are ſometimes proper, though never neceſſary) they are deſired to be admitted joint-patentees with us in the regality; and it is not plainly expreſſed, whether they mean us ſo much as a ſingle vote in theſe affairs; but it is plain, they mean us no more at moſt, than a ſingle vote in them, and no more power than every one of the reſt of our privy-counſellors only leave to us, out of their reſpect and duty, (and that only is left of all our ancient power) a choice, whether theſe that are thus to be joined with (or rather ſet over) us, ſhall be fifteen or twenty-five: and great care is taken, that the oath which theſe men ſhall take, ſhall be ſuch, in the framing the form of which (though ſure we are not wholly unconcerned in it) we may be wholly excluded, and that wholly reſerved to be agreed upon by both houſes of parliament.

"And to ſhew that no more care is taken of our ſafety, than of our power, after ſo great indignities offered to us, and countenanced by thoſe who were moſt obliged to reſent them: after our town and fort kept from us, (from which if it were no otherwiſe ours, than the whole kingdom is, we can no more legally be kept out, than out of our whole kingdom, which ſure yourſelves will not deny to be treaſon) our arms our goods ſent away, and our money ſtopped from us, our guards (in which we have no other intention, than to hinder the end of theſe things from being proportionable to their beginnings) are not only deſired to be diſmiſſed, before ſatisfaction for the injury, puniſhment of the injuries, and care taken for our future ſecurity from the like. But it is likewiſe deſired (and for this, law is pretended, and might as well have been for the reſt, which yet with ſome ingenuity, are it ſeems acknowledged to be but deſires of grace) that we ſhall not for the future raiſe any guards, or extraordinary forces, but in caſe of actual rebellion or invaſion; which if it had been law, and ſo obſerved in the time of our predeceſſors, few of thoſe victories, which have made theſe nations famous in other parts, could have been legally atchieved: nor could our bleſſed predeceſſor queen Elizabeth have ſo defended herſelf in eighty-eight. And if no forces muſt be levied till rebellions and invaſions (which will not ſtay for the calling of parliaments, and their conſent for raiſing of forces) be actual, they muſt undoubtedly, (at leaſt moſt probably) be effectual and prevalent.

"And as neither care is taken for our rights, honour nor ſafety, as a prince; ſo our rights, as a private perſon, are endeavoured to be had from us; it being aſked, that it may be unlawful and puniſhable, not only to conclude, but even to treat of any marriage with any perſon for our own children, or to place governors about them, without conſent of parliament; and in the intermiſſion of theſe, without the conſent of our good lords of the council; that we may not only be in a more deſpicable ſtate than any of our predeceſſors, but in a meaner and viler condition than the loweſt of our ſubjects, who value no liberty they have more than that of the free education and marriage of their children, from which we are aſked to debar ourſelf; and have the more reaſon to take it ill that we are ſo, becauſe of our choice of a governor for our ſon, and a huſband for our daughter, (in which the proteſtant religion was our principal conſideration) we conceive we had reaſon to expect your preſent thanks, and the increaſe of your future truſts.

"We ſuppoſe theſe demands by this time to appear ſuch, as the demanders cannot be ſuppoſed to have any ſuch real fear of us, as hath been long pretended; they are too much in the ſtile, not only of equals, but of conquerors; and as little to be intended for removing of jealouſies, (for which end they are ſaid to be aſked;) and that is not as merchants aſk at firſt, much more than they will take, but as moſt neceſſary to effect it, which (if they be) God help this poor kingdom, and thoſe who are in the hands of ſuch perſons, (whoſe jealouſies nothing elſe will remove) which indeed is ſuch a way, as if there being differences and ſuits between two perſons, whereof one would have from the other ſeveral parcels of his ancient land, he ſhould propoſe to him, by way of accommodation, that he would quit to him all thoſe in queſtion, with the reſt of his eſtate, as the moſt neceſſary and effectual means to remove all thoſe ſuits and differences: but we call God to witneſs, that as for our ſubjects ſake theſe rights are veſted in us, ſo, for their ſakes, as well as for our own, we are reſolved not to quit them, nor to ſubvert (though in a parliamentary way) the ancient, equal, happy, well-poiſed, and never-enough commended conſtitution of the government of this kingdom; nor to make ourſelf of a king of England, a duke of Venice, and this of a kingdom, a republic.

"There being three kinds of government among men, abſolute monarchy, ariſtocracy, and democracy; and all theſe having their particular conveniencies and inconveniencies; the experience and wiſdom of our anceſtors, hath ſo moulded this out of a mixture of theſe, as to give to this kingdom (as far as human prudence can provide) the conveniencies of all three, without the inconveniencies of any one, as long as the balance hangs even between the three ſtates, and they run jointly on in their proper channel, (begetting verdure and fertility in the meadows on both ſides) and the overflowing of either on either ſide, raiſe no deluge or inundation. The ill of abſolute monarchy, is tyranny; the ill of ariſtocracy, is faction and diviſion; the ills of democracy, are tumults, violence and licentiouſneſs. The good of monarchy, is the uniting a nation under one head, to reſiſt invaſion from abroad, and inſurrection at home: the good of ariſtocracy, is the conjunction of council in the ableſt perſons of a ſtate for the public benefit: the good of democracy, is liberty, and the courage and induſtry which liberty begets.

"In this kingdom, the laws are jointly made by a king, by a houſe of peers, and by a houſe of commons, choſen by the people, all having free votes and particular privileges. The government, according to theſe laws, is truſted to the king; power of treaties, of war, and peace, of making peers, of chuſing officers and counſellors for ſtate, judges for law, commanders for forts and caſtles; giving commiſſions for raiſing men; to make war abroad, or to prevent or provide againſt invaſions or inſurrections at home; benefit of confiſcations, power of pardoning, and ſome more of the like kind are placed in the king. And this kind of regulated monarchy, having this power to preſerve that authority, without which it would be diſabled to preſerve the laws in their force, and the ſubjects in their liberties and properties, is intended to draw to him ſuch a reſpect and relation from the great ones, as may hinder the ills of diviſion and faction; and ſuch a fear and reverence from the people, as may hinder tumults, violence, and licentiouſneſs.

" Again, That the prince may not make uſe of this high and perpetual power to the hurt of thoſe for whoſe good he hath it; and make uſe of the name of public neceſſity, for the gain of his private favourites and followers, to the detriment of his people, the houſe of commons, (an excellent conſerver of liberty, but never intended for any ſhare in government, or the chuſing of them that ſhould govern) is ſolely intruſted with the firſt propoſitions concerning the levies of monies, (which is the ſinews as well of peace as of war) and the impeaching of thoſe, who for their own ends, though countenanced by any ſurreptitiouſly-gotten command of the king, have violated that law, which he is bound (when he knows it) to protect; and to the proſecution of which they were bound to adviſe him, at leaſt not to ſerve him in the contrary. And the lords being truſted with a judicatory power, are an excellent ſkreen and bank between the prince and people, to aſſiſt each againſt any incroachments of the other; and by juſt judgments to preſerve that law, which ought to be the rule of every one of the three. For the better enabling them in this, beyond the examples of any of our anceſtors, we were willingly contented to oblige ourſelf, both to call a parliament every three years, and not to diſſolve it in fifty days: and for the preſent exigent, the better to raiſe money, and to avoid the preſſure (no leſs grievous to us than them) our people muſt have ſuffered by a longer continuance of ſo vaſt a charge as two great armies; and for their greater certainty of having ſufficient time to remedy the inconveniences ariſen, during ſo long an abſence of parliaments, and for the puniſhment of the cauſers and miniſters of them, we yielded up our right of diſſolving this parliament, expecting an extraordinary moderation from it, in gratitude for ſo unexampled a grace, and little looking that any malignant party ſhould be encouraged, or enabled to have perſuaded them, firſt, to countenance the injuſtices and indignities we have endured, and then by a new way of ſatisfaction for what was taken from us, to demand of us at once to confirm what was ſo taken, and to give up almoſt all the reſt.

" Since therefore the power, legally placed in both houſes, is more than ſufficient to prevent and reſtrain the power of tyranny; and without the power, which is now aſked from us, we ſhall not be able to diſcharge that truſt, which is the end of monarchy, ſince this would be a total ſubverſion of the fundamental laws, and that excellent conſtitution of this kingdom, which hath made this nation, ſo many years, both famous and happy to a great degree of envy; ſince to the power of puniſhing, (which is already in your hands according to law) if the power of preferring be added, we ſhall have nothing left for us but to look on, ſince the incroaching of one of theſe eſtates upon the power of the other, is unhappy in the effects both to them and all the reſt, ſince this power, of at moſt a joint government in us with our counſellors (or rather our guardians) will return us to the worſt kind of minority, and make us deſpicable both at home and abroad, and beget eternal factions and diſſenſions (as deſtructive to public happineſs as war) both in the choſen, and in the houſes that choſe them, and the people who choſe the chuſers; ſince ſo new a power will undoubtedly intoxicate perſons who were not born to it, and beget not only diviſions among them as equals, but in them contempt of us, as become an equal to them, and inſolence and injuſtice toward our people, and now ſo much their inferior, which ſhall be the more grievous unto them, as ſuffering from thoſe who were ſo lately of a nearer degree to themſelves: and being to have redreſs only from thoſe that placed them; and fearing they may be inclined to preſerve what they have made, both out of kindneſs and policy, ſince all great changes are extremely inconvenient, and almoſt infallibly beget yet greater changes, which beget yet greater inconveniencies.

" Since as great an one in the church muſt follow this of the kingdom; ſince the ſecond eſtate would in all probability follow the fate of the firſt, and by ſome of the turbulent ſpirits, jealouſies would ſoon be raiſed againſt them, and the like propoſitions for reconciliation of differences would be then ſent to them, as they now have joined to ſend to us, till (all power being veſted in the houſe of commons, and their number making them incapable of tranſacting affairs of ſtate with the neceſſary ſervice and expedition, thoſe being retruſted to ſome cloſe committee) at laſt the common people (who in the mean time muſt be flattered, and to whom licence muſt be given in all their wild humours, how contrary ſoever to eſtabliſhed law, or their own real good) diſcover this Arcanum imperii, That all this was done by them, but not for them; and grow weary of journey-work, and ſet up for themſelves, call parity and independence liberty; devour that eſtate which had devoured the reſt; deſtroy all rights and properties, all diſtinctions of families and merit; and by this means this ſplendid and excellently diſtinguiſhed form of government, end in a dark equal chaos of confuſion, and the long line of our many noble anceſtors in a Jack Cade, or a Wat Tyler.

" For all theſe reaſons, to all theſe demands our anſwer is, Nolumus Leges Angliæ mutari: but this we promiſe, that we will be as careful of preſerving the laws, in what is ſuppoſed to concern wholly our ſubjects, as in what moſt concerns ourſelf: for indeed we profeſs to believe, that the preſervation of every law concerns us, thoſe of obedience not being ſecure, when thoſe of protection are violated: and we being, moſt of any, injured in the leaſt violation of that, by which we enjoy the higheſt rights and greateſt benefits, and are therefore obliged to defend no leſs by our intereſt, than by our duty, and hope that no jealouſies to the contrary ſhall be any longer nouriſhed in any of our good people, by the ſubtle inſinuations, and ſecret practices of men, who, for private ends, are diſaffected to our honour and ſafety, and the peace and proſperity of our people. And to ſhew you, that no juſt indignation at ſo reproachful offers, ſhall make us refuſe to grant what is probable to conduce to the good of our good people, becauſe of the ill company it comes in, we will ſearch carefully in this heap of unreaſonable demands, for ſo much as we may (complying with our conſcience, and the duty of our truſt) aſſent unto, and ſhall accordingly agree to it.

" In purſuance of which ſearch in the fourth propoſition, under a demand, which would take from us that truſt, which God, nature, and the laws of the land have placed in us, and of which none of you could endure to be deprived, we find ſomething to which we give this anſwer, That we have committed the principal places about our children to perſons of quality, integrity, and piety, with ſpecial regard that their tender years might be ſo ſeaſoned with the principles of the true proteſtant religion, as (by the bleſſing of God upon this our care) this whole kingdom may in due time reap the fruits thereof: and as we have been likewiſe very careful in the choice of ſervants about them, that none of them may be ſuch, as by ill principles, or by ill examples, to croſs our endeavours for their pious and virtuous education; ſo if there ſhall be found (for all our care to prevent it) any perſon about our children, (or about us, which is more than you aſk) againſt whom both houſes ſhall make appear to us any juſt exception, we ſhall not only remove them, but thank you for the information; only we ſhall expect that you ſhall be likewiſe careful, that there be no underhand-dealing by any, to ſeek faults, to make room for others to ſucceed in their places.

" For the fifth demand, as we will not ſuffer any to ſhare with us in our power of treaties, which are moſt improper for parliaments, and leaſt of all in thoſe treaties in which we are neareſt concerned, not only as a king, but as a father; yet we do (ſuch is our deſire to give all reaſonable ſatisfaction) aſſure you by the word of a king, that we ſhall never propoſe or entertain any treaty whatſoever for the marriage of any of our children, without due regard to the true proteſtant profeſſion, the good of our kingdom, and the honour of our family.

" For the ſixth demand, concerning the laws in force againſt jeſuits, prieſts, and popiſh recuſants, we have, by many of our meſſages to you, by our voluntary promiſes to you ſo ſolemnly made, never to pardon any popiſh prieſt, by our ſtrict proclamations lately publiſhed in this point, and by the public examples which we have made in that caſe ſince our reſidence at York, and before at London, ſufficiently expreſſed our zeal herein. Why do you then aſk that in which our own inclination hath prevented you? And if you can yet find any more effectual courſe to diſable them from diſturbing the ſtate, or eluding the law by truſt or otherwiſe, we ſhall willingly give our conſent to it.

" For the ſeventh demand, concerning the votes of the popiſh lords; we underſtand, that they in diſcretion have withdrawn themſelves from the ſervice of the houſe of peers, and had done ſo when uſe was publicly made of their names to aſperſe the votes of that houſe, (which was then counted as malignant as thoſe, who are called our unknown and unſworn counſellors, are now;) neither do we conceive, that ſuch a poſitive law againſt the votes of any whoſe blood gives them that right, is ſo proper in regard of the privilege of parliament, but are content, that ſo long as they ſhall not be conformable to the doctrine and diſcipline of the church of England, they ſhall not be admitted to ſit in the houſe of peers, but only to give their proxies to ſuch proteſtant lords as they ſhall chooſe, who are to diſpoſe of them as they themſelves ſhall think fit, without any reference at all to the giver.

" As to the deſires for a bill for the education of papiſts by proteſtants in the proteſtant profeſſion, many about us can witneſs with us, that we have often delivered our opinion, that ſuch a courſe (with God's bleſſing upon it) would be the moſt effectual for the rooting popery out of this kingdom; we ſhall therefore thank you for it, and encourage you in it, and when it comes unto us, do our duty; and we heartily wiſh for the public good, that the time you have ſpent in making ordinances without us, had been employed in preparing this and other good bills for us.

" For the eighth, touching the reformation to be made of the church-government and liturgy, we had hoped, that what we had formerly declared concerning the ſame, had been ſo ſufficiently underſtood by you, and all good ſubjects, that we ſhould not need to have expreſſed ourſelf further in it. We told you in our anſwer to your petition, preſented to us at Hampton-court the 1ſt of December, that for any illegal innovations which may have crept in, we ſhould willingly concur in the removal of them; and if our parliament ſhould adviſe us to call a national ſynod, which may duly examine ſuch ceremonies as give juſt cauſe of offence to any, we ſhould take it into conſideration, and apply ourſelf to give due ſatisfaction therein; that we were perſuaded in our conſcience, that no church could be found upon the earth, that profeſſeth the true religion with more purity of doctrine than the church of England doth, nor where the government and diſcipline are jointly more beautified and free from ſuperſtition, than as they are here eſtabliſhed by law: which (by the grace of God) we will with conſtancy maintain (while we live) in their purity and glory, not only againſt all invaſions of popery, but alſo from the irreverence of thoſe many ſchiſmatics and ſeparatiſts, wherewith of late this kingdom, and our city of London, abounds, to the great diſhonour and hazard both of church and ſtate, for the ſuppreſſion of whom we required your timely and active aſſiſtance. We told you in our firſt declaration, printed by the advice of our privy-council, 'That for differences amongſt ourſelves for matters indifferent in their own nature concerning religion, we ſhould, in tenderneſs to any number of our loving ſubjects, very willingly comply with the advice of our parliament, that ſome law might be made for the exemption of tender conſcience from puniſhment, or proſecution for ſuch ceremonies, and in ſuch caſes, which by the judgment of moſt men are held to be matters indifferent, and of ſome to be abſolutely unlawful; provided that this caſe ſhould be attempted and purſued with that modeſty, temper, and ſubmiſſion, that in the mean time the peace and quiet of the kingdom be not diſturbed, the decency and comlineſs of God's ſervice diſcountenanced, nor the pious, ſober, devout actions of thoſe reverend perſons who were the firſt labourers in the bleſſed reformation, or of that time, be ſcandalized and defamed.' And we heartily wiſh, that others whom it concerned, had been as ready as their duty bound them, though they had not received it from us, to have purſued this caution, as we were, and ſtill are willing and ready to make good every particular of that promiſe. Nor did we only appear willing to join in ſo good a work, when it ſhould be brought us, but preſſed and urged you to it by our meſſage of the 14th of February, in theſe words: 'And becauſe his majeſty obſerves great and different troubles to ariſe in the hearts of people, concerning the government and liturgy of the church, his majeſty is willing to declare, that he will refer the whole conſideration to the wiſdom of his parliament, which he deſires them to enter into ſpeedily, that the preſent diſtractions about the ſame may be compoſed; but deſires not to be preſſed to any ſingle act on his part till the whole be ſo digeſted and ſettled by both houſes, that his majeſty may clearly ſee what is fit to be left, as well as what is fit to be taken away:' of which we the more hoped of a good ſucceſs to the general ſatisfaction of our people, becauſe you ſeem in this propoſition to deſire but a reformation, and not, as is daily preached for as neceſſary in thoſe many conventicles, which have within theſe nineteen months begun to ſwarm, and which, though their leaders differ from you in this opinion, yet appear to many as countenanced by you, by not being puniſhed by you (few elſe, by reaſon of the order of the houſe of commons of the 9th of September, daring to do it) a deſtruction of the preſent diſcipline and liturgy. And we ſhall moſt chearfully give our beſt aſſiſtance for raiſing a ſufficient maintenance for preaching miniſters, in ſuch courſe as ſhall be moſt for the encouragement and advancement of piety and learning.

" For the bills you mention, and the conſultation you intimate, knowing nothing of the particular matters of the one (though we like the titles well) not of the manner of the other, but from an informer, (to whom we give little credit, and we wiſh no man did more) common fame, we can ſay nothing till we ſee them.

" For the eleventh, we could not have the oath of all privy-counſellors and judges ſtraitened to particular ſtatutes of one or two particular parliaments, but extend to all ſtatutes of all parliaments, and the whole law of the land; and ſhall willingly conſent, that an inquiry of all the breaches and violations of the law may be given in charge by the juſtices of the King's-bench every term, and by the judges of aſſize in their circuits, and juſtices of the peace at the ſeſſions, to be preſented and puniſhed according to law.

" For the ſeventeenth, we ſhall ever be moſt ready, (and we are ſorry it ſhould be thought needful to move us in it) not only to join with any (particularly with the States of the United Provinces, of which we have given a late proof in the match of our daughter) for the defence and maintenance of the proteſtant religion againſt all deſigns and attempts of the pope and his adherents; but ſingly (if need were) to oppoſe with our life and fortune all ſuch deſigns in all other nations, were they joined: and that for conſiderations of conſcience, far more than any temporal end of obtaining acceſs of ſtrength and reputation, or any natural end of reſtoring our royal ſiſter and her princely iſſue to their dignities and dominions, though theſe be likewiſe much conſidered by us.

" For the eighteenth, it was not our fault that an act was not paſſed to clear the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the houſe of commons, but yours, who inſerted clauſes into both the preamble and act, (perhaps perſuaded to it by ſome who wiſh not that you ſhould in any thing receive ſatisfaction from us) as by paſſing the preamble, we muſt have wounded our honour againſt our conſcience, and by another clauſe have admitted a conſequence, from which we could never have been ſecured, by declaring, that no member of either houſe, upon any accuſation of treaſon, could have his perſon ſeized without the conſent of that houſe of which he is a member; though the known law be, 'That privilege of parliament extends not to treaſon;' and if it did, any member (the houſe being for a ſhort time adjourned, and ſo their conſent not being ſo had) how treaſonable ſoever his intentions were, how clearly ſoever known, and how ſuddenly ſoever to be executed, muſt have fair leave given him to go on and purſue them; no way, how legal ſoever, after the paſſing ſuch a clauſe, being left to prevent it. (3.)

Rem. (3.) The king, in ſhewing the inconveniencies of this clauſe, lays down a caſe different from that of the ſix members accuſed. For he ſuppoſes, to demonſtrate theſe inconveniencies, that the treaſon is manifeſt, and juſt going to be executed. Whereas the difference between the king and the parliament conſiſted, in that the parliament deſired to ſee the proofs, before they conſented to the proſecution of their members. Beſides, this maxim, that the privileges of parliament extend not to treaſonable caſes, is very ambiguous. For it may ſignify, either that in caſe of real, manifeſt, or apparent treaſon, the members of parliament have no more privilege than the reſt of the ſubjects, or elſe that by a bare accuſation of treaſon, true or falſe, a member may be committed to priſon like any other private perſon. The king took it, and would have it taken, in this laſt ſenſe, but the parliament would admit it only in the firſt. But that the king's ſenſe was wrong, evidently appears, in that when, for inſtance, a peer is accuſed of treaſon, he is not ſent to the Tower, according to the uſual courſe of juſtice, as a private perſon would be, but by order of his houſe, which thinks proper to conſent to his proſecution. Without this conſent, the king cannot ſend him to the Tower by his own authority, and upon a bare accuſation. In ſhort, no leſs inconveniencies would attend the king's ſenſe, ſince in that caſe the king, upon bare accuſations, true or falſe, might impriſon all the principal members of both houſes.

" To conclude, we conjure you, and all men, to reſt ſatisfied with the truth of our profeſſions, and the reality of our intentions, not to aſk ſuch things as deny themſelves; that you declare againſt tumults, and puniſh the authors; that you allow us our property in our towns, arms, and goods, and our ſhare in the legiſlative power, which would be counted in us not only breach of privilege, but tyranny and ſubverſion of parliaments, to deny to you. And when you you ſhall have given us ſatisfaction upon thoſe perſons who have taken away the one, and recalled thoſe declarations (particularly that of the 26th of May) and thoſe in the point of the militia (our juſt rights, wherein we will no more part with than with our crown, leſt we enable others by them to take that from us) which would take away the other, and declined the beginnings of a war againſt us, under pretence of our intention of making one againſt you; as we have never oppoſed the firſt part of the thirteenth demand, ſo we ſhall be ready to concur with you in the latter.

"And being then confident, that the credit of thoſe men, who deſired a general combuſtion, will be ſo weakened with you, that they will not be able to do this kingdom any more harm, we ſhall be willing to grant our general pardon, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be thought fit, and ſhall receive much more joy in the hope of a full and conſtant happineſs of our people in the true religion, and under the protection of the law, by a bleſſed union between us, and our parliament (ſo much deſired by us) than any ſuch increaſe of our revenue, (how much ſoever beyond former grants) as (when our ſubjects were wealthieſt) our parliament could have ſettled upon us."

I ſhall make but one general remark upon this anſwer of the king, and which to me ſeems abſolutely neceſſary, namely, that all the beginning, which includes two thirds, is entirely needleſs, ſince the king treats not of the point in diſpute between him and the parliament. The queſtion was not to know, whether the laws aſcribed ſuch and ſuch power to the king, but to know, whether the king having abuſed this power, his promiſe, that he would govern according to the law of the land, was to be depended upon for the future. The king throughout the beginning of his anſwer, ſuppoſes an ignorance of what is due to a king of England, or a cauſeleſs denial of the ſame. As to the firſt point, he pretends to acquaint the public with the nature of the Engliſh conſtitution, which was very needleſs, ſince nobody diſagreed with him. He keeps to the general poſition acknowledged by all the world, but ſays not a word to the particular queſtion, which was the ſole ſubject of the diſpute. As to the ſecond point, he does not deny that he had abuſed his power, but makes no other anſwer to the conſequence drawn by the parliament from this abuſe, than that he promiſes to behave better for the future.

It is eaſy to ſee, that neither the parliament's propoſitions, nor the king's anſwer, were proper to beget an accommodation. Accordingly, it may be affirmed, that neither ſide thought of any ſuch thing. When the king publiſhed his anſwer, he had received ſome arms, ammunition, and pieces of ordnance from Holland, and beſides that, was preparing to beſiege Hull. Though great part of the arms were now removed to London, he hoped ſtill to find there ſufficient for his moſt urgent occaſions. Moreover, this place, which was one of the ſtrongeſt in the kingdom, could be of great ſervice to him, to keep the adjacent country in his intereſt.

On the other hand, the preſbyterian party, who then prevailed in the parliament, had almoſt attained their deſire, that is, had brought things to a rupture, which gave them room to hope, they ſhould quickly have opportunity to accompliſh the reſt of their project. Indeed, this rupture between the king and the parliament being ſuppoſed, it was manifeſt, the kingdom was to be governed by the parliament and the king, ſeparately, and not jointly, as before, that is, they would each govern thoſe of their party; in which caſe, the parliament would have no more occaſion for the king's conſent, who would be looked upon as an enemy, and conſequently, they might ordain whatever they pleaſed, without any oppoſition. This was preciſely the point in which all the proceedings of the preſbyterian party had tended, without their diſcovering themſelves however, any more than was neceſſary to ſupport the expectations of their adherents. For till now it highly concerned them to make the public, and the members who were not of their ſide believe, that they acted in conjunction with the other members, only with the view of vindicating the common liberty, againſt the incroachments of the king.

It is certain, that from the beginning, there was in this parliament, a preſbyterian party, whoſe aims was to alter the church-government. But that this was the ſole aim of the preſbyterians, as many aſſert, is what does not to me appear evident, Why might not theſe men, in ſtriving to erect their diſcipline upon the ruins of the church, have another end, I mean, the prevention of the king and his party's incroachments upon the public liberty? There were, certainly, in this very parliament, members who were very far from being preſbyterians, and yet had the ſame end: why might not the preſbyterians have it too, jointly with that which was peculiar to them? Is it ſo uncommon a thing, to ſee people propoſe to themſelves two different ends, in one and the ſame undertaking? I confeſs I do not ſee the improbability of ſuch a propoſition. The preſbyterian party therefore muſt be conſidered as acting with thoſe two views, and this is ſo true, that undeniable proofs of it will appear in the ſequel of this reign. But their enemies have been pleaſed to aſcribe to them the firſt only, in order to charge them with putting the kingdom in a flame, for the ſake of eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian government in the church. I do not deny, that this motive contributed very much to it. But it does not follow, that the reaſons on which the parliament refuſed to confide in the king, were frivolous. The contrary may be rather inferred. For if theſe reaſons had not been plauſible, the preſbyterians would never have been able to execute their projects, and form ſo ſtrong a party in a kingdom, where, at the beginning of this parliament, they made ſo inconſiderable a figure. But they politicly make uſe of the general diſcontent, which actually ſubſiſted, to bring matters to the point they deſired. They cannot be ſaid to have cauſed this univerſal diſcontent, though it is certain, they helped to inflame it, becauſe it was neceſſary to their views.

The parliament having received advice from Holland, that the queen had pawned or ſold ſome of the crown-jewels at Amſterdam, publiſhed the 2d of June an order, declaring, that whoſoever was concerned in the ſelling or pawning theſe jewels, or in the bringing any money to the king, by way of bill of exchange, or otherwiſe, ſhould be accounted an enemy to the ſtate. But the queen had already laid out the money in purchaſing arms and ammunition, which ſhe had conveyed to the king, in a ſmall ſhip called the Providence, which, the very day the parliament publiſhed this order, ſafely arrived in Burlington-bay, after having been warmly purſued by part of the parliament's fleet, commanded by the earl of Warwick [q].

Some time before the king, finding a war unavoidable, had ordered his friends in both houſes, to abſent themſelves from the parliament. He hoped, by leſſening ſo conſiderably the number of the members, to leſſen the credit of the parliament. But this policy turned not to his advantage. It is true, both houſes were conſiderably leſſened in number. But withal, the king's party there grew ſo weak that they could no longer oppoſe the reſolutions taken againſt the king. Though the two houſes were not ſorry to be rid of theſe ſpies, they believed however, it was neceſſary to take ſome meaſures, either to hinder a greater deſertion, or to convince the people, it was not their fault if the parliament was not ſo numerous as hitherto. The commons therefore ordered all the ſheriffs of the kingdom, to give notice to the repreſentatives, to attend the houſe by the 16th of June, on the forfeiture of one hundred pounds, to be employed in the wars in Ireland, and on pain of undergoing ſuch farther puniſhment as the houſe ſhould think fit.

But the lords went ſtill farther, for they ordered nine of their members [r], who had repaired to the king at York, to appear at the bar the 8th of June as delinquents. Theſe nine lords having ſent their excuſe by a letter, the commons forthwith prepared an impeachment againſt them, and ſent it up to the lords. The 27th of the ſame month [s], the peers pronounced ſentence againſt the nine lords, declaring, they ſhould neither ſit or vote in the houſe during the preſent parliament, and ſhould ſtand committed to the Tower during the pleaſure of the houſe.

Theſe were little preludes to the war which was going to be kindled. But the 10th of June, both houſes gave a more evident proof of their deſign; for upon receiving advice, that the king was actually giving out commiſſions to levy forces, they publiſhed propoſals for the bringing in of money or plate, at eight per cent. for the defence of the kingdom[t]. This is what the king's friends will have to be conſidered as the firſt declaration of war on the parliament's ſide, and pretend thereby to ſhew, that both houſes were the aggreſſors. But it is certain, the king, long before, had taken meaſures to prepare for war, and there is no doubt the parliament had done the ſame, though perhaps more ſecretly than the king. Be this as it will, after having ſeen what were the true grounds and cauſes of the war, it ſeems of little moment to know, which of the two parties firſt diſcovered the meaſures taken to attack or defend. For that at moſt is the meaning of the queſtion, 'Which of the parties began the war?'

The king having notice of what the parliament had done for the ſpeedy raiſing of money, writ to the lord-mayor of London, commanding him to publiſh his letter, wherein he forbid the citizens to lend any money to both houſes. This letter occaſioned their publiſhing a declaration, the aim whereof was to ſhew the people, that the parliament was under an abſolute neceſſity of preparing for their defence. They ſaid his majeſty having ſo often threatened them about Hull and the militia, they could not but conſider his preparations as a deſign to levy war againſt his parliament.

The king made to this declaration a long anſwer, full of reproaches of the illegal proceedings of both houſes againſt him. He did not deny, that he intended to have juſtice in the caſes of Hull and the militia, or loſe his life in requiring it; and affirmed, that this was no proof of a deſign to make war againſt the parliament, but only of his intention to defend himſelf againſt their attacks. The parliament ſaid the ſame thing on their part, and each endeavoured to caſt the blame of the war on the oppoſite party. I did not think it neceſſary to inſert theſe laſt papers, there being nothing new in them. They contain the ſame reproaches, and the ſame vindications on both ſides, as were ſeen in the former declarations. I ſhall only obſerve, that even when the war was going to commence, and there was no more hopes of an accommodation, the king thought it very ſtrange, that his prerogatives ſhould be violated, and the parliament raiſe forces without his approbation. He always uſed the ſame ſtile, even the very midſt of the war. In ſhort, the parliament, weary of theſe paper-ſkirmiſhes, of which there was no end, and which conſumed a great deal of time, prohibited, by a printed order, the publiſhing any declarations or papers in the king's name, that ſhould be contrary to the ordinances of the parliament. After that there was no hope of peace, and accordingly, all thoughts of it were laid aſide by both parties.

The king, before he came to an open declaration, had a mind to execute two deſigns he had formed. The firſt was, to become maſter of the fleet; the ſecond, to beſiege Hull. The project of the fleet was ſolely founded in the expectation, that the captains of the ſhips would declare for him as ſoon as commanded. In this belief, he writ to each captain in particular, requiring him, without delay, and without demanding the orders of his ſuperiors, to bring away his ſhip to Burlington-bay, and yield no farther obedience to the earl of Warwick. He ſent withal a letter to the earl of Warwick, to diſcharge him from the command of the fleet. The letters to the captains were to be delivered, as indeed they were, before that directed to the earl of Warwick. The king diſpatched at the ſame time a meſſenger to London, to carry to the earl of Nortumberland a revocation of his commiſſion of admiral, under the great ſeal. The earl of Warwick, who was then on ſhore, having notice of what paſſed in the fleet, went immediately on board his ſhip, and ſummoned all the captains to attend him at a council of war. All obeyed, notwithſtanding the king's orders, except five, who united together to make their defence, in caſe they ſhould be attacked. The reſt proteſted to their admiral, they would obey his commands. As ſoon as he had ſecured theſe, he cauſed them to come to an anchor round the five others, to force them to ſubmit. But three of them thought fit to come in upon a ſummons. The two that ſtill remained obſtinate, ſuffered themſelves to be ſhamefully taken by unarmed boats, and were ſent to London. Thus the king was diſappointed of his aim, for which, though of great importance, he had not doubtleſs taken very proper meaſures, as appeared by the event[u].

After this fruitleſs attempt, the king believed it in vain to diſſemble any longer, and that he muſt at laſt begin the war. To that end, he ordered William Cavendiſh earl of Newcaſtle to ſecure the town of Newcaſtle; which was performed, though with ſome difficulty, and then he cauſed alſo Tinmouth caſtle to be ſeized. At the ſame time, he ſent many lords and gentlemen into their reſpective ſhires to levy forces, and by a patent under the great ſeal, appointed William Seymour earl of Hertford, his lieutenant-general of the weſtern counties. He kept near his perſon Robert Bartu earl of Lindſey, to be, under him, general of his army. Sir Jacob Aſhley was general of the foot, and the place of general of the horſe was reſerved for prince Rupert, the king's nephew and brother to the elector Palatine, who was daily expected.

Though the king had pretended to raiſe only a guard for his perſon, it was found however, that in the beginning of July, he had about three thouſand foot, and ſeven or eight hundred horſe, with which he reſolved to march to Hull. He ſtaid ſome days at Beverly, and publiſhed a proclamation, to ſignify his intention to beſiege Hull, and the reaſon that induced him thereto. As they have already been mentioned, it is needleſs to repeat them. Three days after, he ſent the proclamation to the parliament, with a meſſage, requiring them, that the Town of Hull might be forthwith delivered to him.

Before the parliament received the meſſage, they had reſolved to preſent a petition to his majeſty, to pray him, in a very humble manner, to forbear all preparations for war; to remove his forces from about Hull; to diſmiſs his troops; to ſend away his garriſons from Newcaſtle, Tinmouth, and other places; for which they promiſed alſo, on their part, to diſcontinue all the preparations they had been forced to make for their defence. The king returned a long anſwer in writing to this petition, wherein he repeated great part of what he had ſaid in his declarations. He made likewiſe ſome propoſitions to both houſes, allowing them to the 27th of July for a full and poſitive anſwer.

The parliament having returned an unſatisfactory anſwer to the propoſitions, the king reſolved to begin the ſiege of Hull. But the enterprize was ſo unſucceſsful, that after having been ſome time before the town, without making any progreſs, he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege or rather blockade, and return to York. The earl of Clarendon ſays, the king undertook the ſiege of Hull, upon the aſſurance given him by ſir John Hotham, that he would ſurrender the town at the firſt ſhot, but that it was not poſſible for Hotham to perform his word[x].

The king, as I before ſaid, had, ſome months ſince, gained Colonel Goring governor of Portſmouth, who feigning to keep the place for the parliament, held it indeed for the king. He received money from both ſides, to reinforce the garriſon and raiſe new works, the parliament not miſtruſting him, and the king relying on his word. At laſt, about the time the king was before Hull, Goring openly declared for him. This happened in the beginning of Auguſt, but three weeks after the parliament had iſſued out orders for levying an army, to be commanded by Robert Devereux earl of Eſſex[y]. This army not being yet ready, both houſes, though aſtoniſhed at Goring's defection, were not however diſcouraged. As it was of the utmoſt importance to recover this place, the ſtrongeſt in the kingdom, before the king ſhould be able to relieve it, they haſtily diſpatched a committee, whom they impowered to aſſemble the militia of the neighbouring counties to block up Portſmouth by land, while the earl of Warwick, by their order, blocked it up by ſea. Happily for the parliament, Goring, though he had received from them three thouſand pounds, and the like ſum from the king, had neglected to lay in the neceſſary proviſions for a ſiege, and particularly corn and ſalt; ſo that in the very beginning of the blockade, he perceived he could not reſiſt long. This made him to reſolve to capitulate. He ſurrendered the place to the committee, only for liberty to retire into Holland, and for his officers to repair to the king.

And this he ſays, induced the king to march to Beverly, in order to beſiege Hull, before, he had any thing in readineſs for ſuch an undertaking. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 546, &c.

During the blockade of Portſmouth, the king not doubting but Goring was in condition to defend that place, publiſhed at laſt a declaration that had long been prepared, wherein he ſums up all the complaints he had already made againſt both houſes. As the reader is ſufficiently informed, there is no occaſion to inſert this new declaration. Only it muſt be remarked, that the king declared both houſes guilty of high-treaſon, and forbid all his ſubjects to obey them. At the ſame time was alſo publiſhed a proclamation, requiring all men who could bear arms, to repair to him by the 25th of Auguſt at Nottingham, where he intended to ſet up his royal ſtandard, which all good ſubjects were obliged to attend. The ſetting up of the royal ſtandard, was the ancient manner of making known to the people the king's urgent occaſion for their aid, and the place to which they were to repair to aſſiſt him. The king could not forbear thinking, he was ſtill to be conſidered as an ordinary king, and to have the ſame reſpect and obedience paid to him, as if he had never given his people any cauſe of complaint. He imagined, that the acts of grace he had paſſed in this parliament, and his promiſes to behave better for the future, had effaced all the ill impreſſions made by his paſt government upon his ſubjects; and that, though there was a powerful party againſt him in the parliament, it was otherwiſe among the people. He thought therefore, the ſetting up his ſtandard would make a ſtrong impreſſion on the people, and induce them to appear in arms at Nottingham. But the prejudices were too deeply rooted in the minds of moſt of the ſubjects, for a bare ceremony to remove them.

Whilſt the day appointed for the ſetting up of the ſtandard was expected, the king endeavoured to augment the number of his forces. He gave out freſh commiſſions, and ſent the earl of Hertford and ſome other lords and gentlemen to manage his concerns, and raiſe troops in the weſtern parts. For himſelf, he departed from York ſome days before the 25th of Auguſt, and in his way took Lincoln, from whence he drew the arms of the train-bands for his troops; after which he came to Nottingham, and the next day reviewed his horſe.

The review was no ſooner ended, but he was informed that two regiments of foot were marching to Coventry by the earl of Eſſex's orders. Whereupon he haſtened thither with his cavalry, conſiſting of ſeven or eight hundred horſe, in hopes of preventing the parliament's forces, and poſſeſſing himſelf of that city. Accordingly he arrived there the day before the two regiments: but the mayor of the city, though without a garriſon, ſhut the gates againſt him, and fired upon his men. He was very ſenſibly touched with this indignity; but as there was no remedy, he was forced to return to Nottingham, leaving the command of his cavalry to commiſſary-general Wilmot,

The next day, his horſe being upon a plain of five or ſix miles extent, where nothing incumbered them, had a clear view of a body of twelve hundred of the enemies foot, guarded only by one troop of horſe. Wilmot, it ſeemed, could not have wiſhed for a fairer opportunity to attack with advantage this body of foot, who had nothing to ſecure them. But, for what reaſon it is not known, inſtead of attacking the enemies, he thought only of avoiding them, and even retreated with ſome precipitation. This was a bad omen to a war juſt commenced.

At laſt, on the 25th of Auguſt, the king cauſed his ſtandard to be erected on a turret of Nottingham caſtle[z], having only with him ſome unarmed train-bands. His proclamation had produced ſo little effect, that few were come to attend the royal ſtandard. Nay, it happened, the very day the ſtandard was erected, to grow ſo tempeſtuous, that it was blown down, and could not be fixed again in a day or two. This was looked upon by many as a fatal preſage of the war. The king had imagined, that the ſetting up of his ſtandard would draw a great numbers of people to Nottingham, who would come and offer him their ſervice: but he was very much diſappointed. He had with him but three hundred foot, and ſome train-bands drawn together by ſir John Digby ſheriff of the county. His cavalry conſiſted only of eight hundred horſe, and his artillery was ſtill at York, from whence it was difficult to bring it, many things being yet wanted to prepare and form it for marching, and beſide there were no foot to guard it. Nevertheleſs, as he had given out many commiſſions, and ordered his forces to repair to Nottingham, he expected them in that town, though not without danger, the parliament having at Coventry five thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe. Thus the king was in a very melancholy ſtate before the war was well begun. He had appointed Robert Bartu earl of Lindſey for general, but had yet no army. The princes Rupert and Maurice his nephews, brothers of the elector Palatine, being come to offer him their ſervice in the beginning of September, he made prince Rupert general of his horſe, quartered at Leiceſter, whither the prince went and took upon him the command.

The king it is certain, was in extreme danger at Nottingham. The town was not in condition to make a long reſiſtance, and the king having ſcarce any forces, if the parliament's troops, which were within twenty miles of the place, had marched directly to him, he muſt have been forced to retire with diſhonour to York, unleſs he would have hazarded his being made priſoner. All thoſe about him ſaw the danger, it being ſo evident; but it was not eaſy to avoid it without quitting Nottingham, which could not but be very prejudicial to him. For this reaſon it was moved in the council, to ſend a meſſage to both houſes, with ſome overture to incline them to a treaty. The intent of this propoſition was doubtleſs to intimate to the king, that his affairs were in ſuch a ſituation, that peace alone could free him from the perplexity and danger he was expoſed to. But the mover of this advice could hardly think, that a bare offer of peace was able to effect it, after what had paſſed before the rupture. Very likely therefore, his deſign was that, in propoſing a peace, ſomething more ſhould be offered, than what had been offered before. The king eaſily perceived the intimation, and was ſo offended at it, that he broke up the council, that it might not be no longer urged.

However, the next day, the ſame motion was renewed, but under a different view. As it was doubtleſs perceived, that what had offended the king, was the plain meaning of propoſing a peace, namely, that his majeſty muſt depart from ſome of his pretenſions, care was taken to remove this odious meaning, and it was adviſed only to ſend a meſſage to both houſes, in order to gain time. The king ſtill oppoſed it, alleging, to offer peace in ſuch a juncture, would be diſcovering his weakneſs: That his enemies would reject the offer with inſolence, and nothing but diſhonour would thereby reflect on himſelf. But it was repreſented to him, that ſuch a meſſage might do good, but could do no harm: That indeed, both houſes, very likely, would reject the offer, but they would thereby render themſelves odious to the people, who were deſirous of peace, and who would be the more inclined to ſerve his majeſty, for his endeavours to procure it: That if the overture was accepted, the king would have an opportunity of demonſtrating, that the war, on his part, was purely defenſive: In ſhort, that the bare offer of peace would of courſe retard the preparations of the parliament, becauſe mens minds would be in ſuſpenſe, whilſt the king's levies might be continued by virtue of the commiſſions already ſent out.

The king yielded to theſe reaſons, becauſe the point was not to offer any new conditions, but only to lay a ſnare for the parliament, and retard their preparations. This was the ſole motive of the meſſage, wherein, as we ſhall ſee preſently, the king propoſed nothing new, and which, however, he repreſented afterwards as an evident ſign of his ſincere deſire of peace. But though ſome pretend, that his majeſty's meſſage, and the parliament's refuſal, contributed very much to facilitate the king's levies, and undeceive the people of their good opinion of the intentions of both houſes, I cannot believe that ſuch weak reaſons were able to produce ſo great effects. It is true, if by the people be meant only thoſe who were devoted to the king, it is not unlikely, that the refuſal of peace might render the parliament odious to them, and promote their taking up arms for the king. But if by the people, be underſtood the parliament's party, or rather all the people in general and without diſtinction, it is not eaſy to conceive, how the refuſal of a bare propoſition, without any thing new in it, could produce ſuch an effect [a]. The people, no doubt, wiſhed

[a] It is judiciouſly obſerved by a modern author, That thoſe on whom the parliament's repreſentations prevailed, were generally people of the midland counties, and the traders in the ſouthern parts of the kingdom, who had ſmarted moſt by the arbitrary acts of power, ſuch as ſeizure of goods, proſecutions for ſhip-money, loans, tunnage, and poundage, illegal imprionment, &c. for peace rather than war. But they would have a ſolid peace, ſupported by other foundations than the king's bare word, and not a peace in general, ſuch as his majeſty propoſed. They had already rejected ſuch a peace; and upon this ſenſe of the nation it was, that the parliament's whole authority was founded. This was no new thing: it had been long diſputed without coming to any concluſion. How therefore could the bare propoſal of a treaty, without any particular offer, incline the people ſo ſtrongly to the king, and render the parliament more odious, if it was rejected? And yet, upon this foundation the king conſtantly built, from the beginning of the war, as will appear in the ſequel. The ſecond reaſon was wholly founded on the prejudices of the privy-counſellors. For, ſuppoſing the negotiation had been entered into, by what freſh evidence would the king have been able to demonſtrate, that the war was only defenſive on his part, ſince he had already alleged all that could be ſaid on that ſubject and ſince his papers were public? The third reaſon was of no greater force. For if the bare overture of a treaty was capable of keeping people in ſuſpence, and retarding the parliament's levies, it might alſo have the ſame effect with regard to the king's. But the counſellors ſuppoſed, his majeſty's levies would be continued with vigour, whilſt the parliament's preparations would be interrupted: That is to ſay, the parliament's friends would fall into the ſnare, whilſt care ſhould be taken privately to warn the king's to avoid it. Nothing more clearly ſhews, with what ſpirit they adviſed the king to ſend this meſſage to the parliament.

Be this as it will, the meſſage was ſent the 25th of Auguſt, (three days after the ſetting up of the ſtandard) [b] by Thomas Wriotheſly earl of Southampton, ſir John Culpepper, and ſome others [c].

He pronounced to both houſes, "That ſome perſons might be by them enabled to treat with the like number authorized by him, in ſuch a manner, and with ſuch freedom of debate, as might beſt tend to the peace of the kingdom. And he aſſured them, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part, which might advance the proteſtant religion, oppoſe popery, ſecure the laws of the land, and confirm all juſt power and privileges of parliament. If this propoſition ſhould be rejected, he proteſted, he had done his duty ſo amply, that God would abſolve him from any of the guilt of that blood which muſt be ſpilt."

As the war was ſufficiently declared by the erecting of the ſtandard, it ſeems, the king ſhould have demanded a ſafe conduct for his meſſengers. But though he had neglected to take that precaution, they pretended, on what grounds I know not, to go and ſit in their reſpective places, without any previous notice, [d]. The lords, offended at the earl of Southampton's boldneſs, called upon him to withdraw, and ordered him to ſend his meſſage in writing, and wait for an anſwer out of London. The commons alſo obliged Culpepper to deliver his meſſage at the bar, at which the king took great offence.

The anſwer of both houſes to his majeſty's meſſage was, "That notwithſtanding their endeavours to prevent the diſtracted eſtate of the kingdom, nothing had followed but proclamations and declarations againſt both houſes of parliament, whereby their actions were declared treaſonable, and their perſons traitors. So that until thoſe proclamations were recalled, and the ſtandard taken down, they could not, by the fundamental privileges of parliament, give his majeſty any other anſwer to his meſſage."

The king's meſſengers being returned to Nottingham with this anſwer, "His majeſty," ſays the lord Clarendon, "Was contented to make ſo much farther uſe of their pride and paſſion, as to give them occaſion, by another meſſage, to publiſh more of it to the people." It is eaſy to judge from hence, whether the king's real motive was a ſincere deſire of peace, ſince his meſſages were intended only to render the parliament odious. He ſaid in his reply: "That he never deſigned to declare both houſes of parliament traitors, or ſet up his ſtandard againſt them, and much leſs to put them and the kingdom out of his protection; he utterly profeſſed againſt it before God and the world. But he promiſed, that if a day were appointed by them, for the revoking of their declarations againſt all perſons as traitors or otherwiſe for aſſiſting him, he would, with all chearfulneſs, upon the ſame day, recal his proclamations and declarations, and take down his ſtandard."

In this meſſage, as in all his other papers, may be obſerved the genius and character of Charles I. He always made uſe of obſcure expreſſions, the interpretation whereof he reſerved to himſelf. It is true, he had not in expreſs terms declared both houſes traitors: but he called their members by that name, as the earl of Eſſex and others. So, according to his way of reaſoning, thoſe that executed the orders of both houſes were traitors and rebels, though the houſes themſelves were not ſo. It may be affirmed, that thoſe little artifices were one of the principal cauſes of this prince's misfortunes, as they made him forfeit the truſt and confidence of his ſubjects. They inſpired the parliament with a perpetual jealouſy of being intangled by treaties, wherein it would have been impoſſible to avoid ſuch ambiguous expreſſions.

The two houſes anſwered, "That his majeſty not having taken down his ſtandard, recalled his proclamations and declarations, whereby he had declared the actions of both houſes of parliament to be treaſonable, and their perſons traitors, and having publiſhed the ſame, ſince his meſſage of the 25th of Auguſt, they could not recede from their former anſwer. That if his majeſty would recal his declarations, and return to his parliament, he ſhould find ſuch expreſſions of their fidelities and duties, that his ſafety, honour, and greatneſs could only be found in the affections of his people, and the ſincere counſels of his parliament, who deſerved better of his majeſty, and could never allow themſelves, repreſenting likewiſe the whole kingdom, to be balanced with thoſe who gave evil counſels to his majeſty."

Mean while, both houſes perceiving, that the king's aim was to keep the people in ſuſpenſe by an uncertain expectation of peace, publiſhed a declaration, proteſting, they would never lay down their arms till his majeſty had left the delinquents to the juſtice of the parliament.

The king on his part, failed not, purſuant to his purpoſe, to make uſe of the anſwers of both houſes to his two meſſages, in a third which he ſent to them, ſaying, "That let all the world judge who had uſed moſt endeavours to prevent the preſent diſtractions, either he who had condeſcended to deſire and preſs it, or the two houſes, who had refuſed to enter into a negotiation. That for the future, if they deſired a treaty of him, he ſhould remember that the blood which was to be ſpilt in this quarrel was that of his ſubjects, and therefore would return to his parliament, as ſoon as the cauſes which had made him abſent himſelf from it ſhould be removed."

Both houſes finding the king's deſign was to render their refuſal to treat odious to the people, returned a ſtronger and more particular anſwer to this meſſage than they had made to the two firſt. The ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

"That at the very time his majeſty propounded a treaty, his ſoldiers were committing numberleſs oppreſſions and rapines.

"That they could not think his majeſty had done all that in him lay to remove the preſent diſtractions, as long as he would admit of no peace, without ſecuring the authors and inſtruments of theſe miſchiefs from juſtice.

"That they beſought his majeſty to conſider his expreſſions, 'That God ſhould deal with him and his poſterity, as he deſired the preſervation of the juſt rights of parliament.' That nevertheleſs, his intention was to deny the parliament the privilege of declaring to be delinquents thoſe they deemed ſuch, a privilege which belonged to the meaneſt court of juſtice in the kingdom.

"That his majeſty hath no cauſe to complain, that he was denied a treaty, when they offered all that a treaty could produce, ſecurity, honour, ſervice, obedience, ſupport, and ſought nothing but that their religion and liberty might be ſcreened from the open violence of a wicked party.

"That if there were any cauſe of treaty, 'They know no competent perſon to treat betwixt the king and the parliament.'

"That beſides, the ſeaſon was altogether unfit, whilſt his majeſty's ſtandard was up, his proclamations and declarations, not recalled, whereby his parliament was charged with treaſon.

"That indeed his majeſty had often proteſted his tenderneſs of the miſeries of Ireland, and his reſolution to maintain the proteſtant religion, and the laws of this kingdom. But that theſe proteſtations could give no ſatisfaction to reaſonable and indifferent men, when at the ſame time ſeveral of the Iriſh rebels, the known favourers of and agents for them, were admitted to his majeſty's preſence with grace and favour, nay, ſome of them employed in his ſervice; when the cloaths, ammunition, horſe, bought by his parliament for the ſupply of the Iriſh war, were violently taken away, and applied to the maintenance of an unnatural war againſt his people.

" That if his majeſty would be pleaſed to come back to his parliament, they ſhould be ready to ſecure his royal perſon, crown, and dignity, with their lives and fortunes."

The king did not leave this anſwer without a reply. But inſtead of doing it by way of meſſage, he publiſhed a declaration to this effect:

" In the firſt place, he alleged the laws in his favour.

" He denied that his ſoldiers had committed any diſorders or violences, and affirmed, he had never ſuffered them to oppreſs any perſon whatever.

" He recriminated upon the parliament. He denied that there were any Iriſh about him, and maintained, that it was a notorious calumny, like that caſt upon him heretofore by Mr. Pym.

" He ſaid, the artillery horſes he had taken at Cheſter were few in number, and of ſmall value. And for the cloaths, if his ſoldiers had taken any that were deſigned for the ſervice of Ireland, it was done without his order; and though he might have ſeized three thouſand ſuits which were going thither, yet he refuſed to do it, and gave order for their ſpeedy tranſportation.

" That the parliament made no ſcruple to employ in the war againſt their king, a hundred thouſand pounds particularly appointed for the relief of Ireland.

" That of near five hundred members, of which the lower-houſe conſiſted, there remained not above three hundred, the reſt having been driven away by tumults and threats, or withdrawn themſelves, out of conſcience, from their deſperate conſultations. That of above a hundred peers, there remained but fifteen or ſixteen in the upper houſe.

" That it was not the body of the parliament, but only the violent leading members that were the authors of the war."

I omit ſeveral general aſſertions which might then be neceſſary to the king's deſigns, but which have been already ſeen in the foregoing papers.

During theſe paper-ſkirmiſhes, both ſides prepared for war. The earl of Eſſex having ordered his forces to aſſemble at Northampton, departed from London the 9th of September to head the army; and having reviewed them, found about ſixteen thouſand men well armed, and well appointed with a good train of artillery. Then the king, perceiving he could no longer remain at Nottingham with ſafety, marched towards the borders of Wales with his troops [e], which were yet ſo few in number, that they did not deſerve the name of an army. He was unreſolved in what place to expect the forces that were to come to him from ſeveral parts: but intended to ſecure, if poſſible, Shrewſbury or Cheſter, without knowing however whether either of theſe towns would receive him, the parliament having in all thoſe parts very active and vigilent agents, who employed all their pains to procure them adherents. For this reaſon the king marched but very ſlowly. When he came to Wellington, about ten miles from Shrewſbury [f], he drew his little army together, and cauſed his military orders for the diſcipline thereof to be read before them; after which he took occaſion to make a ſpeech to his ſoldiers, and the better to ſatisfy them of his good intentions to the public, he made the following proteſtation.

" I do promiſe, in the name of Almighty God, and as I hope for his bleſſing and protection, that I will to the utmoſt of my power, defend and maintain the true reformed proteſtant religion eſtabliſhed in the church of England, and by the grace of God, in the ſame will live and die.

" I deſire to govern by all the known laws of the land, and that the liberty and property of the ſubject may be by them preſerved, with the ſame care as my own juſt rights. And if it pleaſe God, by a bleſſing upon this army, raiſed for my neceſſary defence, to preſerve me from this rebellion, I do ſolemnly and faithfully promiſe, in the ſight of God to maintain the juſt privileges and freedom of parliament, and to govern by the known laws of the land to my utmoſt power, and particularly to obſerve inviolably the laws conſented to me by this parliament.

" In the mean while, if this time of war, and the great neceſſity and ſtraits I am now driven to, beget any violation of thoſe, I hope it ſhall be imputed by God and man to the authors of this war, and not to me, who have ſo earneſtly laboured for the preſervation of the peace of this kingdom.

" When I willingly fail in theſe particulars, I will expect no aid or relief from any man, or protection from heaven: but in this reſolution, I hope for the chearful aſſiſtance of all good men, and am confident of God's bleſſing."

The king was not contented with making this proteſtation to his army, but moreover, in all the conſiderable places he paſſed through, he aſſembled the inhabitants, and endeavoured to convince them of the ſincerity of his intentions. Theſe were neceſſary precautions, at a time when the chief point was to gain the people to his intereſt, for on the people depended the ſtrength of both parties.

From Wellington the king marched to Shrewſbury, having received the agreeable news that the town had declared in his favour, and the inhabitants would give him a joyful reception. Here he reſolved to fix his head quarters, and appoint his rendezvous of his army. This was a very convenient place to expect the troops which were levying for him in Wales, Yorkſhire and Lancaſhire, and to ſend for his ordnance, which had not been able to follow him to Nottingham for want of horſes. This had forced him to make uſe of a hundred draught-horſes ſent by the parliament to Cheſter, to be tranſported into Ireland. He deſired to have the earl of Leiceſter's conſent, who was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and was then with him at Nottingham. But the earl conſtantly refuſing to give any orders about theſe horſes, bought with the parliament's money, the king gained one Errington, a ſervant of the earl's, who took them in his maſter's name, and delivered them to the king [g]. This the parliament, as hath been ſeen, taxed the king with. As for arms, the king not having a ſufficient quantity for all the troops that were to come from divers parts, had taken the arms of the militia in all the places through which he paſſed: but it was by way of loan, that is, he obtained the conſent of the officer, of the militia to take away their arms, on promiſe of reſtoring them. As ſoon as the king came to Shrewſbury [h], the number of his troops ſo conſiderably increaſed, that in a few days he had an army of ten thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, with which he was intirely ſecure from the danger he was in, whilſt his army was forming.

It is ſtrange, that the earl of Eſſex ſhould neither moleſt the king whilſt at Nottingham, nor in his march to Shrewſbury. Probably, if preſently after his arrival at Northampton he had marched directly againſt him, he would have greatly embarraſſed him, and perhaps diſabled him from aſſembling an army. This neglect can be aſcribed only to his not having power to act directly againſt the king's perſon, till he received his inſtructions, which he expected every day, and which came too late. Both houſes, it ſeems, could not believe, the king could be ready ſo ſoon as he was, and imagined, that his inability to raiſe men and money, would compel him to retire to ſome corner of the kingdom, or to throw himſelf into their arms. At leaſt, this is what they ſtrove to infuſe into the people, for fear of terrifying them with the notion of a war, the event whereof might be doubtful. The king made an advantage of this error, to aſſemble all his forces at Shrewſbury, and provide himſelf with money, which he wanted extremely. His friends at London had taken care of this laſt article, and privately ſent conſiderable ſums to Oxford. Moreover, the univerſity, which had always been firmly attached to the king, had engaged to deliver to him all the plate belonging to the colleges, which was very conſiderable. The point was only how to convey this aid ſafely to his majeſty. To that end, the king ſent thither ſir John Byron, with a ſmall detachment of horſe, not daring to give him a ſtronger, for fear of raiſing a ſuſpicion, that it was for ſome conſiderable affair. Byron coming to Oxford, received the money and plate, and returned toward Shrewſbury, by way of Worceſter, taking all poſſible precautions not to be attacked in his march. For this aid of money, which the king could not be without, was of the utmoſt importance to him. Wherefore, the better to ſecure it, he detached prince Rupert with a body of horſe, who marched on the other ſide of the Severn to Worceſter, to expect Byron and guard him to Shrewſbury.

[e] He marched from Nottingham to Derby, Stafford, Leiceſter; and ſo to Shrewſbury, where he ſet up a Mint. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 20.

The

In the mean time, the earl of Eſſex, after ſtaying ſome days at Northampton and ſecuring Warwick, reſolved to fix his head-quarters at Worceſter. To that purpoſe, he ſent colonel Nathaniel Fiennes before, who came to Worceſter at break of day, ſome hours after ſir John Byron was entered with his convoy. Fiennes, at his arrival being told, that there were ſome of the king's horſe in the town, the number whereof he did not know, haſtily retreated, without making any attempt. Preſently after, prince Rupert arrived, and to ſecure Byron's convoy, who was reſting himſelf in order to march on, paſſed through the town, and poſted himſelf, with his horſe, at ſome diſtance on the other ſide. As he did not believe there were any enemies in thoſe parts, he was not very careful to hinder many of his troopers from ſtaying in the town. When he came to the place he had choſen, he alighted with his brother prince Maurice, and moſt of the officers, repoſing themſelves on the ground. On a ſudden they perceived, within muſket-ſhot, five hundred horſe of the enemy marching up a narrow lane. Theſe were a body commanded by colonel Sandys, whom the earl of Eſſex had ſent before to take poſſeſſion of Worceſter. Prince Rupert inſtantly mounting his horſe, without a moment's heſitation, charged theſe troops, as they came out of the lane, and the charge was ſo vigorous, that the enemy was intirely routed, and Sandys ſlain, with thirty of his men. This action gained the prince a great name, not only for the valour he ſhewed, but chiefly for his ſudden and very ſeaſonable reſolution, in attacking his enemies as they came out of the lane, and when they leaſt expected it. Some hiſtorians in relating this ſkirmiſh, ſeem to repreſent prince Rupert, as one of thoſe romantic heroes, who with five or ſix perſons attacked and routed whole armies. But, after all, there is nothing wonderful in this action of the prince, who had not poſted himſelf beyond Worceſter, without having with him his detachment. Beſides, it is not ſaid, what was the number of the body he commanded. Nevertheleſs, this action, how little important ſoever it was, failed not to ſtrike great terror into the parliament's troops, chiefly by reaſon of prince Rupert's activity and courage, who afterwards gave them cauſe to be confirmed in their high opinion of his valour, for he was one of the braveſt princes in Europe. But though he had gained ſome little advantage, he did not think fit to expect the enemy at Worceſter. He went from thence ſome hours after, and ſafely conducted the convoy of money to Shrewſbury, where the king immediately ordered the plate to be coined. The next day, the earl of Eſſex poſſeſſed himſelf of Worceſter, and making ſome ſtay there, ſecured in the mean while, Hereford, Gloceſter, and Briſtol.

It would doubtleſs be very ſtrange, that in the twenty days the king ſtayed at Shrewſbury, his army ſhould ſo greatly increaſe, if, as ſome ſay, it was the effect of the parliament's denial to treat with his majeſty. For, ſo ſhort a ſpace does not ſeem ſufficient to determine the people to repair to the places where they were liſted, and to conduct theſe new raiſed troops to Shrewſbury. It may at leaſt be affirmed, that it is much leſs ſurpriſing, that the king's new levies, which could not be ready whilſt his majeſty was at Nottingham, or which did not care to go to a place ſo expoſed, would be in condition to march during his ſtay at Shrewſbury, though it was but of twenty days, ſince he had iſſued out his commiſſions before he left York.

However this be, the king finding himſelf at the head of an army little inferior in number to the earl of Eſſex's, and perceiving, it was not ſufficient to remain in quiet at Shrewſbury, whilſt the enemy was taking, without reſiſtance, the principal towns in the heart of the kingdom, believed he ought to try to put a ſpeedy concluſion to the war. There were two ways, one was to fight the enemies, the other, to gain ſome marches upon them, and appear near London, before they could arrive. The king took this laſt courſe, in the expectation that he ſhould raiſe an univerſal conſternation in London, which might afford his friends opportunity to ſerve him effectually. So, on a ſudden beginning to march the 12th of October, with his army, which was not much incumbered with baggage, there being not one tent and but little artillery, he quartered that night at Bridgenorth, twenty miles from Shrewſbury; the next day he came to Wolverhampton, the third to Birmingham, and the fourth to Kenelworth, where he reſted one day. It was two days before the earl of Eſſex had notice of his march, and began to follow him. It evidently appears by the king's rout, that if he was not in queſt of the enemies, at leaſt he feared them not, ſince he could not be ignorant how eaſy it was for the earl of Eſſex, either to put himſelf in his way, or overtake him. In all likelihood, he imagined the earl would not dare to hazard a battle, or that being much more incumbered with baggage and artillery, his march would be conſiderably retarded. Be this as it will, it was not till the 22d of October, that the two armies came within ſix miles of one another, without having received any notice of each other's march, till that day, which appears very ſtrange. But what is ſtill more ſurpriſing, is, that the king, to whom ſpeed was ſo neceſſary, had ſo little advanced in five days; ſince, leaving Kenelworth the 17th, he was on the 22d, but four miles north of Banbury, and that the earl of Eſſex, who departed the 15th from Worceſter, ſhould be only at Keinton the 22d, which is not above twenty miles. The king, who till then knew not where the earl of Eſſex was, lay incamped near a village called Edgcot, where he had intelligence the 22d in the night, that the enemies were at Keinton, about ſix miles diſtant. He found then it would be very difficult to execute his deſign upon London, whilſt he ſhould be ſo cloſely followed by the enemies. And therefore he reſolved to give them battle. To that end, he drew up his army on Edge-hill, from whence might be ſeen all Keinton-plain, where the parliament's army ſtood in battle array, the 23d in the morning. The fight began not however till three in the afternoon. It is not known what induced the king to defer it ſo long [l]: but for the earl of Eſſex, he had a very ſtrong reaſon not to be in haſte. For, not imagining himſelf ſo near a battle, he had left behind two thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, with his artillery, and conſequently, delay could not but be advantageous to him.

Prince Rupert, who commanded the king's right wing of horſe [m], marching down the hill, and advancing to charge the enemies left wing, on a ſudden, ſir Faithful Forteſcue, who commanded a troop of the parliament's horſe, moving forward with his whole troop from the groſs of the cavalry, and joining prince Rupert, with his highneſs charged thoſe he had deſerted [n]. This unexpected accident inſpired the parliament's horſe with ſuch a terror, each man looking upon his companion as upon an enemy, that they were intirely routed, and purſued above two miles from the field of battle. By this unadviſed purſuit, the king was in danger of the ſame fate which his predeceſſor Henry III. had at the battle of Lewes. The parliament's right wing ſtood their ground no better than the left. They ran away full ſpeed, and were purſued with the ſame fury and imprudence. What was moreover fatal to the king was, that his reſerve of a regiment of horſe, thinking the victory unqueſtionable by the flight of the enemies cavalry, with ſpurs and looſe reins followed the chace, and could not be hindered by their commanders.

All this while, the foot of both armies were engaged without victory's inclining to either ſide. But at laſt, ſir William Balfour, to whom the earl of Eſſex had given the command of the reſerve, turned the ſcale. As ſoon as he ſaw the king's horſe employed in the purſuit of the flying troops, he went and charged the foot in the flank, and put them into ſuch diſorder, that the king with the two princes his ſons, were in danger of being made priſoners. The earl of Lindſey, the king's general, was taken, having been ſhot in the thigh, of which he died the next day; and the ſtandard, which was always near the king's perſon, was loſt by the death of the ſtandard-bearer ſir Edmund Verney, but it was recovered afterwards in ſome unknown manner [o].

The return of prince Rupert, with his horſe, prevented the king's intire defeat. For Balfour, who had only a ſmall body of reſerve, ſeeing the cavalry returning from the chace, ſuddenly quitted the fight, and ſecured himſelf near the earl of Eſſex's foot. Could the king and prince Rupert have perſuaded their horſe to charge the parliament's infantry, [l] The lord Clarendon ſays, though the horſe were ready, the foot were quartered at ſuch a diſtance, that many regiments marched ſeven or eight miles to the rendezvous, ſo that it was one o'clock before the king's forces moved. Tom. II. p. 35.

[m] The left wing was commanded by commiſſary-general Wilmot, aſſiſted by ſir Arthur Aſton. The earl of Lindſey led the foot, and next to him was his ſon the lord Willoughby, with the king's regiment.—On the parliament's ſide: Their right wing, which conſiſted of three regiments of horſe, was commanded by ſir Philip Stapleton, ſir William Balfour, and the lord Fielding, ſir John Meldrum's brigade led the van, colonel Eſſex was in the middle, and colonel Ballard and Hollis, and the lord Brooke, in the rear. In the left wing were twenty-four troops of horſe, commanded by ſir James Ramſey. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 35. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 36.

[n] Sir Faithful Forteſcue was come from Ireland to haſten ſupplies, and had a troop of horſe raiſed for him for that ſervice, but his troops were diſpoſed into the parliament's army, and he was now major to ſir William Waller. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 36.

[o] It was reſcued by captain John Smith, lieutenant of the lord John Steward's troop, newly returned from the execution of the runaways. He was knighted for it, and made ſtandard-bearer. Whitelock's Memoirs, p. 64. Tom. I. p. 49.

who had ſcarce any cavalry to ſupport them, very probably they would have routed them, and obtained a complete victory. But the horſe that were returned from the purſuit in extreme diſorder, could never be brought to charge the enemies, who ſtood in good order, though they were in great danger. As ſoon as the earl of Eſſex ſaw the enemies cavalry returning, he had drawn off his infantry from the battle, and ranged them in the beſt manner he could, in order the better to ſupport the charge of the king's horſe, who in all appearance, would come and attack them. But it was not his buſineſs to renew the fight. It was ſufficient for him to keep his ground, as he did till night, which freed him from his uneaſineſs.

When the battle began, there remained not above two or three hours day, and as the king's horſe had ſpent ſome time in the purſuit of the run aways, and, after their return, could not be prevailed with to renew the fight, it was too late for the king to rally his infantry, who were in great diſorder, and whereof above two-thirds were miſſing. Both armies kept their poſts all night, and in the morning neither thought themſelves in condition to renew the battle. It is true, the forces left behind by the earl of Eſſex, arrived in the night with his artillery. However, as he had no other cavalry than the five hundred horſe that were newly come, and the ſmall body commanded by Balfour, he did not think he ought to hazard a ſecond battle againſt a body of cavalry that had been victorious the day before, and were ſtill facing his army. The king, on his ſide, finding himſelf without infantry, and conſidering that his troops had ſuffered very much by the cold, which was extremely ſharp that night, believed it ſufficient to let his enemies ſee he feared them not. In this diſpoſition, the two armies faced one another the whole day, without any deſire to engage. At laſt, the earl of Eſſex ordering his baggage to be drawn off, the king retired to the quarters he had taken the day before the battle, and the earl of Eſſex marched towards Warwick[p]. The number of the ſlain on the field of battle was about five thouſand. But what the earl of Clarendon ſays, that two days after, the king reviewing his army, found there were not above three hundred men loſt, is hardly credible, even according to his own deſcription of the battle. But without dwelling upon the particular circumſtances of the battle, which were extremely diſguiſed or exaggerated by both parties, who equally claimed the victory, the conſequences demonſtrate, that they might have more juſtly owned, that each had been worſted[q]. The king went from Shrewſbury with deſign to make an attempt upon London, but after the battle, he relinquiſhed that thought, though the road to London was open, and believed it more proper to retire to Oxford. On the other hand, the earl of Eſſex follows the king to obſtruct his going to London, but after the battle leaves the way open to him, and retiring to Warwick, puts it out of his power to prevent or ſtop him. I believe this ſuffices to ſhew, it was a drawn battle, which afforded no real matter of triumph either to the king or the parliament. Indeed, three or four days after the battle, the king took Banbury-caſtle, where was a garriſon of eight hundred foot and a troop of horſe. But if the circumſtances of taking this place be well conſidered, it will be found, that it was far from being a conſequence or effect of victory. For firſt, the king ſummoned the caſtle, contrary to the opinion of all his generals, who believed his army little able to undertake the ſiege. Secondly, he alleged for reaſon, that he could not determine what courſe to take, till he was informed of the intention of the enemies, and that if they deſigned to attack him, he could not fight in a more advantageous place. From hence it may be inferred, that he was not himſelf fully ſatisfied of the reality of his victory, ſince he imagined the earl of Eſſex in condition to attack him. In ſhort, Banbury-caſtle ſurrendered at the firſt ſhot, which leaves it uncertain, whether the king would have perſiſted in the ſiege in caſe of reſiſtance, and whether the earl of Eſſex would have ſuffered him to do it unmoleſted. The taking of Banbury determined the king to withdraw to Oxford, the only place in thoſe parts at his devotion by means of the univerſity, whoſe members were extremely attached to his intereſt.

Though the parliament challenged alſo the victory, they were very ſenſible they had no great reaſon to triumph. They were obliged however to make a parade of this pretended victory, as if it had been real, to contradict the king's friends who were trying to ſtrike terror into the Londoners, and induce them to ſue for peace, on account of the pretended ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms. The king had ſtill many friends in the city, there having been yet no meaſures taken to drive them away. Nay, in the parliament itſelf, there were not a few who ſtaid there on purpoſe to do the king ſervice, when occaſion ſhould offer, and who failed not to improve the preſent. The news concerning the battle of Edge-hill or Keinton, being very various at firſt, the king's friends at London, induſtriouſly manifeſted all the circumſtances which might give room to believe that the king was victorious, in order to diſpoſe the people to peace. For it muſt be obſerved, that ſince the breach, the king's grand aim had ever been to dazzle the people with the ſpecious term of peace, and he had never ceaſed to hope that the nation would oblige the parliament to come to an agreement, by leaving him in poſſeſſion of all his prerogatives. This was his favourite project, from which he never ſwerved, not even when his affairs were moſt proſperous. It will hereafter appear on ſundry occaſions, with what conſtancy he endeavoured to execute this ſcheme. The preſent occaſion was the firſt ſince the beginning of the war. When both houſes had perfect information of the ſucceſs of the late battle, what public demonſtrations ſoever they made, to cauſe the people to believe their army victorious, they were very ſenſible, ſuch victories were little capable to oblige the king to throw himſelf into their arms, though the people had been amuſed with ſuch hopes. Then the king's adherents who were ſtill in the houſe of commons, obſerving the conſternation expreſſed by moſt of the members, grew more bold, and ſcrupled not to propoſe a peace, as the only means to free themſelves from trouble. Very probably, this was done with the king's conſent, who at the ſame time was uſing his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the public, that he had obtained at Edge-hill a complete victory.

The day before the battle, both houſes had publiſhed a declaration, of which I ſhall content myſelf with relating the ſubſtance: for having given ſo many of theſe papers, I am afraid I ſhall tire my readers if I inſert here at large thoſe that follow.

The two houſes proteſted in the firſt place, "That no private paſſion or reſpect, no evil intention to his majeſty's perſon, no deſign to the prejudice of his juſt honour and authority, engaged them to raiſe forces, and take up arms.

"That his majeſty had refuſed to receive an humble and dutiful petition, which they had directed to the earl of Eſſex to deliver to him.

"That they were fully convinced, that the king was ſo engaged to the popiſh party, that all hopes of peace were excluded.

"That great numbers of papiſts had in ſhew conformed themſelves to the proteſtant religion, in order to qualify themſelves for poſts in the king's army.

"That his majeſty endeavoured at firſt to keep off all jealouſies and ſuſpicions, by many fearful oaths and imprecations, concerning his purpoſe of maintaining the proteſtant religion, and the laws of the kingdom, cauſing ſome profeſſed papiſts to be diſcharged out of his army, and none to be received that would not come to church, receive the ſacrament, and take the oaths. But that afterwards his confidence in the prieſts did more clearly appear: perſons impriſoned for prieſts and jeſuits having been releaſed out of the goal of Lancaſter, and commiſſions granted to profeſſed papiſts.

See Manley, p. 48, &c.—With relation to this battle, Denzil lord Hollis tells a remarkable ſtory, from his own knowledge, concerning the famous Oliver Cromwell; and that ſhews (as he obſerves) "He was as arrant a coward, as he was notoriouſly perfidious, ambitious, and hypocritical. This was his baſe keeping out of the field at Keinton-battle; where he, with his troop of horſe came not in, impudently and ridiculouſly affirming, the day after, That he had been all that day ſeeking the army and place of fight, though his quarters were but at a village near hand, whence he could not find his way, nor be directed by his ear, when the ordnance was heard twenty or thirty miles off." " That thoſe who raiſed forces for his majeſty in the North of England, did arm and employ papiſts.

" That men had been ſent to Hamburgh and Denmark to raiſe forces there, and to bring them over to join with the earl of Newcaſtle, and the army of papiſts which was intended to be raiſed in Newcaſtle.

" That the king had received in his court divers papiſts in Ireland: ſome of which were indicted of high-treaſon for their rebellion there; namely, the lord Taffe, &c.

" That divers Engliſh traitors were the chief counſellors and actors in this unnatural war, as the lord Digby, O'Neal, Wilmot, Pollard, Aſhburnham, &c.

" That divers jeſuits and prieſts, in foreign parts made great collections of money for the relief of the papiſts in Ireland, and the furthering of his majeſty's deſigns againſt the parliament.

" For all which reaſons they were reſolved to enter into a ſolemn oath and covenant, and expected that their brethren of Scotland would help and aſſiſt them, according to the act of pacification between the two kingdoms."

The king anſwered this declaration with two others, which were publiſhed after the battle of Edge-hill. In the firſt he ſaid:

" That notwithſtanding the ſolemn proteſtation of both houſes, of having no evil intention to his perſon, yet they had uſed their utmoſt power, by the ſtrength of their army, to have deſtroyed him.

" That if he refuſed to give admittance to the petition ſent by the earl of Eſſex, it was becauſe it was ſent by perſons whom he had particularly accuſed of high-treaſon. [Here he gave a long account of the whole matter.]

" He denies his ever having had any inclination to the papiſts, or that he had releaſed any prieſt or jeſuits out of the goal of Lancaſter.

" He ſays, that the papiſts ſuppoſed to have commiſſions were not ſo much as known to him, and that they had no command, to his knowledge, in his army.

[It muſt be obſerved, upon theſe two laſt articles, 1ſt, That the priſoners he had releaſed out of the goal of Lancaſter, had been impriſoned as papiſts, prieſts, and jeſuits, but had not been convicted as ſuch. And therefore the king thought he might deny he had releaſed any prieſts, &c.

2dly, The king, when he ſaid there was no popiſh officers in his army, meant by his army, that which he commanded in perſon, and the parliament underſtood that which was commanded by the earl of Newcaſtle. It might therefore be true, that the popiſh officers, commiſſioned by the earl of Newcaſtle, were not known to the king. But the army in the north was as much his army, as that commanded by himſelf.]

" He expreſly denied, that he ever ſent to raiſe forces in Hamburgh or Denmark.

" He affirmed, the parliament entertained ſeveral papiſts in their troops, and of this he ſpoke knowingly, as having taken ſeveral of them priſoners at the battle of Edge-hill[r]."

The ſecond declaration was intitled, " His majeſty's declaration to all his loving ſubjects, after his late victory againſt the rebels on Sunday the 23d of October, 1642." This title was prefixed on purpoſe to cheriſh the fears, the king's friends were endeavouring to infuſe into the people, an account of the pretended victory lately obtained by the king over the parliament's army.

The intent of this declaration was to vindicate the king upon three principal articles, namely, 1. That his majeſty favoured popery, and employed papiſts in his army. 2. That his deſign was to root out parliaments. 3. That it was his intention, by the commiſſion of array, to take away part of gentlemens eſtates from them. I ſhall ſpeak here of the firſt only, becauſe, after what has been ſeen, it would be needleſs to repeat what the king alleged in his vindication upon the two laſt. As to the firſt therefore he ſaid:

" That although he ſhould employ papiſts, no one would wonder, who conſidered the hardſhips and ſtraits he was driven to, and the little ſcruple the parliament made to employ popiſh officers and ſoldiers, who ſerved in great numbers in their army; the induſtry they uſed to corrupt their loyalty; the private promiſes they allured them with to their ſervice, even to the aſſuring them, that all the penal laws ſhould be repealed. That notwithſtanding the artifices of his enemies, and the weakneſs of his own condition, he could not prevail with himſelf to recal his proclamation, againſt receiving into his army ſuch as had not taken the oaths. He owned, however, that he had ſwerved from this general rule, in favour of ſome eminent abilities in command and conduct."

We ſhall find hereafter, that though this proclamation was not recalled, it was very far from being punctually obſerved.

Preſently after, both houſes returned an anſwer to this declaration, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

" That it was aſtoniſhing, the king, having affirmed ſo poſitively, that a far greater number of papiſts ſerved in their army than in his, ſhould not have been pleaſed to name a ſingle inſtance: that they ſhould have been glad of knowing their names, as it would have afforded means to remove thoſe of that religion, who under the profeſſion of proteſtants, might have crept into the army without their privity."

Then they pretended to ſhew, by ſeveral reaſons, the abſurdity of ſaying, that the parliament endeavoured to corrupt the loyalty of the papiſts with the promiſe of repealing the penal laws, and alleged divers inſtances of their ſeverity againſt them, during the ſitting of the preſent parliament.

But for a demonſtration, ſaid they, that the king acted not with ſincerity, when he alleged, in his vindication, that he had ordered no recuſant to be received into his troops, and that this order was a meer illuſion, they named ſeveral popiſh officers, who had commiſſions under the king's own hand, which commiſſions then remained in the houſe of commons. Moreover, they annexed to this declaration a petition, preſented to the king by the popiſh inhabitants of the county of Lancaſter, deſiring leave to provide themſelves with arms for his ſervice, and the king's anſwer granting their requeſt. This petition and his majeſty's anſwer, ſeem to me ſo deciſive upon the preſent caſe, which was ſo often repeated, that I think they ought to be inſerted in their own terms.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble petition of us the inhabitants of Lancaſhire, whoſe names are under-written, in behalf of ourſelves, and divers others, being recuſants,

Humbly ſheweth,

" THAT whereas we, and the reſt of this county, your majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects, are diſarmed, and not ſufficiently provided for the defence of your royal perſon, and our own families; our moſt humble ſupplication to your majeſty is, That we may be received into your moſt gracious protection from violence, have our arms, taken from us, re-delivered in this time of actual war, and by your majeſty's ſpecial directions, be enabled further to furniſh ourſelves with competency of weapons, for the ſecurity of your royal perſon, (if we be thereto required) our countries and families, who now are, not only in danger of the common diſturbances, but alſo menaced by unruly people to be robbed: And when, by the Almighty's aſſiſtance, your majeſty's kingdom ſhall be ſettled, in caſe we be again diſarmed, that a full value of money in lieu thereof may be reſtored."

The king's anſwer.

To our truſty and well-beloved, ſir William Gerrard, baronet, ſir Cecil Trafford, knight, Thomas Clifton, Charles Townley, Chriſtopher Anderton, and John Clanſfield, and other of our ſubjects, eſquires, in the county of Lancaſter.

Charles R.

" TRUSTY and well beloved, we greet you well. Whereas by reaſon of the laws and ſtatutes of our realm, by which all recuſants convicted are to be without arms, your arms have been taken from you: ſo that now, in this time of imminent danger, wherein there are armies raiſed againſt our commands, and contrary to our proclamations, and are marching againſt us, and divers of our good ſubjects, for obeying our lawful commands, and oppoſing the rebellious proceedings of others ill affected, they are by a ſtrong hand ſeized upon and impriſoned, their houſes plundered, and their goods taken away; and the like is threatened to ourſelves, who, as all other our ſubjects, ought to have our protection againſt unlawful violence and force: And the laws made for diſarming recuſants, were made only for a proviſion to prevent a danger in time of peace, and were not intended to bar you from a neceſſary uſe of arms in time of actual war, for your own ſafety, or for the defence of our perſon againſt all rebels and enemies, which by your duty and allegiance you are bound unto; which is not, nor ever was, meant to be diſcharged, or taken away by any act: And [r] Salmonet alſo owns, That there were ſome popiſh prieſts found among the perſons ſlain on the parliament's ſide. Tom. I. p. 165.

The

whereas, the arms which were taken from you, ought by law to have been kept and preſerved, to have been made uſe of by you in ſuch time of open war, or by ſuch others as you ſhould provide, yet under the ſpecious pretence of diſarming recuſants, and perſons ill affected, your arms have been diſpoſed and diſperſed into the hands of ſeveral perſons ill-affected, and for the moſt part, fomenters and exciters of the commotions now raiſed in this kingdom; our will and command therefore is, and we charge and require you, upon your allegiance, and as you tender the ſafety of our perſon, and the peace and welfare of our kingdom, That you, with all poſſible ſpeed, provide ſufficient arms for yourſelves, your ſervants, and your tenants, which we authorize and require, during the time of open war raiſed againſt us, to keep and uſe for the defence of us, and of yourſelves, and of your country, againſt all forces and arms raiſed, or to be raiſed againſt us, or againſt our conſent, or contrary to our proclamations, by colour of any order, or ordinance, or authority whatſoever: And we ſhall (according as we are bound to all our ſubjects) uſe our utmoſt powers for the protection of you and yours, againſt all injuries and violence. And whenſoever theſe arms which you ſhall ſo provide (after it ſhall pleaſe God to put an end to theſe dangers and diſtractions) ſhall be taken away from your cuſtody, by reaſon of our laws now in force, we do hereby aſſure you, we will allow you for the ſame, ſo much as you ſhall have diſpenſed in proviſion thereof."

It is proper to obſerve, concerning theſe two papers, that the queſtion between the king and both houſes was not whether the king might lawfully or not, employ papiſts in his ſervice, but whether he did really employ them? Care therefore muſt be taken, not to confound the right with the fact, the laſt only being the point in queſtion. Now theſe two papers demonſtrate, that the king actually employed papiſts in his ſervice, even at the beginning of the war, and before any effuſion of blood: for this petition was preſented to him, whilſt he was yet at Shrewſbury [s].

For a greater conviction, both houſes annexed alſo to their declaration, a liſt of the names of twenty-eight officers, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, ſerjeants, majors, captains, and lieutenants, that were papiſts, and actually in the king's ſervice, in the earl of Newcaſtle's army.

The king and the parliament were in this ſtate of animoſity, when his majeſty's private friends in the houſe of commons moved to ſue for peace, under colour of the parliament's inability to continue the war, after their late loſs at Edge-hill. The king, on his part, to confirm the opinion his friends were ſtriving to infuſe into the people, that the parliament's army was entirely routed, and to encourage his well-wiſhers in London to join with thoſe in the parliament, ſent an offer of pardon to the cities of London and Weſtminſter; thereby inſinuating to the inhabitants, that ſuch an offer could not but proceed from the ſuperiority he had acquired by his victory. He practiſed the ſame thing with regard to ſome other towns. It is certain, there was then a great agitation in London, cauſed by the king's friends, who under pretence of dreading a war, which, according to them, was ſo unfortunately begun, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to induce the people openly to demand a peace. Againſt theſe ſecret practices, it was the buſineſs of the leading men in the parliament to provide. And as they were no leſs able than their adverſaries, they quickly found means to baffle this project. Inſtead of oppoſing the motion to ſue to the king for peace, they ſupported it with all their power. They ſaid, "That the parliament had not taken arms for the ſake of going to war, but only to procure a good peace, the moſt deſirable thing in the world: That both houſes ought not to be aſhamed to make the firſt advances, and humbly ſue for peace to their ſovereign, but withal, care was to be taken, that a too great zeal for peace might not be a means to leave them at the mercy of their enemies. That in order to make ſuch a peace as was neceſſary to the welfare of the kingdom, the king was to be told, that they were not yet reduced to the point, of being forced to accept of ſuch terms as he ſhould pleaſe to impoſe, and therefore, if they would have a peace wherein every man might find his ſafety, it was neceſſary to take good meaſures for the continuance of the war: That among all the means which could be uſed, they ſaw none more proper, than to invite their brethren of Scotland to their aſſiſtance, purſuant to the treaty between the two nations. Not that they actually wanted them, the parliament's affairs not being reduced to ſuch an extremity, that foreigners were to be haſtily introduced into the kingdom, but that the Scots would doubtleſs ſo anſwer their requeſt, as to convince the king, this refuge would not fail the two houſes in caſe of need: That thereby they ſhould become more formidable, and if the king was really deſirous of a peace, he would be forced to grant it upon reaſonable terms, which was all that ought to be expected."

As this advice was very plauſible, and beſides, propoſed by men in whom the majority had great confidence, it was approved by the houſe. Indeed, none could be ignorant, that by the peace which the king had hitherto offered, and which his friends moved to ſue for, could be meant only a peace that ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of all his prerogatives, and that his word ſhould be taken for ſecurity that he would abuſe them no more. But though the members of the parliament doubted not that the king would grant an act of oblivion, ſuch as they ſhould deſire, they did not believe, that ſuch a peace could be advantageous to the kingdom, becauſe they did not believe the king's word to be a ſufficient ſecurity. Beſides, the preſbyterians were no better pleaſed than they had been hitherto, with a peace which would of courſe reſtore epiſcopacy in all its former luſtre. Wherefore things not being yet brought to that ſtate, that the parliament ſhould be induced to wiſh for ſuch a peace, it was reſolved, 1. That his majeſty ſhould be addreſſed for ſettling the peace of the kingdom. 2. That the preparations of forces and other neceſſary means for defence ſhould be proſecuted with all vigour, if an honourable and ſafe peace might not be obtained. 3. That the Scots ſhould be applied to for aſſiſtance, if there ſhould be occaſion. Theſe reſolutions entirely broke all the meaſures of the king's friends, who had flattered themſelves, that the pretended victory of Edge-hill would produce ſome great effect.

Purſuant to theſe reſolutions, the parliament took care to recruit the earl of Eſſex's army, and to that aim it was ordained, that ſuch apprentices as ſhould be liſted for ſoldiers, ſhould reckon the time ſpent in the wars, as part of their apprenticeſhip. Whereupon great numbers of apprentices engaged in the parliament's ſervice.

After that, both houſes ſent a declaration into Scotland, wherein they did not demand indeed an immediate aid, but ſaid, "That they did not doubt but the Scots would aſſiſt them, if there ſhould be occaſion, according to the the treaty of amity and alliance between the two nations. That therefore they deſired them to raiſe ſuch forces, as they ſhould think ſufficient to ſecure their own borders againſt the attempts of the army of papiſts, levied by the earl of Newcaſtle in the North of England. To engage them the more to what they deſired, they ſaid, the enemies of the proteſtant religion were ſo prevalent with his majeſty, that he had rejected all the petitions preſented to him. That the preſent war was for the maintenance of religion, againſt the efforts of thoſe who had projected its deſtruction, and that in order to preſerve it more effectually, they had willingly embraced the invitation of the Scots, to a nearer degree of union in matters of religion and church-government, which they had accordingly reſolved to purſue."

It was now ſome months ſince the Scotch commiſſioners reſiding at London, had intimated in a memorial preſented to the parliament, that the Scots paſſionately deſired an union of the churches of England and Scotland in the ſame worſhip and diſcipline. As this propoſition was expreſſed by way of wiſh only, and beſides was worded in ſuch a manner, that it might be underſtood, either that the Scots deſired the Engliſh to embrace the worſhip and diſcipline of the church of Scotland, or that they themſelves were willing to conform to the church of England, the parliament had, in the ſame ambiguous terms, civilly anſwered, that they alſo wiſhed the ſame thing, and would heartily concur in accompliſhing the project. This anſwer was doubtleſs framed by the leading preſbyterians, to ſerve as a corner-ſtone, of which they hoped one day to make good uſe. But it was not yet time to declare their intention more openly, for fear of loſing all the church of England men that were againſt the king. Probably theſe men would have been alarmed, if they had clearly known, that the preſbyterians meant to eſtabliſh their worſhip and diſcipline upon the ruins of the church. For the ſame reaſons alſo, in the declaration above-mentioned, both houſes, or rather the directors, thought not proper to ſpeak more plainly; and in ſaying, that both houſes intended to purſue this union, the propoſition was left in all its ambiguity, though it was eaſy for the Scots to perceive, that in time they ſhould receive ſatisfaction. For it is not to be imagined, there were none but preſbyterians in the parliament's party, though this may be the notion ſome would give us of that party, their aim being to inſinuate, that the war between the king and the parliament was properly a religious war, and that the parliament's ſole view was to deſtroy the church of England, and eſtabliſh preſbyteraniſm in its room. As this deſign was unjuſt in itſelf, they would infer, that the war againſt the king was unjuſt. This reaſoning would be ſolid and convincing, were it true, that the oppoſite party to the king had propoſed to themſelves no other end. But as it is certain, the preſbyterians were not the only perſons that had cauſe to complain of the king, it is no leſs ſo, that the party of his enemies conſiſted not of preſbyterians alone, but alſo of a very great number of church-men, who ſaw, that under colour of deſtroying preſbyterianiſm, an arbitrary power was going to be eſtabliſhed. It is eaſy to conceive, that theſe men were ill-affected to the king, had joined with the parliament, and as yet were attached to their party. But it is inconceivable, that the preſbyterians, who at the beginning of the parliament made ſo inconſiderable a figure in both houſes, as well as in the kingdom, ſhould be grown ſo very numerous in the ſpace of two years, or that the members of the church of England, who complained of the king's former adminiſtration, ſhould have entirely renounced the church, and embraced preſbyterianiſm. It is certain therefore, though the preſbyterian party, conſidered as a religious party, had prevailed in the parliament, there were however in that ſame party, conſidered as enemies to the king, many church-men who had no other view than the reformation of the civil government, and the ſecurity, of the nation's liberties. Theſe were the men the parliament were to manage for fear of alarming them, till they could be engaged to turn preſbyterians, either by the ſuperiority the parliament ſhould acquire in the courſe of the war, or by the abſolute neceſſity they ſhould be under of relinquiſhing the people's liberties, or of recurring to the aſſiſtance of the Scots, which could not be obtained but by changing the government of the church. On the other hand, the church of England-men could not take it ill, that the parliament managed the Scots, ſince their aſſiſtance might happen to be abſolutely neceſſary. The ambiguous expreſſions therefore in the declaration, with reſpect to the union of the two churches, ſerved to manage all thoſe who were concerned for the parliament's affairs. The Scots were gladly ſuffered to think, that the propoſition was underſtood in the ſenſe they themſelves gave it, and the church of England-men were told, that the parliament was properly bound to nothing, in promiſing to endeavour an union, becauſe there was no more reaſon for the church of England to conform to that of Scotland, than for this to conform to that of England. That however great advantage would accrue from this pretended engagement, in that the king, from the apprehenſion of ſeeing the parliament cloſely united with Scotland, would be induced to make peace upon reaſonable terms.

Though on this occaſion, the king's enemies had gained ſome advantage in the parliament, his friends did not think themſelves vanquiſhed. They plainly ſaw, that ſo long as both houſes ſhould be able to act with freedom, the king's adverſaries would be always ſuperior, and that it was ſcarce poſſibly to take away this freedom, without an extraordinary aſſiſtance. Wherefore, whilſt men were ſtill in the agitation occaſioned by the battle of Edge-hill, they ſent the king word, that if he would appear before London with his army, they did not queſtion, ſuch commotions would be raiſed in the city, as would turn to his advantage, in which his friends would not fail to exert themſelves to the utmoſt of their power. This made him reſolve to march to London. To that end, he ordered a body of horſe to go forward, who advancing to Reading, the parliament's troops, quartered there, were ſeized with ſuch a terror, that they entirely abandoned the place, and the king came thither ſoon after with his army. Both houſes were alarmed when they heard the king was within thirty miles of London. So, whether for that reaſon, or with deſign to amuſe him, they ſent and deſired a ſafe-conduct for a committee of lords and commons to attend his majeſty with a petition for peace, purſuant to a reſolution taken ſome days before. The king granted a ſafe-conduct for the committee, excepting only ſir John Evelyn, becauſe he was proclaimed traitor[s]. In the mean time, both houſes had advice that the earl of Eſſex was marching towards London with the utmoſt ſpeed. For this cauſe they were in no haſte to ſend the committee to the king, on pretence of his ſcrupling to admit Evelyn. It is hard to conceive why the king, who could not be ignorant, that the execution of his project depended upon expedition, ſtayed long enough at Reading to give the earl of Eſſex time to come to London as ſoon as himſelf. However this be, he marched the 11th of November to Colebrook, fifteen miles from London. Mean while the earl of Eſſex's army arrived about the ſame time, in the neighbourhood of London. But whether it was not ready ſoon enough, or the parliament was alarmed, the committee was ſent to his majeſty the ſame day, with a very humble petition, to appoint a place for the treaty. The king returned a gracious anſwer to the petition, teſtifying, he wiſhed for nothing more than a peace, and to that end, was content to enter into a treaty. The committee returning to London with this anſwer, the parliament immediately ſent orders to their forces not to exerciſe any hoſtility. But preſently after the departure of the committee, the king began to march towards Brentford, which is but ſeven miles from London, and arriving there the 12th in the morning, attacked the town, where ſome of the parliament's troops were quartered, and became maſter of it, after ſome reſiſtance[t]. Immediately after he ſent a meſſage to both houſes to inform them, that ſince his anſwer to their petition laſt night, he had received advice, that the earl of Eſſex was drawing his forces out of London towards him, which had obliged him to march to Brentford: that however he was ſtill deſirous of peace, and expected their committee at Brentford that night, or early the next morning.

The earl of Eſſex's army was indeed arrived near London the 7th, and the earl himſelf was actually in the houſe of peers the 12th, during the aſſault of Brentford. Whereupon both houſes ordered the lord-mayor to ſend out the train-bands, to join with the earl of Eſſex's army, and by that it became much ſuperior to the king's[u]. The ſame day the general made the neceſſary preparations for battle; but the king not thinking fit to expect him, retired towards Kingſton.

The parliament complained, the king had deceived them under the falſe ſhew of deſiring to treat of a peace, ſince immediately after the departure of the committee, he marched to ſurprize Brentford. The king juſtified himſelf two ways. He ſaid firſt, that not only there was no truce agreed upon, but none ſo much as deſired. Secondly, that after the committee's departure, he received certain information, that the earl of Eſſex had ſent forces to Kingſton, Acton, and other places, to ſurround him, which had obliged him to advance to Brentford. The former of theſe reaſons was the beſt, for there being no ceſſation of arms, he might juſtly take all advantages as he thought proper. But he inſiſted the leaſt upon this, for being diſappointed, he would not have it appear that his deſign was to become maſter of London, or at leaſt to raiſe commotions there in his favour, for fear of expoſing his friends to a ſtrict inquiſition. The latter was not of the ſame force. For if he was afraid of being ſurrounded at Colebrook, he did not avoid that inconvenience, by advancing eight miles nearer London. He rather made it greater by that march, unleſs he advanced with deſign to attack the enemy, which did not appear by his conduct.

The king is furniſhed with another reaſon, not contained in a ſort of manifeſto, publiſhed by himſelf on this occaſion. Prince Rupert, it is ſaid, had advanced to Hounſlow with the horſe, without the king's order, and when there, was informed that the parliament had ſent forces to Kingſton, Acton, and other places: ſo, finding he was going to be ſurrounded, ſent to the king to deſire him to advance with his infantry to diſengage him. This reaſon to me ſeems ſo very weak, that I ſhould think it needleſs to refute it, if it did not come from the illuſtrious author of the hiſtory of thoſe times. I will not ſay, that it does not much redound to prince Rupert's honour to affirm, he had advanced without the king's order with his cavalry, which too is not very likely. But firſt, if the prince did think himſelf in danger, it was much eaſier for him to retire to the king, than for the king to march to his relief. Secondly, what probability was there, that the parliament's forces, which are ſuppoſed to have been detached to ſurround the prince, ſhould poſt themſelves between him and the king? Thirdly, the earl of Eſſex's army came near London but that very day, [s] This committee conſiſted of Algernon Percy, earl of Northumberland, Philip Herbert, earl of Pembroke, the lord Wenman, Mr. Pierrepont, and ſir John Hippeſley. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 57.

[t] Part of colonel Hollis's regiment were quartered there, who made a vigorous defence, but would, in all probability, have been moſt of them cut off, if the lord Brook's and colonel Hampden's regiment had not come to their relief, and maintained a fierce and bloody fight till night, wherein many were ſlain, others driven into the river, and many taken priſoners. So that they quitted the town in the night, and the king poſſeſſed it. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 59. * Whitelock, p. 65.

[u] The whole army, of horſe and foot, conſiſted of about twenty-four thouſand men. Idem, p. 66.

and was not in condition to march ten or twelve miles farther to attack the prince.

It is therefore extremely probable, that the king, when he left Oxford, intended to ſurprize London, or hoped that his friends would ſo manage, that he ſhould be received there without oppoſition, before the earl of Eſſex could arrive. But he either loſt too much time at Reading, or was prevented by the earl's expedition. Nevertheleſs, ſince he was not ignorant that the parliament's forces were now very near London, one cannot well ſee what it ſignified to attack Brentford, unleſs it was to brave the parliament, or having firſt deſigned to give battle he had altered his mind upon hearing that the train-bands of London were ſent out to join the earl of Eſſex. Be this as it will, having miſſed his aim, he was forced to frame reaſons to colour his attack of Brentford, and to try to perſuade the people, it was done only in his own defence. After all, it is very likely, that when he ſent back the committee from Colebrook, he was determined to march to Brentford, and was not ſorry the parliament amuſed themſelves with the hopes of a treaty. At leaſt, the reaſons he alleged in his vindication did not prove the contrary.

The war continued all the winter in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, there being ſcarce a county free from it. My deſign is not to deſcend to the particulars of all the ſkirmiſhes and conflicts during the war. Such circumſtances may be agreeable to the Engliſh, who are acquainted with the ſituation of the places, or concerned for the honour of thoſe who ſignalized themſelves on theſe occaſions. But foreigners, for whom I write, being little concerned, I ſhall confine myſelf briefly to relate ſome of the principal actions.

In the beginning of December, the earl of Newcaſtle, who had levied an army for the king in the northern parts, began his march towards York. He was ſtopped at the paſſage of the river Tees, which parts the biſhopric of Durham from Yorkſhire, by young Hotham, who had with him a detachment of the little army commanded by the Lord Fairfax in that county for the parliament: but the earl forced the paſſage, and came to York, with about eight thouſand men.

There were likewiſe during the winter, in the ſame county, two pretty warm actions. The firſt at Tadcaſter, where the lord Fairfax was intrenched, and where he was attacked by the earl of Newcaſtle, who, after an obſtinate diſpute, was obliged at laſt to retreat. The ſecond was at Giſborough, where ſir Hugh Cholmley defeated ſix hundred of the king's party, commanded by colonel Slingſby, who was taken priſoner with a great number of his men.

Some days after, ſir Thomas Fairfax the general's ſon, attacked the town of Leeds, defended by ſir William Savil with fifteen hundred men, carried it by ſtorm, and took five hundred priſoners. Theſe were the moſt remarkable actions in the north, during the winter that followed the firſt campaign.

In the ſouth, ſir William Waller, commander for the parliament, blew up Farnham-caſtle, and made the garriſon priſoners of war. Shortly after he took Wincheſter, and then Chicheſter, after an eight days ſiege.

In the midland counties, ſeveral notable actions, though little deciſive, were alſo performed. The 5th of December, Wilmot commiſſary-general of the king's horſe, the lord Digby, and others, attacked the town of Marlborough, fortified by the parliament, where was a numerous garriſon. The town being carried by ſtorm, was plundered and burnt, and about a thouſand of the garriſon ſlain and taken priſoners.

February the ſecond, prince Rupert took Cirenceſter by ſtorm, and made twelve hundred priſoners [w].

March the firſt, the lord Brooke attacked ſome of the king's forces intrenched in the cloſe of the cathedral of Litchfield, and was there ſlain; but after his death his men carried the cloſe.

The 19th of the ſame month, a battle was fought at Saltheath near Stafford, which was maintained on both ſides four hours, till at laſt Spencer Compton earl of Northampton, who commanded the king's forces, being ſlain, the parliament's troops became victorious.

The ſame day ſir William Waller ſurprized the lord Herbert, who was beſieging Gloceſter, killed five hundred of his men, and took above a thouſand priſoners. After that, he took Chepſtow in Monmouthſhire, and then the town of Monmouth itſelf.

I proceed now to what paſſed in the weſtern counties from the beginning of the war to March the next year 1643. As the war was always very ſharp in thoſe parts, and as the ſuperiority was there obſtinately diſputed, it will be neceſſary, for the better underſtanding theſe events, to give a particular account of what paſſed in theſe counties.

From the time the king was at Beverly, after having failed in his attempt upon Hull, he ſent the marquis of Hertford into the weſt, to try to raiſe a party capable to give the parliament's forces a diverſion. He granted him a commiſſion to command all the weſtern parts, and the marquis made ſir Ralph Hopton his general of horſe. The marquis being come into Somerſetſhire, fixed his quarters at Bath, where he could raiſe but few men, by reaſon of the vigilance of the committee of the militia, who greatly obſtructed his levies. At laſt the earl of Bedford, who commanded in thoſe parts for the parliament, having drawn together much more numerous forces than were thoſe of the king, the marquis of Hertford was obliged to retire into Wales. He ſent however ſir Ralph Hopton with about one hundred and fifty horſe into Cornwall, to endeavour to gain that county to the king's intereſt. The earl of Bedford neglected to purſue this little troop, not doubting but the committee of the militia would be able to diſperſe them, and went and joined the earl of Eſſex. This paſſed before the battle of Edge-hill.

Hopton was well received in Cornwall, and ſeconded by ſir Bevil Greenvil, a Corniſh gentleman, who ſo ordered it that the county declared for the king. Then Hopton drew together three thouſand of the train-bands, and marched towards Lanceſton, from whence they chaſed the committee of the militia, who had aſſembled ſome troops. But endeavouring to lead theſe train-bands into Devonſhire, they refuſed to march out of their county. For which reaſon he diſmiſſed them, having firſt driven the committee from the little town of Saltaſh.

Mean while, with the aſſiſtance of the gentlemen of the county, he found means to levy fifteen hundred regular troops, with whom he became abſolute maſter of all Cornwall, and even made incurſions into Devonſhire.

The parliament having intelligence of Hopton's progreſs in Cornwall, ordered all their forces in Dorſet and Somerſet to join with thoſe of Devon, and gave the command of this army to Henry Grey earl of Stamford. The earl heading theſe troops, ſent Ruthen a Scotchman governor of Plymouth, with a detachment into Cornwall. He was no ſooner there, but was met by ſir Ralph Hopton, who put him to rout, killed many of his men, and took above twelve hundred priſoners. Ruthen, after his defeat, retired to Saltaſh, where he endeavoured to fortify himſelf, and the earl of Stamford threw himſelf into Taviſtock [x].

Hopton taking advantage of the terror he had ſtruck into the parliamentarians, divided his forces into two bodies; with one of which he marched towards Ruthen, and beat him out of Saltaſh, and thereby remained again maſter of Cornwall. The other body moved towards Taviſtock, which the earl of Stamford alſo quitted, and retiring to Plymouth, enabled Hopton with the more eaſe to fix quarters in Devonſhire. But ſhortly after, both parties having agreed to obſerve an exact neutrality in the two counties of Devon and Cornwall, in order to remove the war into other parts, Hopton retired with his forces into Cornwall.

Having related the principal military actions of the firſt campaign, and the following winter, it will be neceſſary to mention ſome other things, which indeed flowed from the war, but were not decided by arms.

Money being the ſinews of war, it is not ſtrange the king and the parliament ſhould do their utmoſt to raiſe all they could. But the wonder is, that they ſhould upbraid each other with the expedients uſed to that end. According to the laws of the land, the king cannot levy money upon the ſubject, without conſent of parliament; but it is no leſs certain, that the parliament cannot impoſe taxes without the royal aſſent. Taxes are laid by acts, to which the king and both houſes muſt neceſſarily give their approbation. But what is to be done when the king and parliament are at war with one another? Neither of them, according to the laws, muſt levy money upon the people, and then it will be almoſt impoſſible to wage war, or elſe both muſt be left at liberty to raiſe it, without regarding each other's conſent. This was what the king and the parliament practiſed, and yet they reproached one another with breach of the laws. If we believe the authors who writ in favour of the king, his majeſty had no other money than what he was ſupplied with voluntarily by gift or loan[y]. If he ſometimes taxed the counties in his power, it was always with the conſent of the inhabitants. But this is a kind of artifice to deceive the reader. For it means nothing more, than that ſome of the leading men of the town or county were gained, by whom it was reſolved to give the king ſuch a ſum, after which it would have been in vain for the reſt to oppoſe it, or refuſe to pay their ſhare. The parliament proceeded in much the ſame manner. They demanded for the maintenance of the war contributions, which they termed voluntary, but which were very far from being ſo. This very clearly appeared in an ordinance of the 29th of November, for aſſembling ſuch as had not freely contributed. The king, conſidering this ordinance as an expreſs breach of the law, iſſued out a proclamation, enjoining all his ſubjects not to ſubmit to it. He publiſhed another of the ſame nature, to command all perſons not to execute the ordinance of parliament for paying tunnage and poundage to the two houſes. All this was found upon the laws, requiring the royal aſſent for the impoſition of taxes. But ſuch were the times, that a ſtrict obſervance of the laws was become impracticable. The parliament anſwered this laſt proclamation, not by acknowledging, the laws were violated by their ordinance, but by ſaying, that the ſtatute urged by the king, was made to hinder the king from impoſing any tax, without the conſent of both houſes, and not to diveſt the parliament of a right to impoſe what they thought proper. It is eaſy to perceive, that this was only a cavil, ſince the king's conſent was no leſs neceſſary for impoſing a tax, than that of both houſes. Or rather, they had no right, neither the one nor the other ſeparately, if the laws had been kept to. And yet the king, in the next February, publiſhed another proclamation, ordering that the cuſtoms upon goods imported, ſhould be paid him at Oxford, which, in all appearance was not performed. This ſubject ſo often returns, not only with reſpect to levies of money, but alſo with regard to every thing enjoined ſeparately by the king or both houſes, that it will not be amiſs to have ſome knowledge of the principles of both parties, in order to avoid paſſing a wrong judgment[z].

Ever ſince the beginning of this parliament, the king had conſtantly profeſſed a ſtrict adherence to the laws of the land. This he perpetually oppoſed to the conduct and pretenſions of the parliament. When the war was begun, he pretended in the like manner, that the laws were to be obſerved with the ſame ſtrictneſs as in full peace. It is very viſible, how advantageous to him this principle was. According to the law, the two houſes could raiſe neither men nor money, much leſs employ them againſt their ſovereign; for he always ſuppoſed the war was only defenſive on his part. He found therefore no better way to reſtore the public tranquility than to adhere to the laws, on the obſervance whereof depended the nation's happineſs. Nothing was truer than this principle, taken in general, and independently of the particular caſe the kingdom was in. But, as the king himſelf owned, the laws being only an empty name, if not kept, and the executive power being lodged in the king's hand, the point was to know, Whether the king could be relied upon for the diſcharge of this truſt, after what had paſſed the fifteen firſt years of his reign? There lay the difficulty of the queſtion between the king and the parliament; to ſolve which the king offered only his bare word, whereon the parliament could not, or would not, rely. It is therefore evident, that when the king urged the laws in his behalf, he ſaid nothing that in the leaſt prejudiced the parliament's claims. The thing was not to know, Whether the laws aſcribed ſuch or ſuch prerogatives to the ſovereign? The parliament did not deny it: but the queſtion was to know, Whether the king was to be truſted with the executive power, after what had paſſed? So the whole difficulty conſiſted in knowing, by what means the execution of theſe ſame laws, agreed to by both parties, might be ſecured. The king carefully avoided the examination of this point, whether the people had a right to demand ſecurity of him, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours to reduce the diſpute to this, "Whether this or that were enjoined by the laws?" This is the ruling principle in all his papers, without one exception.

On the other hand, the parliament were no leſs embarraſſed. It is true, they clearly ſhewed, the king had abuſed his prerogatives, whilſt he fully enjoyed them, and from thence inferred, it was neceſſary to reduce his power within certain bounds. But they ſuppoſed, that in order to reduce him within theſe bounds, there was no other way than to ſtrip him entirely of this ſame power, by depriving him of the command of the militia, and ſome other prerogatives. The queſtion in this reſpect was therefore, Whether it was poſſible to find expedients, which being added to the king's word and oath, might ſecure to the nation their liberties. But the two houſes induſtriouſly avoided to enter upon that queſtion. They were contented to ſuppoſe, without alleging any poſitive proof, that the king had taken up arms to deſtroy the privileges of the people and parliament, and conſequently the war was but defenſive on their part. By that they pretended to vindicate their daily manifeſt breaches of the laws, repreſenting them as abſolutely neceſſary to attain the end they propoſed to themſelves, of ſettling the peace of the kingdom. One can ſcarce help perceiving in this conduct, the aim of certain men, who laboured to render an accommodation impracticable, the better to execute the project of altering the government of the church, to which a peace would have brought inſuperable obſtacles. Could the king have prevailed with himſelf to conſent to that change, expedients would not have been wanted to adjuſt the other points. We ſhall be convinced of this hereafter, when we come to ſee the difficulties of the peace reduced, as I may ſay, to this ſingle article.

The king, as I ſaid, had ſent the earl of Newcaſtle into the north, to gain to his party the biſhopric of Durham, with the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Weſtmoreland, and to levy an army. The earl happily executed the king's deſign. He ſo managed, that theſe four counties entered into aſſociation to furniſh him at the common expence, with men and money, ſo that he raiſed an army of eight thouſand men. But at the ſame time, he taught the king's enemies to form the like aſſociations, which perhaps they would never have thought of. As ſoon as the parliament was informed of this aſſociation, they ordered the like to be entered into by the counties that owned their authority, and appointed generals to command their forces. The lord Fairfax was made general of Yorkſhire, ſir William Brereton of Cheſhire, ſir William Waller of Hampſhire, the lord Grey of Lancaſhire, major-general Brown of Berkſhire, the earl of Denbigh of Shropſhire, [a] colonel Middleton of Wales, and the earl of Mancheſter of Eſſex, and the counties adjoining, called the eaſtern counties, namely, Eſſex, Cambridge, Iſle of Ely, Hertford, Norfolk, Suffolk, and the city of Norwich[b]. By means of theſe aſſociations, the parliament had forces always ready, who indeed were deſigned only for the defence of the aſſociated counties, but were however employed ſometimes in other ſervices. The king frequently tried to prevent theſe aſſociations in counties where he knew he had a great number of friends, as for inſtance, in Kent, and ſome others. But when both houſes perceived the king's practices were like to prevail in any of the counties where they were ſuperior, they obliged them to aſſociate with others, and furniſh their quota.

Beſides theſe aſſociates between the counties of the ſame party, there were alſo at the beginning of the war, private agreements between neighbouring counties of different parties, to obſerve, between them, an exact neutrality. Theſe agreements were founded on the common advantages of the contracting counties, as they removed the war from their own doors, and ſettled a mutual commerce between them, which they could not well be without. I have given an [z] According to ſome authors, the parliament raiſed in all upon the nation, during the courſe of the civil war and afterwards, above ninety-five millions, five hundred and twelve thouſand pounds. And, according to Mr. Walker, there was levied, from the year 1641 to 1647, above forty millions in money, and money-worth. See Hiſt. of Taxes p. 289, 297. In March 1642, they made an ordinance for raiſing thirty-four thouſand, one hundred and eight pounds, thirteen ſhillings per week. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 150.

inſtance in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The like agreement was made between the two parties in Yorkſhire and Cheſhire. But the parliament refuſed to authoriſe theſe private agreements, becauſe they were too advantageous to the king, who in the end would have been able, by that means, to aſſemble all his forces in one place, whereas he was obliged to diſperſe them throughout the whole kingdom. Beſides, the king's party had ſo well managed his concerns, that theſe agreements were made only in places where it was for his advantage; as for example, in Yorkſhire, where the ſole view was to ſtop the inroads of the garriſon of Pontfret caſtle, which very much annoyed the city of York.

The king retiring to Oxford, after the Brentford affair, carried thither the priſoners taken at Brentford and Edgehill. Within a few days after his return, he granted to ſir Robert Heath a commiſſion of oyer and terminer, to try ſome of the priſoners, among whom was captain John Lilburn, who with ſome others, was condemned to die, for being taken in arms againſt the king. The parliament having notice of this ſentence before its execution, declared, that if any priſoner of war ſhould be put to death at Oxford or elſewhere, they would inflict the like puniſhment upon ſuch priſoners as were or ſhould be taken hereafter. This declaration ſaved the lives of the condemned, the king not thinking proper to expoſe his officers to the ſame fate.

[1642-3] Though the meaſures of the king's friends to oblige the parliament to make peace were broken, as I ſaid, they were not diſcouraged. As the king, after the buſineſs of Brentford, had fortified Reading, and left there a ſtrong garriſon, they pretended, the inhabitants of London had cauſe to be extremely alarmed at their neighbourhood. So under colour of preventing the danger, they drew a petition, to which they procured as many hands as poſſible, to deſire leave of both houſes to preſent to the king ſome propoſitions, which he might conſent to with honour. Many of the inhabitants of Weſtminſter, and of the pariſhes of St. Martin's and Covent-Garden, known to be the king's adherents, prepared alſo the like petition. It was a very uncommon thing, and of dangerous conſequence, for private perſons, without the interpoſition or approbation of the magiſtrates, to take upon them to make overtures of peace to the king. Accordingly, the parliament would not receive their petition, nay, ordered that the authors ſhould be brought to juſtice. Probably, they did not expect the parliament would uſe their mediation for a peace: but in publiſhing this petition, wherein they called themſelves the richeſt and moſt conſiderable inhabitants of London, their aim was to inſinuate to the people, that the honeſt part of the citizens wiſhed for peace upon more moderate terms than the parliament, but were reſtrained by the magiſtrates. The two houſes fully perceiving the motives of the petition, ordered it ſo that the mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, ſent a very humble petition to the king, wherein they took care to clear themſelves from all diſloyalty, and expreſſed an earneſt deſire of peace. To that purpoſe, they beſought his majeſty to return to his parliament, accompanied with his royal, not martial, attendance; that whatſoever was amiſs in church and ſtate might be reformed by the advice of both houſes, and ſuch a peace obtained, as ſhould be for the honour of his majeſty, and the welfare of his ſubjects. This petition ſhewed, that the city of London deſired no other peace than what the parliament ſhould agree upon with the king. It had this advantage of the firſt, that it came from the mayor and common-council, whereas the other was ſubſcribed only by private hands.

The king was really perſuaded, that the Londoners deſired and would accept of ſuch a peace as he ſhould be pleaſed to grant, but that the magiſtrates, in concert with the parliament, did their utmoſt to prevent it. This petition being preſented to him the 10th of January 1642-3, he returned a very gracious anſwer, and gave it in writing to the committee of aldermen. He ſaid, "That he never entertained any miſapprehenſion of the loyalty of his city of London, or of the inhabitants in general: but could not ſay the ſame with regard to their magiſtrates, and particularly alderman Pennington, their pretended lord-mayor, and two or three more [c], who endeavoured, with all their power, to prevent the people, and excite them to rebellion. Then he enumerated all the outrages exerciſed at London upon himſelf and the laws, and aſſured, he was ready to return to them, when they ſhould be in a fit poſture to receive him with honour and ſafety, and had apprehended the diſturbers of the public peace, that they might be proceeded againſt by courſe of law, as guilty of high-treaſon." The king greatly flattered himſelf with reſpect to his papers, which he readily believed to be unanſwerable. But the wonderful effects he hoped from thence did not always anſwer his expectations. In this belief, when he delivered his anſwer in writing to the committee of aldermen, he told them, it was his deſire, that it ſhould be read publicly at a common-hall and before the people. The lord-mayor, with the conſent of both houſes, willingly gave his majeſty this ſatisfaction, and his anſwer was accordingly read in public. But the parliament had ſent a committee of lords and commons to be preſent at the reading, and afterwards to reject the king's anſwer. This did Mr. Pym, one of the committee, in a ſet ſpeech, the deſign whereof was to ſhew, that the king's whole anſwer was full of ſcandalous and injurious aſperſions upon the city and parliament. So the king had little reaſon to be ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his anſwer, on which however he had much depended, imagining it would be capable of ſowing diſcord between the people of London and the magiſtrates.

Some days after, the king ſent to the ſheriffs of London a declaration, grievouſly complaining of Pym's ſpeech, and of the publication of a pamphlet in the city in his name, as if he retracted his former promiſes. He required alſo the maſter and wardens of the ſeveral companies of the city, to ſummon all their members, and read this declaration with his fore-mentioned anſwer, publicly in their ſeveral halls. He declared that Iſaac Pennington not being regularly elected according to their charter, or lawfully admitted, could not be looked upon as lord-mayor of London, and ordered the ſheriffs to commit him to ſafe cuſtody, with ſome other aldermen. But the parliament perceiving, the king's aim was to incite the people of London againſt their magiſtrates, commanded the ſheriffs not to execute the order.

As the king frequently ſent private agents to London, to correſpond with his friends there, and to be fully informed of what paſſed in the city and parliament, both houſes thought proper, in order to render this practice more difficult to declare, that all perſons coming from the king's quarters to London without a ſafe-conduct, ſhould be treated as ſpies.

During the winter before the opening of the ſecond campaign, the conteſt about the number of papiſts in the ſervice of the king and of the parliament was renewed, on occaſion of ſome papers publiſhed by the earl of Newcaſtle, and the lord Fairfax againſt each other. The earl of Newcaſtle, did not deny that he had papiſts in his army; but maintained, they were few in number, and beſides, it was lawful to employ them, ſince it was not becauſe of their religion, but for their loyalty. On the other hand, he affirmed, there were great numbers in the parliament's army, and appealed for the truth of what he ſaid to their muſter-rolls. I confeſs this proof to me ſeems of no weight. For beſides that theſe rolls were not publiſhed, and conſequently not eaſy to be examined, probably the religion of the officers and ſoldiers was not ſpecified [d]. However, the king and the earl of Newcaſtle openly aſſerted, there were many papiſts in the parliament's army. The earl of Clarendon has advanced the ſame thing: but in all their writings, there is not a ſingle catholic named; whereas the parliament produced liſts of popiſh officers in the king's ſervice, with their names, quality, and employs. Beſides, it is eaſy to ſee, that the king, according to his principles and behaviour to the papiſts, from the beginning of his reign, made no ſcruple to employ them, and that they themſelves could expect ſome advantage in ſerving him. But what intereſt the parliament could have to employ catholics, or what advantage could accrue to them from that ſervice, does not ſo clearly appear. Nevertheleſs, the imputation perpetually caſt upon him afterwards of having popiſh armies, becauſe he refuſed not the aſſiſtance of papiſts, and the conſequence drawn from thence, that his deſign was to deſtroy the proteſtant religion, muſt be deemed a very great aggravation, and a mere calumny to render the king odious.

Since the queen was in Holland, ſhe had not been idle. She laboured effectually to procure the king officers, arms, and ammunition, which was facilitated by the prince of Orange her ſon-in-law's credit. September 1642, both houſes ſent an agent, Walter Strickland, to the Hague, to complain to the ſtates-general of the preparations making in Holland for the king, and of the ſupplies that were ſent

[c] Ven, Foulk, and Manwaring, are named by the king.

[d] The earl ſays, in one of his papers, "That the parliament had had, for many months, great numbers under their pay, both Engliſh, French, and other nations, whom, at the time of their inrolment, and ever ſince, they did know to have been profeſſed papiſts: whereas, it was notoriouſly known, that before this courſe was taken on the other party, his majeſty and his miniſters did not admit to, nor continue any ſoldiers in pay, who were ſuſpected to be that way inclined, or did refuſe the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy." Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 80.

him. But Strickland was received very coldly, by reaſon of the prince of Orange's credit in the aſſembly of the ſtates. Beſides, the ſtates-general did not conſider him as a public miniſter, becauſe hitherto the parliament had never ſent agents abroad in their own name. They were contented therefore to depute one of the members of their aſſembly, to know what he had to ſay. Strickland put into their hands a declaration from the parliament, to this effect:

"That the lords and commons underſtood by an intercepted letter of the lord Digby's, that he had addreſſed himſelf to the prince of Orange, and by his countenance and help made proviſion of great quantities of ordnance, powder, arms, and divers other ſorts of warlike proviſion: and the ſaid prince, the better to encourage divers commanders of Engliſh regiments in the ſervice of the ſtates, to reſort to the king's aid againſt the parliament, had promiſed to reſerve their places for them in their abſence.

"That they could not believe, this was done by any authority of the ſtates, conſidering the great help they had received from England, when they lay under the heavy oppreſſion of their princes. Neither could they think, that they would be forward to help to make thoſe ſlaves, who had been uſeful and aſſiſtant in making them freemen: or that they would forget, that the troubles and dangers of them both iſſued from the ſame fountain, and that thoſe who were ſet at work to undermine religion and liberty in England, were the ſame, which by open force had ſought to do the like in the low-countries.

"That it could not be unknown to them, that the jeſuitical faction had corrupted the king's counſels, and the conſcience of a great part of the clergy, plotted to deſtroy the parliament, raiſed a cruel rebellion in Ireland, endeavoured to divide the king from his parliament and people, and by falſe ſlanders incenſed his majeſty ſo, as that he had reſolved to ſet up his ſtandard, and draw his ſword for the deſtruction of his people, whom by the laws and conſtitution of the kingdom he is bound to preſerve and protect.

"That the queſtion was not, whether the king ſhould enjoy the ſame prerogative and power which belonged to former kings his predeceſſors; but whether that prerogative and power ſhould be employed to the defence or the ruin of the kingdom.

"That it could not be denied, but that it would be more honour and wealth, ſafety and greatneſs to his majeſty, in concurring with his parliament, than in the courſe he was in; but that his counſellors looked more upon the prevailing of their own party, than upon any of thoſe great advantages, which he might obtain by joining with his people.

"That both houſes had lately expreſſed ſo earneſt inclinations to a national love and amity with the United Provinces, that they had petitioned his majeſty, that they might be joined with them in a more near and ſtrait league and union: and they could not but expect ſome returns from them of the like expreſſions; therefore deſired, that they would be ſo far from blowing the fire which began to kindle amongſt them, that they would rather endeavour to quench it by ſtrengthening and encouraging them, who had no other deſign but not to be deſtroyed, and to preſerve their religion."

This declaration was long neglected, the ſtates-general not vouchſafing to return any anſwer. At length, Strickland having preſented it to the ſtates of Holland, they promiſed to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality, and ingaged the province of Zealand to take the ſame reſolution. They even arreſted ſome ſhips laden with ammunition and ſoldiers for the king. Then the ſtates-general could no longer help taking notice of the parliament's declaration, and returned in anſwer: "That they would expreſly forbid every body to tranſport any weapons or warlike ammunition into England, and would gladly employ their mediation for putting an end to the troubles."

But this could not hinder the indirect ſupplies that were ſent to the king, by reaſon of the prince of Orange's great credit. During the winter, general King, a Scotchman, brought his majeſty ordnance and ammunition [e], and general Goring brought over ſome Engliſh officers that were in the ſervice of the ſtates. It is true, that from time to time the Engliſh ſhips ſeized ſome of thoſe veſſels that were ſent to the king. Strickland made frequent complaints of the ſupplies: but the ſtates-general took no notice of them. Nay, they granted the queen, who was preparing to return to England, ſo large and general a paſſport, that by virtue thereof ſhe might tranſport into England troops, ordnance, arms, and ammunition, in what quantities ſhe pleaſed. Nevertheleſs the ſtates of Holland, whom it concerned to keep fair with the parliament, ſtopped one of the queen's veſſels laden with ammunition; whereupon ſhe delivered in a proteſtation. In all probability, they had a mind to manage both parties, the parliament by ſeizing one of the ſhips, and the queen, by ſtopping but one out of many. We ſhall ſee hereafter, that the ſupply brought to the king by the queen was very conſiderable. She arrived about the middle of February in Burlington-bay, and from thence went to York, where ſhe made ſome ſtay [f].

The king, as I ſaid, conſtantly inſiſted upon the laws of the land, and urged that they ought to be obſerved in time of war as in time of peace. The admitting of this principle would have turned greatly to his advantage, for the laws not ſuppoſing an actual diviſion between the king and the parliament, aſcribed to the king ſundry prerogatives which he could have uſed againſt his enemies. For inſtance, by virtue of the prerogative, he pretended to adjourn the courts of juſtice to Oxford during Hilary-term, but the parliament would not conſent to it.

On the other hand, the counties being divided between the two parties, the parliament addreſſed his majeſty, repreſenting the inconveniencies that would follow the holding of the aſſizes in the ſeveral counties, ſome whereof were for the king, and ſome for the parliament, beſought him to agree to their being deferred to a more convenient ſeaſon. But the king poſitively refuſed it under colour of the neceſſity of puniſhing malefactors at all times. Had he gained this point, he might have condemned as rebels all thoſe that had taken up arms againſt him, for the judges muſt have adminiſtered juſtice according to the law, which not ſuppoſing an open war between the king and the parliament, condemn, without diſtinction, all that are in arms againſt the king. But the caſe the kingdom was then in, being wholly extraordinary and unexpected, the parliament pretended, the laws could not be executed in that reſpect, without ſome reſtriction and explanation. For this reaſon, they deſired the aſſizes might be ſuſpended, till ſome means might be agreed upon, for the impartial rendering of juſtice. But finding, the king refuſed to conſent to it, they publiſhed an ordinance, forbidding the aſſizes to be held till further order.

Though the war was begun in April 1642, and a battle, with ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, had been fought, the king could hardly be perſuaded, that the very perſons who were in arms againſt him, could or dared refuſe the obedience that was due to him. Of this notion he gave an evident proof in March 1642-3, on the following occaſion. The city of Briſtol being in the hands of the parliament, the king had gained Mr. Robert Yeoman the laſt year ſheriff and one of the principal citizens, and ſent him a commiſſion to raiſe forces, and appoint what commanders he thought proper, Yeoman's deſign being to ſurrender the city to the king. To that purpoſe, he joined with one Bourchier another citizen, and they both formed a plot, into which many of the inhabitants entered, to ſeize the city for the king. The plot being diſcovered the very night it was to be executed, the conſpirators were impriſoned, and the parliament ſent down a commiſſion to colonel Nathaniel Fiennes the governor, to call a council of war, and proceed againſt the priſoners by martial law. The conſpirators being condemned to die, the king writ to the governor by general Ruthen, earl of Forth, that if he put theſe men to death, ſome priſoners in his hands ſhould undergo the ſame fate. Fiennes returned the general a civil anſwer: but in ſhewing him however, the difference between priſoners of war, and ſecret ſpies and conſpirators, he threatened, in his turn, there would be frequent opportunities in the courſe of the war for the parliament to uſe repriſals. Whereupon the king writ a thundering letter to the mayor and aldermen of Briſtol, commanding them, as well as all the inhabitants, to riſe againſt the governor and garriſon, and free the condemned priſoners. It was eaſy to foreſee the mayor would ill obey this order. Accordingly the priſoners Yeoman and Bourchier were executed, without the king's thinking proper to proceed in the like manner againſt the priſoners in his power.

Before I relate what paſſed in the ſecond campaign of the year 1643, I think it abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the diſpoſition of the king and parliament to peace and war. Military actions depending upon many circumſtances of time, place, number, and bravery of the troops, conduct and abilities of the officers, theſe things indeed are ingredients of hiſtory, but not the chief. If in the recital of warlike exploits, the end of hiſtory was to teach the art of war, all the circumſtances of the ſieges, battles, ſkirmiſhes, would be eſſential: but there is another end more material to the generality of readers, namely, to know the cauſes and grounds of the beginning and continuance of wars, and conſequently the intereſts, motives, and artifices of the parties concerned, from whence military actions ſpring. This is the reaſon why I reſolved to be brief in the deſcription of battles, in order to be more large upon the fore-mentioned points which I look upon as what is moſt conſiderable. Nothing, in my opinion, is more proper to ſhew the real diſpoſitions of the king and the parliament, than the treaty at Oxford in March and April 1643, concerning a peace. And therefore I reſolved to give a particular account of that negotiation, and the rather as I ſhall thereby avoid the neceſſity of explaining afterwards many things, which otherwiſe might not be well underſtood.

[f] The day after her majeſty's landing, four of the parliament ſhips came into the road, and firing upon the veſſels that were landing the ammunition, the balls reached the town, near the place where the queen was reſting herſelf after her voyage. Whereupon, ſhe was forced to remove to an obſcure lodging behind a hill. The marquis of Montroſe, and the lord Ogilby, with two troops of horſe, conducted her to the earl of Newcaſtle, who entertained her at York. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 156. Commons war, p. 24.

Both houſes of parliament having conſidered that the king made ſome advantage of the inclination he had conſtantly ſhewn for peace, ſent and deſired a ſafe-conduct for commiſſioners they intended to ſend to him, which the king granting, the commiſſioners preſented to his majeſty certain propoſitions as proper to ſerve for foundation to a peace[g]. Ruſhworth has preſerved in his collection two ſpeeches made in council upon this occaſion, the earl of Briſtol's to perſuade the king to continue the war, and the earl of Dorſet's to demonſtrate the advantages and neceſſity of a peace. The ſubſtance of the earl of Briſtol's reaſons was as follows:

"1. That the parliament had declared divers of the greateſt and moſt eminent among the nobility delinquents in the higheſt nature; ſo that there could not be an accommodation, without the utter ruin of themſelves and their families.

"2. But granting that this article were removed, his majeſty could not condeſcend with his honour to beg peace of his ſubjects.

"3. That no mention could be found in the hiſtory of Spain of inteſtine and civil wars, becauſe they were truly ſubjects, and their ſovereign truly a ſovereign. But ſince in England the ſtate would neither be ſo to the king, nor ſuffer the king to be ſo to them, he thought they ſhould be compelled to it.

"4. That it was no diſhonour for ſubjects to condeſcend to their king, but it was an exceſſive diminution to his majeſty's royalty, to ſubmit himſelf to his ſubjects.

"5. His opinion therefore was, that his majeſty ſhould neither propound to the parliament, or receive from them any conditions for peace, but ſuch as ſhould abſolutely comply with the regal dignity and prerogative, and ſuch as might be no way prejudicial to his majeſty's ſervants and counſellors, or their eſtates.

"6. That there was an army on foot which could by force compel that, which fair words could not effect."

On the other ſide the earl of Dorſet repreſented:

"1. That peace, and a ſudden one, was abſolutely neceſſary, betwixt his majeſty and the parliament.

"2. That he would not adviſe them to embrace a peace that ſhould be more diſadvantageous than the war, a peace which would deſtroy the eſtates and families of the nobility. But it was to be conſidered, that the parliament declared that only againſt delinquents, ſuch as they conjectured had miſcounſelled his majeſty, and were the authors of the tumults in the common-wealth. But this declaration of theirs, except ſuch crimes could be proved againſt them, were of no validity; the parliament would do nothing unjuſtly, nor condemn the innocent; and certainly innocent men needed not fear to appear before any judges whatſoever. He who ſhould, for any cauſe, prefer his private good before the public utility, was but an ill ſon of the common-wealth.

"3. That the buſineſs of the kingdom was to ſtudy to reconcile all differences between his majeſty and his parliament, and ſo to reconcile them, that they ſhould no way prejudice his royal prerogative, of which the parliament being a loyal defender (knowing the ſubject's property dependent on it) would never endeavour to be an infringer; ſo that if doubts and jealouſies were taken away by a fair treaty between his majeſty and the parliament, no doubt a means might be deviſed to rectify differences.

"4. That in Spain, the ſubjects were ſcarcely removed a degree from ſlaves, nor the ſovereign from a tyrant. But in England the ſubjects had, by a long and received liberty, made their freedom reſult into a ſecond nature: neither was it ſafe for the kings to ſtrive to introduce the Spaniſh government upon this free-born nation, nor juſt for the people to ſuffer that government to be inforced upon them; which he was certain his majeſty's goodneſs never intended.

"5. Granting that his majeſty had an army of gallant and able men, yet he had infinite diſadvantages on his ſide, the parliament having double his number, and ſurely perſons of as much bravery, nay, and ſure to be daily ſupplied when any of their number failed, a benefit which his majeſty could not boaſt of, they having the moſt popular part of the kingdom at their devotion; all, or moſt of the cities, conſiderable towns, and ports, together with the maineſt pillar of the kingdom's ſafety, the ſea, at their command, and the navy; and, which was moſt material of all, an unexauſted indies of money to pay their ſoldiers, out of the liberal contributions of coin and plate, ſent by people of all conditions, who accounted the parliament's cauſe their own.

"6. All which things conſidered, he concluded it neceſſary, to beſeech his majeſty, to take ſome preſent order for a treaty of peace betwixt himſelf, and his high court of parliament."

It is not ſaid, what was the reſult of the council's deliberations; but it may be judged by what followed, that the king reliſhed the earl of Briſtol's reaſons better than the earl of Dorſet's. I return to the treaty at Oxford.

[1643] The parliament having to guard againſt the artifices of the king's friends, who were ſtrenuouſly endeavouring to perſuade the people, that the war was waging only for the ſake of ſome of their members, could not better contradict them, than by openly ſuing to the king for peace, and by publiſhing the terms on which they were ready to conclude it. They meant to ſhew by theſe terms, that it was not the private intereſt of ſome of their members that put them upon action, but ſolely the welfare and ſecurity of the nation: however, they knew at the ſame time the king would not accept them. His majeſty, on his part, was obliged to ſhew he wiſhed for peace, ſince he had always pretended to take up arms only in his own defence. But the truth is, he deſired it no more than the parliament, becauſe he ſaw, it was no favourable juncture to obtain ſuch a peace as he expected, with a full reſtoration of all his prerogatives. Thus, though neither the king nor the parliament had any intention ſincerely to endeavour a peace, they were however both indiſpenſibly obliged to expreſs their deſire of it, not to give the people occaſion to believe, they preferred their private intereſt to the good of the kingdom. For this reaſon the king continually inſiſted upon reſtoring the laws to the former vigour, and the parliament, upon ſecurity for the obſervance of the ſame laws, and thereby both render a peace impracticable. The ſubſtance of the propoſitions preſented to the king by the parliament was to this effect[h].

"I. That the armies on both ſides be diſbanded, and his majeſty be pleaſed to return to his parliament.

"II. That he leaves delinquents to a legal trial and judgment of parliament.

"III. That the papiſts be diſbanded and diſarmed.

"IV. That his majeſty be pleaſed to give the royal aſſent to the following bills:

"1. For taking away ſuperſtitious innovations.

"2. For the utter aboliſhing of all archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, &c.

"3. Againſt ſcandalous miniſters.

"4. Againſt pluralities.

"5. For conſultation with godly, religious, and learned divines. That his majeſty be pleaſed to promiſe to paſs ſuch other bills for ſettling of church-government, as upon conſultation with the aſſembly of the ſaid divines, ſhall be reſolved on by both houſes of parliament.

"V. That his majeſty be pleaſed to give his conſent,

[g] The commiſſioners on this occaſion, were Algernon Percy earl of Northumberland, Philip Herbert earl of Pembroke, William Cecil earl of Saliſbury, and Henry Rich earl of Holland; with the viſcounts Wenman and Dungarnon; and ſir John Holland, and ſir William Litton, knights; William Pierrepoint, Buliſtrade Whitelock, Edmund Waller, and Richard Winwood, eſquires. They had their firſt acceſs to the king in Chriſt-church garden, where he was walking with the prince, and divers of the lords attending him. All kiſſed his hand, and Waller approaching the laſt, his majeſty ſaid, "Though you are the laſt, yet you are not the worſt, nor the leaſt in my favour." The diſcovery of a plot then in hand in London to betray the parliament, wherein Waller was concerned, did manifeſt the king's courtſhip to Waller, to be for that ſervice. Whitelock, p. 67.

[h] The earl of Northumberland read the propoſitions to the king with a ſober and ſtout courage, and being interrupted by him, ſaid ſmartly, "Your majeſty will give me leave to proceed?" The king anſwered, "Ay, ay;" ſo the earl read them all through. Whitelock's Mem. p. 67. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 165.

Sir

That an oath may be eſtabliſhed by act of parliament to be adminiſtered in ſuch manner, as by both houſes ſhall be agreed on; wherein they ſhall abjure and renounce the pope's ſupremacy; the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, purgatory, worſhipping of the conſecrated hoſt, crucifixes, and images; and that the refuſing the ſaid oath, being tendered in ſuch manner as ſhall be appointed by act of parliament, ſhall be a ſufficient conviction in law of recuſancy.

" And that his majeſty be pleaſed to conſent to.

" 1. A bill for the education of the children of papiſts by proteſtants.

" 2. To a bill for the true levying of the penalties againſt recuſants, in ſuch manner, as both houſes of parliament ſhall agree on.

" 3. To a bill whereby the practice of papiſts againſt the ſtate may be prevented.

" VI. That the earl of Briſtol and the lord Herbert may be moved from his majeſty's councils and court, and that they may not bear any office, or have any employments concerning the ſtate or common-wealth.

" VII. That the militia be ſettled in ſuch a manner as ſhall be agreed on by both houſes.

" VIII. That his majeſty be pleaſed to appoint for judges[1], ——— with the clauſe 'Quam diu ſe bene geſſerint.'

" IX. That all ſuch perſons as have been put out of the commiſſion of peace, &c. ſince the firſt day of April 1642, may again be put into them; and that ſuch perſons may be removed, as ſhall be excepted againſt by both houſes of parliament.

" X. That his majeſty be pleaſed to paſs the bill preſented to him to vindicate and ſecure the privileges of parliament, from the ill conſequences of the late precedent in the charge and proceeding againſt the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the houſe of commons.

" XI. That his majeſty's royal aſſent may be given unto ſuch acts as ſhall be adviſed by both houſes of parliament, for the ſatisfying and paying the debts and damages wherein the two houſes of parliament have engaged the public faith of the kingdom.

" XII. That his majeſty be pleaſed to enter into a ſtrict alliance with the ſtates of the United-provinces, and other neighbouring princes and ſtates of the proteſtant religion.

" XIII. That in the general pardon which his majeſty hath been pleaſed to offer to his ſubjects, all offences and miſdemeanours committed before the 10th of January 1641, which have been, or ſhall be queſtioned in parliament before the 10th of January 1643, ſhall be accepted; which offences and miſdemeanours ſhall nevertheleſs be taken and adjudged to be fully diſcharged againſt all other inferior courts: that likewiſe there ſhall be an exception of offences committed by any perſons, which have had any hand in the rebellion of Ireland: and an exception of William earl of Newcaſtle, and George lord Digby.

" XIV. That his majeſty will be pleaſed to reſtore ſuch members of either houſe of parliament to their ſeveral places, out of which they have been put ſince the beginning of the parliament; that they may receive ſatisfaction and reparation for thoſe places; and that all others may be reſtored to their offices and employments, who have been put out of the ſame upon any diſpleaſure conceived againſt them, for any aſſiſtance given to both houſes of parliament, or obeying their commands, or forbearing to leave their attendance upon the parliament without licence, or for any other occaſion ariſing from the differences betwixt his majeſty and his parliament."

Theſe propoſitions plainly ſhewed, that though both houſes ſued for a treaty in order to a peace, they were however very far from it, ſince they inſiſted upon things which the king would ſcarce have granted, had his condition been much worſe that it was at that time. Nevertheleſs, as he had talked very much of his offer in Auguſt laſt, to treat of a peace, and of the refuſal of both houſes, he did not think it adviſeable abſolutely to reject theſe propoſitions. He conſented therefore, that they ſhould be diſcuſſed in a treaty; but gave ſix others on his part; namely.

" 1. That his majeſty's own revenue, magazines, towns, forts, and ſhips which have been taken or kept from him by force, be forthwith reſtored unto him.

" 2. That whatſoever had been done or publiſhed contrary to the laws of the land, or derogatory to his majeſty's power and rights be renounced and recalled.

" 3. That whatſoever illegal power hath been claimed and exerciſed by both or either houſe, over his ſubjects as impriſoning their perſons without law, ſtopping their habeas corpus's, and impoſing upon their eſtates without act of parliament be diſclaimed, and all ſuch perſons ſo committed forthwith diſcharged.

" 4. That a bill be framed for the better preſerving of the book of common prayer from the ſcorn and violence of Browniſts, Anabaptiſts, and other ſectaries, with proper clauſes for the eaſe of tender conſciences.

" 5. That all ſuch perſons, as, upon the treaty, ſhall be excepted out of the general pardon, ſhall be tried, 'per pares,' according to the uſual courſe and known law of the land.

" 6. And to the intent this treaty may not ſuffer interruption by any intervening accidents, that a ceſſation of arms and free trade for all his majeſty's ſubjects be firſt agreed upon."

Some days after, the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes, to deſire that his laſt propoſition might be firſt taken into conſideration, to the end that during the ceſſation of arms, the peace might be treated of with the greateſt tranquility, to which they conſented.

It was the 28th of February before both houſes ſent the terms to the king, on which they propoſed to conclude a ſuſpenſion of arms, during the treaty; namely,

" 1. That all manner of arms, ammunition, victuals, money, bullion, and all other commodities paſſing without ſuch a ſafe-conduct as may warrant their paſſage, may be ſtayed and ſeized on, as if no ſuch ceſſation were agreed on at all.

" 2. The ſame with regard to all manner of perſons paſſing without ſuch a ſafe-conduct.

" 3. That his majeſty's forces in Oxfordſhire ſhall advance no nearer to Windſor than Wheatly, and in Buckinghamſhire no nearer to Ayleſbury than Brill; and that in Berks the forces reſpectively ſhall not advance nearer the one to the other than now they are: and that the parliament-forces in Oxfordſhire ſhall advance no nearer to Oxford than Henley; and thoſe in Buckingham no nearer to Oxford than Ayleſbury; and that his majeſty's forces ſhall take no new quarters above twelve miles from Oxford any way; and that the parliament-forces ſhall take no new quarters above twelve miles from Windſor any way.

" 4. That no ſiege ſhall be begun or continued againſt Gloceſter, and that his majeſty's forces now employed in the ſiege ſhall return to Cirenceſter, and Malmſbury or to Oxford, as ſhall be moſt for their conveniency; and the parliament-forces which are in Gloceſterſhire, ſhall remain in the cities of Gloceſter, Briſtol, and the caſtle and town of Berkley, or retire nearer to Windſor, as they ſhall ſee cauſe; and that thoſe of Wales which are drawn to Gloceſter, ſhall return into their quarters, where they were before they drew down to Gloceſterſhire.

" 5. That in caſe it be pretended on either ſide, that the ceſſation is violated, no act of hoſtility is immediately to follow; but firſt, the party complaining is to acquaint the lord general on the other ſide, and to allow three days after notice given for ſatisfaction. And in caſe ſatisfaction be not given, or accepted, then five days notice to be given before hoſtility begin: and the like to be obſerved in the remoter armies by the commanders in chief.

" 6. Laſtly, That all the other forces in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, and not before-mentioned, ſhall remain in the ſame quarters and places as they are at the time of publiſhing this ceſſation, and under the ſame conditions as are mentioned in the articles before, and that this ceſſation ſhall not extend to reſtrain the ſetting forth, or employing of any ſhips for the defence of his majeſty's dominions."

The king replied to theſe propoſitions by a meſſage to both houſes, complaining, " That he had been left without an anſwer almoſt a month, from the 3d to the 28th of February. He conceived, that the articles of the ceſſation now preſented to him, were ſo ſtrict, that ſuch of his good ſubjects who were not of his army would receive no benefit by the ſuſpenſion, which he would ever inſiſt on: and therefore he had returned the articles with ſuch alterations as he doubt-

And that Mr. juſtice Bacon be continued; and the ſerjeants, Rolls and Atkins made juſtices of the King's-bench; Reeves and Foſter continued; ſerjeant Pheaſant made one of the juſtices of the Common-pleas; ſerjeant Creſwel, Mr. Samuel Brown, and Mr. John Pulloſton, be made barons of the Exchequer. ed not but both houſes would conſent to, ſince they ſufficiently manifeſted how ſolicitous he was for the good of his people, and how deſirous to prevent any more effuſion of his ſubjects blood. He deſired the ceſſation might begin the 12th of March, or ſooner, if the conditions ſhould be ſooner agreed on, and was willing the ſame ſhould continue for twenty days, in which time he hoped by the treaty a full peace might be eſtabliſhed throughout the kingdom.

It muſt be underſtood, that the king in this negociation propoſed to himſelf three advantages, as will hereafter evidently appear. 1. To gain time to make his preparations. 2. To ſet on foot, by means of a ceſſation of arms, a free commerce and correſpondence between the quarters of both armies, and particularly, between London and Oxford, which would help to provide himſelf of many things neceſſary for the enſuing campaign, by ſending for them from London or elſewhere. 3. To convey ſafely from York the forces and ammunition that were come from Holland. All this was concealed under the pretence of procuring the eaſe of his people by a free commerce throughout the kingdom. Theſe are the articles which he ſent to both houſes, with the alterations he mentioned.

" I. That all manner of arms, ammunition, money, bullion, and victuals paſſing for the uſe of either army, without a paſs or ſafe-conduct, from the generals of each army, may be ſtayed and ſeized on, as if no ceſſation were agreed on at all."

The king omitted here the words [and other commodities.]

" II. That all officers and ſoldiers of either army paſſing without licence or ſafe-conduct as aforeſaid, may be apprehended and detained, as if no ceſſation were agreed upon at all: and that all manner of perſons, his majeſty's ſubjects, of what quality or condition ſoever (except officers and ſoldiers of either army) ſhall paſs to and from the cities of Oxford and London, and back again at their pleaſure, during this ceſſation, as likewiſe to and from any other parts of his majeſty's dominions, without any ſearch, ſtay, or impriſonment of their perſons, or ſeizure and detention of their goods or eſtates: and that all manner of trade, traffic, and commerce, be free and open between his majeſty's ſubjects, excepting as aforeſaid, between the officers and ſoldiers of either army, or for arms, ammunition, money, bullion, or victuals, for the uſe of either army, without a paſs or ſafe-conduct, as aforeſaid, which may be a good beginning to renew the trade and correſpondence of the kingdom, and whereby his good ſubjects may be reſtored to that liberty and freedom they were born to and have ſo happily enjoyed, till theſe miſerable diſtractions, and which, even during this war, his majeſty hath to his utmoſt laboured to preſerve, opening the way by moſt ſtrict proclamations, to the paſſage of all commodities, even to the city of London itſelf.

III. The beginning of this article is the ſame as in the parliament's, but the end is different, viz.

" And that the forces of neither army ſhall advance the quarters nearer to each other, than they ſhall be upon the day agreed on for the ceſſation to begin; otherwiſe in paſſage and communication between their ſeveral quarters reſpectively, without any acts of hoſtility to each other, but may enlarge themſelves within their own quarters reſpectively, as they ſhall find convenient.

Hereby the king was at liberty to ſend for his forces from York to Oxford, without any oppoſition from the parliament's army.

" IV. That the forces of either army in Gloceſterſhire, Wiltſhire, and Wales, as likewiſe in the cities of Gloceſter, Briſtol, and the caſtle and town of Berkley, ſhall be guided by the rule expreſſed in the latter part of the precedent article.

V. This article is exactly the ſame with the parliament's.

" VI. That all other forces in the kingdom of England, and dominion of Wales, not before mentioned, ſhall remain in the ſame quarters and places, as they are at the time of publiſhing this ceſſation, otherwiſe than in paſſage and communication between their ſeveral quarters, as is mentioned in the latter part of the ſaid article; and that this ceſſation ſhall not extend to reſtrain the ſetting forth, or employing any ſhips for the defence of his majeſty's dominions, 'Provided that his majeſty be firſt acquainted with the particulars, and that ſuch ſhips as ſhall be ſet forth be commanded by ſuch perſons as his majeſty ſhall approve of.'

" VII. Laſtly, That during the ceſſation, none of his majeſty's ſubjects be impriſoned, otherwiſe than according to the known laws of the land; and that there ſhall be no plundering or violence offered to any of his majeſty's ſubjects. And his majeſty is very willing, if there be any ſcruples made concerning theſe propoſitions and circumſtances of the ceſſation, that the committee for the treaty nevertheleſs may immediately come hither, and ſo all matters concerning the ceſſation may be ſettled by them."

Though both houſes were by no means pleaſed with the king's alterations in their articles, yet as he offered to treat upon that ſubject, they deſired a ſafe-conduct for ſix commiſſioners, namely, the earl of Northumberland, the lord Say, and four commoners [k]. The king immediately granted it, excepting the lord Say, becauſe he was proclaimed traitor [l]. When he ſent the ſafe-conduct, he ſignified to them by a meſſage, that he was content his propoſition concerning the magazines, &c. and theirs for diſbanding the armies, ſhould be firſt treated of and agreed, and then the ſecond of his majeſty's, and the ſecond of theirs, and ſo in order: and that the time of the treaty might not exceed twenty days.

The parliament's five commiſſioners repairing to Oxford, preſented to the king freſh articles concerning the ceſſation of arms. But they were ſo little different from the firſt, that the king was not ſatisfied with them. And therefore he delivered to the commiſſioners the following objections againſt the laſt articles:

1. They are in effect the ſame his majeſty formerly excepted to, and there is not the leaſt mention of freedom of commerce between his ſubjects, and conſequently they have no eaſe or benefit by this ceſſation, though that is his majeſty's chief aim.

2. The putting the ſhips that may be employed under the command of perſons approved of by his majeſty, is not conſented to by theſe articles; and by that means the conveying of any number of forces from one place to another (which is an act of hoſtility) remains free to both houſes.

3. The army raiſed by the parliament is ſpoken of, as if his majeſty were no part of the parliament, or himſelf to have raiſed that army. Now in order to prevent any inconveniencies that might ariſe upon real differences or miſtakes, upon the latitude of expreſſions, and to avoid delays, his majeſty deſired the committee might have liberty to debate any ſuch differences and expreſſions, and yet no ſuch power is given in theſe articles, and the committee confeſſed to his majeſty they have no liberty, but are ſtrictly bound to the very words of the articles now ſent.

4. His majeſty's deſire, that during the ceſſation none of his ſubjects might be impriſoned otherwiſe than according to the laws of the land, is in no degree conſented to.

5. His majeſty's deſire againſt violence is not at all taken notice of, nor is his deſire againſt plundering any way ſatisfied; his majeſty not only meaning thereby the robbing of the ſubject by the unrulineſs of the uncommanded ſoldiers, but particularly the violence and plundering uſed to his ſubjects, for not ſubmitting to impoſitions required from them by ordinances of one or both houſes, which are contrary to the known laws of the land.

6. Beſides, as there is no conſent given to thoſe alterations offered by his majeſty, ſo where an abſolute conſent may be ſuppoſed, becauſe the very words of his majeſty's articles are wholly preſerved, yet by reaſon of the relation of ſomewhat going before that is varied by them, the ſenſe of thoſe words is wholly varied too. So that upon the matter, all the propoſitions made by his majeſty (which did not in terms agree with thoſe preſented to him) are utterly rejected. For theſe reaſons his majeſty deſires that the committee now ſent may ſpeedily have liberty to debate and agree upon the articles of ceſſation.

Both houſes perceiving, the king concealed under the little alterations he had made in their articles, more than appeared at firſt ſight, thought proper to tell him, they were not wholly ignorant what advantages he intended to draw from ſuch a ceſſation of arms as he propoſed. To that end, they ſent him their reaſons in writing why they were obliged to reject his additions to their articles. The ſubſtance of their reaſons was to this effect:

" 1. That if they ſhould grant ſuch a free trade as your majeſty deſireth to Oxford and other places, where your forces remain, it would be very difficult, if not impoſſible, to keep arms, ammunition, money and bullion, from paſſing into your your majesty's army, without very strict and frequent searches, which would make it so troublesome, chargeable, and dangerous to the subjects, that the question being but for twenty days for so few places, the mischiefs and inconveniences to the whole kingdom would be far greater than any advantage which that small number of your subjects (whom it concerns) can have by it.

[l] But he told them, in caſe they thought fit to ſend any other in his room not liable to the ſame exception, he ſhould enjoy the benefit of the ſafe-conduct, as well as if particularly named. But they did not ſend any in his ſtead, ſo only five went. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 173.

"The case then is much otherwise than is expressed by your majesty's answer; for whereas they are charged not to give the least permission of this liberty and freedom of trade during the cessation, the truth is, That they do grant it as fully to the benefit of the subjects even in time of war; and that your majesty, in pressing this for the people's good, doth therein desire that which will be very little beneficial to the subject, but exceeding advantageous to your majesty, in supplying your army with many necessaries, and making your quarters a staple for such commodities as may be vented in the adjacent counties, and so draw money thither, whereby the inhabitants will be better enabled by loans and contributions to support your majesty's army. And as your majesty may receive much advantage, and the other army much danger, if such freedom should be granted to those places; so there is no probability that the army raised by the lords and commons, shall have any return of commodities and other supplies from thence, which may be useful for them: and they conceive, that in a treaty for a cessation, those demands cannot be thought reasonable which are not indifferent, that is equally advantageous to both parties.

"As they have given no interruption to the trade of the kingdom, but in relation to the supply of the contrary army, which the reason of war requires; so they beseech your majesty to consider, whether your soldiers have not robbed the carriers in several parts, where there hath been such reason; and your ships taken many ships, to the great damage, not only of particular merchants, but of the whole kingdom. And whether your majesty have not declared your own purpose, and endeavoured by your ministers of state, to embark the merchants goods in foreign parts, which hath been in some measure executed upon the Eastland merchants in Denmark, and is a course which will much diminish the wealth of the kingdom, violate the law of nations, make other princes arbiters of the difference betwixt your majesty and your people, break off the intercourse between this and other states, and like to bring us into quarrels and dissension with all the neighbouring nations.

"2. To demand the approving of the commanders of the ships, is to desire the strength of one party to the other, before the difference be ended, and against all rules of treaty; to make a cessation at sea, would leave the kingdom naked to those foreign forces, which they have great cause to believe have been solicited against them, and the ports open for such supplies of arms and ammunition as shall be brought from beyond the seas: but for conveying any number of forces by those means from one port to another, they shall observe the articles of the cessation by which that is restrained.

"3. As for the expressions of the army raised by the parliament, they are contented it should be altered thus (raised by both houses of parliament,) as not desiring to differ upon words; but to give any conclusive power in this case to the committee upon such differences as may arise, wherein the houses have given no express direction, is neither safe for the committee to undertake, nor fit for the two houses to grant; yet to debate, and to press the reason of their desires, whereby an agreement from your majesty may be procured, is granted to them; and although the two houses did think it most proper the cessation should be first agreed on, and that it was unfit to treat in blood, yet to satisfy the world of their earnest longing after peace, they have given power to the committee, to enter into the treaty upon the two first propositions, notwithstanding the cessation be not assented to; and those being agreed, they hope the foundation will be laid not only of a suspension, but a total abolition of all hostility in the kingdom.

"4. If the nature of war be duly considered, it must needs be acknowledged, that it is incompatible with the ordinary rules of a peaceable government: your majesty would have them commit none, but according to the known laws of the land, whereby they conceive your majesty understands, that it must be by the ordinary process of law; which being granted, it will follow, that no man must be committed by them for supplying your majesty with arms, powder, ammunition: for by the law of the land, the subject may carry such goods from London or any other place to Oxford, the soldiers must not be committed if they run from their colours, and refuse any duty in the army, 'No man shall be committed for not submitting to necessary supplies of money:' so that if this be yielded in your majesty's sense, they shall be disabled to restrain supplies from their enemies, and to govern or maintain their own soldiers. It cannot be thought reasonable, that under the disguise of a cessation, they should admit that which will necessarily produce the dissolving of the army, and the destruction of the cause.

"It seems not probable, that your majesty doth intend, that if any be taken with supplies for this army, or mutinying in your own, such persons shall not be committed, but according to the known laws of the land, that is, by process of law: but rather that your majesty will so interpret this limitation of known laws, that though it lays strict bonds upon both houses, yet it leaves your generals as much liberty as before: for it hath been denied by your majesty, that these known laws give any power to the two houses of parliament to raise arms, and so consequently their general cannot exercise any martial law in those cases; and it is not unlike, but that it will be affirmed, that the generals constituted by your majesty's commission, have that power by the same known laws; so that this article, under the specious shew of liberty and law, would altogether disable them to defend their liberties and laws, and would produce to your majesty an absolute victory and submission, under pretence of a cessation and treaty.

"5. Being, by necessity inevitable on their part, enforced to a defensive war in this unhappy breach between your majesty and them, and that they are therein warranted both by the laws of God and man, it must needs follow, that by the same laws they are enabled to raise means to support that war; and therefore, till it shall please God to incline your majesty to afford them such a peace as may secure them, they cannot relinquish the power of laying taxes upon those who ought to join with them in that defence, and the necessary ways of levying those taxes upon them, in case of refusal, for otherwise their army must needs be dissolved. But if your majesty shall consent to disband the armies, the cause of the war being taken away, the consequences will likewise be removed, and the subject restored to the benefit of those laws which the necessity of arms hath in such cases suspended.

"6. They deny any pretence of consenting to those alterations and additions offered by your majesty; only in the preamble they say, they have considered of those articles, with such alterations and additions; unto which articles they profess they were ready to agree, not as they were accompanied with those alterations and additions, but in such manner as they expressed. As for the clause left out in the third article, it implied a freedom of passage and communication of quarters, which is contrary to the nature of the cessation, whereby matters should be preserved in the state they are, and neither party have liberty so much to advantage himself, as it is evident your majesty might do, if your forces in the north and west might join with those at Oxford, and bring those supplies of treasure or arms thither, which were brought out of Holland; or at least it should be so indifferent, as to give a proportionable advantage to the other side, which this doth not. For the forces under the power of both houses are so disposed, that they have an easy passage from one to the other: but your majesty's forces are severed the one from the other, by many large counties, strong passes, and competent armies; and if they had admitted this clause, they had bereaved themselves of one of the greatest advantages, and freed your majesty's party of one of the greatest inconveniences which your majesty or they have in this war.

"For the reasons already alleged, they cannot agree to the alterations and enlargements of the cessation propounded, or to transfer any such power to the committees, of treating, debating, and agreeing upon those articles in any other manner than the houses have directed. But that a fair and speedy passage may be opened to a secure and happy peace. They have enabled their committees to treat and debate upon the two propositions concerning his majesty's own revenue, the delivery of his towns, castles, magazines, and ships, and the disbanding of the armies; which being agreed upon, a present peace and security will follow; and the treaty upon the other propositions be facilitated, without fear of interruption, by the confusion of war, or exasperation of either party by the bloody effects thereof."

The king failed not to reply to this paper. But as his answer was very long, I shall content myself with inserting the most material part of each article.

1. Concerning the freedom of trade:

His majeſty denies that he has any private benefit by it, and aſſures, that the good of the people is the only advantage he has in view. He ſlightly paſſes over the objection, that the ceſſation of arms not being to laſt but twenty days, the freedom of commerce could not be, for ſo ſhort a ſpace, of any great benefit to the nation.

His majeſty affirms, that no complaint concerning the robbing of carriers by his ſoldiers has been made to him, which he has not received to the relief and reparation of the ſufferers.

He owns, he is reſolved not to grant his protection to ſuch perſons abroad, who aſſiſt or conſent to actions of diſloyalty to him at home.

3. Concerning the ſhips.

He ſays, as the ſetting out of the preſent fleet is pretended to be for the defence of his dominions, it is moſt neceſſary for his majeſty to know both the deſigns, and to approve of the commanders. He cannot ſee how a ceſſation at ſea ſhould leave the kingdom naked to foreign forces; and is willing to concur in the reſiſtance of all ſuch, of what kind ſoever; and expects, that during the ceſſation, the conveying of all forces from one part to another by ſea, for the aſſiſtance of the earl of Eſſex, be reſtrained, which both houſes ſeem now to conſent to, though it be not at all expreſſed in their former articles.

3. Concerning the power of the committee.

His majeſty had, and hath great reaſon to deſire, that the committee may have liberty to debate and conclude any differences and expreſſions in the articles, in order to prevent loſs of time. Of this there is a clear evidence, in the conſent which his majeſty now underſtands to be given by both houſes, that no forces ſhall, during the ceſſation, be ſent by ſea, for the relief of any places held by them; which clauſe might in much leſs time have been agreed here, if there had been that liberty. And much time muſt ſtill be loſt, as the committee have not power to explain the meaning of both houſes concerning communication of quarters.

4. Concerning impriſonments.

It was no part of his majeſty's intention, that his article againſt impriſonment of his ſubjects, otherwiſe than according to the known laws of the land, ſhould extend to the deſtruction of the military diſcipline of either army. This is an inſtance of the neceſſity of enabling ſome perſons to conclude upon theſe articles, ſince a limitation of half a dozen words would have ſaved moſt of this fourth reaſon.

5. Concerning taxes.

His majeſty inſiſts very much, upon the two houſes not having a legal power to impoſe taxes without his conſent. And adds, he is very well pleaſed to find they have need of force and rapine to raiſe them. He ſays, he has reaſon to inſiſt, that no ſuch violence be uſed towards his ſubjects, for not ſubmitting to illegal impoſitions, being willing to be obliged from the like courſe, and to rely wholly upon the juſtice of his cauſe, and the affection of his people.

6. Concerning communication of quarters:

The king's anſwer upon this article was very general and obſcure. He ſays, it highly concerns him, that this and every other clauſe be ſo clear, that no after-differences may ariſe upon any diſputable point, ſince they, whoſe induſtry and malice could perſuade any of his people, that in the buſineſs of Brentford, he had broken a ceſſation before any was made or offered, would have a much eaſier work to lay the breach of a made ceſſation to his charge, if the ground of the breach would bear the leaſt diſpute. He agrees, that in a ceſſation the advantages ſhould be equal, but from this principle draws the inferences, That therefore ſir Ralph Hopton, and the earl of Newcaſtle, ought to have the ſame liberty to come to him, as the earl of Stamford, and the lord Fairfax, had to come to the earl of Eſſex. (1.)

Remark (1.) This advantage not accruing to both houſes by the ceſſation of arms, ſince they had it before, the king could not pretend to the ſame by virtue of the ſuſpenſion.

He concluded his anſwer with ſaying, "Notwithſtanding all this, his majeſty, to ſhew his abundant deſire of peace, is contented to admit a ceſſation upon the matter of their own articles, ſo that his majeſty may not be underſtood to conſent to any impoſing upon his ſubjects, or impriſoning them, to force them to contribute; ſo that there may not be a liberty for any rapine, plundering, or ſeizing upon his ſubjects by the parliament's ſoldiers; for not ſubmitting to ſuch illegal impoſitions; for otherwiſe both houſes may, during the ceſſation, impoſe new taxes, not only to the nineteenth part, but if they pleaſe, to the half of, or all their eſtates; and their army would then be at leiſure to be employed as collectors, as well of the old as the new impoſitions, and vaſt ſums would and might by this means be raiſed, to their own extraordinary advantage, and great diſadvantage of his majeſty, who can neither obtain his own conſent to take the like courſes, nor, in caſe he could, is he ſo quartered as to have within the power of his army, any ſuch city as London, or ſo many and rich counties as they have to retire to on ſuch an occaſion."

Both houſes having examined the king's anſwer, ſent their committee new inſtructions, wherein they ſaid, "His majeſty's expreſſions in his anſwer were ſo doubtful, that they did not think good to conſume any more time in debates upon the ceſſation, and the rather, as the remainder of the whole time for the treaty was but ſeven days, and if the ceſſation were preſently agreed, it would not yield any conſiderable advantage to the kingdom. Wherefore they ſhould deſire his majeſty, to give a ſpeedy and poſitive anſwer to their firſt propoſition concerning the diſbanding, that ſo the people might not have the ſhadow, but the ſubſtance of peace."

Theſe inſtructions being communicated to the king, he returned an anſwer, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew, it was not his fault that a ceſſation of arms was not concluded. He preſſed again, that whatever was thought doubtful in the articles might be expounded, whatever was excepted at might be debated, a ceſſation concluded, and power given to the committee to that end.

Theſe are all the tranſactions concerning the ſuſpenſion of arms propoſed by the king, and by which, probably, he had hoped to reap great advantages, had the two houſes been leſs upon their guard. As the conferences on the peace were not to commence till the 25th of March, whatever was done before that day concerning the ceſſation, is to be conſidered, rather as a preparative, than as part of the conferences, though the negociation concerning the ſuſpenſion was continued till 7th of April.

I muſt now ſpeak of the eſſential part of the treaty, relating to the terms offered on both ſides for a peace. As it was agreed to begin with the diſcuſſion of the two firſt reſpective propoſitions, his majeſty's firſt was immediately conſidered. The propoſitions was, That his revenue, magazines, towns, ſhips, and forts, ſhould be reſtored. I ſhall relate the principal things urged upon each of theſe heads.

Concerning the revenue.

March the 26th, the commiſſioners preſented to the king a memorial, containing,

"That the two houſes of parliament had not made uſe of his majeſty's own revenue, but in a very ſmall proportion, which for a good part had been employed in the maintenance of his majeſty's children, according to the allowance eſtabliſhed by himſelf: that they would ſatisfy what ſhould remain due to his majeſty, of thoſe ſums received out of his own revenue; and would leave the ſame to his majeſty for the time to come. But they likewiſe propoſed, That he would reſtore what had been taken for his uſe, upon any of the bills aſſigned to other purpoſes, by ſeveral acts of parliament, or out of the proviſion made for the war of Ireland."

The king's anſwer.

"That he was well contented to allow whatſoever had been employed in the maintenance of his children, and to receive the arrears due to himſelf, and to be ſure of his own for the future.

"That he was willing to reſtore all monies taken for his uſe by any authority from him, upon any bills aſſigned to other purpoſes, being aſſured he had received very little or nothing that way.

"But he expected ſatisfaction for all thoſe ſeveral ſums received and diverted to other purpoſes, by orders of one or both houſes, which ought to have been paid upon the act of pacification with Scotland, or employed for the diſcharge of the debts of the kingdom, and by other acts of parliament for the relief of his proteſtant ſubjects of Ireland."

The next day, the commiſſioners deſired to know of his majeſty, if he would not account his own revenue to be ſure for the future, if both houſes of parliament did leave it in the ſame way as it was before the troubles begun.

The

The king anſwered, "That by thoſe words (of being ſure of his own for the future) he meant that no reſtraints or interruption ſhould be made by one or both houſes, in and upon his majeſty's revenue, but that it ſhould be left in the ſame way it was before the troubles begun."

It is eaſy to ſee, there was no difficulties upon this article capable of preventing a peace.

Concerning the magazine.

The parliament's commiſſioners offered in writing, "That all the arms and ammunition taken out of his majeſty's magazines, ſhould be delivered into his ſtores, and whatſoever ſhould be wanting, they would in convenient time ſupply in kind. But they likewiſe propoſed, That the perſons to whoſe charge thoſe public magazines ſhould be committed, being nominated by his majeſty, might be ſuch as the two houſes of parliament could confide in. And that he would reſtore all ſuch arms and ammunition, as had been taken for his uſe from the ſeveral counties, cities, and towns."

The king's anſwer.

"The magazines ſhall be committed to, and continued in the cuſtody of, the ſworn officers, to whoſe places the ſame belong. And if any the ſaid officers ſhall forfeit that truſt by any miſdemeanours, his majeſty will by no means defend them from the juſtice of the law.

"His majeſty will reſtore again, and recompence out of his own ſtores, ſuch arms and ammunition as have been taken for his uſe out of the ſeveral counties, &c.

"He expects, that the arms and ammunition which have been taken from the ſeveral counties and cities, for the uſe of the armies under the command of the earl of Eſſex, be likewiſe reſtored to them."

Without entering into a more particular diſcuſſion of this article, it ſuffices to ſay, that the whole difficulty lay in both houſes reſerving to themſelves the power of approving ſuch as ſhould be entruſted with the cuſtody of the magazines, and in the king's pretending, that the legal oath of ſuch perſons was a ſufficient ſecurity. And this rendered the concluſion of it impracticable.

Concerning the reſtitution of the towns and forts.

The ſame difficulty occurred upon this article. The two houſes offered to reſtore the towns and forts, but pretended that they ſhould be delivered into the hands of ſuch perſons as both houſes could confide in, which the king would not agree too. As the commiſſioners urged the neceſſity of giving ſatisfaction to the people, with reſpect to their fears and jealouſies, the king anſwered, That he rather expected, their reaſons ſhould have had ſome foundation in the law of the land, than that they ſhould only have inſiſted upon fears and jealouſies, of which as he did not know the ground, ſo was he ignorant of the cure.

Concerning the ſhips.

It was the ſame with this as with the two forgoing articles. Both houſes required, that the lord high-admiral and all commanders of ſhips ſhould take a particular oath, to uſe their utmoſt power to preſerve the true proteſtant religion, and the peace of the kingdom, againſt all foreign forces, and all other forces raiſed without his majeſty's authority and conſent of the two houſes of parliament. But the king would not conſent to it, alleging, the oaths which all thoſe officers were by law already obliged to take, were very ſufficient. Only he ſaid, if any thing ſhould be made appear to him neceſſary to be added, when there ſhould be a full and peaceable convention of parliament, he would readily conſent to an act for ſuch addition.

If it is conſidered, what was the occaſion of the war, it will eaſily be perceived, that the execution and not the injunction of the laws was the queſtion. Wherefore the king, in pretending that every thing ſhould be ſettled by the laws, did not meddle in the leaſt with the queſtion to be decided in his diſpute with the parliament.

The king's firſt propoſition having been thus debated in vain, they proceeded to the firſt of the parliament's, which contained two articles; namely, that both armies ſhould be diſbanded, and his majeſty return to his parliament.

The king's anſwer to the firſt was, "That he was willing all armies ſhould be diſbanded, and conceived the beſt way to it to be a ſpeedy concluſion of the treaty, and for that purpoſe he deſired, that the time given to the committee of both houſes to treat might be enlarged."

As to the ſecond, "He would repair to his parliament, as ſoon as he could poſſibly do it with his honour and ſafety."

As the king's anſwer was too general and doubtful, the commiſſioners in writing deſired to know, "If by the words (a ſpeedy concluſion of the treaty) he intended a concluſion of the treaty on his firſt propoſition, and their propoſition for diſbanding the armies, or a concluſion of the treaty on all the propoſitions of both parts."

The king anſwered, "That by 'a ſpeedy concluſion of the treaty,' he intended ſuch a concluſion of the treaty, as there might be a clear evidence to himſelf and his ſubjects of a future peace, and no ground left for the continuance and growth of the preſent bloody diſſenſions; which, he doubted not, might be obtained, if both houſes ſhould conſent, that the treaty might proceed without further interruption or limitation of days."

This anſwer being no leſs ambiguous than the former, the commiſſioners inſiſted upon an explanation of what they had already deſired; as alſo that he would be pleaſed to let them know, what he intended ſhould be a clear evidence to him and his ſubjects of a future peace.

The king anſwered, "That if the concluſion of the treaty on his firſt propoſition, and the propoſition of both houſes, ſhould be ſo full and perfectly made, that the law of the land might have a full, free, and uninterrupted courſe, for the defence and preſervation of the rights of his majeſty, both houſes, and his ſubjects there would thence be a clear evidence of a future peace: and this would be ſuch a concluſion as he intended. He never meant, that both armies ſhould remain undiſbanded until all the propoſitions of both ſides were fully concluded. But he was very ſorry, that in that point of the propoſition of both houſes, viz. his return to the parliament, they had yet no manner of power or inſtructions ſo much as to treat with him."

The king uſed ſuch general expreſſions, that it was eaſy to ſee, he ſought only to prolong the conferences, or to make ſome advantage of the commiſſioners anſwers. In all appearance, he would alſo have found a freſh occaſion of delay, in the debate of that part of the propoſition concerning his return to the parliament.

April the 10th, the commiſſioners preſented another paper to his majeſty, wherein they ſaid, "That by new inſtructions they were commanded to inſiſt upon the diſbanding of the two armies, and that both houſes conceived his anſwer to be in effect a denial, unleſs they departed from all thoſe cautions and limitations contained in their reply to his firſt propoſition: that if they had not inſerted their deſire of his majeſty's return in their committee's inſtructions, it was becauſe they conceived the diſbanding the armies would facilitate his reſolution therein."

During the courſe of the negociation, the king had frequent conferences in private with the commiſſioners. Whitelock relates in his memorials, that in one of theſe conferences, the commiſſioners (of whom he was one) having been with the king till midnight, and preſſed him with their reaſons upon a very material point, his majeſty was prevailed with to give a ſatisfactory anſwer, which would have much conduced to a happy ſucceſs of the treaty, and told them, "He was fully ſatisfied, and promiſed to let them have his anſwer in writing according to their deſire;" but becauſe it was then too late to draw it up, he ordered them to wait on him the next morning at ſuch an hour. Accordingly they came, but inſtead of that anſwer, which they expected, the king gave them a paper quite contrary to what was concluded the night before, and very much tending to the breach of the treaty. Whitelock ſays, he was informed by ſome of the king's own friends, that after the commiſſioners were gone from his majeſty, and his council alſo withdrawn, ſome of his bed-chamber (and they went higher) hearing from himſelf what anſwer he had promiſed, and doubting it would tend to ſuch an iſſue as they did not wiſh, they being rather for the continuance of the war, never left perſuading the king, till they prevailed with him to change his former reſolutions, and give order for his anſwer to be drawn directly contrary to what he had promiſed; it being that prince's misfortune to prefer always the opinion of others to his own. Which is an obſervation confirmed alſo by the lord Clarendon in his character of king Charles I. [m]. Indeed

[m] Whitelock obſerves farther upon this treaty, that their inſtructions were very ſtrict, and tied them up to treat with none but the king himſelf, who he ſays, manifeſted on this occaſion, his great parts and abilities, ſtrength of reaſon, and quickneſs of apprehenſion, with much patience in hearing what was objected againſt him, wherein he allowed all freedom, and would himſelf ſum up the arguments, and give a moſt clear judgment upon them. He ſays alſo concerning the commiſſioners, the earl of Northumberland demeaned himſelf with much courage and wiſdom. Mr. Pierrepoint acted his

Whitelock does not ſay, that the king's anſwer he mentions, was the ſame with the following meſſage; but in all likelihood it was ſo, ſince it was the cauſe of breaking off the conferences. However this be, on the 12th of April the king ſent this meſſage to both houſes, notwithſtanding the endeavours of the commiſſioners to diſſuade him from it.

Subſtance of the king's meſſage to both houſes, April 12, 1643.

"AS ſoon as his majeſty is ſatisfied concerning his own revenue, magazines, ſhips, and ports, to which he deſires nothing but that the juſt, known, legal rights of his majeſty (devolved to him from his progenitors) and of the perſons truſted by him, which have violently been taken from both, be reſtored unto him, and unto them.

"As ſoon as all the members of both houſes ſhall be reſtored to the ſame capacity of ſitting and voting in parliament as they had upon the 1ſt of January 1641, the ſame right of belonging unto them by their birth-rights, and the free elections of thoſe that ſent them, and having been voted from them, for adhering to his majeſty in theſe diſtractions; his majeſty not intending that this ſhould extend either to the biſhops, whoſe votes have been taken away by bill; or to ſuch, in whoſe places upon new writs, new elections have been made.

"As ſoon as his majeſty and both houſes may be ſecured from ſuch tumultuous aſſemblies, as to the great breach of the privileges, and the high diſhonour of parliaments having formerly aſſembled about both houſes, and awed the members of the ſame, and occaſioned two ſeveral complaints from the houſe of lords, and two ſeveral deſires of that houſe to the houſe of commons, to join in a declaration againſt them; the complying with which deſire might have prevented all theſe miſerable diſtractions which have enſued. Which ſecurity, his majeſty conceives, can be only ſettled by adjourning the parliament to ſome other place, at the leaſt twenty miles from London, the choice of which his majeſty leaves to both houſes.

"His majeſty will then moſt chearfully and readily conſent, that both armies be immediately diſbanded, and give a preſent meeting to both his houſes of parliament at the ſame time and place, at, and to which, the parliament ſhall agree to be adjourned.

"His majeſty being confident, that the law will then recover the due credit and eſtimation, and that upon a free debate, in a full and peaceable convention of parliament, ſuch proviſions will be made againſt ſeditious preaching and printing againſt his majeſty, and the eſtabliſhed laws, which hath been one of the chief cauſes of the preſent diſtractions; and ſuch care will be taken concerning the legal and known rights of his majeſty, and the property and liberty of his ſubjects, that whatſoever hath been publiſhed or done, in or by colour of any illegal declarations, ordinances, or order of one or both houſes, or any committee of either of them, and particularly the power to raiſe arms without his majeſty's conſent, will be in ſuch manner recalled, diſclaimed, and provided againſt, that no ſeed will remain for the like to ſpring out of for the future, to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, and to endanger the very being of it."

There was no need of much penetration, to perceive by this meſſage, that the king not only intended to break off the conferences, but alſo was not much inclined to peace. It was indeed very needleſs to enter into treaty, ſince neither king nor parliament would recede from their pretenſions. The ſhorteſt way would have been to diſcuſs the general queſtion, whether there was juſt reaſon to confide in the king, and reſtore him to his rights; for every one of the propoſitions offered by both parties neceſſarily led to that queſtion, ſo that none could be decided without this being previouſly determined. If the reſt of the propoſitions had been diſcuſſed, the difficulties would have been ſtill greater, ſince the two parties built upon quite oppoſite principles. But, in all appearance, the king and the parliament had foreſeen what came to paſs, and agreed to the negociation only to make the people believe they were diſpoſed to a peace. This was equally neceſſary for them, becauſe in the people conſiſted the ſtrength of both ſides.

As ſoon as both houſes received this meſſage, they ſent their commiſſioners poſitive orders to return, and the conferences ceaſed.

It was not without reaſon that the king deſired a ceſſation of arms on the terms by him propoſed, though for never ſo ſhort a ſpace, and that he inſiſted upon communication of quarters. He found himſelf at Oxford unprovided of ammunition, and the queen, who was at York, had brought him a good quantity; but the difficulty was to convey them to Oxford with a ſtrong guard. If therefore the ceſſation of arms had been concluded with the clauſe of communication of quarters, nothing would have hindered the king from ſending for his ammunition from York, without the parliament's being able to complain. For though in the firſt article of the propoſed ceſſation, it was allowed to ſtop all perſons carrying ammunition, it was not ſaid however, that ſuch a conveying was a breach of the ſuſpenſion. Since therefore by the article of communication of quarters, the king might have drawn as many of his troops as he pleaſed from York to Oxford, he might likewiſe, if this article had been granted, have ſent for his ammunition with a guard, which the parliament's forces could not have attacked without breaking the truce, when the guard ſhould have paſſed into their quarters.

It evidently appears, the king intended to reap this advantage by the ceſſation of arms, which, according to him, was to be only for the eaſe of the people, ſince from the beginning of April, when the treaty was negociating at Oxford, he detached prince Rupert with twelve hundred horſe and ſeven or eight hundred foot, to eſtabliſh a communication between York and Oxford, by ſecuring certain places between theſe two cities. The prince marched by Birmingham, a town of the parliament's, garriſoned with a company of foot [n], and taking it by ſtorm, made the inhabitants pay a large fine, as a puniſhment for aſſiſting the garriſon to repulſe him [o].

After this little conqueſt, the prince marched directly to Litchfield, where he entered without difficulty, the town being open in ſeveral places. But the cathedral, with the cloſe, was a ſort of fortreſs, which he was obliged to beſiege in form, it being ſtrongly garriſoned. At laſt, he drained the moat, and ſprung two mines, one whereof taking effect, he furiouſly ſtormed the place, which was bravely defended by the garriſon: but the dread of not being able to ſtand a ſecond aſſault, cauſed them to deſire to capitulate. The prince granted them an honourable capitulation, being very glad to be freed from the trouble of continuing the ſiege, which had laſted ten days. He intended to puſh his conqueſts farther to the north, in order to make a line of communication between York and Oxford: but the king recalled him from Litchfield, wanting him to raiſe the ſiege of Reading.

The treaty at Oxford being broken off the 15th of April, the earl of Eſſex marched that day from Windſor, and on the next, appeared before Reading. His army conſiſted of ſixteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; and the garriſon of three hundred horſe, and three thouſand foot. The king was ſo poſſeſſed with the notion, that the parliament's ſoldiers ſerved them unwillingly and by conſtraint, that he iſſued out a proclamation, offering pardon to ſuch as were in the earl of Eſſex's army, a precaution intirely fruitleſs. At the beginning of the ſiege, the governor, ſir Arthur Aſton, being wounded in the head, and forced to keep his chamber, the command was devolved to colonel Richard Fielding, the eldeſt colonel in the garriſon.

The king no ſooner heard of the ſiege of Reading, but he ſent away a detachment of horſe, under the command of commiſſary Wilmot, who found means to throw into the town five hundred men and ſome powder. But this ſupply not appearing ſufficient to colonel Fielding, he demanded to capitulate, and a truce was agreed on, during which the beſiegers and the beſieged, mutually gave hoſtages.

At the ſame time the king coming with his army within a few miles of Reading, detached Ruthen his general, lately made earl of Forth, who with a thouſand muſqueteers, vigorouſly attacked a poſt [p], by which the king was neceſſarily to paſs, in order to relieve Reading. The earl of Forth was in hopes, that whilſt he attacked this poſt, the garriſon would ſally out upon the beſiegers. But as without knowing it he had made his attack juſt as the truce was agreed on, there was no ſally from the town. So not being able to force the paſs, he retreated to the king.

Mean while, Fielding having negotiated a capitulation with the earl of Eſſex, found means, before it was entirely conclud-his part with deep foreſight and prudence. Sir William Ermyn was a gentleman of good underſtanding and converſation, and would give his opinion upon good reaſon. Sir John Holland, a gentleman of excellent parts as well as perſon, ſhewed a very good judgment and teſtimony of his abilities. Mr. Whitelock (that is, himſelf) was put upon very much labour, being employed in drawing up all the papers to the king, which were tranſcribed afterwards by the ſecretaries. Whitelock, p. 68, 69.

ed, to go in the night to the king, and tell him, he hoped to have liberty to march away with all their arms and baggage. The king approved of the capitulation, which was ſigned the next day, and the town ſurrendered to the beſiegers. But by one of the articles, which probably Fielding did not tell the king, and which perhaps was not yet agreed on, the earl of Eſſex excepted the deſerters, who could not obtain liberty to march away with the reſt of the garriſon. When the king's troops came out of the town, and were paſſing through the enemies guards, the ſoldiers were inſulted, and ſome waggons plundered, contrary to the articles of the capitulation.

The king was very well pleaſed with ſaving the garriſon of Reading, and indeed that was his principal view in permitting Fielding to capitulate. But when the garriſon came to Oxford, ſeveral officers complained, that Fielding was too haſty in ſurrendering a place which could have held out much longer. Nay, ſome accuſed him openly of betraying the king. Whereupon he deſired to be tried by a council of war, which was granted him. The king, who perhaps had too readily conſented to the capitulation, and was incenſed at him, when he underſtood that the place was capable of making a longer defence, could not however find fault with his capitulating, ſince it was done with his approbation. But his admitting the article, whereby the deſerters were excepted, was charged to him as a crime, and the king publiſhed a declaration, proteſting he had not conſented to that exception, being very far from refuſing protection to any who ſhould leave the enemy, and betake themſelves to his ſervice. Fielding was likewiſe accuſed of not paying punctual obedience to the king's orders: but what theſe orders were I have not been able to find [q]. However this be, Fielding was ſentenced by the council of war to loſe his head: which ſentence, after long interceſſion, was remitted by the king; but his regiment was given to another. Probably, he was too haſty to conclude the capitulation, and had not fully declared to the king, the true ſtate of the place. But as he could not be condemned for that, ſince he had the king's conſent to capitulate, other pretences were ſought. This ſentence occaſioned great diſſention in the king's army, ſome endeavouring to vindicate it, whilſt others paſſionately repreſented it as the moſt unjuſt that ever was given in the like caſe.

The earl of Clarendon ſays, the king having received wrong intelligence, that the earl of Eſſex, after the taking of Reading, was marching directly to Oxford, reſolved to retire into the north to join the earl of Newcaſtle. But it was only a falſe alarm. The earl of Eſſex was ſo little able to beſiege Oxford, that he was forced on the contrary to remain above ſix weeks at Reading, without being able to act, by reaſon of the ſickneſs which infeſted his army.

Whilſt the treaty for peace was negociating at Oxford, ſir William Waller continued his conqueſts along the Severn, where having defeated lord Herbert of Ragland, ſon to the marquis of Worceſter, he became maſter of Hereford. But in aſſaulting Worceſter he was repulſed, after which he went and joined the earl of Eſſex before Reading.

As the war was ſpread in all parts of the kingdom, the military actions of this ſecond campaign, cannot, without confuſion, be ſpoken of according to the order of time. And therefore I chuſe rather to follow the order of the places, and ſpeak firſt of what paſſed in the middle of the kingdom, where the two principal armies lay. I ſhall relate next the chief events that happened in the weſt; and laſtly, ſhall proceed to what paſſed in the north, and on the borders of the eaſtern counties. Theſe being aſſociated by the parliament, and well provided with troops, the king had not many opportunities to carry the war thither. As for the ſouthern counties, nothing conſiderable was acted there this campaign. After that, I ſhall reſume what paſſed of any moment, with regard to civil affairs, during the courſe of the year 1643. This method has alſo its inconveniencies: but I ſhall endeavour to avoid them in part, by marking the exact time of every event, that the cauſes and motives as well of the civil as military actions may be more eaſily known.

The taking of Reading ſeemed to be a good omen to the parliament for the reſt of the campaign. But, as I ſaid, the great mortality among the earl of Eſſex's ſoldiers, ſuffered him not to improve that advantage. After the ſurrender of Reading, both houſes thought of no leſs than beſieging Oxford, where the king was in great diſtreſs for want of warlike ſtores. In all appearance, the intelligence he had received, that the earl of Eſſex was going to march thither, came from ſome friends at London, who knowing it was the parliament's deſign, did not queſtion, it would be put in execution. Mean while, the king received ſome ammunition in May, and as his enemies were not in condition to make any attempt, he remained quiet at Oxford.

At length, after a ſix weeks ſtay at Reading, the earl of Eſſex marched towards Oxford, rather out of condeſcenſion to the parliament, than in expectation of making any progreſs, by reaſon of the ill ſtate of the army. He advanced however to Thame, within ten miles of Oxford, where he ſtopped [r]. There was in his army a Scotch colonel named Hurry, who had ſerved in Germany with the earl of Forth, the king's general, with whom he kept a ſecret correſpondence. As ſoon as the earl of Eſſex approached Oxford, Hurry quitted the parliament's ſervice, and went over to the king, who received him very graciouſly. After that, he informed prince Rupert of the ſituation of the quarters of the parliament's army, and perſuaded him to make an attempt, upon the enemy. So the prince going from Oxford in the evening with a body of horſe, took a long circuit, and at break of day came to Wickham, where beating up the quarters of two regiments, one of horſe, the other of foot, he cut them in pieces. Then he attacked another quarter with the ſame ſucceſs, after which he reſolved to retire by a bridge, where he had left a guard. But the earl of Eſſex having now taken the alarm, had detached ſome troops to intercept the prince, who was to croſs Chaldgrave field, and enter a lane, which led to the bridge. The earl of Eſſex's horſe not giving the prince time to reach the bridge, he choſe rather to expect them in an open field, than enter the lane with the enemy in his rear. He charged therefore theſe horſe with ſuch bravery, that he put them to flight towards a body of foot, which the earl of Eſſex was leading himſelf. Whilſt the horſe were flying, the prince paſſed the lane and bridge, and entered Oxford in triumph [s]. Upon the firſt alarm at the head-quarters, Mr. Hampden, colonel of foot mounted his horſe, and rode as a volunteer in the regiment ordered to intercept the prince. He was ſhot in the ſhoulder in this action, and within a few days died of the wound. He was a perſon very eminent in his party, both for his courage as an officer in the army, and for his wiſdom and capacity as a member of parliament. He had given a good proof of his firmneſs in his famous trial concerning ſhip-money.

After this loſs, the earl of Eſſex, whoſe army was in a very ill ſtate, thought not proper to remain longer at Thame. He put his troops into quarters of refreſhment at St. Alban's, Uxbridge, and the neighbouring parts, till they ſhould be recruited and furniſhed with many things they wanted, which the parliament did not ſeem much to regard, either from inability, or for ſome other reaſon.

From that time, the king's military affairs began to flouriſh, and the parliament was extremely embarraſſed. The queen joined the king the 13th of July, and brought him two thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, a hundred waggons laden with ammunition of all ſorts, ſix pieces of cannon, and two mortars. On the other ſide, ſir William Waller, ſent into the weſt by the parliament, had the ill fortune to be defeated, and his army was ſo diſperſed, that it was no longer ſerviceable [t]. In this juncture it was that the king reſolved to beſiege Briſtol by prince Rupert, with whom was joined the Corniſh army that had vanquiſhed ſir William Waller.

The 22d of July, prince Rupert incamped before Briſtol, and the ſame day, with the aſſiſtance of ſome ſailors, who had been gained, he ſeized the ſhips in Kingroad, laden with goods of great value, which the inhabitants of Briſtol had thought to ſecure there.

On the morrow, the prince holding a council of war, it was reſolved to proceed by aſſault, and not by approach. The walls muſt have been very weak, otherwiſe, it can hardly be conceived, that the beſiegers ſhould reſolve to ſtorm two days after their arrival, eſpecially as there was a numerous garriſon in the place [u]. However this be, the next day both armies attacked the city, each at three ſeveral places, ſo that the garriſon were forced to divide themſelves into ſix bodies to defend the walls. The Corniſh army was repulſed with great ſlaughter in their three aſſaults.

[u] The garriſon conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred foot, and a regiment of horſe and dragoons. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 227.

The two diviſions of prince Rupert's were likewiſe repulſed: but the third commanded by colonel Waſhington had better ſucceſs, the colonel finding means to make a breach in the wall large enough for the prince to enter with his horſe. But this advantage only put him in poſſeſſion of the ſuburbs, beyond which was the city wall, much ſtronger than what he had paſſed. However, he marched up the ſtreet to Frome-gate, where he was forced to halt, and where he loſt many of his men, who were ſhot by the inhabitants from the walls and windows[w].

What the prince had gained was ſo inconſiderable, that probably, the ſiege would ſtill have coſt much time, and many lives, if the governor had not loſt his preſence of mind, and ordered a parley to be beaten. The governor was colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, who at the beginning of this parliament, had made in the houſe of commons ſeveral fine ſpeeches againſt the king, but who, in all appearance, was not very ſkilful in the art of war. The prince immediately granted the deſired capitulation, thinking himſelf very happy to gain a place of that importance in ſo ſhort a time. The capitulation was ill obſerved by the king's ſoldiers, who ſtripped thoſe of the garriſon, and made themſelves more than amends for the breach of the capitulation at Reading, whether it was done with or without the connivance of the generals. Fiennes was impriſoned for his cowardly ſurrender of Briſtol, and ſome months after condemned to die by a council of war. But he was reprieved by the earl of Eſſex, and paſſed the reſidue of his days beyond ſea.

The taking of Briſtol infuſing freſh hopes into the king, he was willing to improve the preſent opportunity, whilſt the parliament had no army ready to oppoſe his progreſs. He reſolved therefore to beſiege Gloceſter, the poſſeſſion whereof would have been of great conſequence to him. By it he would have been maſter of all the Severn, from Briſtol to Shrewſbury, and of the whole country between that river and Wales, where there would have been only Hereford, which probably would have quickly ſurrendered. By that means, he would not only have extended his quarters into a very good country, but alſo ſecured a communication from Cornwall to the northern counties. For as the parliament had no army in the weſt, ſince Waller's defeat, the communication of the weſtern-counties with Briſtol could not be interrupted. The taking of Gloceſter would have opened a communication from Briſtol to Shrewſbury, and from thence to the north, by means of Lancaſhire, which was more for him than for the parliament. Beſides that, the taking of Gloceſter would have ſecured him the poſſeſſion of Wales, where the parliament would have had no entrance but by ſea. If therefore even ſome of his friends have blamed him for undertaking this ſiege, it may be affirmed, the ill ſucceſs was the beſt foundation of their opinion. For my part, I believe, he had all the reaſon in the world to undertake it, at a time when there was no likelihood that the earl of Eſſex's army could be ready ſoon enough to hinder that conqueſt. The lord Clarendon pretends to diſcover a ſecret which confirmed the king in his reſolution. He ſays, the king having ſent a meſſenger to colonel Maſſy governor of Gloceſter, to perſuade him to deliver the place, Maſſy in public anſwered in a high ſtile, but in private bid the meſſenger tell the king, "That if he came himſelf to beſiege the town, he would not hold it againſt him, for it would not ſtand with his conſcience to fight againſt the perſon of the king[x]." But the ſequel ſhewed, either that Maſſy had altered his mind, or the king had taken a mere compliment for a poſitive promiſe, ſince in the defence of the place Maſſy was very far from expreſſing the leaſt inclination to favour the king. This prince was ever poſſeſſed with the notion, that thoſe who bore arms againſt him acted contrary to the dictates of their conſcience, and readily believed, they only wanted an opportunity to ſerve him, wherein he was frequently miſtaken.

Nothing ſhews more clearly how advantageous to the king the taking of Gloceſter would have been, than the parliament's alarm when they heard the firſt news of his marching to form the ſiege. Whereas before the earl of Eſſex's army was ſuffered to decay, all endeavours were uſed to recruit it the moment the king's intention was known. Care was taken to complete the regiments by freſh levies of ſoldiers, raiſed in London with all poſſible expedition. And to facilitate theſe levies, the parliament ordered the ſhops to be ſhut up till Gloceſter ſhould be relieved, and moreover, the earl of Eſſex's army was ſtrengthened with a numerous body of the city train-bands. Theſe things were done with that diligence, that in fifteen days the earl of Eſſex was ready to march to the relief of the beſieged.

The king came before Gloceſter the 10th of Auguſt, with about eight thouſand horſe and foot, and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which however were not ſo vigorouſly puſhed as was expected, by reaſon of the frequent ſallies of the beſieged. Beſides, the king was obliged to go to Oxford, which made him loſe ſome days. The earl of Eſſex beginning to march the 26th of Auguſt, arrived in a few days near Gloceſter, and advancing to Preſbury-hills, drew up his whole army in view of the city, expecting the king would come and give him battle. But the king not thinking fit to run any hazard, raiſed the ſiege, which could not be done without great diſorder[y]. The earl of Eſſex marching into Gloceſter, found the beſieged reduced to a ſingle barrel of powder, and no better provided with other ſtores[z]. After ſtaying there three days[a], he departed towards London, paſſing through Tewkeſbury in his way. He marched two days before the king knew he was gone, and ſurprized the town of Cirenceſter, where lay two regiments[b]. After that he croſſed north Wiltſhire a deep and incloſed country, which obliged him to make very ſhort marches.

As ſoon as the king had notice of the enemies march and rout, he departed alſo in order to follow them, ſending prince Rupert before with all his cavalry, conſiſting of five thouſand horſe. It is likely, his intention was that the prince ſhould poſt himſelf between London and the parliament's army, whilſt he followed and put the army between him and his cavalry. Be this as it will, for it is not eaſy to gueſs the king's deſign, prince Rupert came up with the earl of Eſſex, as he was marching over Auborn-chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night. There inſued in this place a ſharp conflict, prince Rupert having charged the earl's rear, who were put into ſome diſorder. The marquis of La Vieuville a Frenchman[c], who ſerved the king as a volunteer, was killed in this action. This conflict obliged the earl of Eſſex to quarter at Hungerford. The next day he continued his march towards Newbury, but found that the king had prevented him by two hours, and poſted himſelf near the town. Prince Rupert, after the action of the foregoing day, went and joined the king.

The two armies, being too near each other to part without blows, prepared for battle, and the fight begun[d]. Prince Rupert, as uſual, performed wonders with his horſe. He quickly made the parliament's cavalry give way: but took care not to commit the ſame fault he had done at Edge-hill, by purſuing the runaways too far. After he had routed the enemies horſe, he charged their infantry, who, though deſtitute of the aſſiſtance of the cavalry, received, him with ſuch intrepidity, that he could make no impreſſion on their ſtand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about. It was fought all the reſt of the day with pretty equal ſucceſs. But in the night the king retired with his army, and left the way open to the earl of Eſſex to proceed to Newbury, where he [x] The lord Clarendon does not ſay, the king ſent a meſſenger, but that colonel Leg, under whom Maſſy had ſerved in the king's army, ſent him a letter of kindneſs and overture, as was proper in ſuch a caſe from one friend to another. To which letter Maſſy returned an anſwer in a high ſtile, but told the meſſenger in private as above. Tom. II. p. 242.

[y] Whitelock has a particular not mentioned by the lord Clarendon, viz. his majeſty underſtanding that Eſſex advanced apace to the relief of Gloceſter, ſent a trumpet to him with ſome propoſitions to be treated on. But Eſſex, much acquainted with ſuch ſmall deſigns to hinder his march, returned a ſpeedy anſwer, "That he had no commiſſion to treat, but to relieve Gloceſter, which he was reſolved to do, or to loſe his life there." And his ſoldiers hearing of a trumpeter come with propoſitions to treat, cried out for a long time together, with loud acclamations, "No propoſitions, no propoſitions." So their trumpeter was diſmiſſed. Whitelock, p. 72.

[a] And in that time ſays the lord Clarendon, which was as wonderful as any part of the ſtory, cauſed all neceſſary proviſions to be brought in to them, out of thoſe very quarters in which the king's army had been ſuſtained, and which they conceived to be entirely ſpent: ſo ſolicitous were the people to conceal what they had, and to reſerve it for them. Being intended to lodge the night before. Next day the earl of Eſſex ſeeing the coaſt clear, purſued his march, and paſſing through Newbury, arrived at Reading as he had before reſolved. Prince Rupert, who followed him, ſeeing him entered into the narrow lanes, attacked his rear, put them in diſorder, and took ſome priſoners: but prevented not the earl from continuing his march. He remained two days at Reading to refreſh his troops, and without leaving a garriſon in the place, which was poſſeſſed by the king's forces after his departure, returned to his old quarters. The king loſt in this battle above twenty officers of note, and among others Henry Spencer earl of Sunderland, Robert Dormer earl of Caernarvan, and Lucius Carey Lord Falkland ſecretary of ſtate, who would be preſent at the fight, though he had no call, not being a military officer [e].

I have taken the deſcription of this battle from the lord Clarendon, which by many omiſſions is rendered obſcure. Among others, it does not appear what the king did with his infantry. This gives occaſion to preſume, that his foot were routed when prince Rupert charged the parliament's. For otherwiſe, it cannot be conceived, how theſe laſt could have reſiſted, had they been attacked by the king's infantry and cavalry at once. Neither is it ſeen in this deſcription, why the king left the field of battle in the night, ſince it does not appear that he had received any conſiderable loſs. Nevertheleſs, the lord Clarendon endeavours to prove, though by weak arguments, that the king gained the victory. I believe it would be very eaſy to confute his reaſons, were there any occaſion. I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying in general, that the earl of Eſſex's deſign at his departure from Gloceſter, was to return to his former quarters about London, and that the battle of Newbury hindered him not from executing it, whereas the king's intention was probably to intercept the earl of Eſſex's paſſage, which he could not effect [f].

After the battle, the king retiring to Oxford, and the earl of Eſſex to Windſor, neither had much ſhare in the actions of the reſt of the campaign. I ſhall proceed therefore to other parts of the kingdom, where the war was continued, and particularly in the weſt, where it was very ſharp.

I have already ſaid in ſpeaking of the affairs of thoſe parts, that the parliament did not think proper to conſent to the neutrality entered into by the counties of Devon and Cornwall. On the contrary, they reſolved to carry the war into Cornwall, which had declared for the king. To that end, about the beginning of May, whilſt the king's troops were at Lanceſton, few in number, and very ſhort of proviſions, Henry Grey earl of Stamford, the parliament's general in the weſt, entered Cornwall with an army of ſeven thouſand men. He poſted himſelf on the top of the hill near Stratton, from whence he ſent a party of twelve hundred horſe, under the command of ſir George Chudleigh, to Bodmin, a town in the middle of the county, in order to keep it in awe and hinder the militia from joining the king's forces as they had once done before. Sir Ralph Hopton, who commanded for the king at Lanceſton, and had but three thouſand men, eaſily ſaw he ſhould be driven out of the county, unleſs he found means to avoid it by ſome notable action. This made him reſolve to march to the enemies, though they were much ſuperior in number, and advantageouſly poſted. The earl of Stamford thought himſelf ſo ſecure from any attack, that though he had frequent notice of the enemies approach he could not believe it. Indeed, it would have been raſh in ſir Ralph Hopton, to attack him with ſo great diſadvantage, had there been any other way to ſave the county for the king. However that be, the 16th of May, approaching the hill on which the earl of Stamford was incamped, he ordered him to be attacked at four ſeveral places [g]. As the aſſailants were reſolved to conquer or die, they gained, though with great difficulty, the top of the hill, which their enemies were at length forced to relinquiſh, after ſuſtaining the charge many hours. In this action the earl of Stamford had only three hundred men killed, but left ſeventeen hundred in the hands of the enemy. Among theſe priſoners was major general Chudleigh, who being carried to Oxford, turned to the king. The earl of Stamford, whether to excuſe his defeat, or upon ſome grounds, openly complained, that Chudleigh had betrayed him, and in the heat of the battle turning againſt him, charged him with the body under his command. The earl of Clarendon pretends it was a ſcandal: but I imagine few now are concerned to know the truth [h].

After this battle the earl of Stamford throwing himſelf into Exeter, his army being diſperſed, and the party of horſe ſent to Bodmin, thinking proper to retire to Plymouth, Hopton remained maſter of Cornwall. Shortly after he was informed by a meſſenger from Oxford, that the parliament had reſolved to ſend ſir William Waller into the weſt, with forces to join the remains of the earl of Stamford's army and ſome levies that were to be raiſed in that country, and that the king on his part was ſending thither the marquis of Hertford and prince Maurice with a body of troops, who were now upon their march. This made him think, it would be very proper for his little Corniſh army (ſo it was now called) to join the marquis's forces. He marched therefore into Devonſhire, leaving a party at Saltaſh to defend Cornwall from any incurſions of Plymouth, and advanced to Tiverton, where he expected orders from the marquis. Preſently, after, hearing the marquis of Hertford was come to Chaud, a town in Somerſetſhire, on the edge of Devonſhire, with ſeventeen hundred horſe and one thouſand foot, he went and joined him, and the two bodies together formed an army of ſeven thouſand men. Taunton, a large town in Somerſetſhire, was the firſt the marquis of Hertford reſolved to attack: but the garriſon ſaved him the labour, by retiring to Bridgewater, on account of a ſedition raiſed by the inhabitants. On the morrow, the parliament's troops quitted alſo Bridgewater, and in a few days Dunſtarcaſtle was ſurrendered to the king [i].

The marquis of Hertford having ſtaid about Taunton ſome days, heard at laſt that ſir William Waller was within two days march of him, drawing troops together with the utmoſt diligence, and expecting more from London and Briſtol. Whereupon he reſolved to attack him, without giving him time to ſtrengthen his army any more. Whilſt he was preparing to execute his deſign, the committee of the militia, who were levying forces [k] in thoſe parts to join them with Waller's, perceiving a favourable opportunity, beat up one of the marquis's quarters, who was now advanced to Somerton, and gave ſo briſk an alarm to the king's troops, that the marquis was forced to draw out the whole army. Then the parliament's forces retired to Wells but ſeeing they were purſued, quitted Wells, and poſted themſelves on the top of Mendip-hill, which overlooks the city. The marquis of Hertford being come to Wells, ſtayed there, the day being far ſpent. But prince Maurice, ſir Ralph Hopton, and the earl of Caernarvan, taking the enemies retreat for a flight, went out with two regiments of horſe to purſue them, and marched directly to them. Whereupon the parliament's forces being moſtly foot, and few in number, retired in order to join a detachment of horſe ſent by Waller to ſupport them. But the earl of [e] Being diſſuaded by his friends to go into the fight, he ſaid, "He was weary of the times, and foreſaw much miſery to his country, and did believe he ſhould be out of it ere night." His death, ſays Whitelock, was lamented by all that knew or heard of him, being a gentleman of great parts ingenuity, and honour; courteous to all, and a paſſionate promoter of all endeavours of peace betwixt the king and parliament. He was ſlain in the 34th year of his age. Whitelock, p. 73.

[f] Whitelock's account of Newbury fight is briefly this: Eſſex finding his ſoldiers full of mettle, and reſolved to force their way, he led them in perſon, and firſt charged the enemy with his own regiment and the lord Robert's brigade of horſe; the fight began about ſix o'clock in the morning, Sept. 20, and held with very hot ſervice till ten or eleven at night. The parliament's forces beat the enemy from all their advantages, got the hill from them on which they were poſted, purſued them to Newbury, and out of the town again, but the night coming on, they could purſue them no further; and though the king's forces (eſpecially the horſe conſiſting moſt of gentlemen) made a gallant reſiſtance, yet this place not being proper for their fight, their foot were thus beaten, and in the night marched away, leaving Eſſex maſter of the field, whoſe ſoldiers had the pillage of the dead bodies. Whitelock, p. 73.—This battle laſted from ſeven o'clock in the morning, till ſeven or eight at night. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 295.

[g] The four diviſions of the little army were led on, the firſt by the lord Mohun and ſir Ralph Hopton; the ſecond by ſir John Berkley and ſir Bevil Greenvil; the third by ſir Nicholas Slanning and colonel Trevannion; the fourth by colonel Baſſet and colonel William Godolphin. In memory of this battle, ſir Ralph Hopton was afterwards created lord Hopton of Stratton. As for the twelve hundred horſe ſent to Bodmin, under the command of ſir George Chudleigh, father to the major-general, upon the news of the defeat, ſir George, with as many as he could keep together, got into Plymouth. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 208.

[h] Ruſhworth ſays, that by letters afterwards intercepted to his father ſir George, it appears to have been a deſigned thing: whereupon his father, to prevent any ſuſpicion on himſelf, ſurrendered his commiſſion; and ſhortly after, publiſhed a ſort of declaration, which is to be ſeen in Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 272.

[i] By Mr. Lutterel the owner, who thereupon was made governor of it by the marquis. Sir John Stawel was made governor of Taunton, and Edmund Windham of Bridgewater. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 213

[k] Theſe forces conſiſted not only of new raiſed men, but alſo the remains of thoſe horſe and dragoons that eſcaped out of Cornwall, after the battle of Stratton, and the ſoldiers that fled from Taunton, &c. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 215.

Caernarvan, who was fartheſt advanced, gave them not time to retreat in good order. As they were obliged to paſs through a lane, he entered after them, and purſued them beyond, till we met with Waller's horſe, who ſtopped his career, and compelled him to retire in his turn with great precipitation. Prince Maurice coming to his relief, a warm action enſued, wherein the prince received two cuts in his head, and was beaten off his horſe, but was fortunately relieved. Night obliged both parties to retire, the king's to Wells, and the parliament's to Bath.

Some days after, the marquis of Hertford, knowing Waller's army daily increaſed, marched towards Bath to try to draw him to an engagement. But Waller having his reaſons to defer it, becauſe he ſtill expected freſh ſupplies, the marquis advanced to Mangasfield, five miles beyond Bath towards Oxford. Whereupon Waller, whoſe chief buſineſs was to hinder him from joining with the king, marched out of Bath, and drew up his army on Lanſdown, expecting the enemies, who failed not to move towards him. As the marquis of Hertford was in a country ſo diſaffected to the king, that only force could procure him any ſupply or relief; and as beſides, he was advanced beyond Bath on purpoſe to engage them to fight, he was unwilling to loſe the opportunity. In this action, which was called the battle of Lanſdown, of his two thouſand horſe the marquis of Hertford loſt above fifteen hundred. But on the other hand, he drove Waller from his poſt, and compelled him to give way about demy-culvering ſhot. The next day, Waller retired to Bath, and the marquis entirely remained maſter of the field [l].

But this inconſiderable advantage, gained with the loſs of almoſt all his horſe, threw him into a very ill ſituation. He had been ſent into the weſt to drive ſir William Waller from thence, and yet, after the battle, Waller was between the king's army and the weſtern counties, where the marquis could penetrate but by a ſecond battle, which he was not in a condition to hazard, as being without horſe. This made him reſolve to march to the Devizes, leave there his infantry under the command of ſir Ralph Hopton [m], and break through to Oxford, with the prince and the remainder of the horſe, in expectation of returning from thence with a body of cavalry ſtrong enough to bring off the foot he ſhould leave at the Devizes, which was but thirty miles from Oxford. This reſolution was purſued. But as ſoon as he had quitted his infantry at the Devizes, Waller came before the town with his whole army, and inveſted theſe troops, who were in a very ill ſtate by reaſon of the ſcarcity of proviſions. As he was ſenſible, the beſieged could not remain long in ſuch a ſtate, he made them an overture of capitulating with him, which Hopton gladly embraced, in the uncertainty whether any ſupplies would come from Oxford, or would arrive ſoon enough. He entered therefore into treaty with Waller, but with intention to prolong it as much as poſſible, and not yield to the laſt extremity, as expecting every moment to be relieved from Oxford. Waller was ſo confident that they were at his mercy, that he had ſent the parliament word, "That their buſineſs was done, and by the next poſt he would ſend the number and quality of his priſoners."

Mean while, the marquis of Hertford and prince Maurice being come to Oxford, and having repreſented to the king the diſtreſs of his troops at the Devizes, his majeſty immediately ſent the lord Wilmot with fifteen hundred horſe, who came within two miles of the Devizes before the capitulation between Hopton and Waller was ſigned.

Waller was no ſooner informed of the enemies approach, but he drew up, without drum or trumpet, his whole army on Roundway Down, over which the king's troops were neceſſarily to paſs in order to join thoſe in the town. Wilmot, finding he could not execute his deſign without fighting, drew up within muſket-ſhot of Waller's army. But perhaps he would have thought of it more than once, before he attacked with fifteen hundred horſe an army ſo ſuperior in number, had not Waller begun the fight, by charging the enemy with a regiment of cuiraſſiers lately ſent from London, and which till now had been deemed invincible [n]. This regiment was vigorouſly repulſed, and retreating in diſorder, infuſed ſuch a terror into Waller's troops, that they made but a faint reſiſtance. Mean while Hopton ſeeing from the town the diſorder of the enemies, came out with his foot, and bravely ſeconding Wilmot, who for his part did not give the enemies time to recover themſelves, they quickly put the whole army to rout, killed five or ſix thouſand men, and took nine hundred priſoners. Waller, after his defeat, eſcaped to Briſtol. He complained very much of the earl of Eſſex, who, lying then at Thame, had ſuffered Wilmot to paſs without ſending a party after him, or giving the alarm to Oxford, which would have cauſed Wilmot to be recalled. The earl of Eſſex on the other hand, who was no friend to Waller, could not forbear ſaying ſome reproachful things on his defeat. This bred ſuch enmity betwixt them, that it might have been very prejudicial to their party, had not the parliament taken care to reconcile them.

After ſo complete a victory, the lord Wilmot returned in triumph to Oxford, and the marquis of Hertford, taking the command of the army, appeared before the city of Bath, the gates whereof were opened at the firſt ſummons. Preſently after, the king, having reſolved to beſiege Briſtol, as was before related, ordered the Corniſh army to join prince Rupert at the ſiege. As ſoon as he was maſter of Briſtol, he reſolved to ſend an army into the weſt, under the command of prince Maurice, and to keep the marquis of Hertford near his perſon. To that end, he gave orders to Robert Dormer earl of Caernarvan, who was to ſerve under prince Maurice, to advance towards the weſt with a party of horſe, while the prince ſhould follow with the infantry, of which the Corniſh army made the beſt part. The earl of Caernarvan marched firſt into Dorſetſhire, which declared for the parliament, and took Weymouth, Dorcheſter, and Portland-caſtle. Here prince Maurice came and joined his cavalry. When he was at the head of the army, he ſuffered his troops to uſe ſuch licence, and ſo ill obſerved the articles made upon the ſurrender of the towns, that the earl of Caernarvan, out of indignation, being a perſon full of honour and juſtice upon all contracts, quitted his command in this army, and returned to the king before Gloceſter. Mean while prince Maurice, after ſtaying ſome time in Dorſetſhire, entered Devonſhire, and laid ſiege to Exeter, which was ſurrendered by capitulation by the earl of Stamford.

After the taking of Exeter, the prince applied himſelf chiefly to increaſe the number of his forces by freſh levies, whilſt the parliament had no army in that country able to withſtand him. In a ſhort ſpace he aſſembled ſeven thouſand foot, with horſe in proportion, beſides three thouſand men commanded by colonel John Digby before Plymouth, the blockade of which place he had formed, till the prince ſhould come and beſiege it. There had lately been diſcovered at Plymouth a plot framed by Sir Alexander Carew, knight of the ſhire for Cornwall, and governor of the fort and iſland of St. Nicholas, on which depended the ſecurity of the town, to deliver the iſland and fort to the king. Carew was apprehended and ſent to London, where ſome time after he was condemned to die by a court-martial [o].

When prince Maurice had compleated his levies, inſtead of going to Plymouth, he laid ſiege to Dartmouth, which employed him more than a month. During that time, the inhabitants of Plymouth, whom the diſcovery of Carew's plot had thrown into a great conſternation, recovered themſelves, and reſolved upon an obſtinate defence. This reſolution was confirmed by a ſupply of five hundred men ſent by the parliament by ſea, with a Scotch governor an experienced warrior. So, prince Maurice, when he came before the place, found the conqueſt of it much more difficult than he had expected. He continued however the ſiege, notwithſtanding the winter, which was now begun. Here I ſhall leave the affairs of the weſt, till I have farther occaſion to ſpeak of them, and proceed to the recital of what paſſed in the north during this campaign.

Since the earl of Newcaſtle's arrival at York with his army levied in the north, the lord Fairfax had been obliged to keep at ſome diſtance from that city, to avoid being attacked by an army much more numerous than his own. All the northern parts from York to the borders of Scotland were for the king. The ſouthern part of Yorkſhire was for the parliament, and the war was waging in the middle parts of the county to the right and left. But little elſe was tranſacted, beſides the taking of ſmall towns, which ſerved only to enlarge the quarters of one or other army.

[l] In this battle, as was before obſerved, fell ſir Bevil Greenvil. This was the firſt time the king's horſe had turned from an enemy, occaſioned, it ſeems, by a regiment of cuiraſſiers commanded by ſir Arthur Haſlerig, which were ſo compleatly armed, that they were called the regiment of lobſters. Juſt after the battle, ſir Ralph Hopton was miſerably hurt by the accidental blowing up of ſome powder. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 220.

[m] Who was now paſt danger, and could hear and ſpeak, though he could not ſee or ſtir; with him were left the earl of Marlborough, general of the artillery, and the lord Mohun. Idem, p. 221.

[n] This was the regiment of lobſters before mentioned, which according to Ruſhworth, raſhly led on by ſir Arthur Haſlerig, leaving the foot, charged the king's forces very diſadvantageouſly, and ſo were preſently routed. Whitelock ſays, Waller's horſe, upon a panic fear, fled, and left the foot to the mercy of the enemy. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 285. Whitelock, p. 70.

[o] He was beheaded on Tower-hill, December 23, 1644.

115. Newgate Street as the Act directs Dec^r 15^th 1786.

In May 1643, the earl of Newcaſtle took two or three of theſe places. In the ſame month, the lord Fairfax having detached fifteen hundred men, under the command of his ſon ſir Thomas Fairfax, ordered Wakefield to be attacked, where lay three thouſand men of the king's party. This aſſault was made about four in the morning, with ſuch vigour and conduct, that the king's troops were driven from the town, and many taken and ſlain. Amongſt the priſoners was general Goring the commander [p].

Preſently after, the earl of Newcaſtle had his revenge. Having taken Howley-houſe [q], he marched from thence towards Bradford, and in the way was met on Atherton-moor by the lord Fairfax, whom he entirely routed. Fairfax, with the remains of his army, threw himſelf into Hull, where ſir John Hotham had been lately apprehended by order of parliament, and the lord Fairfax was made governor of that important place.

In June, Gainſborough, a town in Lincolnſhire, was taken by the lord Willoughby of Parham, commander for the parliament in thoſe parts, who there made Robert Pierpoint earl of Kingſton priſoner. But being informed that the earl of Newcaſtle was preparing to recover Gainſborough, he ſent his priſoner in a pinnace to Hull. The earl was unfortunately ſhot by ſome of his own party, who would have ſtopped the pinnace. Mean while, the earl of Newcaſtle began indeed his march to beſiege Gainſborough, and at his approach, detached a party of horſe to inveſt the town. Oliver Cromwell arriving at the ſame time, with deſign to ſupply the town with proviſions, defeated this detachment, purſuing them even in ſight of their main body, which he did not think to be ſo near. As he was not in condition to face that army, he retreated in good order, and after throwing ſupplies into the town, retired at a greater diſtance. Shortly after, the earl of Newcaſtle retook Gainſborough, and poſſeſſed himſelf of Lincoln, where he put a ſtrong garriſon; after which, he beſieged Hull, whilſt the king was before Gloceſter.

The lord Fairfax, aſſiſted by ſir John Meldrum, a Scotchman, defended the town of Hull with great bravery and conduct for five weeks, though he was vigorouſly attacked. At laſt, October the 11th, the beſieged made a grand ſally, and after a very obſtinate fight, which was ſeveral times renewed, drove the beſiegers from their trenches, and ſeized their cannon. This obliged the earl of Newcaſtle, now created marquis, to raiſe the ſiege.

The ſame day this famous ſally was made at Hull, a groſs body of horſe, part of the earl of Newcaſtle's army, commanded by the lord Widrington, were routed at Horn-caſtle, by Edward Montague earl of Mancheſter, who had with him ſir Thomas Fairfax, and Cromwell.

The reſt of the military actions during the winter after this campaign, having a neceſſary connexion with the affairs of Scotland and Ireland, I am indiſpenſably obliged to ſpeak of what paſſed in theſe two kingdoms in the courſe of this year. I ſhall begin with Scotland.

The parliament of England, when they replied to the Scots propoſition of uniting the two national churches, made their anſwer, which was no leſs ambiguous than the demand, a toothing, which they might uſe or not, as occaſion required. It is certain, there was a ſtrict correſpondence between ſome of the leading members and the Scots. Theſe members eaſily foreſaw, that to eſtabliſh preſbyterianiſm in England, they ſhould in the end want the Scots, who, on their part, were ready to aſſiſt them when a favourable opportunity ſhould offer. Since the king, in his laſt journey to Scotland, had been forced to grant the Scots whatever they deſired, the leaders of the contrary party had taken ſuch juſt meaſures, that all the offices of the kingdom were in the hands of their friends, whilſt thoſe that were ſuſpected of inclining to the king, were removed from all ſorts of employments. By this means, the friends of the parliament of England were in a capacity to ſecond them at a proper time, in eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian government in the church of England. It was not ſolely out of zeal for religion, but alſo out of policy, that the directors of the Scotiſh affairs wiſhed the Engliſh would receive that form of government. They believed, they could never promiſe themſelves a perfect tranquility, if it ſhould happen to be in the king's power to be revenged of them, and that he would be inceſſantly prompted thereto if the biſhops were reſtored in England. Whether this belief was well-grounded, or only a prejudice, it is certain they looked upon the reſtoration of epiſcopacy in England, as the firſt ſtep to their ruin. For this reaſon, they always continued a very ſtrict correſpondence with both houſes, by means of their commiſſioners reſiding in London, in order to act in concert with them, for leſſening the king's power, and deſtroying epiſcopacy. This plainly appeared in the courſe of this year 1643.

The affairs of the parliament not being in a ſituation to afford a proſpect of any great advantages upon the king this campaign, the Scots began to prepare to aſſiſt them, in caſe there ſhould be occaſion. To that purpoſe, about the beginning of May, it was moved by ſome of the leading men, that there might be a joint meeting of the council, the conſervators of the peace, and the commiſſioners for public burthens. In the hands of all theſe was lodged the authority of the kingdom, when there was no parliament. This motion was readily complied with, all the public offices and poſts being, as I ſaid, filled with men of that party. In this aſſembly it was propoſed, that, conſidering the danger the kingdom was in, by reaſon of armies levying in the north of England, Scotland ſhould be put in a poſture of defence. As this could not be done without a parliament, or a convention of eſtates, it was urged, that there was an abſolute neceſſity of immediately ſummoning ſuch a convention. The marquis of Hamilton, and ſeveral others, ſtrongly oppoſed it, alleging, that for them to appoint a convention without the king's order, was an encroachment upon the royal prerogative in the higheſt degree: that his majeſty had promiſed to call a parliament in the year 1644, and therefore to hold a convention of eſtates before that time, without his privity, was directly contrary to the laws of the land. But their arguments were in vain. It was carried by the majority, that the lord chancellor ſhould ſummon a convention of eſtates, againſt the 22d of June. They make a diſtinction in Scotland between a convention of eſtates, and a parliament. The convention of eſtates is a court conſiſting of all the members of parliament; but as they are called, and ſit without the ſtate or formalities uſed in parliament, ſo their power extends only to raiſe money or forces, but not to make or repeal laws.

The king having notice of what was projecting in Scotland, immediately ſent thither the earls of Roxborough, Kinnoul, and Lanerick, with inſtructions concerning what they were to do for his ſervice. Theſe three lords arrived at Edinburgh the 15th of May, and brought the marquis of Hamilton a patent, creating him a duke. Beſides this, they preſented to the council a declaration from the king, wherein he endeavoured to diſplay the juſtice of his cauſe againſt the parliament of England. He vindicated his innocence with regard to all the aſperſions caſt upon him, particularly concerning religion, and repreſented very pathetically, the wrongs and injuſtices done him. As we have ſeen more than once what the king alleged in his vindication, I think it unneceſſary to inſert the declaration. I ſhall only obſerve, that he concluded with ſaying, "God ſo deal with us, and our poſterity, as we ſhall inviolably obſerve the laws and ſtatutes of that our native kingdom, and the proteſtant religion, the laws of the land, the juſt privileges and freedom of parliament."

Shortly after, the king hearing that a convention of eſtates was ſummoned without his order or privity, eaſily perceived, this ſtep was not taken without an intention to ſupport it. He choſe therefore to permit them to aſſemble, but with expreſs order to limit their conſultations to the beſt ways and means of ſupplying the Scotiſh army in Ireland, and to relieving public burthens by preſſing a ſpeedy payment of the brotherly aſſiſtance due from England. But the convention was by no means inclined to be thus reſtrained. When the eſtates met, the firſt thing in debate was the limitation in the king's letter of licenſe. The duke of Hamilton, with the king's other friends [r], voted it no convention but as regulated by his majeſty's letter; but all the reſt voted it a free convention [s]. The king pretended afterwards, the duke of Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerick had not ſerved him with ſincerity, and if they had pleaſed they might have hindered the convention from meeting. Some time after, theſe two lords repairing to Oxford, he ordered them to be apprehended, but the earl of Lanerick found means to eſcape, and his brother the duke was ſent down to be impriſoned in the caſtle of St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall. The earl of Clarendon in his hiſtory ſupports to the utmoſt of his power the king's ſuſpicion of theſe two brothers, whilſt, on the other hand, there is, in the Memoirs of the dukes of Hamilton, a large vindication upon this article.

[s] Whereupon Hamilton and his party withdrew, and would ſit in the convention no more. Ibid.

The convention of eſtates met the 22d of June, and the general aſſembly of the kirk, the 2d of Auguſt. It is obſervable, it was in June that an ordinance of the parliament of England, was publiſhed for calling an aſſembly of divines and others, to be conſulted by both houſes, for ſettling the government and liturgy of the church of England, and that this aſſembly held their firſt ſeſſion the 1ſt of July, a few days after the meeting of the convention of eſtates in Scotland. The ſequel ſhewed with what deſign this aſſembly was appointed.

The precaution taken by the Scots was not ineffectual. They ſeem to have foreſeen what happened ſoon after. For in the interval between the propoſing a convention of eſtates, and the time of their meeting, the earl of Eſſex's army was ſeized with ſickneſs after the taking of Reading; the city of Briſtol fell into the king's hands; and ſir William Waller's forces were routed at Roundway-down. If the king's ſucceſſes had not received a check by the raiſing of the ſiege of Gloceſter and the battle of Newbury, it is very viſible, the parliament's affairs were in a very ill ſituation about the end of July and the beginning of Auguſt, that is, at the time the convention of eſtates, and the general aſſembly met in Scotland. Accordingly, both houſes failed not to improve the precaution taken by the Scots, and which, in all appearance, had been ſuggeſted to them. As they ſaw, their affairs were declining, they applied, without farther conſideration, to the convention of Scotland for aſſiſtance, and ſent commiſſioners, with full power to treat. Theſe commiſſioners, who came to Edinburgh whilſt the king was approaching Gloceſter, found the eſtates of Scotland as well diſpoſed as they could wiſh[t].

Both houſes had foreſeen, that the eſtates of Scotland would demand, in return for their aſſiſtance, a poſitive engagement to eſtabliſh in the church of England a preſbyterian government, like that in the kirk of Scotland. It is ſcarce to be doubted, that ſome of the directors of the parliament's affairs had made ſuch a private agreement with them, though it cannot be proved by any public acts. Nay, very likely, the earl of Eſſex's army had been ſuffered to decay, on purpoſe to reduce things to ſuch a ſtate, that the aſſiſtance of the Scots ſhould be abſolutely neceſſary. At leaſt, it is hard to diſcover any other reaſon, that could have induced the parliament to ſuffer that army to remain unſerviceable from the taking of Reading to the ſiege of Gloceſter. It appeared that this proceeded not entirely from inability, ſince, when the danger grew more imminent, means were found to enable the earl of Eſſex to relieve Gloceſter. Now it was preciſely whilſt the earl of Eſſex's army was thus neglected, that the parliament reſolved to deſire the aſſiſtance of Scotland. Be this as it will, both houſes ſent, with their commiſſioners, two declarations, one directed to the convention, the other to the general aſſembly. The firſt was, only to deſire the ſpeedy aſſiſtance of the eſtates, and to inform them, that their commiſſioners had inſtructions to treat with them, not only concerning the ſatisfaction to be made for the deſired aid, but alſo about ſettling the accounts between the two kingdoms. In the ſecond, both houſes acknowledged the great zeal and love, manifeſted by the general aſſembly of the churches of Scotland, in their endeavours for the preſervation of the true proteſtant religion from the attempts of the popiſh and prelatical party, to the neceſſary reformation of church-government in England, and the more near union of both churches. And therefore they exhorted the aſſembly to ſend into England ſome of their body, for the furtherance of that work in conjunction with the aſſembly of divines now ſitting at Weſtminſter. They declared alſo, that beſides their inſtructions in the civil matters of both kingdoms, the commiſſioners had received directions to reſort to and conſult with the general aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland, in every thing relating to the reformation of the church of England; and to that end, Mr. Marſhal and Mr. Nye, miniſters of God's word, were appointed to aſſiſt the commiſſioners with their advice.

With theſe declarations the commiſſioners found no difficulty in their negociation. On the contrary, the general aſſembly addreſſed to the eſtates a declaration, containing the reaſons which ought to induce them to aſſiſt the parliament of England. The reaſons were to this effect:

"1. The controverſy now in England being betwixt the Lord Jeſus and Anti-chriſt with his followers, if we would not come under the curſe of Meroz, we ſhould come out and help the Lord againſt the mighty.

"2. There was an act paſſed by the convention of eſtates, anno 1585, wherein the eſtates found it neceſſary to enter into a league and chriſtian confederation, with all proteſtant princes and eſtates, againſt the bloody league at Trent. Conformed to which there followed a league betwixt the two crowns of Scotland and England, ſubſcribed at Berwick 1586, againſt whatſoever foreign and inteſtine powers of papiſts ſhould arrive or riſe. And therefore the cauſe being the ſame, as well as the parties, and the danger, we are bound to perform now, what we promiſed then.

"3. We ſtand obliged to England for old kindneſs to us, being in the ſame poſture then that they are in now; for in the year 1556 and 1557, the eſtates of this land, finding the reformation of religion oppoſed by their own princes with arms and violence, and themſelves oppreſſed by the popiſh army, ſought and obtained the aſſiſtance of an army from England, whereby they expelled the French army, made the pacification at Leith, held the parliament of 1560, eſtabliſhed the religion. Therefore they got new aſſiſtance from England to ſuppreſs the general popiſh faction, whereby they took in the caſtle of Edinburgh from the Laird of Grange; and in that public printed prayer, prefixt to the Pſalm-book, we ſolemnly promiſed never to forget their kindneſs againſt the French; and if we call to mind the manifeſtation of the lawfulneſs of the expedition into England, we ſtand obliged to them for their late kindneſs; for they not only refuſed to levy arms againſt us in the laſt troubles in 1639, but alſo did mediate for a treaty, did welcome and kindly entertain our army for a year, did freely beſtow upon us their brotherly aſſiſtance of thirty thouſand pounds; whereupon we acknowledged our thankfulneſs, not to conſiſt in affection and words at that time, but in the mutual kindneſs, and real declaration to be expected from the whole kingdom of Scotland, in all time to come; beſides ſolemn promiſes and vows repeated in our late declaration and information publiſhed to the world, wherein we aſſure them of our help in their need, as in 'the remonſtrance of the ſtates of Scotland, 1639, page 28. Remonſtrance of the parliament of England, 1640, page 15, 16. Intentions of the army of Scotland,' near the end.

"4. The common danger imminent to both kirks and kingdoms, do invite us to help them; for we and they ſail in one bottom, dwell in one houſe, are members of one body, that according to their own principles, if either of the two nations or kirks be ruinated, the other cannot long ſubſiſt. We have the ſame friends and foes, and many years experience hath taught us, what influence popery and prelacy in England may have upon Scotland; for from thence came the prelates, the ceremonies, the book of Common-prayers, Service-book, and upon our refuſal, the bloody ſword came from thence; therefore we are to take England's condition to heart, as a common cauſe, to put forth our helping hand, if we tender religion, laws, and liberties.

"5. The common advantage redounding to both kirk and kingdom, to perſuade help; for hereby we have a fair opportunity to advance uniformity in diſcipline and worſhip, which will prove the ſureſt bond of union, and bulwark to both.

"6. If we forſake England, we forſake our deareſt friends, who can beſt help us in caſe we be reduced to the like ſtraits hereafter by the common adverſary.

"7. If we ſuffer the parliament of England to be cut off, we have loſt our peace with England. If the popiſh and prelatical faction do over-rule the parliament, we may expect war both from king and parliament, whereunto they will not want pretences. And we have reaſon to fear, that, ſeeing ſome of the malignants at home are reported to have vented, that the king was not tied to keep what he had granted to us, becauſe by calling and keeping our convention, we have firſt broken to him.

"8. If we ſhould deſert them at this time, yet as Mordecai ſaid to Eſther, 'Deliverance ſhall ariſe to them from elſewhere; but we and our father's houſe may look for deſtruction;' and who knoweth, but we are reſtored to our religion and liberties, to a free convention at this time, and made a mirror of God's mercy to all nations and kirks, that we may help our brethren of England?

"9. That the only means for the procuring of a happy

[t] The commiſſioners appointed were, John Mannors, earl of Rutland, (who, upon indiſpoſition of health, procured a releaſe,) and the lord Grey of Wark, (who refuſing to go on account of his inability to bear ſo long a journey, was ſent to the Tower, but ſoon after releaſed) for the lords; and for the commons, ſir William Armyne, ſir Henry Vane the younger, Mr. Hatcher, and Mr. Darley, with two divines, Marſhal and Nye, to attend them. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 466. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 232.

The

agreement betwixt the king and the parliament, is by putting up of the ſword, and ſaving chriſtian blood from being ſhed, ſuppreſſing of papiſts, and eſtabliſhing religion in his dominions; for humble ſupplications and remonſtrances, reached out with naked hands, will not prevail with our adverſaries, who have invironed our king, and cloſed his ears to the cry of his ſubjects.

"But it will be objected, ſeeing our religion and liberties are eſtabliſhed according to our own deſires; and ſeeing his majeſty's declaration to the whole kingdom, and letter to every nobleman and borough, to give aſſurance for preſervation of the ſame without altering, we have no intereſt nor hazard, however buſineſs go in England; but ſhould keep ourſelves in peace and quiet.

"1. Anſwer. In all the proceedings of this buſineſs we have from time to time declared, That neither verbal promiſes, nor fair declarations for maintaining religion and liberty could ſecure us, becauſe we have ſo often found 'facta verbis contraria.' As for example, the treaty of Dunce, when we confided to verbal gracious expreſſions of his majeſty's; yet afterwards they were denied, and burnt by the hands of the hangman, and an army levied againſt us. It was the counſel of Monſieur de Thou to the queen-regent of Scotland at St. Andrews, for reverſing our firſt reformation, to grant our predeceſſors in fair promiſes and declarations all that they craved, and when thereby they ſhould be divided, to interpret theſe by herſelf, and to take order with the heads of the opponers; and this policy was uſed by Charles IX. king of France, for the ſubverting of the proteſtant religion in France, as witneſſeth Monſieur de Thou, L. 71. p. 463.

"2. As we have found by former experience, that the eſtabliſhment of our firſt reformation by an act of aſſembly and parliament, could not ſecure us from the violent preſſing of innovations againſt both; and in the new remonſtrance of 1640, page 16. we have fully expreſſed, that no aſſembly or parliament, whereunto we faſtened our hopes, can be any ſafety for us, ſo long as our enemies ſit at the helm, and govern the king's council, and make his majeſty interpret laws contrary to the advice of judicators of kirk and ſtate. And of late our mediation betwixt him and his parliament was rejected, and our commiſſioners ſtopt from going to London, contrary to his own ſafe-conduct.

"3. If the parliament of England that now is, be deſtroyed, who ſhall undertake for our ſafety? As the king's declarations cannot exceed his perſon, or ſecure us at the hands of his ſucceſſors, ſo we may perceive in the late diſcovery of the plots of the Scots, Engliſh, and Iriſh papiſts, that theſe declarations can be no ſufficient ſecurity againſt the ſurpriſing of papiſts and malignants, if they be permitted to carry arms within any of the kingdoms.

"Secondly, It is objected, that we are a poor people, not fit for ſuch an undertaking. To which we anſwer,

"1. The repreſentative body of the kingdom now convened, can beſt ſatisfy this objection.

"2. When God calls his people, and makes them willing, he gives them alſo ſtrength, that through him they may do valiantly.

"3. God hath helped us in all enterprizes for his cauſe, and he will yet provide for us. We hope the wiſe convention of ſtates will ſee to the conditions, that the kingdoms received as little detriment as may be.

"Thirdly, It is objected, they will not embrace a preſbyterian-government in the kirk, and ſo no hope of uniformity.

"Anſwer 1. They have already put out epiſcopal government, root and branch, neither will they, nor do the proteſtant kirks know of any other but the preſbyterial.

"2. If any zealous man amongſt them have their ſcruples againſt preſbyterial government, we truſt the Lord will reveal the truth unto them.

"They have in many declarations expreſſed their reſolutions and deſires for uniformity."

The aſſembly and convention having reſpectively appointed committees to treat with the Engliſh commiſſioners, it was agreed at the firſt conferences, that the beſt and ſpeedieſt means for accompliſhing the union and aſſiſtance deſired, was that both nations ſhould enter into a mutual covenant or league. This covenant was prepared in a very ſhort time, ſo that Auguſt the 17th, it was preſented to the eſtates and the general-aſſembly, and approved by both the ſame day. On the morrow, being the 18th, it was ſent to England by the lord Maitland, afterwards duke Lauderdale. He was accompanied with Mr. Alexander Henderſon, moderator of the general aſſembly, and Mr. Gilleſpy, both miniſters, as commiſſioners from the aſſembly to treat with the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter, about the union of the two churches.

If the Scots were diſpoſed to enter into a league with the Engliſh, theſe were no leſs deſirous of it. Auguſt the 28th, ten days after the departure of the Scotch commiſſioners, the parliament of England, conſented to the covenant. Immediately after, the aſſembly of divines were ordered by both houſes to frame an exhortation to the taking of the covenant, to be read publicly in all the churches. That done, the covenant was ordered to be printed and publiſhed, and appointed to be taken the 22d of September by all the members of parliament, and the aſſembly of divines, which was done with great ſolemnity [r]. The covenant was as follows:

A ſolemn league and covenant for reformation and defence of religion, the honour and happineſs of the king, and the peace and ſafety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

"WE noblemen, barons, knights, gentlemen, citizens, burgeſſes, miniſters, of the goſpel, and commons of all ſorts in the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the providence of God living under one king, and being of one reformed religion, having before our eyes the Glory of God, and the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, the honour and happineſs of the king's majeſty and his poſterity, and the true public liberty, ſafety and peace of the kingdoms, wherein every one's private condition is included; and calling to mind the treacherous and bloody plots, conſpiracies, attempts, and practices of the enemies of God againſt the true religion and profeſſors thereof in all places, eſpecially in theſe three kingdoms, ever ſince the reformation of religion, and how much their rage, power, and preſumption are of late, and at this time, increaſed and exerciſed, whereof the deplorable eſtate of the church and kingdom of Ireland, the diſtreſſed eſtate of the church and kingdom of England, and the dangerous eſtate of the church and kingdom of Scotland, are preſent and public teſtimonies; we have (now at laſt) after other means of ſupplication, remonſtrance, proteſtations and ſufferings, for the preſervation of ourſelves and our religion from utter ruin and deſtruction, according to the commendable practice of theſe kingdoms in former times, and the example of God's people in other nations, after mature deliberation, reſolved and determined to enter into a mutual and ſolemn league and covenant, wherein we all ſubſcribe, and each one of us for himſelf, with our hands lifted up to the moſt high God, do ſwear:

"I. That we ſhall ſincerely, really and conſtantly, through the grace of God, endeavour, in our ſeveral places and callings, the preſervation of the reformed religion in the church of Scotland, in doctrine, worſhip, diſcipline and government, againſt our common enemies, the reformation of religion in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, in doctrine, worſhip, diſcipline and government, according to the word of God, and the example of the beſt reformed churches; and we ſhall endeavour to bring the churches of God in the three kingdoms to the neareſt conjunction and uniformity in religion, confeſſing of faith, form of church-government, directory for worſhip and catechiſing, that we, and our poſterity after us, may, as brethren, live in faith and love, and the Lord may delight to dwell in the midſt of us.

"II. That we ſhall in like manner, without reſpect of perſons, endeavour the extirpation of popery, prelacy, (that is, church-government by archbiſhops, biſhops, their chancellors and commiſſaries, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, and all other eccleſiaſtical officers depending on that hierarchy) ſuperſtition, hereſy, ſchiſm, profaneneſs, and whatſoever ſhall be found to be contrary to ſound doctrine, and the power of godlineſs, leſt we partake in other men's ſins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues, and that the Lord may be one, and his name one in the three kingdoms.

"III. We ſhall with the ſame ſincerity, reality and conſtancy, in our ſeveral vocations, endeavour with our eſtates and lives, mutually to preſerve the rights and privileges

[r] The manner of taking it was thus: The covenant was read, and then notice was given that each perſon ſhould immediately, by ſwearing thereunto, worſhip the great name of God, and teſtify ſo much outwardly, by lifting up their hands; and then they went up into the chancel [of St. Margaret's Weſtminſter,] and there ſubſcribed their names in a roll of parchment, in which this covenant was fairly written. It was taken that day by two hundred and twenty-two members of parliament, whoſe names ſee in Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 480.

of the parliaments, and the liberties of the kingdoms, and to preſerve and defend the king's majeſty's perſon and authority, in the preſervation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms, that the world may bear witneſs with our conſciences of our loyalty, and that we have no thoughts or intentions to diminiſh his majeſty's juſt power and greatneſs.

"IV. We ſhall alſo with all faithfulneſs endeavour the diſcovery of all ſuch as have been or ſhall be incendiaries, malignants, or evil inſtruments, by hindering the reformation of religion, dividing the king from his people, or one of the kingdoms from another, or making any faction or parties among the people, contrary to this league and covenant, that they may be brought to public trial, and receive condign puniſhment, as the degree of their offences ſhall require or deſerve, or the ſupreme judicatories of both kingdoms reſpectively, or others having power from them for that effect, ſhall judge convenient.

"V. And whereas the happineſs of a bleſſed peace between theſe kingdoms, denied in former times to our progenitors, is, by the good providence of God granted unto us, and hath been lately concluded and ſettled by both parliaments, we ſhall, each one of us, according to our place and intereſt, endeavour, that they may remain conjoined in a firm peace and union to all poſterity, and that juſtice may be done upon the wilful oppoſers thereof, in manner expreſſed in the precedent articles.

"VI. We ſhall alſo, according to our places and callings, in this common cauſe of religion, liberty, and peace of the kingdoms, aſſiſt and defend all thoſe that enter into this league and covenant, in the maintaining and purſuing thereof, and ſhall not ſuffer ourſelves directly or indirectly, by whatſoever combination, perſuaſion, or terror, to be divided and withdrawn from this bleſſed union and conjunction, whether to make defection to the contrary part, or to give ourſelves to a deteſtable indifferency or neutrality in this cauſe, which ſo much concerneth the glory of God, the good of the kingdoms, and the honour of the king, but ſhall all the days of our lives zealouſly and conſtantly continue therein, againſt all oppoſition, and promote the ſame according to our power, againſt all letts and impediments whatſoever; and what we are not able ourſelves to ſuppreſs or overcome, we ſhall reveal and make known, that it may be timely prevented or removed; all which we ſhall do as in the ſight of God.

"And becauſe theſe kingdoms are guilty of many ſins and provocations againſt God, and his ſon Jeſus Chriſt, as is too manifeſt by our preſent diſtreſſes and dangers, the fruits thereof: We profeſs and declare before God, and the world, our unfeigned deſire to be humbled for our ſins, and for the ſins of theſe kingdoms, eſpecially that we have not, as we ought, valued the ineſtimable benefit of the goſpel; that we have not laboured for the purity and power thereof; and that we have not endeavoured to receive Chriſt in our hearts, nor to walk worthy of him in our lives, which are the cauſes of other ſins and tranſgreſſions, ſo much abounding amongſt us. And our true and unfeigned purpoſe, deſire, and endeavour, for ourſelves, and all others under our power and charge, both in public and in private, in all duties we owe to God and man, to amend our lives, and each one to go before another in the example of a real reformation; that the Lord may turn away his wrath and heavy indignation, and eſtabliſh theſe churches and kingdoms in truth and peace. And this covenant we make in the preſence of Almighty God, the ſearcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the ſame, as we ſhall anſwer at that great day, when the ſecrets of all hearts ſhall be diſcloſed; moſt humbly beſeeching the Lord to ſtrengthen us by his Holy Spirit for this end, and to bleſs our deſires and proceedings with ſuch ſucceſs, as may be deliverance and ſafety to his people, and encouragement to other chriſtian churches, groaning under, or in danger of, the yoke of anti-chriſtian tyranny, to join in the ſame, or like aſſociation and covenant. To the glory of God, the enlargement of the kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, and the peace and tranquility of chriſtian kingdoms, and common-wealths."

I have often ſaid, that the preſbyterian party prevailed in the parliament of England. This party impatiently waited for an opportunity to eſtabliſh the preſbyterian government in the church, and this ſeemed to them ſo favourable, that they reſolved not to loſe it. The affairs of the parliament were in an ill way. The king was become maſter of Briſtol. The earl of Eſſex's army was unſerviceable, and Waller's entirely diſperſed by the loſs of the battle of Roundway-down. Prince Maurice was with a good army in the weſt, where he met with no oppoſition. The marquis of Newcaſtle was maſter of all the north, and ſuperior in number of troops to the lord Fairfax in the county of York. In ſhort, the king was now beſieging Gloceſter, when the parliament's commiſſioners came to Edinburgh. Had he taken that place, the parliament would have had reaſon to fear a general defection, conſidering the advantages the king would have thereby received. The two houſes had therefore, if I may ſo call it, no other refuge than the aſſiſtance of the Scots, an aſſiſtance which could not be procured, but by yielding them the article of uniformity, ſo paſſionately deſired by them, being, in their opinion, the ſole means of ſecuring the enjoyment of their liberties. So, thoſe of the parliament's party that were moſt attached to the church of England, clearly perceived they muſt conſent to a change of church-government, or be expoſed to the hazard of loſing the fruit of all their labours, in caſe the king ſhould be reſtored by force of arms. Things ſtanding thus, they could not think it ſtrange, that the parliament ſhould conſent to an uniformity, in order to ſatisfy the Scots for their ſo neceſſary aſſiſtance. For this reaſon the covenant was taken without murmuring, and it was not perceived, that this proceeding would increaſe the number of the king's friends, as the parliament had ever dreaded, becauſe it was done at a juncture, when the neceſſity of it ſeemed unavoidable.

Shortly after, the king iſſued out a proclamation to forbid the taking of the covenant, but it produced no great effect. On the contrary, the committee of eſtates did, by their printed act of the 22d of October, ordain it to be ſworn and ſubſcribed by all the ſubjects, under pain of having their goods and rents confiſcated. After that, they ſummoned all the lords of the council to come and ſign it before them. The duke of Hamilton, and ſome others, refuſing to ſubſcribe it, the committee, by another act, of the 17th of November, ordered all their lands to be ſeized, and their perſons to be apprehended, with permiſſion to kill ſuch as reſiſted. Notwithſtanding all this, the king, at the duke's coming to Oxford, cauſed him, as I ſaid, to be arreſted.

After both kingdoms had agreed upon the covenant, the eſtates of Scotland appointed commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh, concerning the aid deſired. The ſubſtance of the treaty, ſigned November the 29th, is as follows:

"1. That the covenant be ſworn and ſubſcribed by both kingdoms.

"2. That an army ſhall be forthwith levied in Scotland, conſiſting of eighteen thouſand foot effective, and two thouſand horſe, and one thouſand dragoons effective, with a ſuitable train of artillery, to be ready at ſome general rendezvous near the borders of England, to march into England with all convenient ſpeed, the ſaid foot and horſe to be well and compleatly armed, and provided with victuals and pay for forty days.

"3. That the army be commanded by a general, appointed by the eſtates of Scotland, and ſubject to ſuch reſolutions and directions as ſhall be agreed and concluded mutually between the two kingdoms, or by committees appointed by them in that behalf.

"4. That the charge of levying, arming, and bringing the ſaid forces together, as alſo the fitting the train of artillery, be computed and ſet down according to the ſame rates, as if the kingdom of Scotland were to raiſe the ſaid army for themſelves; all which for the preſent is to be done by the kingdom of Scotland upon accompt, and the accompt to be delivered to the commiſſioners of the kingdom of England; and when the peace of the two kingdoms is ſettled, the ſame to be repaid or ſatisfied to the kingdom of Scotland.

"5. That this army be likewiſe paid, as if the kingdom of Scotland were to employ the ſame for their own occaſion; and towards the defraying thereof, ſhall be monthly allowed and paid the ſum of 30,000l. ſterling by the parliament of England; out of the eſtates and revenues of the papiſts, prelates, malignants, and their adherents, or otherwiſe; and in caſe the ſaid 30,000l. monthly, or any part thereof, be not paid at the time when it ſhall become due, the kingdom of England ſhall give the public faith for the paying of the remainder unpaid with all poſſible ſpeed, allowing the rate of 8l. per cent. for the time of the performance thereof; and in caſe that notwithſtanding the ſaid monthly ſum of 30,000l. paid as aforeſaid, the ſtates and kingdom of Scotland ſhall have juſt cauſe to demand farther ſatisfaction of their brethren of England, when the peace of both kingdoms is ſettled, for the pains, hazard, and charges they have undergone in the ſame, they ſhall by way of brotherly aſſiſtance have due recompence made to them by the kingdom of England, and that out of ſuch lands and eſtates of the papiſts, prelates, malignants malignants and their adherents; and for the aſſurance thereof, the public faith of the kingdom of England ſhall be given them.

" 6. And to the end the ſaid army may be enabled and prepared to march, the kingdom of England is to pay in ready money to their brethren of Scotland, the ſum of 100,000l. ſterling at Leith or Edinburgh, by way of advance beforehand, which is to be diſcounted back again to the kingdom of England by the kingdom of Scotland, upon the firſt monthly allowance which ſhall grow due to the Scotiſh army, from the time they ſhall make their firſt entrance into the kingdom of England.

" 7. That the public faith of the kingdom of Scotland will be given to be jointly made uſe of with the public faith of the kingdom of England, for the preſent taking up 200,000l. ſterling in the kingdom of England, or elſewhere, for the ſpeedy procuring of the ſaid 100,000l. ſterling as aforeſaid; as alſo a conſiderable ſum for the ſatisfying in good proportion the arrears of the Scotiſh army in Ireland.

" 8. That no ceſſation, nor any pacification or agreement of peace whatſoever ſhall be made without the mutual advice and conſent of both kingdoms.

" 9. That the public faith of the kingdom of Scotland, ſhall be given to their brethren of England, that neither their entrance into, nor their continuance in, the kingdom of England, ſhall be made uſe of to any other ends than are expreſſed in the covenant, and in the articles of this treaty: and that all matters of difference that ſhall happen to ariſe between the ſubjects of the two nations, ſhall be reſolved and determined by the mutual advice and conſent of both kingdoms, or by ſuch committees as for this purpoſe ſhall be by them appointed.

" 10. That the kingdom of England do oblige themſelves to aid and aſſiſt the kingdom of Scotland, in the ſame or like caſes of ſtraits and extremities.

" 11. That during the time that the Scotiſh army ſhall be employed as aforeſaid, for the defence of the kingdom of Scotland, there ſhall be fitted out, as men of war, eight ſhips, whereof ſix ſhall be of burden betwixt one hundred and twenty and two hundred tun; the other between three and four hundred tun; all which ſhall be maintained at the charge of the kingdom of England, to be employed for the defence of the coaſt of Scotland, under ſuch commanders as the earl of Warwick, for the time of his being admiral, ſhall nominate, with the approbation of the committees of both kingdoms; which commanders ſhall receive from the ſaid earl general inſtructions, that they do from time to time obſerve the directions of the committees of both kingdoms."

Though this treaty was not ſigned till the 29th of November, the eſtates of Scotland were ſo ſecure, there would be no objections to the terms, that the troops of the moſt diſtant counties were now marching to the general rendezvous, whilſt the treaty was in hand. The very day the covenant was ſent to England, namely, the 18th of Auguſt, a proclamation was publiſhed in the king's name according to the uſual ſtile, commanding all the ſubjects of Scotland, from ſixteen to ſixty years old, to provide themſelves with ammunition, arms, and forty days proviſions, and to be ready to march for the defence of the kingdom. The king could not bear, that an order ſhould be publiſhed in his name to his ſubjects of Scotland, to arm themſelves againſt himſelf. He writ a vehement letter to the council, commanding them expreſly to call in the proclamation, but it was to no purpoſe. The king ſeems not to have known, that in Scotland as well as in England, in all ſtate affairs, the king is never conſidered as ſeparated from the people, and that it is the uſual practice to publiſh all public orders in the king's name, though they are prejudicial to his private intereſts. Hiſtory furniſhes us with numberleſs inſtances, and the king had found, by too frequent experience for ſome time in England, that in making war upon him, it was pretended to be for his honour and true intereſt. He himſelf pretended, that he waged war with both houſes in defence of the liberties of parliament. This is an effect of the conſtitution of the government, whereby the king as the head, and the people as the body, are deemed inſeparable. If they happen to be divided, it is not ſtrange, that each pretends to act for the good of the whole, ſince this pretenſion is made the ſole cauſe of their diviſion.

Upon this foundation it was, that the eſtates of Scotland publiſhed two manifeſtoes, wherein, ſuppoſing the king to have been, and ſtill to be guided by pernicious counſels, they pretended not only, that they might juſtly aſſiſt the two houſes againſt him, but were bound in conſcience to make war upon him. They maintained, they had no other view, than to reſcue him from the dangers he willingly expoſed himſelf to, and to labour for his happineſs and glory. After all, this maxim is not wholly peculiar to England and Scotland; it has been followed in other ſtates during civil wars. All that can be ſaid, is, that many times the welfare of the king and ſtate, is only a cloke to ambition, revenge, and other criminal paſſions. But it is not impoſſible, that what is frequently a pretence only, may ſometimes be a very ſolid reaſon. It is the part of the wiſe and unbiaſſed, who ſeek only the truth, to diſtinguiſh the real motives which engage ſubjects to take up arms againſt their ſovereigns, in ſtates where an abſolute and unlimitted power cannot with reaſon be aſcribed to the prince, as in England and Scotland.

The king made a long anſwer to theſe manifeſtoes, but it was upon quite contrary ſuppoſitions. He pretended, both houſes of parliament had forced him to take up arms in his own defence: that his conſent to the acts of the parliament of Scotland, was more than ſufficient to ſecure their religion and liberties: that his ſubjects of Scotland could not, without being guilty of treaſon, make war upon him on any pretence whatſoever, and other the like ſuppoſitions, which the Scots did not grant, as he did not thoſe made by them in ſupport of their pretended right. There is one among others, which frequently occurs in the authors who have writ on this ſubject, and which is admitted, or rejected, according as they lean to either party. And this obliges me juſt to mention it, in order to arm the reader againſt the prejudices of both.

In the treaty of peace concluded at London 1641, there was this clauſe: " That the kingdom of Scotland ſhall not denounce nor make war againſt the kingdoms of England, or Ireland, without conſent of the parliament of Scotland; nor, on the other hand, the kingdom of England make war againſt Scotland, without conſent of the parliament of England. And in caſe any of the ſubjects of any of the kingdoms ſhall riſe in arms, or make war againſt any other of the kingdoms and ſubjects thereof, without conſent of the parliament of that kingdom whereof they are ſubjects, or upon which they do depend, that they ſhall be held as traitors to the ſtates whereof they are ſubjects. And that both the kingdoms, in the caſes aforeſaid, be bound to concur in the repreſſing of thoſe that ſhall happen to riſe in arms, or make war without conſent of their own parliament."

The king ſuppoſing, that the Scots, in aiding the parliament againſt him, intended to make war upon England, inferred from this clauſe, that they were guilty of treaſon. This inference was founded not only upon the ſuppoſition above mentioned, but alſo upon the convention of eſtates not being a true parliament, and moreover upon his having given them licence to meet, but with ſuch limitations as had not been obſerved. The Scots ſuppoſed on the contrary, that, far from intending to make war againſt England, their deſign was to aid and defend that kingdom againſt the popiſh and prelatical party, and reſcue the king out of their hands.

Thus, what the king called invading England, the oppoſite party called aſſiſting it. This muſt be always remembered when we read the hiſtory of thoſe days.

The Scotch army entered England January 15, 1643-4. But it is not yet time to relate what they did there. It will be neceſſary firſt to ſpeak of what paſſed concerning Ireland, and of ſome other important occurrences of the year 1643.

As to Ireland, the ſucceſs of the firſt campaign had been ſo equal on both ſides, that neither could boaſt of having gained any great advantage. The point was to continue the war, each rightly judging, peace would be always very remote, ſo long as things remained in a ſtate of equality. And therefore the king and the parliament thought of ſtrengthening themſelves againſt the enſuing campaign. The treaty of Oxford not ſucceeding, as was eaſy to foreſee, the king thought of means to employ at home the Engliſh troops that ſerved in Ireland, and to that purpoſe, of making a truce with the rebels. As this notable project could not but be odious to the Engliſh, and render ſuſpicious all the king's proteſtations with reſpect to the Iriſh rebellion, he ſaw himſelf obliged to uſe more caution, to procure an excuſe to conclude this ceſſation. This he did by engaging the lords-juſtices of Ireland, and the council of Dublin to countenance his project. But as I may be accuſed of aſcribing to the king motives he never had, I think it incumbent on me to allege here the unqueſtionable teſtimony of the lord Clarendon. The reader will find it in vol. II. p. 318. fol. edit.

"The king was not all this while without a due ſenſe of the dangers that threatened him, in the growths and improvement of the power and ſtrength of the enemy, and how impoſſible it would be for him, without ſome more extraordinary aſſiſtance, to reſiſt that torrent, which he foreſaw by the next ſpring would be ready to overwhelm him, if he made not proviſion accordingly. And finding by degrees, that it was not in his power to compoſe the diſturbances of England, or to prevent thoſe of Scotland, and abhorring the thought of introducing a foreign nation to ſubdue his own ſubjects, he begun to think of expedients which might allay the diſtempers in Ireland; that ſo, having one of his kingdoms in peace, he might apply the power of that towards the procuring it in his other dominions. He was not ignorant, how tender an argument that buſineſs of Ireland was, and how prepared men were to pervert whatſoever he ſaid, or did in it; and therefore he reſolved to proceed with that caution, that whatſoever was done in it, ſhould be by the council of that ſtate, who were underſtood to be moſt ſkilful in thoſe affairs."

Hence it is evident, that the king's deſign in making a truce with the Iriſh rebels, was to employ the Engliſh forces which ſerved in that kingdom, to ſubdue the parliament, and that, to avoid the approaches which might be caſt on him for it, he reſolved ſo to manage, that it ſhould appear to be done by the council of Ireland, that is, by the lords-juſtices and the reſt of the council. In the paſſage I have quoted, the lord Clarendon inſinuates, that the king came not to this reſolution till about the end of the year 1643, that is, when he was ſure the Scots were to ſend an army into England. For, after relating what had paſſed during the campaign of 1643, the parliament's negociations in Scotland, the covenant of both kingdoms, the reſolution taken in Scotland to aid the two houſes, the calling of the Oxford parliament, which was not done till December the ſame year; he comes at laſt to ſpeak of the king's reſolution, to make uſe of the Engliſh troops that were in Ireland. "The king, (ſays he) was not all this while without a due ſenſe of the dangers that threatened him, and how impoſſible it would be for him to reſiſt that torrent, which he foreſaw by the next ſpring would be ready to overwhelm him.---He began therefore to think of expedients which might allay the diſtempers of Ireland." It is however certain, the king reſolved to make a truce in Ireland, long before the parliament's negociation with Scotland, and before the Scots reſolution to levy an army. And what invincibly proves that the king was determined, before the engagement of the Scots, is, that the Iriſh truce was ſigned the 15th of September 1643, after a long negociacion. Thus, the lord Clarendon's inſinuation, that the king did reſolve to employ the Engliſh forces of Ireland, only to ſecure himſelf againſt the torrent that was ready to overwhelm him, being very ill-grounded, confirms what will be ſeen hereafter, that he was not induced by neceſſity to make a truce with the Iriſh rebels, but by the hopes of ſubduing the parliament with theſe additional forces.

To have a pretence to conclude this truce, the king believed, the beſt way was to perſuade the public, it would be extremely advantageous, or rather was abſolutely neceſſary, to the Engliſh in Ireland, and their only refuge, to preſerve what they ſtill poſſeſſed in that country. He had complained ſeveral times, that the parliament neglected the Iriſh war, and would have had a numerous army ſent thither. But, as I ſaid before, the parliament ſuſpecting, the king's aim was only to weaken them by that diverſion, were contented with ſending from time to time a few ſupplies to continue the war, beſides the Scotch troops which made a great diverſion in the north. Theſe ſupplies, though inconſiderable, had however produced this good effect, that the rebels, inſtead of making greater progreſs, had on the contrary loſt much ground after ſeveral defeats. They were however ſtill much ſuperior to the Engliſh, and though the Engliſh and Scotch forces were able to curb them a little, they were not ſtrong enough to hope to reduce them to obedience. Nay, it was to be feared, they would in the end be overpowered with numbers, eſpecially as the parliament, engaged in a war with the king, could not ſend a powerful aid into Ireland for fear of leaving England unprovided. This was the pretence uſed by the king to conclude a truce with the rebels.

In the ſituation of affairs ſince war had been declared between the king and the parliament, and the lords-juſtices who governed Ireland were greatly embarraſſed. They had been commiſſioned by the king, and conſequently from him they were to receive their orders. But on the other hand, the parliament having taken upon them to pay the charges of the Iriſh war, they could not openly declare for the king, without forfeiting the aſſiſtance of the parliament, the king not being in condition to ſupply them. A perfect neutrality was not poſſible, becauſe the king and the parliament's intereſts being oppoſite, they could not implicitly obey the one, without being ſuſpected by the other. They choſe therefore to try to content both, as far as was poſſible, and the rather, as the king and the parliament expreſſed an equal deſire to end the Iriſh war. But they could not remain long in this ſituation. Such was their caſe at laſt, that it was not poſſible for them to pleaſe both. The parliament having ſent in October 1642 a committee to Dublin to aſſiſt the council, and ſettle with the lords-juſtices what related to the continuance of the war[s], theſe commiſſioners were at firſt received with reſpect, but in February 1643, by the king's expreſs order, were ſent back to England. The king was well pleaſed, the parliament ſhould ſupply what was neceſſary for continuing the war, but unwilling they ſhould have any ſhare in the government of Ireland, or their commiſſioners a place in the council of ſtate. Shortly after, he removed ſome of the lords-juſtices and counſellors[t]. Probably, he was then forming the project of a truce with the rebels, and wanted for that purpoſe, that the lords-juſtices and all the counſellors ſhould be diſpoſed to act only by his orders. Beſides, on this ſuppoſition, the parliament's commiſſioners could not but be a great impediment, had they continued to aſſiſt at the council of ſtate. From that time alſo, the inſtances of the lords-juſtices to the king and parliament for aid, became mere preſſing and frequent. They repreſented the ſtate of the Engliſh in Ireland as entirely deſperate, without a ſpeedy ſupply of men, money, and ammunition. They ſaid, the officers were very importunate for leave to return to England. In a word, they omitted nothing, that was apt to create a belief, there was no remedy. On the other hand, ſome officers of the Engliſh army preſented a remonſtrance to the lords-juſtices, April the 4th, 1643, declaring, they were reduced to deſpair for want of money to ſubſiſt, and that it ought not to be thought ſtrange, if in their caſe they ſhould have recourſe to the firſt and primary law of nature, namely, the law of ſelf-preſervation. If to theſe ſo earneſt complaints be added, what the lord Clarendon ſays, that the king reſolved ſo to proceed, that every thing ſhould appear to be done by the council of Ireland, the ſending back of the parliament's commiſſioners, and the changes made among the lords-juſtices, and members of the council, one can ſcarce help ſuſpecting theſe complaints to be all begged, on purpoſe to ſerve for pretence to the ceſſation. This ſuſpicion ſeems the more probable, as at that time the affairs of the Engliſh in Ireland were upon a very good foot, and as the marquis of Ormond had juſt gained at Roſs a ſignal victory over the rebels. Accordingly the lords-juſtices, as well as the officers, took care not to make the progreſs of the rebels the grounds of their complaints, but only the want of money, proviſions, and ammunition.

However this be, the remonſtrance of the officers being ſent to the king, he took occaſion from thence to ſend to the marquis of Ormond a commiſſion, impowering him to treat with the rebels, and agree with them upon a ceſſation of arms for one year. He gave notice of it to the lords-juſtices, in a letter of April the 23d, 1643, commanding them to aſſiſt the marquis in the execution of his commiſſion to the utmoſt of their power. The date of this commiſſion is remarkable, for it evidently ſhews, that the Scots reſolution to aſſiſt the parliament, which was not taken till the following Auguſt, was not the cauſe of the Iriſh truce.

May the 3d, the king renewed his orders to the marquis of Ormond concerning the truce. But before the marquis had received theſe freſh orders, the lords-juſtices had writ to the king, the 11th of the ſame month, a very expreſſive letter, repreſenting the miſerable condition of Ireland, in ſuch terms as ſhewed, that every one was reduced to deſpair for want of money, and proviſions, though till then the Engliſh forces had been crowned with ſucceſs againſt the rebels[u].

[s] They carried with them 20,000 l. in ready money, three huudred barrels of powder, ten tun of match, and other ammunition. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 530.

[t] See the declaration hereafter of both houſes, concerning the affairs of Ireland. Rapin.

[u] They complained, that they had no victuals, clothes, or other proviſions requiſite towards their ſuſtenance; no money to provide them of any thing they wanted; no arms, and not above forty barrels of powder in his majeſty's ſtores. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 538.

The

The king, who meant to take advantage of this letter, to demonſtrate to the public, the neceſſity of the ceſſation he intended to conclude, ſent it to both houſes[w], who immediately took the affair into conſideration. A committee was appointed, with orders to think of ways to raiſe money for Ireland. Upon the report of the committee, the parliament reſolved to raiſe money by voluntary contributions, and offered very advantageous terms to ſuch as ſhould advance the ſums required[x]. But notwithſtanding this, the king, July the 2d, diſpatched freſh orders to the lords juſtices and the marquis of Ormond, to conclude a truce for one year, which they were already endeavouring. From the 20th of June, the general council of the Iriſh, aſſembled at Kilkenny, had granted a commiſſion to treat[y].

September the 7th, the king repeated his orders to the marquis of Ormond, to conclude the truce as ſoon as poſſible. At the ſame time he ordered him to ſend into England, all the Engliſh forces that could be ſpared after the concluſion of the truce. His reaſon was, and he could juſtly ſay it then, that an army was preparing in Scotland to invade England. But there was no mention of that article in the foregoing orders.

At length, the ceſſation was ſigned the 15th of September, on the condition that both parties ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of what they held. The king founded the neceſſity of it, firſt, upon a remonſtrance preſented to him December the 1ſt, 1642, by four colonels, as well in their own, as in the names of many other officers, who ſerved in the army of Ireland, wherein they told him it was impoſſible for them to ſubſiſt any longer, if means were not found to ſupply their preſſing wants. Secondly, upon the repeated letters ſent from the lords juſtices to the king and the parliament, ſince January 1642-3, wherein they ſaid, the army was going to periſh in few days, for want of aſſiſtance. Thirdly, upon the forementioned remonſtrance of the officers of the 4th of April, wherein they pretended a few hours delay to aſſiſt them, would be too long[z]. Nevertheleſs this army, which was reduced to extremity the 1ſt of December 1642, found means to ſubſiſt till the 15th of September 1643, though the lords juſtices complained, they had received no ſupplies ſince November. This is a clear evidence, that all theſe complaints were very much aggravated by the private direction of the king, who meant to uſe them for pretence to the truce. This is what the parliament repreſented in a declaration publiſhed on account of the Iriſh ceſſation, before they had notice of its being concluded: they complained very ſtrongly, that they were never acquainted by the ſtates of Ireland with the treaty of a ceſſation, much leſs was their advice demanded, notwithſtanding that by act of parliament, and by his majeſty's commiſſion under the great ſeal, both houſes were "to adviſe, order, and diſpoſe of all things concerning the government and defence of that kingdom." They ſaid, that to accompliſh the more eaſily this diſhonourable ceſſation, thoſe of the ſtate in Dublin, who were ſo honeſt and religious as to diſſuade it, were firſt diſcountenanced, and at laſt put out of their places, and reſtrained to priſon, as ſir William Parſons one of the lords juſtices, ſir John Temple maſter of the rolls, ſir Adam Loftus vice treaſurer of Ireland, and ſir Robert Meredith, one alſo of the council-table. That it was made only with a view to diſcourage thoſe who had ſubſcribed to advance money upon the parliament's propoſals, in order to render impoſſible the maintenance of the army in Ireland, and to employ it in England to the deſtruction of the parliament. For theſe and many other reaſons, which I omit, not to be tedious, both houſes declared the intended ceſſation void, promiſing to indemnify thoſe who ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to it[a].

Mean while, the king who was aſſured of the concurrence of the lords juſtices, the council of ſtate, and the marquis of Ormond general of the army, ſo ordered it, that after the concluſion of the truce all the Engliſh troops that could be ſpared were ſent to him. Theſe forces landed at Moſtyn in Flintſhire, and their firſt attempt was upon Hawarden-caſtle, which was ſurrendered to them the 4th of December. Then they took ſome other ſmall places in Cheſhire[b]; after which the lord Byron[c], who commanded for the king in thoſe parts, beſieged Nantwich, January the 15th 1643-4. Three days after, making a ſudden and violent ſtorm upon five ſeveral places of the town at once, he was every where repulſed with the loſs of many of his men. At laſt, the 21ſt of the ſame month, the lord Fairfax, who advanced to relieve the town, entirely routed the Iriſh army, conſiſting of three thouſand foot, (who were almoſt all ſlain or taken priſoners) and of eighteen hundred horſe, moſt of whom eſcaped by flight, but were ſo diſperſed that they could be of no farther ſervice to the king. Colonel George Monk was taken in this action, and ſent priſoner to the Tower of London, where he remained ſome time, till at laſt he took up arms under the parliament[d]. Thus the king received no advantage by theſe troops, nay, they rather did him great prejudice, in that by all his proceedings to procure them he confirmed the miſtruſt entertained by many people, of his being concerned in the Iriſh rebellion.

Not to interrupt the thread of the military actions, and of what paſſed in Scotland and Ireland, I have been forced to paſs over ſeveral important events of this year 1643, of which it will be neceſſary to ſpeak, though withour any connection, as they are of a different nature. The reader will eaſily by obſerving the dates, perceive their relation to the general affairs. I ſhall begin with certain projects framed at London, to compel the parliament to make peace, whilſt the armies were in the field.

The king was ever ſtrongly poſſeſſed with the notion, that fear alone held moſt of the people attached to the parliament, and that if he procured them a good opportunity to hold up their heads, he ſhould oblige both houſes to make a ſpeedy peace, without demanding the ſecurities, which made the principal obſtacle. This was his favourite ſcheme, as well as of his miniſters, his council, his friends, and adherents in London and elſewhere; and this was the ſpring of ſeveral projects to force the parliment to a peace. It would indeed be very ſtrange, that ſo many able men ſhould be of this opinion, without any manner of foundation. But on the other hand, one knows not what to think, when it is conſidered, that of ſo many projects, built upon this ſuppoſition, not one ſucceeded, which ſeems to argue that the majority of the people were not for the king. However, it is certain, the king had many friends in London, and in the parliament itſelf, who ſerved him artfully by pretending to dread that the war would be deſtructive to the parliament, and thereby they endeavoured to infuſe a real terror into the people, and incline them by degrees to wiſh and ſue for peace. Theſe men inceſſantly plotted to ſow diſcord between the parliament and the people. As it was neceſſary for them to hold private correſpondence with the court, in order to act according to directions, his majeſty ſent frequent meſſengers to London, ſometimes ſecretly, ſometimes openly, under colour of bringing meſſages to the parliament, in order to convey his inſtructions to his friends, and be exactly informed of what paſſed in both houſes and the city. With this view, in December 1642, he publiſhed for the ſake, as was pretended, of the inhabitants of London, a proclamation, for the free and ſafe paſſage of all goods, wares, and merchandizes to the city. But the commons ſuſpecting ſome hidden myſtery under this condeſcenſion, paſſed the next month two orders, the one, That no carriers or waggoners ſhould be permitted to go to Oxford or elſewhere, without ſpecial licence from the parliament: The other, that any agent or ſervant to any perſon that was in arms againſt the parliament, who ſhould preſume to come to Weſtminſter, or reſide about London, ſhould be forthwith apprehended as a ſpy. The 10th of April following, theſe orders were renewed, and even extended to all perſons that ſhould come from the king's quarters to London without a ſafe-conduct, and the ſame was printed and publiſhed.

In all appearance, the king, who had ſo many correſpondents in London, was not ignorant of this order. Neverthe-leſs, on pretence it was not ſignified to him in form, he ſent a meſſage to the parliament, with an offer of peace in general terms, without demanding a ſafe-conduct for the bearer. But the commons, reſolving to ſtop the courſe of theſe artifices, which ſerved to carry on the king's private correſpondence in London, ordered the meſſenger to be ſent to priſon, for coming without a ſafe-conduct. Three days after, to ſhew the people, the king vainly amuſed them with hopes of a peace, they impeached the queen of high-treaſon, and ſent up the impeachment to the lords by Mr. Pym. The king, full of indignation at this extraordinary proceeding, publiſhed a proclamation, to forbid obedience to the orders of both houſes, declaring, he acknowledged them no longer for houſes of parliament.

Affairs were in this ſituation, when both houſes diſcovered a conſpiracy formed in London, ever under colour of procuring peace refuſed by the parliament. I ſhall give the particulars of this conſpiracy, as they were communicated to the lords by Mr. Pym, at a conference between the two houſes. He told them.

"I. That the conſpiracy was formed of a mixture and conjunction of perſons of ſeveral qualities, ſome whereof were of both houſes of parliament, others of the city, and others belonging to the court, who in their reſpective places and employments were to form and perfect the work, raiſed out of the aſhes of the late petition of London for peace.

"II. The chief actors were Mr. Waller, a member of the houſe of commons, who pretended, and gave out to the reſt, that many others of that houſe, and of the lords, were privy to and concerned therein; Mr. Tompkins, a gentleman living in Holborn, brother-in-law to the ſaid Mr. Waller, and a ſervant to the queen, as being ſecretary to the commiſſioners for her majeſty's revenue; Mr. Challoner, an eminent citizen; one Mr. Blinkark, Mr. Alexander Hampden, who brought the laſt meſſage from the king; Mr. Haſſel, one of his majeſty's meſſengers, &c.

"III. The method was, for ſeveral perſons in the city to diſpoſe of themſelves into a committee, to hold intelligence with both armies, the court, and the parliament, to take a general ſurvey of the affections of all the inhabitants within the weekly bills of mortality, which was to be done under theſe three ranks, 'right men,' (or of the king's party) 'averſe men,' (or the well affected to the parliament) and 'moderate men,' (or neutrals;) to conſider of arms, ammunition, and all proviſions of war, to appoint out of themſelves ſelect perſons to treat with Mr. Waller and Mr. Tompkins in relation to the city, court, and parliament; as alſo with ſir Nicholas Criſp, ſir George Binion, captain Royden, and others at Oxford.

"IV. Mr. Waller's part was to engage a conſiderable part of the lords and commons, and to be a means of conveying counſels, reſolutions, and intelligence between them and the ſaid city committee. Mr. Tompkins was not only an aſſiſtant to Mr. Waller therein, but an inſtrument to convey by Haſſel and others their proceedings to the court, principally to the lord Falkland, and to receive thence directions, powers, and commands.

"V. For preventing diſcovery, proteſtations of ſecrecy were taken, as they were chriſtians not to diſcloſe it, and no man in the city was to endeavour the engaging above two, whereby no one man could impeach many.

"VI. From the court, Mr. Heron and Mr. Alexander Hampden, and others employed upon meſſages from the king to the parliament, were to convey directions, encouragements, and advice to thoſe in London, and authority was to be given under the great ſeal, and warrants under the king's hand, for ſettling a council of war, naming of generals and other officers, execution of martial law, raiſing of money, and providing arms; and to facilitate the whole, part of the king's forces to be in readineſs to aſſiſt the party here, as there ſhould be occaſion.

"VII. The particulars of the deſign itſelf were, to ſeize the king's children, to ſecure ſeveral members of parliament, particularly the lord Say, the lord Wharton, Mr. Pym, ſir Philip Stapleton, colonel Hampden, and colonel Strode, as alſo the lord-mayor and committee of the militia, under pretence of bringing them to a legal trial; to ſeize upon the outworks, forts, magazines, gates, and other places of importance in the city and the Tower, and let in the king's forces, and in the mean time to reſiſt and obſtruct all payments, impoſed by authority of the two houſes for ſupport of their armies.

"VIII. For their authority they had the following commiſſion brought up by the lady Aubigney, (who was under cuſtody) the ſaid commiſſion being found hid under ground in Mr. Tompkins's cellar.

"IX. In purſuance of this commiſſion, they had often conſulted of a general, and treated with ſir Hugh Pollard, priſoner in the Compter (once a member of the houſe of commons, but expelled, being accuſed of having an hand in the deſign to bring up the northern army againſt the parliament,) about it. And a declaration was ready drawn, ſetting forth the cauſe of their taking up arms to be in purſuance of their late proteſtation, to maintain the true reformed proteſtant religion againſt all papiſts and ſectaries, to oppoſe illegal aſſeſſments, &c. which was to be diſtributed to their friends, and on the night of their riſing, ſet upon the poſts round about London. Concerning which time of their riſing they had alſo conſulted, (of which preciſe notice was to be ſent to Oxford, as to the day and hour) and ſome moved to have it done on Wedneſday the laſt of May (being the faſt day, and the very next day after the firſt intimation was given towards a diſcovery) but it had been put off, and not fully concluded, it being ſaid, 'it ſhould be left to the lords to determine,' whom Waller pretended ſhould ſide with them. Mr. Haſſel lay cloſe to Beaconsfield, and had word ſent, 'The great ſhip was come in the Downs,' by which he was to underſtand, that the deſign was near ripe; and he acquainted the lord Falkland at Oxford therewith, and received anſwer, that they ſhould haſten it with all ſpeed, and when they were ready, three thouſand of the king's forces were to advance from Oxford within fifteen miles of London, to be ready upon notice to fall into the works, and aſſiſt; and white ribbons or tape was agreed to be worn by all concerned in this action to diſtinguiſh them."

The lord Clarendon, who is very large upon this conſpiracy, denies neither the plot itſelf, nor the king's commiſſion, brought to London by the lady Aubigney [e], but urges, that the parliament confounded in one ſingle plot, two different projects, the firſt formed by Waller, Tompkins, and Challoner, who were at London, and the other by ſir Nicholas Criſp, who being recorder of London [f], had been impriſoned, and making his eſcape, had retired to Oxford. But however, whether there were two plots or one, it is no leſs apparent, that the king's deſign was to compel the parliament to a peace, and that his frequent meſſages to both houſes with offers of peace, were often but artifices to carry on his correſpondence in London.

This diſcovery cauſed both houſes to reſolve to unite themſelves ſtill more ſtrictly together, by a new covenant or oath, tendered to all the members, and afterwards to the army, and ſuch of the people as were willing to take it. Tompkins, Challoner, and two other conſpirators were hanged [g]. But Waller ſaved his life, paying a fine of ten thouſand pounds, and was baniſhed the kingdom. Hampden died in priſon before his ſentence, and Haſſel died likewiſe the night before his trial. The ill ſucceſs of this plot prevented not the like from being contrived the next Auguſt.

Since the miſcarriage of Waller's conſpiracy, the king had a train of ſucceſſes, which revived the courage of his friends at London, who began to be diſmayed. The lord Fairfax was defeated at Atherton in Yorkſhire. The queen was come to his majeſty with a conſiderable ſupply. Waller was intirely routed at Roundway-down; and the king, now maſter of Briſtol, was preparing to beſiege Gloceſter. Thus crowned with ſucceſs, he thought it a favourable opportunity to force the parliament to a peace, and all his London friends began to uſe their endeavours. Whether this project came from the court, or the king had only approve of it, he believed it requiſite to prepare the minds of the people by a public declaration, to this effect:

"As the grievances and loſſes of no particular perſons could be compared to the damage he himſelf ſuſtained; ſo a peace could not be ſo welcome to any man as to him. God Almighty knew, with what unwillingneſs, and anguiſh of ſoul, he ſubmitted to the neceſſity of taking up defenſive arms. And the world knew, with what juſtice and bounty he had repaired his ſubjects for all the preſſures they had borne, by ſuch excellent laws, as would for ever have prevented the like; and with what earneſtneſs he deſired to add any thing, for the eſtabliſhment of the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom; all which had been evidently invaded by thoſe who had ſacrificed the public good to their own ends. He well remembered the proteſtation made by him, at the head of his army, 'To defend and maintain the true reformed proteſtant religion, and if it ſhould pleaſe God to bleſs his arms with ſucceſs, he would maintain the juſt privileges and freedom of parliament, and govern by the known laws of the land, for whoſe defence that army was only raiſed. And there could not be a more ſeaſonable time to renew that proteſtation than now, when God had vouchſafed him ſo many victories, which would hinder him from falling under the ſcandalous imputation, that his meſſages of peace proceeded from the weakneſs of his power, not love of his people. He declared therefore to all the world, in the preſence of God, that he was ſo far from intending any alteration of the religion eſtabliſhed, in which he was born and bread, and would reſolutely die, or from the leaſt thought of invading the liberty and property of the ſubject, or violating the juſt privileges of parliament; that the preſervation of the eſtabliſhed religion, the laws, the liberties of the people, and the juſt privileges of parliament ſhould be equally his care, as the maintenance of his own rights. Whether thoſe that were enemies to the eſtabliſhed eccleſiaſtical government, who perſecuted the learned, orthodox miniſters, and put into their places, ignorant, ſeditious, and ſchiſmatical preachers who villified the book of Common-prayer, and profaned God's worſhip were like to advance religion: whether thoſe who, without the leaſt ſhadow of law, impoſed exorbitant taxes upon their fellow ſubjects, impriſoned, tormented, and murdered them, were like to preſerve the liberty and property of the ſubject, and whether thoſe who had invaded the juſt rights of the crown, denied the king his negative voice, awed and terrified the members of both houſes, were like to vindicate the privileges of parliament, all the world may judge." In ſhort, after ſeveral invectives againſt the two houſes, he concluded with ſaying: "Whoſoever have been miſled, by thoſe whoſe hearts from the beginning have deſigned all this miſchief, and ſhall redeem their paſt crimes, by their preſent ſervice and loyalty, in the apprehending or oppoſing ſuch who ſhall continue to bear arms againſt us, and ſhall uſe their utmoſt endeavours to reduce thoſe men to their due obedience, and to reſtore the kingdom to its wonted peace, ſhall have cauſe to magnify our mercy, and to repent the treſpaſſes committed againſt ſo juſt and gracious a ſovereign[h]."

It is not difficult to perceive, that by this declaration, and eſpecially by the latter part of it, the king's aim was to excite and authorize an inſurrection in London, againſt both houſes, and what happened preſently after puts it intirely out of doubt. This declaration was therefore a preparative for the execution of a plot, to compel the parliament to a peace. Undoubtedly, the king was really deſirous of a peace. But it muſt be always remembered, what peace it was he ſo earneſtly wiſhed. It was a peace that ſhould re-inveſt him with all his prerogatives, after which he promiſed to govern according to the known laws of the land. But in this promiſe lay the whole difficulty of the peace, the parliament pretending it could not be relied on, and the king offering no other ſecurity than his word, tacitly ſuppoſing it to be a crime to doubt his ſincerity.

This declaration was no ſooner publiſhed than the king's friends began their uſual artifices in London. They affected an extraordinary terror, cauſed by the proſperous ſucceſs of the king's arms, and inſinuated, that the conſequences ſhould be prevented by a peace. But as the examples of Tompkins and Challoner had effectually terrified the king's moſt devoted friends, not one dared openly to expoſe himſelf to the ſame danger. It was therefore reſolved among them, that the houſe of lords ſhould firſt break the ice, and propoſe a peace to the commons, which ſhould be ſeconded by the king's friends in London. The upper-houſe conſiſted but of a few peers, ſome of whom were either openly or privately for the king. Others were his enemies, and ſome were ready to follow the ſtream which way ſoever it carried them. Theſe were the men the king's party ſtrove to gain by various means, in order to be ſuperior in the houſe of lords, ſome by promiſes, others by threats, and ſome again by way of perſuaſion, intimating to them the abſolute neceſſity of a peace. In ſhort, they ſecured a majority of voices in the upper-houſe: not that all they prevailed with, abſolutely promiſed to be devoted to the king: (that was not the point;) but only to agree that a peace ſhould be propoſed by their houſe, which could not be conſidered but as a very innocent thing. The managers of this contrivance took care, not to propoſe a peace without terms, ſuch as the king deſired. That alone had been ſufficient to make them loſe ſome of thoſe they had gained. They had only to engage the commons to enter into negociation, after which, they hoped the ſuperiority the king then had, ſupported with the endeavours of his party, would be capable to remove in his favour the difficulties that might occur in the principal articles. This reſolution being taken, the lords ſent and deſired a conference with the commons, where they declared, that they had reſolved to ſend propoſitions of peace to the king, and hoped the commons would concur with them. The propoſitions were:

"1. That both armies may be preſently diſbanded, and his majeſty be intreated to return to his parliament, upon ſuch ſecurity as ſhould give him ſatisfaction.

"2. That religion might be ſettled with the advice of a ſynod of divines, in ſuch a manner as his majeſty, with the conſent of both houſes of parliament, ſhould appoint.

"3. That the militia, both by ſea and land, might be ſettled by a bill; and the militia, forts, and ſhips of the kingdom, put into ſuch hands as the king ſhould appoint, with the approbation of both houſes of parliament: and his majeſty's revenue to be abſolutely and wholly reſtored unto him; only deducting ſuch part as has been of neceſſity expended for the maintenance of his children, and not otherwiſe.

"4. That all the members of both houſes, who had been expelled only for abſenting themſelves, or mere compliance with his majeſty, and no other matter of fact againſt them, might be reſtored to their places.

"5. That all delinquents, from before the 10th day of January 1641, ſhould be delivered up to the juſtice of parliament, and a general pardon for all others on both ſides.

"6. And laſtly, that there might be an act of oblivion for all by-gone deeds, and acts of hoſtility."

Probably, thoſe who had cauſed theſe propoſitions to be paſſed in the houſe of peers, did not themſelves believe, a peace could be made upon theſe foundations. The difficulties which occurred in the three firſt propoſitions, had been very often debated, both before and ſince the beginning of the war, without the poſſibility of coming to any concluſion. It was therefore unlikely, that the king, in his proſperity, would grant what he had denied when his affairs were not in ſo good a ſituation. But, as I ſaid, the intention of the managers of this contrivance was only to procure a negociation, perſuaded as they were, that by their intereſt and cabals, or by an inſurrection of the people, they ſhould cauſe theſe points to be decided in favour of the king. For that reaſon, the principal propoſition, namely, the third concerning the militia, which the parliament had always carefully explained, was expreſſed in a very general and ambiguous manner, in theſe terms, "That the militia might be ſettled by a bill."

The commons plainly ſaw what was the aim of the authors of theſe propoſitions, and were terrified at it. The houſe was apprehenſive, that they were but too powerfully ſupported, otherwiſe, it was not likely they ſhould have taken ſuch a ſtep, at a time when a committee was already gone to deſire aſſiſtance of the Scots. Wherefore, after a long debate, it was reſolved, by a majority of votes, that the propoſitions ſhould be ſent to the king. It is extremely probable, this reſolution was taken only to amuſe the king's friends, and to gain time, in order to break their meaſures the more eaſily. For the next day the lord-mayor of London, attended with a crowd of people, came to the houſe of commons, of which he was a member, and delivered, from the common-council, a petition, wherein the houſe was intreated to perſiſt in their former reſolutions, and reject the propoſitions of the peers. The lord-mayor affirmed alſo, that the people of London were ready to exert their utmoſt for the vigorous proſecution of the war. Whereupon, the houſe took courage again, and reverſed the reſolution of the foregoing day. Thus, the king's friends were in their turn greatly embarraſſed, and under a neceſſity of [h] Adding, "We deſire all our good ſubjects, who have really wiſhed us well, now God has done ſuch wonderful things for us, vigorouſly to endeavour to put an end to all theſe miſeries, by bringing in men, money, plate, horſes, or arms, to our aid, that ſo we being not wanting to ourſelves, may with confidence expect the continuance of God's favour, to reſtore us all to that bleſſed harmony of affection, which may eſtabliſh a firm peace."

taking new meaſures. The expedient they deviſed was to cauſe the women to riſe, in hopes that ſuch an inſurrection might breed a greater, and occaſion ſome revolution.

Auguſt the 9th, a petition for peace was preſented to the commons by two or three thouſand women, with white ſilk ribbons in their hats. The conditions propoſed by them were exactly the ſame as the king had always offered. A general anſwer being ſent to them, they were not ſatisfied, and their number by noon increaſing to five thouſand, they came to the door of the houſe, crying, "Peace, peace; give us thoſe traitors that are againſt peace, that we may tear them to pieces; give us that dog Pym." Part of the train-bands (that uſually ſtood centinel there) firing upon them with powder only, to frighten them away, they laughed at it, and finding a heap of brickbats in the yard, threw them at the centinels, and drove them away. At laſt, ſome troops were forced to be ſent for, who, after uſing fair means in vain, drew their ſwords, and cut them over their hands and faces. A ballad-ſinger was killed upon the ſpot [i], and another woman loſt her noſe, whereof it was ſaid ſhe afterwards died. At length, they were diſperſed. The lord Clarendon, (who ſays many were killed and wounded,) affirms, they were the wives of ſubſtantial citizens; which is hardly credible [k]. Thus ended the grand project of forcing the parliament to a peace, a project wherein means was found to engage ſeveral lords and many commoners under colour that a peace was neceſſary to the ſtate. Nothing could be truer, but care was taken not to diſcover to them, that on pretence of labouring for the public, the king's advantage alone was really ſought.

The earl of Eſſex was one of thoſe who were moſt deſirous of peace, but not in the ſame manner as the king's friends. Theſe were for a peace, and uſed their utmoſt endeavours to procure it: but it was ſuch a peace as the king offered, that is, a peace founded only upon his word. The earl of Eſſex did not think it impracticable, in concluding a peace, to find neceſſary ſecurities for the nations liberties: as appears in his letter of the 9th of July to the ſpeaker, wherein, after the deſcription of Chaldgrave-field, he ſays, "If it were thought fit to ſend to his majeſty to have peace, with the ſettling of religion, the laws and liberties of the ſubject, and to bring unto juſt trial thoſe chief delinquents that have brought all this miſchief to both kingdoms: and (as my lord of Briſtol ſpoke once in parliament) how we may be ſecured to have theſe things performed hereafter; or elſe, if his majeſty ſhall pleaſe to abſent himſelf, there may be a day ſet down to give a period to all theſe unhappy diſtractions by a battle, which, when and where they ſhall chuſe, that may be thought any way indifferent, I ſhall be ready to perform that duty I owe you; and the propoſitions to be agreed upon between his majeſty and the parliament, may be ſent to ſuch an indifferent place, that both armies may be drawn near the one to the other; that if peace be not concluded, it may be ended by the ſword."

It is evident, this is not the language of a man propoſing a peace to gratify the king, and ſolely with intent to procure a negociation from which the king might reap ſome advantage; but of one that heartily wiſhed for ſuch a peace, as might put a happy period to the diſtractions of the kingdom; or if that could not be by means of a peace, to end them at leaſt by a battle. He was, doubtleſs, of opinion, that the nation would run leſs hazard by venturing a deciſion by arms, than by the continuance of the war. Nothing better demonſtrates the uprightneſs of his intentions. But there were few in thoſe days of the ſame diſpoſition. The king paſſionately wiſhed for peace; but it was on condition he ſhould be no loſer by it, that he ſhould be reſtored to all his rights, and his word relied on for the future. As to religion, all he would yield was, that the preſbyterians ſhould not be compelled by penal laws to conform to the church of England. Hitherto he had advanced nothing that might make them hope for a public toleration of their religion. The parliament for their part wiſhed likewiſe for peace, provided by the peace the king was reſtrained from returning to his former courſes, that is, was ſo humbled that he ſhould be able to do nothing without the conſent of both houſes, and enjoy only the empty name of a king, with the external badges of royalty. As to religion, there were very many, as well members as others, who preferred the continuation of the war, let what would be the event, to ſeeing the biſhops reſtored to their power. This muſt be always remembered, when either of the two parties is heard to ſpeak of peace. The like diſpoſition to the earl of Eſſex was doubtleſs the cauſe that ſome were dazzled with the bare ſound of peace, and the limitations inſerted in the propoſitions to be ſent to the king at the time of the late plot. But it may be affirmed, that the chief authors of the artifice were far from having the nation's welfare in view, and thought only of ſerving the king. I do not queſtion, but ſome others were perſuaded to conſent to the propoſitions by reaſon of the end propoſed by the preſbyterian party and now publicly known, as they perceived, that the advantages the parliament might gain upon the king in the continuation of the war, would only ſerve to ruin the church of England with the greater eaſe.

The earl of Eſſex's integrity made him experience what uſually happens to honeſt men in civil diſſenſions, where the moderate paſs for indifferent, and coldly affected to their party. The king, who was informed of this lord's moderation, imagined, he deſired a peace only becauſe he was diſpleaſed with the parliament, and convinced of the injuſtice of the cauſe he had eſpouſed. In this belief, he unſucceſsfully uſed all means to gain him. On the other hand, the moſt violent of his party grew jealous of the earl of Eſſex, perceiving he was no proper inſtrument for their deſigns. Wherefore they no longer confided in him, or at leaſt, feigned not to truſt him, in order to have, by his removal, another general, more compliant and manageable. They caſt their eyes on Edward Montague earl of Mancheſter, known formerly by the name of the lord Kimbolton, and began with advancing him to the command of the forces of the eaſtern aſſociated counties, to which Lincolnſhire was lately added, to go and oppoſe the earl of Newcaſtle; and an ordinance was paſſed, to raiſe new levies by preſſing, to reinforce that army.

If the earl of Eſſex had joined with the parliament only out of paſſion, humour, or intereſt, the mortifications he met with, would have been apt to make him turn to the king, to be revenged of the two houſes. But that was not his character. Though he had complained ſeveral times of the diſregard ſhewn him, in leaving his army without recruits and cloaths, and though ſeveral lords of the king's party took this occaſion to try to perſuade him to change ſides, he ever remained firm to his principles. How ſtrong ſoever their ſolicitations might be, he never gave the leaſt reaſon to believe, he was capable of betraying the parliament, who had truſted him with the command of their forces. Both houſes being informed of the inſtances made to their general, aſſured him of their eſteem and acknowledgement for his great ſervices, and promiſed to recruit and cloath his army, before thoſe of ſir William Waller, and the earl of Mancheſter, which was accordingly done. This ſatisfaction was more than ſufficient, to make him forget all the occaſions of complaint before given him. A famous hiſtorian has been pleaſed to aſcribe the earl of Eſſex's conſtant attachment to the parliament, to his not having ſteaddineſs enough to engage in ſo hazardous an enterprize, as that of forcing the parliament to a peace. I am perſuaded, this was owing to the king, and all his party's prepoſſeſſion that there was not a ſingle man for the parliament, that was ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe. This prejudice was never relinquiſhed.

The project of thoſe who had undertaken to gain the earl of Eſſex, was, that as ſoon as he ſhould give the word, the lords and commoners who were in the ſecret, ſhould retire to the army, and under the ſecurity thereof, proteſt againſt the violence that was offered, the breach of their privileges, by the common-council's taking notice of their debates and over ruling their concluſions, by hindering the ſending of their propoſitions to the king. They did not doubt, but by their example great numbers would take the ſame courſe, by which means they hoped to be ſtrong enough to conſtrain the parliament to make peace. And in caſe the parliament ſhould remain obſtinate, their deſign was to enter upon a ſeparate treaty with the king, as men undeceived, who having been ſeduced by the parliament, were at length ſenſible of the injuſtice of their cauſe. They imagined, the whole kingdom would do the ſame, and the parliament be intirely forſaken. For the king and his party always fanſied, that among the parliament's adherents, not one was ſo, through perſuaſion, honour, and conſcience, but through ſeduction, fear, and ignorance. This cauſed them to take ſo many wrong ſteps, to compel the parliament to a peace by the people's means, ſteps that proved extremely prejudicial to the king. That with regard to the earl of Eſſex, was no leſs ſo than the reſt. The lords and commoners who were concerned in this ſtratagem, as well as in Waller's plot, fearing the earl of Eſſex might diſcover them, thought proper to avoid being called to an account, by retiring to the king. Of this number were the earl of Portland [l], and the lord Conway, who had been impriſoned for Waller's affair, and afterwards releaſed, the lord Lovelace, who had only ſtaid with the parliament by the king's leave, the earls of Clare, Bedford [m], and Holland. The earl of Northumberland, diſſatisfied with his not having in the parliament the ſame credit as formerly, feigning an indiſpoſition, obtained the parliament's leave to retire for his health to his houſe at Petworth in Suſſex. As this place was liable to be infeſted from ſome of the king's quarters, it was generally believed, he had aſſurances of not being moleſted. The flight of all theſe peers turned greatly to the king's diſadvantage, as it deprived him of ſo many friends in the parliament, who were always ready to ſerve him and were wont to direct his adherents in London. Moreover, by the abſence of theſe lords, the king's enemies were more at their eaſe, and found fewer obſtacles to their deſigns than before. For ſhortly after, the earl of Eſſex's army was enabled to relieve Gloceſter, and the parliament approved of the covenant made with Scotland, in which doubtleſs they would have been oppoſed by thoſe that were lately withdrawn. I muſt now proceed to other matters.

I juſt mentioned, that ſir John Hotham, governor of Hull, was apprehended by order of parliament: it is now time to ſpeak of the cauſe of his diſgrace. The king had been ſo incenſed with him, that there was little probability for his ever pardoning the indignity he had received from him, or of Hotham's delivering himſelf into his hands. And yet, the deſire of becoming maſter of Hull in the one, and the thirſt of revenge in the other, made them forget all that was paſt. Hotham, as he could not bear that, after the ſervice he had done the parliament in keeping Hull for them without dreading to expoſe himſelf to the king's indignation, the lord Fairfax ſhould be made commander in chief of all the forces in the north, an honour, which doubtleſs he thought himſelf more worthy of, reſolved to be revenged for this pretended injuſtice by delivering the place to the king [n]. The preciſe time of his applying himſelf to the earl of Newcaſtle is not known; but it is certain, he writ ſeveral letters to him, which were communicated to the queen whilſt ſhe was in the north. He had drawn his ſon, captain Hotham, into the plot, and it was agreed between them, to deliver Hull to the queen, when on her march with her troops to the king. Mean while, young Hotham having given ſome occaſion to ſuſpect him, was ſeized by ſir John Meldrum, and ſent priſoner to Nottingham-caſtle. Hotham found means to eſcape, and going to Lincoln, writ from thence to the parliament, complaining of the injury done him, and affirming he was ready to anſwer whatever ſhould be laid to his charge. But as the queen was now upon her march, and it was time to execute the deſign, he returned to Hull, to contrive the means with his father. The queen thought herſelf ſo ſecure of having Hull very ſoon in her power, that ſhe ſaid in her letter of the 27th of June to the king, "She ſtayed at Newark but for one thing, to have Hull and Lincoln, for which ſhe hoped he would pardon two days ſtop." At the ſame time that the order was ſent to ſeize young Hotham, the mayor of Hull was told to have an eye upon the father, examine his conduct, and take care to preſerve the town. The ſon's return to Hull after his eſcape from Nottingham, the ſuſpicions he already lay under, and the notice received from Mr. Moyer, captain of a man of war then in the road, that Hull was going, that night or the next, to be delivered to the king, made ſir Matthew Boynton the mayor, though brother-in-law to the governor, reſolve to prevent it. That very night, whilſt the Hothams were in bed, all the townſmen, officers, and ſoldiers of known affection to the parliament, were aſſembled without noiſe, and all the ports of the town ſeized, without one drop of blood, or ſo much as a muſket diſcharged. Mean while, I know not for what reaſon, they had neglected to ſecure the two Hotham's [o], who found means to get out of the town: but at their coming to Beverley, they were both ſeized and brought to London, where, after a long impriſonment, they were condemned and executed [p].

There were two things which did the king great injury, with regard to the people, and from which he omitted no opportunity to juſtify himſelf, knowing how detrimental ſuch prejudices might be to him. The firſt was, that he countenanced popery; the ſecond, that he had excited the Iriſh rebellion, or at leaſt connived at it. Theſe two articles both houſes made no ſcruple to inſinuate, and even to maintain openly in their papers. Not that they had poſitive proof of what they advanced; but they drew from his actions and divers paſt events, inferences, to ſome of which, it muſt be owned, the king anſwered but weakly, or in generals, or, according to his cuſtom, by ambiguous expreſſions, capable of a double meaning.

As to the firſt charge, he took occaſion to make the following proteſtation, juſt as he was going to receive the ſacrament from the hands of archbiſhop Uſher.

My Lord,

"I eſpy many reſolved proteſtants, who may declare to the world the reſolution I do now make. I have, to the utmoſt of my power, prepared my ſoul to become a worthy receiver; and may I ſo receive comfort by the bleſſed ſacrament, as I do intend the eſtabliſhment of the true reformed proteſtant religion, as it ſtood in its beauty, in the happy days of queen Elizabeth, without any connivance at popery. I bleſs God, that in the midſt of theſe public diſtractions, I have ſtill liberty to communicate; and may this ſacrament be my damnation, if my heart do not join with my lips in this proteſtation.

Charles I. was undoubtedly very zealous for the proteſtant religion, as profeſſed in the church of England. But it is no leſs certain, he never ſcrupled to favour the papiſts, either out of complaiſance to the queen, or from a belief, that the ſtrict obſervance of the penal laws made againſt them, was not neceſſary to the welfare of the proteſtant religion. It is therefore very difficult to explain what he meant by theſe words, "without any connivance at popery." It cannot be thought that his intention was to ſwear he would never grant the papiſts any toleration, ſince at this very time he was negociating the Iriſh ceſſation, whereby toleration was granted to the catholics of Ireland; and it will hereafter appear, that, in treating of a peace with the rebels, he ſcrupled not to grant them that article. Much leſs ſtill may we venture to affirm, that by the word Connivance, he underſtood all manner of condeſcenſion for the papiſts. This ſenſe would be repugnant to his principles and uſual practice. It ſeems therefore moſt reaſonable to think, that he made a diſtinction between popery and papiſts; and that when he promiſed to eſtabliſh religion in its beauty, his meaning was, that he would ſuffer no popiſh tenets to be mixt with the doctrines of the church of England. But if this was his meaning, it was not to the purpoſe, ſince this was not properly the thing he was charged with. As he was very artful in chuſing expreſſions, to which it was difficult to give a fixed and determinate ſenſe, it is certain, his moſt ſolemn proteſtations produced not the intended effect.

As to the ſecond charge, relating to the Iriſh rebellion, I do not think I can give a clearer knowledge of the matter, than by inſerting the ſubſtance of a declaration publiſhed on this occaſion by both houſes, the 25th of July, 1643. They ſhewed,

"That in the ſecond year of his majeſty's reign, a deſign was formed in Ireland, to bring in a public toleration of the popiſh religion in that kingdom, and to ſuſpend all proceedings againſt papiſts, for a ſum of money to be paid to his majeſty. That the then biſhops of Ireland made a proteſtation againſt it, ſetting forth, how grievous a ſin it was to conſent to ſuch a toleration, and of what dangerous conſequence it might be. And the houſe of commons, in a remonſtrance made in the third year of his majeſty's reign, informed, that even then the popiſh religion was profeſſed in every part of that kingdom, and that monaſteries and nunneries were then newly erected, and repleniſhed with men and women of ſeveral orders, beſeeching his majeſty, that ſome ſpeedy courſe might be taken for redreſs therein; yet in the beginning of the fourth year of his majeſty's reign, all this was granted and confirmed by his majeſty, in conſideration of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, to be levied in three years upon the kingdom in general, as well upon the proteſtants as upon the papiſts.

"That many potent and notorious papiſts had been created peers by his majeſty.

"That when, by direction of the lord chancellor Loftus, and the earl of Corke, then lords juſtices, proceedings were begun againſt the papiſts upon the ſtatute of 2 Elizabeth, for not coming to church, and the judges in their circuits gave

that

that ſtatute in charge, and indictments were framed thereupon, directions were ſent from England, to ſuſpend and ſtay all proceedings upon that ſtatute, when by taking the penalty impoſed by that ſtatute, being nine-pence, for abſenting from church, Sundays and Holidays, the poor proteſtants there might have been eaſed of many heavy payments and taxes, which were after impoſed upon them.

"That the late earl of Strafford, being the king's lieutenant there, did by his great favourite ſir George Ratcliff, one of his majeſty's privy-council of that kingdom, hold correſpondency with the popiſh clergy, and particularly with Paul Harris, a known prieſt, who had both public and private acceſs to ſir George Ratcliff at all times, as well by night as by day.

"That in March 1639, the earl of Strafford carried with him into Ireland, ſir Toby Matthews, a notorious pernicious, Engliſh jeſuited prieſt (baniſhed at the beginning of this parliament, upon the importunity of both houſes) lodged this prieſt over againſt the caſtle of Dublin, the houſe where the earl did himſelf reſide, and from whence this prieſt daily rode to the public maſs-houſes in Dublin and negociated the engaging of the papiſts of Ireland in the war againſt Scotland.

"When the late lord chancellor Loftus and the earl of Corke were lords juſtices, they endeavoured to ſuppreſs the maſs-houſes in Dublin, and to convert them to pious uſes; one, which was in the ſtreet called the Back-lane, they diſpoſed of to the univerſity of Dublin who placed a rector and ſcholars in it, and maintained a weekly lecture there: but after the earl of Strafford came to the government, the lecture was put down, the ſcholars diſplaced, and the houſe became a maſs-houſe, as formerly it had been.

"That divers monaſteries and nunneries were newly erected, immediately before the rebellion broke forth in divers parts of that kingdom: That at the Naas, where the earl of Strafford had his chief ſeat and reſort, convents of friars, namely, Auguſtines, Franciſcans, Dominicans, were not only permitted, but alſo an houſe built there by the ſaid earl, for another purpoſe (as he pretended) ſoon after the building was converted to a friary, by the connivance of the ſaid earl.

"That the Iriſh popiſh army was kept on foot there for a long time after the beginning of this parliament; to the great furtherance of this rebellion, by teaching thoſe barbarous villains the knowledge of arms, under the notion of fighting againſt Scotland, but now made uſe of to extirpate both Engliſh and Scotch from the kingdom of Ireland.

"And that lead might not be wanting to the compleating of this intended rebellion, the ſilver mines of that kingdom, which afforded great ſtore of lead, and therefore fit only to be in the hands of proteſtants of known integrity, were farmed out by his majeſty to moſt pernicious papiſts, namely, ſir George Hamilton, ſir Baſil Brook, and the like; and upon the diſcovery of the plot for the ſurprizing of the city and caſtle of Dublin, divers barrels of muſket bullets were found (upon ſearch) in the houſe of the ſaid ſir George Hamilton in Dublin.

"That the earl of Strafford had, by a violent endeavour, entitled his majeſty by office to the whole counties of Roſcommon, Mayo, Slego, Galloway, and Clare, and to a great part of the counties of Limerick and Tipperary; by which means a door was opened, not only to increaſe his majeſty's revenue, but therewith to ſettle a plantation of proteſtants; and yet when the lords-juſtices and council of Ireland did by their letters exceedingly importune his majeſty that he would not part with thoſe counties, and that the plantation of Engliſh proteſtants might proceed as was formerly intended; his majeſty, notwithſtanding, did in the queen's preſence, by a clandeſtine agreement, give away, at a papiſt's requeſt, thoſe five whole counties, for a rent of 2000 l. or thereabouts.

"That archdeacon Maxwell teſtifies in his examinations taken in Ireland, that he heard Tirligh Oge O'Neale, brother to ſir Phelim O'Neale, the arch-rebel of Ulſter, confeſs, that the rebellion was communicated by the Iriſh popiſh committee to the papiſts in England, who promiſed their aſſiſtance. And Mac Mahoun, who was to join with the lord Mac Guire, for the ſuppriſing the caſtle of Dublin, being taken and examined, at the rack confeſſed, that the original of that rebellion was brought to them out of England, by the Iriſh committee employed to his majeſty for redreſs of grievances.

"That the earl of Caſtlehaven, a peer of England, and a notorious rebel in Ireland, Mr. Porter who declared himſelf a papiſt in Ireland, ſir Baſil Brooke, a popiſh treaſurer for the monies raiſed by the queen's ſolicitation for the war againſt the Scots; Mr. Andrew Brown a lawyer in Lincoln's-inn, heretofore expelled thence for being a known papiſt, with divers other dangerous Engliſh papiſts went out of England into Ireland, the ſummer before the rebellion broke forth, and were very active there.

"That the rebels in all parts of Ireland profeſſed, that the cauſe of their riſing was to preſerve his majeſty and the queen, from being oppreſſed by the puritan parliament, and that it was by their conſent, for they had good warrant in black and white for what they did. They called the Engliſh army, parliament-rogues, and traitors to the queen; and told them at the beginning of the rebellion, that e're long they ſhould ſee England as much in blood as Ireland then was: That they had their party in England and Scotland, which ſhould keep both kingdoms ſo buſy at home, that they ſhould not ſend any aid againſt them, with a multitude of ſuch-like expreſſions from the Iriſh of the beſt quality; as may appear by the examinations of colonel Audley Mervin, William Steuart, eſq; Henry Steuart, gent. herewith printed, and by divers other proofs.

"In the ſame month of October, wherein the rebellion of Ireland broke forth, the lord Dillon of Coſtelough (now in arms againſt the parliament and kingdom of England) went out of Scotland from his majeſty into Ireland, bringing his majeſty's letters, obtained by mediation of the queen, to be preſently ſworn a privy-counſellor of Ireland; who when he had taken the oath of a privy-counſellor, preſents to the lords-juſtices and council, from many of the inhabitants of the county of Longford, a letter in the nature of a remonſtrance, full of unreaſonable demands: as namely, to have freedom of religion, a repeal of all laws made to the contrary, and the like.

"In December after the rebellion, the ſame lord Dillon, together with his brother-in-law, the now lord Taaffe, a notorious papiſt, repaired into England, bringing with them ſeveral papers and inſtructions from many lords and gentlemen of the Pale, all now in rebellion, to negociate for them to his majeſty, and as they ſolicit with his majeſty here on the behalf of the rebels, ſo do they ſolicit the rebls from hence in the name of his majeſty, to perſiſt in their rebellion, as appears by the teſtimony of Mr. Jephſon, a member of the houſe of commons, lately delivered at a conference before both houſes in theſe words, viz.

'At my late being at Oxford, finding my lord Dillon and the lord Taaffe in favour at court, I acquainted the lord Faulkland, his majeſty's ſecretary, that there were two lords about the king, who, to his majeſty's great diſhonour, and the great diſcouragement of his good ſubjects, did make uſe of his majeſty's name to encourage the rebels: to make this appear, I informed, that I had ſeen two letters ſent by the lord Dillon and the lord Taaffe to the lord of Muſkerie, the chief man in rebellion in Munſter, and one of the Iriſh committee ſent into England, intimating, that though he did not ſtand with the conveniency of his majeſty's affairs to give him public countenance, yet that his majeſty was well pleaſed with what he did, and would in time give him thanks for it; (or near to that purpoſe.) That theſe letters were ſeen by the lord Inchiquine, the chief commander of the Engliſh forces in Munſter, and by his ſecretary, who had kept copies of them; and that I was ready to juſtify as much. Whereupon the lord Faulkland was pleaſed to ſay, that they deſerved to be hanged. But though I ſtayed there at Oxford about a week after this diſcovery made, I never was called to any farther account, nor any prejudice done to theſe two lords, but they had the ſame freedom in court as before, for ought I could obſerve or hear to the contrary.'

"That ſince this diſcovery made to the lord Faulkland, the ſame lord Taaffe, one Roche, and William Brent a lawyer, an active papiſts, with letters from his majeſty, went from Oxford to Dublin: and upon Thurſday before Whitſuntide 1643, in the evening, taking with them one colonel Barry, a profeſt papiſt, and pretending for Connaught, ſlipt away to Kilkenny, where the Tueſday following was a general aſſembly of all the chief rebels. When they had done their errand, Barry was left lieger at Kilkenny among the rebels; the lord Taaffe returned to Dublin; and upon Friday the 9th of June 1643, the lord Taaffe, with divers of the privy-council of Ireland, that favoured the rebels, met at the marquis of Ormond's houſe, where the propoſitions which the lord Taaffe brought from the rebels were debated. The lord Taaffe is ſince gone into Connaught, Brent is come back to Oxford to give an account of this employment.

"By this every man may conſtrue, what was meant by his majeſty's not conſenting that the parliament ſhould ſend a committee into Ireland the laſt year, to endeavour the carrying on the war againſt the rebels, upon pretence that the earl of Leiceſter was preſently to go over thither, who is yet remaining remaining at Oxford. That when that committee had prevailed with the lords-juſtices and council, and with many of the prime commanders, and other officers of the army in Leinſter, to ſubſcribe by way of adventure for land in Ireland, to be ſettled by a new bill, very conſiderable ſums which were to be deducted out of their reſpective entertainments; then to render this endeavour fruitleſs, one captain Yarner did confidently affirm, that thoſe which had or ſhould ſubſcribe, were enemies to the king, a thing ſo incredible, that few could believe it, till the ſame man went to Oxford; and upon his return to Dublin, aſſured the lord marquis of Ormond and the officers, that he had diſcourſed with his majeſty about this way of ſubſcription, and that his majeſty did not approve of the ſame: whereupon thoſe who had ſubſcribed did withdraw their hands, and the reſt were wholly diſcouraged.

"That, about this time, a commiſſion was ſent over to meet with the rebels, and to hear what they could ſay, or propound for themſelves: which commiſſion was directed to the lord marquis of Ormond, and to ſome other commiſſioners; among whom Thomas Bourk, that had an hand in contriving this rebellion, was one, and who brought the ſaid commiſſion into Ireland, and confidently delivered the ſame at the council-table, to the amazement of all the council then preſent, that were not acquainted with the plot.

"That the lords and commons, to whoſe direction the war was committed, thought it expedient to ſend into Ireland a committee for that purpoſe, conſiſting of members of the houſe of commons, but authoriſed from both houſes; who carried with them above twenty thouſand pounds in ready money, beſides great ſtore of powder, match, and other ammunition: but when thoſe who favoured the rebels, ſaw, that during the abode of the committee there, parties were continually ſent forth to deſtroy the enemy; and that the committee engaged their own particular credits, to take up monies for the relief and ſetting forth of the army; a letter was ſent from his majeſty, and brought over by the marquis of Ormond's own ſecretary, wherein his majeſty did require, the lords-juſtices and council, not to admit the committee any more at their debates. And it is obſervable, that this letter was only ſigned with his majeſty's hand, without any ſecretary's hand to avow the ſame.

"The commons cannot conceive what is meant, that the juſtices and council are ſtraitly charged in that letter, upon their allegiance, not to ſuffer the committee to ſow ſedition among his majeſty's good ſubjects; unleſs to ſtir up and excite the Engliſh ſoldiers to the pay of the parliament, to proceed vigorouſly againſt the Iriſh rebels, be conſtrued as the ſowing of ſedition among his majeſty's good ſubjects.

"That, according to the teſtimony of ſir William Brereton, knight of the ſhire for the county of Cheſter, there landed, in June 1643, many Iriſh rebels in Werrel in Cheſhire, ſome whereof acknowledged, that they had waſhed their hands in the blood of ſeveral Engliſh and Scotch in Ireland, and now hoped to waſh their hands in the blood of Engliſhmen in England: the country where theſe rebels firſt arrived, did all riſe with their beſt weapons, and apprehended ſeveral of them; but they were reſcued out of their hands by a troop of horſe, which came from the commiſſioners of array, who alſo ſeized about twenty-eight of the honeſt countrymen priſoners.

"And that the councils now predominant at Oxford, and the ſupreme council of rebels at Kilkenny, are concurring and aiding one another, as well by ſea as by land, is apparent by that which follows: the commiſſioners authorized to command the king's forces in the weſt, by an authority derived unto them under the great ſeal of England, do grant commiſſions or letters of mart, for the apprehending and taking, for his majeſty's ſervice, all ſhips and veſſels belonging to the cities and towns that have declared for the parliament; and on the other ſide, the rebels of Ireland grant the like commiſſions. And as the ſhips in his majeſty's ſervice do gratify the rebels of Ireland, in ſeizing the ſhips that bring proviſion for the relief of the Engliſh army in Ireland; ſo the rebels of Ireland do in like manner gratify his majeſty, by commanding the ſhips ſet forth by them to examine all Engliſh ſhips at ſea, whether they be for the king or parliament; and if they be for the king, to let them go; but if for the parliament, to take and pillage them. All which is proved by the depoſitions herewith annexed.

"The earl of Antrim, a notorious rebel, was taken by the Scots army in Ulſter, and impriſoned there, upon ſuſpicion of high-treaſon: to avoid his trial, he broke priſon, and fled into the north parts of England, and hath been with the queen at York a long time; from whence he was ſent to the rebels of Ulſter, with ſecret inſtructions, and had ammunition aſſigned him by the queen's directions: and what care was taken of his ammunition appears by a letter here annexed, dated at York the 8th of May 1643, written by ſerjeant-major Roſſe, at the deſire of Mr. Jermin.

"Since this care taken of the ammunition of the earl of Antrim, the earl of Antrim is taken the ſecond time by general major Monroe, as he was returning from the queen, to the rebels of Ulſter, with divers letters, inſtructions, and papers: and by the confeſſion and depoſition of the earl of Antrim's own ſervant, who was taken with his maſter, and ſince condemned and executed, it is evident, that there was, and doubtleſs yet is, a deſign on foot to reconcile the Engliſh and Iriſh in Ireland; and that by their joint power having expelled the Scots, the Iriſh forces that might be ſent againſt the parliament of England. The earl of Antrim, the lord of Aboyn, and the earl of Niddiſdale, were three principal agents employed in this plot. This clearly appears, in that the lord of Aboyn, in a letter taken in the earl of Antrim's pockets, writes in theſe words:

My Lord,

'BEING certainly informed by Niddiſdale's ſervant, That there is a new order ſince we parted, for ſtopping of the ammunition, I have taken occaſion to intreat your lordſhip by this bearer, that I may know the particulars of it. I muſt confeſs it ſurprizeth me, that any diſtance ſhould alter ſo ſeaſonable a concluſion: and certainly, I ſhall never deſerve to be made the inſtrument of fruſtrating the hopes of thoſe parts, which ſhould have been enabled by this ſupply: I am perſuaded there is ſcarce another mean to make our fidelity uſeleſs for her majeſty's ſervice.'

"And that it might appear to the rebels of Ireland, that the earl of Antrim was accounted his majeſty's good ſubject, and had his majeſty's approbation for what he was to act there, he was furniſhed with a paſs from the earl of Newcaſtle.

[The paſs is here inſerted at length in the declaration. The reſt of the article tends to ſhew by the earl of Antrim's confeſſion, and that of Stuart, one of his ſervants, that the earl was employed by the queen to make peace with the rebels.]

"The houſe of commons, among a numerous company of proofs of this kind, concluded with the teſtimony of John Dod, late miniſter at Anneghliffe in the county of Cavan, who was examined at the bar of the houſe of commons, and teſtifieth,

'That after he had ſuffered many miſeries in this rebellion of Ireland, he repaired into this kingdom, and ſome occaſion carrying him to Oxford, he ſtaid there ſeven weeks, and came out of Oxford the 13th of June 1643. That during his ſtay there, he ſaw a great number of Iriſh rebels, whom he very well knew to have had a hand in the moſt barbarous actions of that rebellion; as the daſhing of ſmall infants in pieces, the ripping up of women with child, and the like, among whom was one Thomas Brady, who, at Turbet in in Ireland, within ſeven miles where the ſaid Dod lived; as thirty-ſix old men, women, and children, not able to flee, were paſſing over a bridge, cauſed them all to be thrown into the water, where they were all drowned; that this Brady is now at Oxford in great favour, and ſerjeant-major to colonel Percy's regiment: that he ſaw there three Franciſcan friers, namely;———and three jeſuits, namely;———who were all very earneſt for the cauſe, and daily encouraging the ſoldiers to fight againſt the round-heads, and for that purpoſe have liſted themſelves in the lord Dillon's troop, and are called cornets: that there are daily and public meetings at maſs, in almoſt every ſtreet there; and verily believes in his conſcience, that for one ſermon preached, that there are four maſſes ſaid now at Oxford: that he ſaw ſir John Dungan there, a man accuſed of high-treaſon in Ireland, for being in rebellion, and fled into England, who hath a commiſſion for a troop of horſe: the lord Barnewall of Trimbleſtown, and his ſon, who hath a commiſſion for a troop of horſe, and is now gone into Wales to raiſe them: a ſon of the lord Newterfield, who hath gotten a commiſſion likewiſe: that, as near as he can poſſibly compute, there was then at Oxford above three thouſand rebels; and that moſt of the king's life-guard are Iriſh."

The two houſes concluded in the following manner: "Upon the whole matter, no man can think, that this rebellion in Ireland, ſo barbarous and bloody, that one hundred and fifty-four thouſand proteſtants, men, women, and children, Engliſh and Scotch, were maſſacred in that kingdom, between the 23d of October, when the rebellion broke forth, and the 1ſt of March following, by the computation of the prieſts themſelves that were preſent, and were directed by ſome chief rebels of Ireland to take this computation, leſt they ſhould be reported to be more bloody than in truth there was cauſe: no man can believe, that this horrid and unparalleled rebellion ſhould be the undertaking of the rebels alone, being ſet on foot when a parliament was ſitting in England, that could not diſſolve without its own conſent, when all nations profeſſing the Romiſh religion, were at peace with England, and ſo engaged at home, that the rebels, in reaſon, could not expect any conſiderable aſſiſtance from them, nor could think themſelves able to encounter England or Scotland either, much leſs both together: ſo that to imagine the nobility, gentry, and in a manner the whole kingdom of Ireland, ſhould thus deſperately engage their lives and eſtates in ſo raſh an enterprize, without being encouraged, incited, nay, commanded from England, with aſſurance both of connivance and aſſiſtance too, were to deny them to be reaſonable creatures.

"And therefore the houſe of commons, abundantly ſatisfied in their own conſciences and judgments of the truth thereof, cannot but declare to the world, that by all theſe concurring circumſtances, and convincing proofs, they are perſuaded, that this unheard of, and monſtrous rebellion of Ireland, was projected, incited, and aſſiſted by thoſe councils now only prevalent with his majeſty: that the queen, with her Romiſh prieſts, the papiſts of all his majeſty's three kingdoms, have been principal actors and ſticklers herein: that, now theſe bloody rebels have in a manner rooted out the proteſtant religion in Ireland, there is a deſign to pardon them, and bring them into England to do the like: that no earthly power is likely, in human reaſon, to withſtand this damnable plot, but the power of the parliament in England, which is now declared by a late proclamation, to be no free parliament, to be null, and of none effect; and all poſſible endeavours uſed, by ſtrength and ſtratagem, to deſtroy the ſame. So that the houſe of commons do conceive it impoſſible, that ſo many of thoſe which would be thought the honeſt and moderate Engliſh proteſtants, ſhould any longer be blinded and led on, to join with German, French, Walloon, Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh papiſts; and thereby to ſurrender up at once the proteſtant religion, the parliament, liberties, and laws of England, into the hands of papiſts and ſtrangers; that ſo this renowned kingdom may be no more a nation."

As the charge againſt the king of exciting the Iriſh rebellion, or at leaſt of conniving at it, made a great noiſe in thoſe days, and as all the hiſtories are full of it, I thought it neceſſary to ſhew the grounds or pretences of it, by giving the ſubſtance of this declaration. For it is not likely, the parliament ſhould have omitted any thing capable of proving their aſſertion, though it be true, that the king afterwards took certain ſteps which could have very much ſwelled this manifeſto. I ſhould be glad, according to my uſual method, to give here the king's particular anſwer to theſe articles. But I have not been able to find any, or ſo much as to know, whether he ever returned an anſwer. Indeed he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to clear himſelf from the accuſation; but it was only by generals and proteſtations, without replying to any particular article, no not even in his Eikon Baſiliké, where he undertakes to vindicate his whole conduct.

I cannot therefore but obſerve, concerning this declaration, that there are ſome articles which ſeem very much aggravated; and others, from whence may be drawn conſequences not ſo odious as thoſe here inſinuated. But then it cannot be denied, that there are ſome, to which it were to be wiſhed, for the king's honour, he had returned diſtinct and particular anſwers.

It appears by this manifeſto, that the parliament had little regard for the king. But beſides the animoſity and revenge, which might enter into the deſign of blackening his reputation, it is certain, policy had no ſmall ſhare in it. The king, in all his public papers, repreſented himſelf as being perfectly innocent of all that was laid to his charge, and as having undertaken the war only in defence of the laws and liberties of the nation. He deſcribed the two houſes as a company of robbers, who for their own private ends, had put the kingdom in a flame, refuſed the obedience due to him, and, without any cauſe, trampled upon all the known laws of the land. The gratifying the paſſion of revenge was not the king's ſole motive; there was another much more dangerous to the parliament; and that was, to draw the people of London to his ſide, by means of theſe papers (which his friends took care to diſperſe in the city) and thereby to force both houſes to conclude ſuch a peace as he deſired, that is, a peace which ſhould reſtore him to all his rights. If therefore the two houſes, out of reſpect to the king, had neglected to defend themſelves, their ſilence might have been very prejudicial to them, ſince people are apt to believe, if an accuſation be not anſwered, it is becauſe there is no good anſwer to be given. It was therefore the parliament's buſineſs to try, as far as poſſible, to inlighten the people, whom the king, as they pretended, had a mind to impoſe upon by general proteſtations, to which they laboured to ſhew his actions did not correſpond. This was the great end of the declaration, wherein they endeavoured to demonſtrate the king's inſincerity, in that, whilſt he called heaven and earth to witneſs, that he had no other intention than to maintain the proteſtant religion, "without conniving at popery," he was labouring to make a peace with the Iriſh rebels; a peace, which in the conjuncture of affairs could not be concluded, but by granting things inconſiſtent with the ſafety of the proteſtant religion.

On the other hand, as the king by his papers and emiſſaries in London, was continually endeavouring to convince the public of the ſincerity of his zeal for religion, for the laws and the liberties of the people, without ever mentioning what paſſed the fifteen firſt years of his reign, the two houſes were concerned to renew the remembrance of thoſe times, leſt the occaſion of their fears and jealouſies ſhould in the end be forgot. And therefore they did two things very proper to produce this effect. The firſt was, to order king James's book for tolerating ſports on Sundays, which Charles I. had cauſed to be publiſhed again in the churches, to be burnt by the common hangman. This book being almoſt forgot, could not produce any great effects at the time I am ſpeaking of. But in all appearance, both houſes meant thereby to inſinuate to the people, what was to be expected from the king's great zeal for religion, in caſe he came to be reſtored to his former power. The ſecond was, to proceed to judgment againſt judge Berkley, whom the lords condemned in the exorbitant fine of twenty thouſand pounds, and to ſtand committed to the Tower till he ſhould be tried upon the other articles alleged againſt him. For this ſentence concerned only that part of his charge relating to his extrajudicial opinions in the caſe of ſhip-money. Berkley was one of the king's moſt zealous inſtruments to eſtabliſh an arbitrary power. Nevertheleſs, he had now lain three years in priſon, without being thought of. But this year the parliament believed it proper to bring him to judgment, as well to revive the memory of a time, the king was endeavouring to bury in oblivion, as to reap the benefit of his fine[q]. This laſt motive makes the lord Clarendon ſay, that the parliament in appropriating the fine to themſelves, which by the laws was due to the king alone, were thought by many to be guilty of a greater crime than that for which Berkley was ſentenced. This ſuppoſes, that even when the king and parliament were making war upon one another, the parliament ſhould do the king juſtice, and ſend him the money ariſing by fines and confiſcations. But the two houſes were ſo far from allowing this maxim, that, on the contrary, the ſame month they paſſed an ordinance for ſeizing the king, queen, and prince's revenues, for the public uſe[r], that is, to be employed in the war againſt the king. Four days after, the king on his part publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding all tenants or debtors to pay any rents or debts to ſuch perſons as were in open rebellion againſt him. But theſe orders, as well from the king as the parliament, were executed only in places where they were ſupported with power.

Moſt of the lords, who had withdrawn from the parliament and retired to the king, meeting with a very cold reception at Oxford, thought fit once more to change ſides, and return to London. The earl of Holland led the way[s]. He was at firſt put under confinement, but ſome days after, had leave to live upon his own eſtate, without any employ. Probably he had expected a better reception, ſince after his return he publiſhed a declaration very injurious to the king, wherein he ſaid, that retiring to Oxford, in hopes by his credit to procure a peace, he had been labouring it to the utmoſt of his power, but (added he) without ſucceſs, the king and his council being entirely averſe to all accommodation, becauſe every thing at court was managed by the papiſts [t]. The earl of Northumberland, who was retired to Petworth, being informed how ill the earl of Holland was received at Oxford, thought proper to return to the parliament, where he was received with reſpect, both houſes being willing to ſuppoſe, he had never intended to leave them, though many ſuſpected he had withdrawn to his own eſtate, on purpoſe to ſee what reception the other lords would meet with at Oxford. The earls of Bedford and Clare took alſo the ſame courſe, and came off with being debarred for a time from ſitting in parliament [u].

[s] The lord Clarendon ſays, he expected to be reſtored to his places of lord-chamberlain and privy-counſellor; of which he had aſſurance, before he came, from the queen; at leaſt, from Mr. Jermyn, who, no doubt exceeded his commiſſion. This diſappointment was the occaſion of his return. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 279.

One of the principal tranſactions of the year 1643, was the reſolution of both houſes to make a new great-ſeal. It had been propoſed by the commons in July: but, whether through ſcruple, as ſome pretended, or becauſe the king's ſecret party were yet very numerous in the houſe of peers, the lords refuſed their conſent, or rather delayed their anſwer. But in the November following, their ſcruples vaniſhed. The commons repreſented to them in a conference, the miſchiefs occaſioned by the conveying away, and through the want, of the great-ſeal [w].

I. It was ſecretly and unlawfully carried away by the lord-keeper, Littleton, who ought not to have departed without leave of both houſes. Nor would have been ſuffered to do ſo, if his intentions had been diſcovered.

II. It hath been ſince taken away from him, and put into the hands of ill-affected perſons, ſo as the lord-keeper being ſent to by the parliament for the ſealing ſome writs, anſwered, "He could not ſeal the ſame, becauſe he had not the ſeal in his keeping."

III. That thoſe who have had the managing thereof, have employed it to the hurt and deſtruction of the kingdom; as by making new ſheriffs, to be as ſo many commanders of forces againſt the parliament; by iſſuing out illegal commiſſions of array; by ſending forth proclamations againſt both houſes of parliament, proclaiming them traitors.

And through the want of the great-ſeal, 1. The terms have been adjourned, the courſe of juſtice obſtructed. 2. No original writs can be ſued for without going to Oxford, which none that holds with the parliament can do, without peril of life or liberty. 3. Proclamations in parliament cannot iſſue out for bringing in delinquents impeached of high-treaſon, or other crimes, under pain of forfeiting their eſtates. 4. No writs of error can be brought in parliament to reverſe erroneous judgments, nor writs of election iſſued out for chuſing new members upon death or removal of any, whereby by the number of members is continually leſſening. 5. Every other court of juſtice has a peculiar ſeal, and the parliament, the ſupreme court, has no other ſeal but the great-ſeal, and ſo now no ſeal at all. 6. The great-ſeal is the Clavis Regni, and therefore ought to be reſident with the parliament (the repreſentative of the whole kingdom) whilſt it continues ſitting; the king, as well as the kingdom, being always legally preſent in it during its ſeſſion.

The next day the lords declared their conſent to the making a new great-ſeal. Accordingly a great-ſeal was made exactly like that in the king's hands [x], and, by an ordinance of both houſes, it was declared, that all letters patent and grants, which had paſſed under the great-ſeal ſince the 22d of May, 1642 [y], were void, and of no effect. That the new great-ſeal ſhould be of like force, power, and validity, as any great-ſeal of England had ever been, and be put into the cuſtody of the perſons hereby ordained commiſſioners for that purpoſe, who ſhould have the ſame power and authority as any lord-chancellor or lord-keeper had uſed to have. On the laſt of November, the new great-ſeal was carried by the ſpeaker of the commons, attended with the whole houſe, to the lords, and delivered to the lord Grey of Werk their ſpeaker, who in the preſence of both houſes gave it to the commiſſioners [z]. The firſt thing ſealed with it, was a patent to the earl of Warwick, or lord high-admiral of England, the earl of Northumberland not being in that favour with both houſes as formerly.

The king and his friends made a great noiſe upon this incroachment of the parliament, and urged the ſtatute of the 25th of Edward III, by which the counterfeiting the great-ſeal, is in expreſs terms declared to be high-treaſon. But it is eaſy to perceive, this ſtatute concerned only private perſons and not both houſes of parliament, and that it was not poſſible, when the ſtatute was made, to foreſee the king and the parliament would be one day divided. Beſides, it cannot be ſaid, that private perſons have any right to diſpoſe of the great-ſeal. But it is not the ſame with both houſes of parliament, who are the repreſentatives of the nation. For the great-ſeal is not the king's ſeal in particular, but the kingdom's, and the kingdom is a body compoſed of the king, who is the head, and the people, who are the members. If the king has the diſpoſal of the great-ſeal, it is only as he is the moſt noble of the members of this body, conſidered as being united with, and not as being ſeparated from, the other members [a]. If therefore ſuch a ſeparation happens, as was at the time I am ſpeaking of, it is hard to conceive, by what title the king or people, ſeparately, may claim the diſpoſal of the great-ſeal, which is the ſeal of their joint, not ſeparate, authority. In ſhort, I doubt, that they who moſt ſtrenuouſly affirm, that in ſuch a ſeparation, the king ought to have the ſole diſpoſal of the great-ſeal, are willing to admit all the conſequences flowing from that principle. The great-ſeal ſtamps an inviolable authority upon all the acts to which it is applied. If therefore, in caſe of an open war between king and parliament, the king could, by means of the great-ſeal, communicate ſuch an authority to all his particular acts, where would be the bounds of his power, which by the conſtitution of the government, is limited by the laws? He would need only to declare by proclamation under the great-ſeal, as Charles had really done, that according to the laws, the members of parliament are traitors and rebels, and then the point would be decided by the ſole poſſeſſion of the great-ſeal, and the king might aſſume an unlimited power by this authority. But how would the caſe be, if the parliament was in poſſeſſion of the great-ſeal, and by the like proclamation ſhould declare the king traitor and rebel; would the application of the ſeal give ſuch an act an inviolable authority?

It will doubtleſs be ſaid, that the great-ſeal gives an inviolable authority to ſuch acts only as are agreeable to the laws, and that the laws expreſly declare thoſe who take up arms againſt the king, guilty of high-treaſon. But it is manifeſt, the laws, as they neither could, nor ought to, foreſee an actual ſeparation between the king and the people repreſented in parliament, have conſidered the king only as the head, inſeparably united with the body, and not as the head divided from the other members. Elſe it might be ſaid, the laws have aſcribed to the king an unlimited power, which is directly contrary to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government. Certainly the laws have conſidered the king but as head of the ſtate, and the crime of taking up arms againſt him relates, not more to his perſon in particular, than to the reſt of the ſtate. The parliament therefore ſeems to have had no leſs right to make a new great-ſeal, than the king would have had, if the common-ſeal had been in the hands of the parliament, ſince the ſeal was not the property of either, but belonged to both, conſidered as being inſeparably united together.

About this time, count Harcourt, a prince of the houſe of Lorrain, was ſent from France into England. He came directly to London, where he was received with great ceremony as embaſſador extraordinary, though he had not preſented his credentials to the parliament. But it was ſup-

[t] Whitelock ſays, the earl of Holland being examined by the parliament, ſaid, that "after he heard of the ceſſation in Ireland, his conſcience would not give him leave to ſtay any longer with him at Oxford." The young earl of Caernarvan came alſo from Oxford to the parliament, and was committed to the care of his grandfather the earl of Pembroke. Whitelock. p. 77.—The lord Clarendon obſerves, upon this occaſion, that the ill reception of theſe lords, made the king, and all about him, looked upon as implacable; and ſo diverted all men from any thoughts of returning to their duty, and chuſe rather to ſtay where they were, than expoſe themſelves by unſeaſonable and unwelcome addreſſes. Tom. II. p. 283.

[u] It was ſaid in drollery, that theſe three earls had much confirmed others to continue with the parliament, for they having tried both parties, found it by experience, that this was the beſt to be in, and adhere to. Whitelock. p. 71.

[w] The author having confounded theſe two reaſons for making a new great-ſeal, they are placed in order in the tranſlation.

[x] There was engraven on one ſide the picture of the houſe of commons, with the members ſitting; and on the other, the arms of England and Ireland. Whitelock, p. 70.

[y] The day the lord-keeper Littleton left the houſe, and went with the ſeal to the king at York.

[z] Two lords and four commoners, who thereupon took the oaths for the due execution of their places; the ſpeaker of the peers ſwearing the lords, and Mr. Brown, the clerk of the lords houſe, the four commoners. The ſeal was ordered to remain at the ſaid Mr. Brown's houſe, in an iron cheſt, with three different locks, and not to be removed thence, but in the preſence of three commiſſioners. The two lords were firſt, the earls of Rutland and Bullingbrook, but the earl of Rutland alleging himſelf not qualified for ſuch a charge, the earl of Kent was nominated in his room. (Whitelock ſays, the lords were Mancheſter and Bullingbrook, p. 71.) The four commoners were, St. John's, Wilde, Brown, and Prideaux, all lawyers. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 342.

poſed, he was not without them, and intended to addreſs himſelf firſt to the king. After ſome days ſtay in London, without any application to both houſes, he went to Oxford, where he had ſeveral conferences with the king. After that, he writ to the earl of Northumberland, that having propoſed to his majeſty from the king of France and the queen-regent, the making of a peace with his ſubjects, he found him wholly inclined to enter into negociation, and that if both houſes would inform him wherein conſiſted the differences between the king and them, he would gladly uſe his intereſt to adjuſt them. Both houſes thought it very ſtrange, that this prince ſhould offer his mediation, without producing his credentials. They told him therefore by the earl of Northumberland, that they received with all due reſpect, the offers of the king and queen-regent of France, and that as ſoon as he ſhould ſhew, he was authorized of ſuch a mediation, they would not fail to appoint a committee to treat with him. But he had no credentials for the two houſes, the queen-regent not judging proper to own them for a parliament, ſince the king of England refuſed them that title. So, this pretended mediation was not only fruitleſs, but was alſo a clear indication, that the French court had ſent this embaſſy only as an outward teſtimony of their concerning themſelves in the king's affairs, though in all appearance, they did not much deſire to ſee an end put to the troubles of the kingdom [b].

Sir Edward Deering, who had made himſelf ſo famous in the beginning of this parliament, by his zeal for his country, and by ſeveral noble ſpeeches upon grievances, was grown extremely verſe to the proceedings of both houſes, ſince he found, the aim of ſome of the leading-men was to eſtabliſh preſbyterianiſm in the church of England. For that cauſe, after the war was begun, he forſook the parliament, and turned to the king. But, in all appearance, he was no better pleaſed with the court than he had been with the parliament, ſince he followed at laſt the example of the lords above-mentioned. He came to London in February 1643-4, and preſenting a petition to the houſe of commons, whereof he was member, he obtained leave to ſpend the reſidue of his days at his houſe near Canterbury, where he died within a few months [c].

Mr. Pym, one of the pillars of the parliament, and a chief director of the affairs of the houſe, died December the 18th, 1643. The king's adherents ſpeak of him as of a very wicked man, and thoſe on the ſide of the parliament repreſent him as the greateſt patriot than in England. Opinions ſo oppoſite about the ſame perſon are not uncommon. It is not ſtrange, that from oppoſite principles ſhould be drawn contrary conſequences. Thus much is certain, Mr. Pym's death was a very great loſs to the parliament, he being one of the moſt able members of the houſe [d].

The commons, as was ſaid, impriſoned in May this year, 1643, a perſon ſent by the king with the offer of peace, and ſhortly after he was diſcovered to be one of thoſe employed by the king to keep a correſpondence in London. The king could not be ignorant, the commons had twice declared, they would treat as ſpies ſuch as ſhould come from the king's quarters to London, without a ſafe-conduct. Beſides that he had good correſpondents in London and the parliament, he had no occaſion to be informed of the particular reſolutions, to know it is not allowable for men, without a ſafe-conduct, to come into the enemy's quarters ſince it is a maxim received, wherever a war is declared. But there was ſomething in the preſent caſe ſtill more particular. For, upon the houſe arreſting this meſſenger, his majeſty, by advice of his council, had deemed it inconſiſtent with his honour to hold any farther correſpondence with the parliament. Moreover, the 18th of October, both houſes had publiſhed an ordinance, declaring, any perſon coming to London from the king's quarters ſhould be looked upon as a ſpy. And yet twelve days after, on the 30th of October, the king ſent privately to London, Daniel Kniveton, a ſtate meſſenger, with three proclamations, one againſt "Taking of a ſolemn league and covenant;" another, againſt "the obſervation of the monthly faſt," enjoined by the parliament; a third for "removing the ſeals of the green-wax offices belonging to the Exchequer, King's-bench, and Common-pleas, to Oxford." This man was taken up, and committed to priſon. Nevertheleſs, the 19th of November following, Carpenter, another meſſenger, was privately ſent by the king, with an order to the judges to adjourn the term to Oxford [e]. Carpenter was alſo apprehended, and they were both tried and condemned to die. Kniveton was the leſs excuſable, as he had before been taken and detained at Windſor for the ſame reaſon, and diſcharged by the general. All the defence he made was, that being the king's ſworn meſſenger, he was obliged to obey him; that beſides, not taking London for a garriſon, he thought he might have come without drum, trumpet or paſs. But this defence not being capable of ſaving his life, he was executed. Carpenter, though under the ſame condemnation, was reprieved and committed to Bridewell [f]. The lord Clarendon ſpeaks of the ſentence paſſed upon theſe men as of a great injuſtice, for two reaſons; that they were obliged to obey the king, being his meſſengers; and that the parliament had not cauſed their ordinance to be notified to the king. I doubt, all will not be induced by theſe reaſons to condemn the proceedings of both houſes. The king at leaſt ſeems not to have blamed them, ſince he did not uſe repriſals, neither does it appear that he ever complained of it in form.

In proportion as the war was continued, the animoſity between the king and the parliament was inflamed, who no longer regarded each other. The king refuſed to own the two houſes for parliament, and they omitted nothing, as appears in their declaration concerning the Iriſh rebellion, to blacken the king's reputation. Theſe proceedings were not confined to England, where they might be in ſome meaſure neceſſary, becauſe the point was to gain the people, but care was taken alſo to convey papers abroad, tending to vindicate one of the parties, and blacken the other. Both houſes being informed, or it may be ſuppoſing, that the king had emiſſaries abroad, who were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to repreſent the civil wars in England as a horrible rebellion againſt the ſovereign, ordered the aſſembly of divines then ſitting at Weſtminſter [g], to write letters to the churches of Zealand, Holland, France, and Switzerland, to warn them againſt the artifices of the king's agents, by giving them a clear relation of the affairs of England. They charged them to inſiſt chiefly upon the king's employing Iriſh rebels, and other papiſt, to be governors, commanders, and ſoldiers; to lay before them the proofs of the intention of the king's counſellors to introduce popery, and hinder the reformation deſigned by the parliament: laſtly, to inform them of the diſadvantageous opinion of the king's party concerning the proteſtant churches abroad, becauſe not governed by biſhops. The aſſembly failed not to ſend to theſe churches a circular letter, which was properly a manifeſto for the parliament againſt the king, with copies of the ſolemn league and covenant, and of the declaration of England and Scotland on that ſubject.

Some time after, the king, on his part publiſhed a manifeſto, addreſſed to all the proteſtant churches, to efface the [b] Whilſt count Harcourt was in England, he had two affronts put upon him. 1. He had not been landed four and twenty hours, before Walter Montague, one of his train, was apprehended and committed to the Tower. This man was an agent of the king's in the court of France, and thought, by diſguiſing himſelf, to get a ſafe paſſage to Oxford, in the embaſſador's retinue. 2. As count Harcourt was going from London to Oxford, his coach was ſearched for letters, though he had a ſafe-conduct. For both which indignities he could get no redreſs. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 307, 308.

[c] He died June 23, 1644. Beſides his former papers, he left behind him a learned diſcourſe (publiſhed about a week before his death) concerning the Proper Sacrifice, wherein he ſolidly and eloquently confutes popiſh tranſubſtantiation. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 384.

[d] The lord Clarendon will have it, that he died of the 'morbus pediculoſus,' or 'lowſy diſtemper. Tom. II. p. 353. And the ſame is affirmed in Mercurius Ruſticus. Whereas, Ruſhworth ſays, there was ſuch a report, but the ſame was not true; and for public ſatisfaction, his body was viewed by many hundreds of people; the true natural cauſe of his death ſeeming to be the great pains he took, joined with a competent old age, and at laſt, but an ill-ſeated conſtitution. Whitelock ſays the ſame thing, but makes him die in May, p. 69. Some time before his death, he cauſed to be printed a vindication of himſelf, which the reader may ſee in Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 256. He is ſaid to be the beſt verſed in parliamentary affairs of any man then in England. See Lud. tom. I. p. 80.

[e] The king had publiſhed ſeveral proclamations for the adjournment of the term to Oxford, which had been fruitleſs, for want of neceſſary legal form of having the writs read in court. So Carpenter was to deliver theſe writs of adjournment into the hands of either of the ſworn judges then remaining at Weſtminſter, who were Bacon in the King's-bench, Reeve in the Common-pleas, and Trevor in the Exchequer. Accordingly, he delivered the writs to Reeve and Trevor, who immediately cauſed him to be apprehended. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 313.

[f] From whence he eſcaped ſome time after, and returned to Oxford. Idem, p. 314.

[g] Divers members of both houſes, to a great number, ſat in this aſſembly and had the ſame liberty with the hundred and twenty divines, to debate and give their votes in any matter. Selden, who was a member, ſpoke admirably (ſays Whitelock, who was alſo a member, p. 71.) in theſe debates and ſometimes, when the divines had cited a text to prove their aſſertion, he would tell them, "Perhaps in your little pocket bibles with gilt leaves (which they would often pull out and read) the tranſlation may be thus, but the Greek and Hebrew ſignifies thus and thus," and ſo confuting them in their own learning. Not but there were many famous divines among them, as Twiſſe their Prolocutor, Edward Reynolds, afterwards biſhop of Norwich, Arrowſmith, Lightfoot, Gataker, &c. Their firſt meeting, purſuant to the ordinance of both houſes, was the 1ſt of July 1643, in Henry VII's chapel. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 339.

The

impreſſions which the parliament's circular letter might have cauſed. This manifeſto, which was very ſhort, contained only a proteſtation that he had never intended to conſent to the public exerciſe of the catholic religion in his dominions, but was firmly reſolved to adhere, to his laſt breath, to the church of England, wherein he was born, baptized, and educated; and to the liturgy of that church, approved by ſo many convocations and parliaments, by all the proteſtant churches, and the ſynod of Dort.

Mean while, the king was very much perplexed how to maintain the war the enſuing campaign, knowing the parliament were preparing to exert themſelves powerfully. He had been openly charged, before this parliament, with arbitrarily exacting money of his ſubjects, without conſent of parliament. He had himſelf owned, he had exceeded his power, ſince he had not only redreſſed that grievance, but alſo proteſted ſeveral times, he had redreſſed it freely and willingly. Since the war was begun he had never ceaſed to accuſe both houſes of the ſame arbitrary actions, which he himſelf had been ſo often upbraided with, in that they impoſed taxes upon the ſubjects without their conſent, directly contrary to the known laws whereon he perpetually inſiſted. By demonſtrating that both houſes violated the laws, he pretended to gain the people to his ſide. Mean while money was neceſſarily to be raiſed, not only to maintain the forces already on foot, but alſo to levy others, in order to reſiſt the Scots, who were upon the point of entering England. If, for the maintenance of theſe forces, he had impoſed taxes by his ſole authority, he could not have reproached both houſes for the ſame thing, and perhaps would have diſobliged his own party by acting againſt the laws. Money, however, was to be found at any rate, otherwiſe he would not be able to continue the war. Hitherto he had uſed ſeveral ways to raiſe money without giving any advantage againſt him, whether by ſelling or mortgaging the crown-lands, or by the voluntary contributions of his well-wiſhers. But the means he had already uſed were too uncertain to be ſafely relied on. He thought therefore, and found an expedient to free himſelf from this ſtrait. He aſſembled at Oxford all the members that according to him, had been driven from the parliament; preceding, theſe members were the true parliament, and the more, as he had publicly declared, he no longer looked upon both houſes at Weſtminſter as ſuch. He did not expect this new parliament would increaſe the number of his friends; but he could reaſonably hope it would grant him an aid of money, and that being anthoriſed by ſuch an act, he might openly and by way of authority levy what money was neceſſary. This happened accordingly, and was properly the king's aim in calling this parliament, which met at Oxford the 22d of January 1643-4[h].

As it was not proper the king ſhould immediately diſcover his ſole end in calling this extraordinary parliament, he only told them in the firſt ſpeech, that he had aſſembled them to receive their advice, and conſult with them how to appeaſe the troubles of the kingdom.

The firſt ſtep taken by this parliament, was to try to convince the public of their intention to labour for peace. I have already explained the conſtant ambiguity of the word peace, and the different ſenſes given it by the two parties, and therefore think it needleſs to repeat it. There is no queſtion, the king heartily wiſhed for a peace, but it was on condition it ſhould be made after his manner, and in his ſenſe of the word, elſe he was very averſe to it. To be convinced of what I advance, a man needs only conſider what the lord Clarendon ſays, ſpeaking of the motion made in the council to ſummon the Oxford parliament, which the king ſcrupled a little. "The king was at firſt in ſome apprehenſion, ſays that illuſtrious hiſtorian, that ſuch a conflux of perſons together of the parliament, who would look to enjoy the privileges of it in their debates, might, inſtead of doing him ſervice, do many things contrary to it, and exceedingly apprehended, that they would immediately enter upon ſome treaty of peace, which would have no effect; yet whilſt it was in ſuſpenſe, would hinder his preparation for war, and though no body more deſired peace, yet he had no mind that a multitude ſhould be conſulted upon the conditions of it: imagining, that things of the greateſt importance, as the giving up perſons, and other particulars of honour, would not ſeem to them of moment enough to continue a war in the kingdom." Hence appears what ſort of peace was deſired by the king. It was not ſuch a peace as the Oxford parliament might think reaſonable, but a peace whereby he ſhould not be obliged to make any conceſſions.

But his council quickly freed him from theſe apprehenſions, by the ſame method uſed on the like occaſion in the beginning of the war. It was intimated to him, that there was no probability, the two houſes at Weſtminſter would ever treat with the members that ſhould meet at Oxford, becauſe they would not look upon them under any notion, but as private perſons and deſerters of the parliament. Whereupon the king's ſcruples vaniſhed. As the Oxford parliament was intirely directed by the king, and as his majeſty agreed to the propoſing a peace to thoſe at Weſtminſter, it may eaſily be gueſſed, that in ſo doing, his intention was not to conclude it, unleſs both houſes at Weſtminſter would have ſubmitted to his terms. But the two houſes at Oxford had another view in this proceeding, namely, to lay a ſnare for the parliament at Weſtminſter, and ingage them, if poſſible, to treat with them, which would have been owning them for a parliament. However, they expected to reap ſome advantage from their refuſal.

To this end, a letter was ſent to the earl of Eſſex, ſigned by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, forty-three lords, and a hundred and eighteen members of the houſe of commons. In this letter it was ſaid, "That his majeſty having ſummoned them to attend him at Oxford, they were aſſembled in obedience to his commands: that his majeſty was pleaſed to invite them in the proclamation of ſummons, by graciouſly ſaying, 'His ſubjects ſhould ſee how willing he was, as far as in him lay, to reſtore the peace of the kingdom:' that this invitation had not only been made good to them, but ſeconded by ſuch unqueſtionable demonſtrations of his majeſty's deep ſenſe of the miſeries and calamities of his poor ſubjects in this unnatural war, and of his moſt entire and paſſionate affections to redeem them from that ſad and deplorable condition, by all ways poſſible conſiſtent with his honour, or the future ſafety of the kingdom: 'That as it were impiety to queſtion the ſincerity of them, ſo it were great want of duty and faithfulneſs in us, (his majeſty having vouchſafed to declare that he did call us, to be witneſſes of his actions and privy to his intentions) ſhould we not ſatisfy and witneſs to all the world the aſſurance we have of the piety and ſincerity of both.' Adding—That being ſatisfied of this truth, they had yet hopes to be the happy inſtruments of their country's redemption from the miſeries of war, and reſtitution to the bleſſings of peace; and were deſirous to believe, that his lordſhip, howſoever engaged, would co-operate with them in the bleſſed work, by truly repreſenting to, and induſtriouſly promoting with, 'thoſe by whom he was truſted[i],' their moſt earneſt deſire, that ſome perſons be appointed on either part, to treat of ſuch a peace as may yet redeem their country from the brink of deſtruction."

The earl of Eſſex returned this ſhort anſwer, "That the letter he had received, not being addreſſed to the two houſes of parliament, nor any acknowledgement of them being therein, he could not communicate it to them: that the maintenance of the parliament of England, and the privileges thereof, was that for which himſelf and his whole party were reſolved to ſpend their blood, as being the foundation whereon all the laws and liberties of the nation were built[k]."

Though the earl of Eſſex ſaid, he could not communicate the letter to the parliament, it was known however that his anſwer had been concerted with a committee of both houſes, called the committee of ſtate. Wherefore the king, knowing the intention of both houſes, believed he ſhould run no great hazard by ſending them a meſſage in a letter to the earl of Eſſex, directed to 'the lords and commons of parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter.' This meſſage contained the uſual offers to treat of a peace, and appoint commiſſioners, if they would do the like on their part. The king added, he took this ſtep by the advice of 'the lords and commons of parliament aſſembled at Oxford.' Both houſes eaſily perceived the king was laying a ſnare for them, by putting them under a neceſſity, either of accepting his offer, in which caſe they ſhould indirectly own the lords and commons aſſembled at Oxford for a parliament, or of rejecting it, and ſo furniſhing them with a reaſon to upbraid them for refuſing to labour for a peace. But they little regarded this artifice, and for anſwer declared, they would never own the members who had deſerted both houſes for a parliament. "And hereupon, added they, we think ourſelves bound to let your majeſty know, that ſeeing the countenance of this parliament is ſettled by a law, (which, as other laws of your kingdoms, your majeſty hath ſworn to maintain, as we are ſworn to our allegiance to your majeſty, theſe obligations being reciprocal) we muſt in duty, and accordingly are reſolved, with our lives and fortunes, to defend and preſerve the juſt rights and full power of this parliament; and do beſeech your majeſty to be aſſured, that your majeſty's royal and hearty concurrence with us herein, will be the moſt effectual and ready means of procuring a firm and laſting peace in all your majeſty's dominions, and of begetting a perfect underſtanding between your majeſty and your people, without which your majeſty's moſt earneſt profeſſions, and our moſt real intentions concerning the ſame muſt neceſſarily be fruſtrated."

I have before ſhewn, with what thoughts the king propoſed a peace to both houſes at Weſtminſter, namely, that this general offer would not be accepted as was eaſy to foreſee. Upon this refuſal it was to both houſes at Oxford exulted as if the bare propoſal of a peace had been a clear and evident demonſtration of their ſincere deſire to make a reaſonable peace. They publiſhed upon this occaſion a long declaration, ſo like thoſe publiſhed by the king on the ſame occaſion, that it was not difficult to perceive it flowed from the ſame fountain. They publiſhed alſo, ſome time after, another pretending to ſhew, that the members aſſembled at Oxford had been forced from the parliament by the threats and outrages of the leading men. In this declaration were repeated all the outrages and artifices uſed by the chief of the party, to intimidate ſuch as would not conform to their ſentiments, and this it was pretended, was the ſole reaſon of their being obliged to retire. This was really the king's ſcheme, but it may be ſaid to be ill grounded. For the members who had deſerted the parliament, had not, for the moſt part, abſented themſelves, till long after theſe pretended outrages, ſome by the king's own expreſs order, others for fear of being puniſhed for endeavouring to raiſe commotions againſt the parliament. But care was taken not to mention this in the declaration. After all, ſuppoſing ſome had withdrawn themſelves purely out of fear, it is certain their number came far ſhort of thoſe who retired with the ſole view of ſerving the king. However, they were all confounded in the ſame claſs, as having been expreſly driven from the parliament.

Some time after, both houſes at Weſtminſter publiſhed alſo a manifeſto, wherein they pretended to ſhew, that under the ſpecious colour of propoſing peace, a ſnare was laid to engage them tacitely to own that they were not the parliament, but that the true parliament was aſſembled at Oxford. They drew their proofs from ſeveral letters written from Oxford to the earl of Eſſex, from the expreſſions in the king's late meſſage, but eſpecially from an intercepted letter from the lord Digby, where he ſaid: "A point which his majeſty may not ſuffer them to gain, without ſubverting the grounds and maxims of all his late proceedings againſt them, and that which he now goes upon by the advice of all his nobility here, as you will perceive by this incloſed proclamation[l], upon the effects whereof all the eyes of the kingdom are fixed. God ſend them to be as good actuated, as they are in ſpeculation, for I am confident, that in reaſon it carries probability of the ſureſt and readieſt way to a re-eſtabliſhment of his majeſty in his juſt rights and powers of any courſe that hath been yet attempted."

The day before the two houſes at Oxford writ to the earl of Eſſex, to propoſe a peace, they voted, That the Scots having entered the kingdom in an hoſtile manner, had thereby denounced war againſt England, and that all the Engliſh who ſhould aſſiſt them, ſhould be deemed as traitors and enemies to the ſtate.

March the 12th, the ſame houſes at Oxford voted, "That the lords and commons now remaining at Weſtminſter, are guilty of high-treaſon, for raiſing of forces under the command of the earl of Eſſex, for conſenting, and being aſſiſting to the preſent coming in of the Scots into England, and for counterfeiting the great-ſeal." But as votes did no hurt to the parliament at Weſtminſter, ſo neither were they of much advantage to the king. He found a more real benefit from them, with regard to the affair for which the Oxford parliament was ſummoned, I mean, the aid of money he expected for the ſupport of the war.

This parliament was however greatly embarraſſed, how to give the king an effectual aſſiſtance, for that was the principal affair. If, as the only and true parliament, they had laid a general tax, the king would have run the hazard of meeting great oppoſition in levying the money, all the inhabitants of the counties on his ſide, not being ſatisfied that ſuch a parliament had a lawful authority. In that caſe, he would have been obliged to uſe force to compel thoſe that ſhould refuſe to pay, which did not ſuit with his preſent circumſtances. Another method was therefore taken, which doubtleſs was ſuggeſted by the court. This was, to adviſe the king to borrow one hundred thouſand pounds of the richeſt men of his party. To that purpoſe, the commons went into their reſpective counties, to take the number of thoſe who were reckoned monied men, and make a liſt, wherein were ſet down the quality and ability of each. The commons being returned to Oxford with the liſts, the taxes were proportioned; after which, the king writ circular letters to every particular perſon, to borrow of one, a hundred pounds, of another, two hundred, promiſing to repay the ſame as ſoon as he was able, and not forgetting to ſay in theſe letters that this loan was by advice of his parliament[m]. Thus, though this parliament did not think themſelves ſufficiently authorized to impoſe a general tax, the particular perſons who are rated, were no leſs obliged to furniſh what was laid on them, ſince theſe loans were made with the advice of both houſes. The king would have found leſs advantage in a general tax, for it was much eaſier to raiſe a hundred thouſand pounds upon particular rich men, than upon the whole nation. Now the point was to procure the king, certainly and ſpeedily the money he wanted. Accordingly it was ſeen ſhortly after, that this was the ſole motive of chuſing that method; for the Oxford parliament hearing that both houſes at Weſtminſter had laid a duty upon wine, beer, ale, and other commodities, which they called an Exciſe, a word before unheard of in England[n], made no ſcruple to join the like in the counties where the king's authority was acknowledged.

From that time, nothing remarkable paſſed in this parliament, which ſitting till the 16th of April, was prorogued to October, and never met again. It ſerved only to procure the king money, for which it was ſolely deſigned, and to exhibit a ſpectacle never before ſeen in England, namely, two parliaments at once, holding their ſeſſions at the ſame time.

Three days before the opening of this parliament, the Scotiſh army entered England, notwithſtanding the ſeaſon, which it ſeemed ſhould have hindered their march[o]. The marquis of Newcaſtle who commanded in the north for the king, hearing that the bad weather prevented not this army's advancing towards the borders, began to march alſo with his troops, and came to Newcaſtle the 2d of February[p]. The Scotch army approaching the town, the general ordered it to be ſummoned; but the ſummons had no effect. He ſtayed in thoſe parts all the reſt of February, waiting for his artillery, which was coming by ſea. The 28th of the ſame month he paſſed the Tyne at ſome diſtance from Newcaſtle[q], having left on the north ſide of the town, ſix regiments of foot and ſome horſe, to keep the garriſon in awe. The marquis being too weak to venture a battle, contented himſelf with haraſſing the Scots by frequent ſkir-

That the reader may have a notion of it, it will be proper to mention ſome of the particulars. Every pound of tobacco, not of the Engliſh plantation, was to pay, over and above all cuſtoms, 4s. and that of Engliſh plantation 2s. Every tun of wine retailed, 6l. and for private uſe 3l. Malaga raiſins, one farthing per pound. Currants, 1d. Loaf-ſugar, 4d. per pound. Cloth of gold and ſilver 8s. and tiſſue 10s. a yard. Damaſk table-linen, 1s. a yard, &c. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that Ruſhworth has not inſerted this curious ordinance in his collections.

miſhes in order to retard their march; but at laſt he thought proper to retire to Durham, where the Scotch general followed him, though with great inconveniency, as he wanted forage for his horſe.

When the marquis of Newcaſtle marched out of York to oppoſe the Scots, he left the command of the city with a good body of troops to colonel John Ballaſis [r]. As ſoon as the lord Fairfax was informed, that the marquis had taken the northern rout, he reſolved to march towards York, and to that end, ordered his ſon ſir Thomas Fairfax to meet him at a certain place, with the party he commanded, that they might act in conjunction. But Ballaſis having notice of this deſign, departed from York with moſt of the garriſon to hinder their junction, and poſted himſelf at Selby. A few days after, the lord Fairfax having taken a great circuit, to deceive the vigilance of the enemy, and joining his ſon, ſuddenly attacked Selby with about four thouſand men, where Bellaſis lay with fifteen hundred horſe and eighteen hundred foot, forced the town, took the colonel priſoner, with ſixteen hundred of his men, and killed a great number.

The marquis of Newcaſtle heard this ſad news at Durham, the Scots being then within two miles of the place. He immediately feared, that the lord Fairfax, after his victory, would attack York, or at leaſt, march directly towards Durham, to put him between the two armies. For this reaſon, he ſuddenly reſolved to retire to York, as well to ſecure himſelf as that city, which otherwiſe would have been in great danger.

[1644] It ſoon appeared that the marquis had taken this reſolution very ſeaſonably, for, the 20th of April, that is, nine days after the Selby-fight [s], the lord Fairfax joined the Scots at Tadcaſter, whence the two generals reſolved to go and beſiege York. But as that city was too large to be inveſted on all ſides by the two armies, particularly towards the river, over which the marquis had made a bridge of boats [t], they deſired the earl of Mancheſter, general of the forces of the eaſtern aſſociated counties, to advance to this ſiege. Till the arrival of the earl of Mancheſter, the two generals held the city blocked up to the ſouthward of the river Ouſe. I ſhall interrupt for a moment, the account of the ſiege of York, to ſpeak of the ill ſucceſs of the parliament's arms at Newark.

Whilſt the marquis of Newcaſtle was in the north obſerving the Scotch army, the lord Willoughby of Parham, and ſir John Meldrum, with above five thouſand men of the parliament's forces, beſieged Newark, a conſiderable town in Nottinghamſhire, where the king had placed a garriſon. As ſoon as the king knew it, he ſent orders to prince Rupert to endeavour to relieve the place. The prince being then at Cheſter, put himſelf immediately upon the march, and being joined by other troops, made a body of ſeven thouſand men, with which he advanced towards Newark. Meldrum, who commanded alone at the ſiege, the lord Willoughby being gone elſewhere, reſolved to fight the prince, and to that purpoſe drew up his forces at a little diſtance from the town. The 21ſt of March there was a ſharp conflict, particularly at a bridge, by which Meldrum had reſolved to retreat in caſe of need. The bridge was vigorouſly attacked, and as bravely defended. Mean while, after the fight was over, Meldrum finding himſelf too weak to renew it the next day, reſolved to retreat over the bridge in the night. But he found the guard he had left there had deſerted, and the bridge in the poſſeſſion of the enemies [u]. So, not being able to retreat, and perceiving himſelf ſurrounded with the king's forces, Meldrum ſent a trumpet to the prince for a parley. It was agreed, that the foot ſhould march away with their ſwords, colours, and drums; all the officers with their arms, horſes, and baggage; and the troopers and dragoons, with their ſwords, horſes, and colours. But he was forced to deliver all his ordnance and ammunition with about three thouſand muſkets.

The prince, after this expedition, which gained him great honour, returned into Shropſhire, and from thence into Lancaſhire, to relieve the counteſs of Derby, who for the ſpace of eighteen weeks was beſieged in Latham-houſe, and made a gallant defence againſt a body of two thouſand men [w]. In his way to Latham, the prince took by ſtorm Stopworth, a ſmall town in Cheſhire. Whilſt he was advancing towards Latham, the beſiegers raiſed the ſiege, and part of them under the command of colonel Rigby, went and reinforced the garriſon of Bolton in Lancaſhire, which was in great danger. The prince purſued them, and without giving them time to come to themſelves, took the town by ſtorm [x].

After that, he attacked Liverpool, a ſea-port town on the edge of Cheſhire, where thoſe who paſs into Ireland generally embark. The governor, colonel More, after ſome reſiſtance, conveyed on board the ſhips in the Pool moſt part of his ſoldiers [y], and the richeſt goods in the town, and then the prince entered with little oppoſition. Here he received a letter from the king, ordering him to march with all ſpeed to the relief of York, which was now beſieged. The king ſaid to him in his letter, "That his affairs were in ſo very ill a ſtate, that it would not be enough, though his highneſs raiſed the ſiege of York, if he had not likewiſe beaten the Scotch army;" which words induced the prince to fight a battle that proved very fatal to the king.

I left York blocked up by the Engliſh and Scotch armies, commanded by the lord Fairfax and the earl of Leven, till the earl of Mancheſter ſhould join them. The earl of Mancheſter was general of the ſeven eaſtern aſſociated counties, who had raiſed an army of fourteen thouſand horſe, foot, and dragoons. With this army the earl of Mancheſter had already done the parliament great ſervice. In the laſt campaign he had taken the town of Lynn, and in the beginning of this, had poſſeſſed himſelf of Lincoln. As ſeveral of the leading members of parliament thought of putting him in the earl of Eſſex's place, occaſion was taken from the ſervices he had performed, to make a conſtant proviſion for his army. To that end, by an ordinance of both houſes, May the 15th, 1644, each of the ſeven aſſociated counties were charged and rated at a weekly ſum for the maintenance of his army [z]; after which, he received orders to join the two other armies, to beſiege York together. The parliament had alſo taken care for the ſubſiſtence of the earl of Eſſex's [a], and ſir William Waller's armies; ſo that in May they had five armies on foot, beſides the troops diſperſed in ſeveral counties, and in garriſon.

Before the marquis of Newcaſtle was blocked up in York, he had ſent general Goring with four thouſand horſe, to ravage the parts in ſubjection to the parliament. Wherefore, the earl of Mancheſter detached likewiſe three thouſand horſe, which were joined by two thouſand, ſent from the Scots before York, to wait the motions of Goring. The earl of Mancheſter therefore joined the two armies only with his foot, and ſome few horſe [b], and preſently after the junction, the ſiege of York was begun. The marquis of Newcaſtle had ſent the king word, that he hoped to hold out ſix weeks or two months, and beſought him to think in the mean time how to relieve him. To retard, as much as poſſible, the progreſs of the ſiege, he made overtures for a treaty, but on ſuch conditions as he knew would not be granted. Nevertheleſs he gained ſeven or eight days by this artifice, ſo that the ceſſation he had obtained, did not expire till the 15th of June. On the 24th he ſallied out, and furiouſly attacked the earl of Mancheſter, but, after a ſharp conflict, was repulſed with loſs.

On Sunday the 30th of June the beſiegers had certain notice, that prince Rupert was advancing at the head of an army, of near twenty thouſand men, which had greatly increaſed in their march, as well by the troops drawn from ſeveral garriſons, as by Goring's horſe, who had joined them, ſo that the army was not inferior to the three armies employed in the ſiege. The three generals, after a ſhort conſultation, thought it adviſeable to raiſe the ſiege, and join their armies, whether, as ſome affirm, with deſign to give battle, or to avoid it, as others pretend. Be this as it will, they poſted themſelves on Marſton-moor, about five miles from York. But though indeed prince Rupert muſt have paſſed that way to come at them with his army, they left however two ſides of York open, that proviſions and ammunition, and even troops, by ſmall parties, might be conveyed in. If the prince's deſign had been only to relieve York, he had already effected it, and had only to remain in his poſt, and keep the enemies at a bay, till all neceſſaries had been ſent into the city [c]. But that ſame day, coming to York with a guard of two hundred horſe, he conferred with the marquis of Newcaſtle, or rather ſignified to him, that he intended to fight, according to his majeſty's expreſs orders. As the prince was extremely haughty, he made not the leaſt compliment to the marquis, upon the authority he aſſumed in reſolving to give battle, contrary to the marquis's opinion, who maintained, it was by no means requiſite in the preſent juncture, and the rather, as he expected five thouſand men, who were coming from the north to his aſſiſtance. Moreover, the prince made no ſcruple to command, without ſaying any thing to the marquis, the forces in York to be ready to join him the next morning in order to engage. And yet, theſe forces had been levied by the marquis, and commanded by him with great reputation. Beſides, the marquis's birth and merit ſeemed to require a greater regard from the prince. Perhaps it never came into the marquis's thoughts to deſire a fight of the king's expreſs order, or elſe he believed it to be an affront to the prince, to ſhew the leaſt doubt of ſuch an order. However this be, he told him, he was ready to obey his highneſs in all things, who might diſpoſe of his troops as he pleaſed, and for his own part, he would be contented to charge in the battle as volunteer. His diſſatisfaction was farther increaſed, when having aſked the prince, what ſervice he would be pleaſed to command him, the prince anſwered him, he would begin no action upon the enemy till early the next morning, and deſired him to repoſe himſelf till then. Thus the prince had the ſole management of the intended battle, without conſulting the marquis any more. Though he had ordered his forces in York to come and join his army, it does not appear that he had aſſigned any command or poſt to the marquis of Newcaſtle, perhaps, becauſe he ſaid, he would be in the battle as a volunteer. It cannot be denied, this behaviour was very ſevere to a lord, who had always ſhewn for the king a zeal and affection not to be ſurpaſſed, nor perhaps equalled.

This bridge prince Rupert endeavoured to recover, but was repulſed. The other was Muſcome-bridge, over which he deſigned to retreat, but the guard deſerting broke it down. Idem, p. 307.

In the night, the three parliament generals having conſidered that the place was relieved, and thinking prince Rupert had no farther deſign than to lay in proviſions, reſolved to march to Tadcaſter, Cawood, and Selby, as well to preſerve the Eaſt-riding, as to hinder the furniſhing of York with proviſions from thence. Accordingly they began their march early in the morning, the Scots leading the van. But about nine o'clock they had intelligence, that the prince was approaching with his army, and indeed he was advanced with five thouſand horſe, near their rear. Whereupon they were obliged to draw up ſpeedily, and call back their van, which made all poſſible haſte to rejoin them. Fortunately for them, the foot which the prince had drawn out of York, could not come up with his army till noon, and this gave the Scots time to rejoin the reſt of their army, which they had left in the morning. The armies were both drawn up about two in the afternoon: but there was between them a deep and large ditch, which neither cared to paſs, for fear of giving the enemy too great an advantage. For this reaſon, they ſtood looking upon one another above two hours, each expecting the other to begin the charge.

Prince Rupert himſelf headed the left wing [d], conſiſting of five thouſand horſe. The right wing was commanded by ſir Charles Lucas, with colonel Hurry, and the main body by general Goring. It does not appear, that the marquis of Newcaſtle had any command in the action. The parliament's right wing, oppoſite to prince Rupert, was led by ſir Thomas Fairfax, the left by the earl of Mancheſter, aſſiſted by his lieutenant-general Oliver Cromwell. In the center, towards the right, was the lord Fairfax, and general Leven towards the left. At laſt, between ſix and ſeven in the evening, the parliament generals gave the ſignal, and marched to the enemies. I ſhall not undertake to deſcribe this battle, becauſe, in all the accounts I have ſeen, I meet with ſo little order and clearneſs, that I cannot expect to give a ſatisfactory idea of it to ſuch of my readers as underſtand theſe matters. I ſhall content myſelf with relating one remarkable circumſtance, beſides the ſucceſs in general. The left wing of the king's army, commanded by prince Rupert, was entirely routed by the parliament's right wing, whilſt the king's right wing had the ſame advantage over the left of the parliament. The two victorious wings, after chaſing their enemies, returned to the field of battle, and, I know not by what accident, met face to face, ſo that each ſtood on the ſame ground that the enemy poſſeſſed at the beginning of the battle. Here the fight was renewed, and maintained on both ſides with great warmth and vigour, till at laſt night approaching, the king's horſe were put to flight, and purſued as long as day would permit. It was probably at this time that the prince's foot were alſo routed. I ſay, probably, becauſe in the deſcription of this battle, it does not appear what the foot did. But this is not the only time that we are left in the dark, when we read in hiſtories the deſcriptions of battles. They are generally made by perſons who have not the leaſt tincture of the art of war, and who by dwelling upon ſome frivolous circumſtances, paſs over thoſe that might give the intelligent reader clear ideas. It ſuffices therefore to ſay, that the prince's army was purſued within a mile of York, where they retired in the night. The countrymen who were commanded to bury the dead, gave out that they interred four thouſand one hundred and fifty bodies. It was reported that three thouſand of the prince's men were killed. But the conquerors affirmed, they loſt not above three hundred [e].

Though prince Rupert had always been victorious where he had commanded in chief, it is not very ſurprizing that he ſhould once be defeated; this is a misfortune incident to the greateſt generals. But this reſolution to retire the next day with his army, muſt needs appear very ſtrange. His horſe had not ſuffered much, becauſe they had taken to flight betimes, at leaſt thoſe of the left wing, commanded by himſelf, and his foot were alſo in good condition, the greateſt ſtorm having fallen on the marquis of Newcaſtle's. He might therefore have defended York, and waited the king's orders upon this fatal accident. So, this extraordinary reſolution can ſcarce be imputed but an exceſſive ſhame and indignation, which hindered him from conſidering how prejudicial it would be to the king his uncle's affairs. He ſent the marquis of Newcaſtle notice of his deſign, juſt as the marquis was ſending him word, that he was inſtantly going to quit the kingdom. They both put their reſolutions in practice. The marquis repaired that very day to Scarborough, and embarked for Hamburgh [f], and the prince left York, and marched towards Cheſter with the remains of his army. It is eaſy to gueſs why the marquis of Newcaſtle quitted the king's ſervice, after having been ſo unworthily treated by prince Rupert. He believed doubtleſs, he could not with honour reſume his former command, having been deemed incapable to ſerve the king on ſo important an occaſion. Nay, very probably, he imagined the prince would not have behaved to him in ſo haughty and rude a manner, if he had not thought he ſhould be avowed. Nevertheleſs, the prince

[c] Ludlow obſerves, That if the prince could have been contented with relieving York, and retreate, as he might have done, without fighting, the reputation he had gained, would have cauſed his army to increaſe like the rolling of a ſnow-ball. Tom. I. p. 123.

[d] Ruſhworth ſays, the prince led the right wing, and ſir Charles Lucas the left; and the earl of Mancheſter and Cromwell commanded the left of the enemy. The king's forces conſiſted of fourteen thouſand foot, nine thouſand horſe, and about twenty-five pieces of ordnance. The parliament's army did not exceed that number. Oliver Cromwell was hard preſſed by the prince's horſe, and wounded above the ſhoulders, but at length he broke through. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 633, 634. Whitelock, p. 94. Others ſay, there were about four thouſand taken priſoners, and as many ſlain on the king's party; the whole of both armies amounted to near nine thouſand men. Commons War, p. 50. Among the colours were prince Rupert's ſtandard, with the arms of the Palitinate, and a red croſs in the middle; a yellow coronet, in the middle of a lion couchant, and behind him a maſtiff, ſeeming to ſnatch at him, and in a label from his mouth, written Kimbolton; at his feet little beagles, and before their mouths written, Pym, Pym, Pym; and out of the lion's mouth theſe words proceeded—"Quouſque tandem abutere patientia noſtra?" [f] With him went his two ſons, Charles viſcount Mansfield, and Henry lord Cavendiſh; his brother ſir Charles Cavendiſh; Dr. Bramhal biſhop of Londonderry; the lord Falconbridge; the lord Withrington; the earl of Elthyne; the lord Cornwarth; and ſir William Carnaby. On the 8th of July they arrived at Hamburgh. The marquis came no more to England till after the reſtoration of Charles II. Idem. p. 637.

This

could afterwards produce in his vindication only the king's letter above-mentioned, which he underſtood in a ſenſe the king himſelf had never thought of[g]. It may therefore be affirmed, that his committing ſo many errors one after another, was entirely owing to his exceſſive haughtineſs.

The parliament-generals improved their victory, and the diſſention of their enemies. They returned to their poſts before York, which was left to the diſcretion of ſir Thomas Glemham the governor, who ſeeing himſelf unable long to reſiſt, ſurrendered that important place upon honourable terms. They were no ſooner in poſſeſſion of York, but the three armies ſeparated. The lord Fairfax with his forces remained at York, as governor. The earl of Mancheſter marched towards Lincoln, not to be remote, without neceſſity, from the aſſociated counties, whoſe troops he commanded. The earl of Leven, with the Scotch army, marched northward to join the earl of Calendar, who was advancing with a ſtrong reinforcement from Scotland. When theſe forces were joined, he laid ſiege to Newcaſtle, which ſurrendered at diſcretion about the end of October[h]. Thus the battle of Marſton-moor loſt the king all the north, which hitherto had given the parliament-forces a powerful diverſion. But this was not all the miſchief the king had to fear. There was danger of the three victorious armies joining in the heart of the kingdom thoſe of the earl of Eſſex and ſir William Waller, and of their taking at once all the places which were ſtill in his power. This was the more to be feared, as when he heard of the defeat of his army at Marſton-moor, he was himſelf marching to the relief of the weſt, where the earl of Eſſex then was with an army, which the king's forces in thoſe parts were not able to withſtand. This is what I muſt now explain, and withal ſpeak of what paſſed at Oxford, whilſt the northern armies were in action.

The parliament ſeem, by their extraordinary preparations in the beginning of the year 1644, to have intended to put a ſpeedy concluſion to the war. Beſides the armies of the lord Fairfax and Scotland, and that of the earl of Mancheſter, which was paid by the eaſtern counties, a new regulation was made the latter end of March, for the maintenance of ſeven thouſand five hundred foot, and three thouſand horſe, to be commanded by the earl of Eſſex. At the ſame time, by another ordinance, the four ſouthern aſſociated counties, namely, Kent, Suſſex, Surry, and Hampſhire, were to maintain an army of three thouſand ſix hundred foot, twelve hundred horſe, and five hundred dragoons, under the command of ſir William Waller. Theſe were not new armies, they ſubſiſted before the regulation; but the point was to recruit them, compleat the number fixed by the parliament, and ſettle the neceſſary weekly payment of their ſubſiſtance[i].

Though ſir William Waller was worſted at the battle of Roundway-down, the two houſes, far from loſing their eſteem for him, reſolved to ſend him into the weſt, with an army capable of withſtanding prince Maurice, who found no farther oppoſition in thoſe parts. The king having notice of this deſign, reſolved not only to hinder Waller's march into the weſt, but alſo to break the aſſociation of the four ſouthern counties, where he had many friends, and even hoped to procure an aſſociation of theſe counties in his favour. To that purpoſe, he gave the lord Hopton[k] an army conſiſting of troops drawn out of ſeveral garriſons, and of two regiments of foot lately arrived at Briſtol from Ireland[l]. As ſoon as theſe forces were aſſembled, the lord Hopton poſted himſelf at Wincheſter, where ſir John Berkley brought him two regiments newly raiſed by him in Devonſhire, and the king ſent him a detachment of a thouſand men commanded by ſir Jacob Aſhley. All theſe forces together made an army of four thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe[m], with which he reſolved to march into Suſſex. Waller, who was then quartered about Farnham, aſſembled his troops and faced the enemy: but after ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes, he retired into Farnham caſtle, from whence he took a journey to London, to repreſent to the parliament his want of ſupplies, without which it would not be poſſible to perform what had been enjoined him.

Immediately after Waller's departure for London, the lord Hopton marched with part of his army to attack Arundel caſtle, which was ſurrendered upon terms. But hearing a few days after, that Waller was returned to Farnham with a ſtrong reinforcement, he rejoined the reſt of his army.

Waller's journey to London anſwered his expectations. Beſides a brigade of Londoners under major-general Brown, he procured an order of parliament to the earl of Eſſex, to ſend him from his army a thouſand horſe under the command of ſir William Balfour. He was no ſooner returned to Farnham with theſe ſupplies, but he marched all night, and at break of day beat up one of the lord Hopton's quarters at Alton, and carried away priſoners colonel Boles's regiment of foot[n]; a troop or two of horſe, which were in the ſame quarters, having betimes taken to flight. Then he marched directly to Arundel caſtle, and made the garriſon priſoners. Here the learned Chillingworth was taken, and died within a few days.

The king hearing of the ſupplies given to Waller, ſent a reinforcement to the lord Hopton. The earl of Forth, the king's general[o], would go himſelf, but refuſed the command which the lord Hopton offered to reſign to him. The lord Hopton having then an army of about eight thouſand men, reſolved to give Waller battle, and begun his march with that intent, at the very time Waller was advancing towards him with the ſame reſolution. The two armies met between Farnham and Wincheſter on Cheriton-down near Alresford, where the battle was fought the 29th of March. The lord Hopton was defeated and forced to retire to Reading, and afterwards to Oxford[p]. Waller marched to Wincheſter, and became maſter of the city, but did not think proper to beſiege the caſtle, which was his own inheritance, becauſe he had elſewhere more important affairs, as will be ſeen preſently. The lord Clarendon pretends, the loſs ſuſtained by Waller at Alresford hindered him from improving his advantage, and marching into the weſt, as he had reſolved. But it may be affirmed, this was not the thing that prevented his taking the weſtern rout. It was rather owing to the parliament's reſolution, by whom he was recalled to London, after having diſmiſſed the auxiliary regiments of that city, and Kent, which were alſo come to join him.

Both houſes perceiving, that by the king's late loſs at Alresford, his army was diſcouraged and conſiderably leſſened; that moreover, they had ſufficient forces in the north to have nothing to fear from the marquis of Newcaſtle, who was ſhut up in York, reſolved to beſiege Oxford, where the king was with his army. So, having relinquiſhed, or ſuſpended the deſign of ſending Waller into the weſt, they laboured with all poſſible diligence, to put the two armies of Eſſex and Waller upon the foot ſettled by their ordinance, that they might act together againſt Oxford.

The king had ever imagined, that Waller's deſign was to march towards the weſtern parts. For which reaſon he had aſſembled his forces at Marlborough, and afterwards poſted himſelf at Newbury, where he had remained ſome time, till he could better diſcover the deſigns of his enemies. But having at length found, the parliament had altered their meaſures, he came to Reading, and cauſed the fortifications to be demoliſhed, in order to ſtrengthen his army with the garriſon, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men. He alſo ordered prince Rupert to come and join him: but afterwards permitted him to relieve Latham houſe, where the counteſs of Derby was beſieged. With the Reading garriſon, his army was increaſed to eight thouſand five hundred foot, and four thouſand horſe. But being ſtill ignorant of the deſigns of his enemies, he thought proper to retire to Oxford with his whole army.

Mean while, the parliament, who had for ſome time found means to take their reſolutions with more ſecrecy than formerly, perceiving the two armies of Eſſex and Waller ready to march, ſent to each a ſupply of four thouſand two hundred of the train-bands of London. So, the earl of Eſſex's army conſiſted of twelve thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; and Waller's of ſeven thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe and dragoons. Theſe two generals had orders to march ſeparately, and beſiege Oxford, if the king remained there; but if he went from thence, the earl of Eſſex was ordered to follow him with his army, and Waller to march into the weſt, according to the firſt project. They departed from London, the 14th and 15th of May, to put themſelves at the head of their reſpective armies, and immediately marched towards Oxford.

The king had poſted almoſt all his infantry at Abington, in order to ſtop the enemies, and have time to conſider what meaſures he ſhould take, in caſe they really intended to beſiege Oxford, which he ſtill queſtioned. As Abington could not be eaſily defended but on the eaſt-ſide, and he was unwilling to run any unneceſſary hazard, he had ordered general Wilmot to make a vigorous defence, if attacked on that ſide, but if on the weſt from Wantage and Farrington, to relinquiſh the place. But whether the order was not clear and full, or for ſome other reaſon, Wilmot, at the enemies, approach on the eaſt-ſide immediately retired to Oxford, and the earl of Eſſex inſtantly entered Abington. The king perceiving the ſiege of Oxford was reſolved, had but one way to hinder it, which was to defend the paſſes of the rivers Iſis and Cherwell, which run on the weſt and eaſt-ſides of the city, and to that end he quartered his horſe near the Iſis, and his foot towards the Cherwell. As the motions of the parliament-armies entirely proceed from the ſituation of Oxford and the adjacent country; and as, without this knowledge, ſcarce any thing would be intelligible, I ſhall paſs over the particulars which to me ſeem not abſolutely neceſſary, and content myſelf with ſaying, that Waller found means at laſt to gain the paſs at Newbridge over the Iſis, which enabled him to fall upon the rear of the king's foot that were defending the Cherwell [q]. Whereupon the king drew all his forces into Oxford and to the north of the city, with thoughts at the ſame time of providing for the ſafety of his perſon, not judging it proper to ſuffer himſelf to be ſhut up. There was no time to loſe, for the king's troops were hardly retired, when the earl of Eſſex paſſed the Cherwell at Goſworth bridge with his army. So the king giving orders to his horſe, and a ſmall body of foot, to wait for him at ſuch a place, left Oxford the 3d of June about nine o'clock at night, and ſafely paſſed between the two parliament-armies [r]. He was out of all danger of purſuit before the news of his retreat reached the enemies, and came at length, on June 6, to Worceſter, after having endured a great fatigue.

The two generals were extremely ſurprized, when they heard the king had eſcaped them. But it was too late to hope to overtake him. Mean while, the city of Oxford being well ſtored with proviſions and ammunition, and the king having left there almoſt all his foot, they did not think fit to beſiege it, and the rather, as they had no orders to do it, unleſs the king remained there. The parliament's intention was, that in caſe the king quitted Oxford, the earl of Eſſex ſhould follow him with his army; and Waller with his take care of the affairs of the weſt. But the earl of Eſſex, for ſome unknown reaſon, reverſed his order, and would himſelf march into the weſt. And when Waller urged the parliament's orders, the earl of Eſſex poſitively commanded him, as his general, to obey, to which the other could make no reply. So, the earl immediately began his march to the weſt. The parliament were very much offended with the earl of Eſſex's diſobedience, and ſent him an order, which reached him at Saliſbury, to return, follow the king, and leave to Waller the weſtern expedition. But the earl, inſtead of complying, ſent a letter to the committee of war [s], with the reaſons of his conduct, ſubſcribing his letter, "Your innocent, though ſuſpected ſervant, Eſſex." Whether both houſes were ſatisfied with the earl's reaſons, or believed it proper not to incenſe him in ſuch a juncture, they ſuffered him to purſue his march, which he did in a ſlow and eaſy manner, till he came into Devonſhire.

The queen had been ever ſince April at Exeter, the capital of that county, where ſhe was delivered of the princeſs Henrietta, about a fortnight or three weeks before the earl of Eſſex's approach. As ſoon as ſhe heard of his entering Devonſhire, ſhe ſent and deſired a ſafe conduct to retire to Briſtol [t]. The earl of Eſſex anſwered, if her majeſty would pleaſe to go to London, he would have the honour to wait upon her thither; but could not give her a ſafe-conduct to Briſtol, without the expreſs order of both houſes. Whereupon the queen withdrew into Cornwall, and ſome time after into France, with a convoy of men of war, ſent her by the prince of Orange.

Prince Maurice had been, ſince the 20th of April, before the little town of Lyme, which made a more obſtinate defence than was expected. This place, and Plymouth, were almoſt the only towns in the weſt that were for the parliament. It was therefore very neceſſary for the parliament, to have in thoſe parts, forces capable of reviving the courage of their friends, who had received no aſſiſtance ſince prince Maurice's arrival. At the earl of Eſſex's approach, who was now advanced to Dorcheſter, the prince raiſed the ſiege of Lyme, and retired to Exeter. The ſame day, the earl of Eſſex poſſeſſed himſelf of Dorcheſter. Then, he detached ſir William Balfour, who took Weymouth, whither the earl of Eſſex inſtantly repaired. He had ſome thoughts of beſieging Exeter, and indeed marched that way; but conſidering that prince Maurice was there with his whole army, he was afraid of loſing too much time in the ſiege, and ſtopped at Chard, where he remained ſome time, and from thence marched to Tiverton. Whereupon, prince Maurice ſent a detachment from Exeter, with orders to ſecure Barnſtable; but the inhabitants ſhut the gates againſt them, and immediately ſent to the earl of Eſſex, to come and take poſſeſſion of the town, which was done accordingly by the lord Roberts. Here was taken captain Howard, who having been formerly lieutenant to captain Pym, had deſerted, with nineteen troopers, to the king's party; for which being now tried by a council of war, he was condemned and executed. Upon this, prince Maurice cauſed to be hanged Turpin, a ſea-captain, taken priſoner in attempting to relieve Exeter, when the earl of Stamford was beſieged in it. He being indicted for levying arms againſt the king, was by the judges, Heath, Forſter, Banks, and ſerjeant Glanvil, condemned, but hitherto reprieved, by reaſon of the conſequences. The parliament was very much incenſed at this repriſal, conſidering the difference between a priſoner of war, and deſerter. Wherefore having ſerjeant Glanvil in their cuſtody, who had lately quitted the king's party, and returned to London, they ordered him to be impeached of high-treaſon. Soon after, the king's party cauſed fourteen clothiers to be hanged at Woodhouſe in Wiltſhire [u], and the parliament ordered eight Iriſhmen to be executed, who had been taken priſoners in ſome action. Theſe are the ſad effects of civil wars. Theſe executions gave occaſion to the parliament, in Auguſt following, to erect a court-martial, to which were given very ſevere inſtructions, chiefly with reſpect to deſerters. About the middle of July, Taunton-Dean was taken for the parliament, by a party of the garriſon of Lyme [w].

I am obliged for a time, to break off the narrative of the affairs of the weſt, to relate what the king did after his eſcape from Oxford.

He arrived the 6th of June at Worceſter with his little army; but ſtaid there only a few days, hearing Waller was marching that way. When he quitted Worceſter, he made ſeveral marches and counter-marches [x], to deceive the vigilance of his enemy, not being ſtrong enough to venture to expect him. At laſt, having made a ſhew of marching towards Shrewſbury, Waller doubted not but his deſign was to join prince Rupert, who was ſtill in thoſe parts. For this was before the battle of Marſton-moor. He thought it therefore very important to march before, and poſt himſelf between the king and Shrewſbury, in order to hinder his joining with the prince. The king was very glad to have deceived Waller. As ſoon as he knew Waller expected him upon that rout, he feigned to take it indeed, but ſuddenly turning about, inſtead of continuing his march towards Sqrewſbury, took the road to Oxford, and left Waller in his poſt, without any poſſibility of overtaking him. When he came near Oxford, he was joined by the reſt of his army, which he had left there when he quitted that city. Then,

[q] The lord Clarendon ſays, he might have brought over all his army, and fallen upon the king's rear; not, that he did. Tom. II. p. 376.

[r] He went that night to Mr. Parret's at Northlye, where next morning he drew up his army, and went that afternoon to Burton on the water, where he lodged at Dr. Temple's the prince's chaplain. On the 5th he marched to Eveſham, and on Thurſday the 6th to the city of Worceſter. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 671.

[x] June 12, he marched from Worceſter to Bewdley; the 15th he advanced along the Severn towards Bridgenorth, but returned the ſame day to Worceſter; the 16th, he marched through Eveſham to Broadway; and the next day came to Burford. Idem, p. 674, 675.

On

no longer fearing Waller, ſince he was ſtronger than he, he went and quartered in Buckinghamſhire, without any other deſign than to give the enemy battle, if there was occaſion.

Waller having been thus circumvented, approached the king however, and at length the two armies were in ſight, with the river Cherwell between them. Waller drew up on a very advantageous ground, imagining the king would paſs the river to attack him, and thereby furniſh him with an opportunity to fight with advantage. But the king, to draw him from his poſt, feigned to march northward, and accordingly advanced into Northamptonſhire, leaving a ſtrong guard at Cropedy-bridge, to hinder the enemies from paſſing and following him in the rear. Whilſt he was marching, he had intelligence, there was a body of three hundred horſe going to join Waller, within two miles of the van of his army, and was told they might be eaſily cut off, if the army moved faſter. Whereupon orders were ſent to the van, and main body, to advance faſter. As ſoon as Waller perceived there was a great diſtance between the king's rear, and the reſt of his army, he detached a thouſand horſe, to paſs the river at a ford, a mile below, and himſelf, with fifteen hundred horſe, one thouſand foot, and eleven pieces of cannon, attacked Cropedy-bridge, took it, and paſſed his troops. Which done, he fell upon the king's rear, but was repulſed, with loſs of many of his men and part of his cannon. This is all that can be gathered with any clearneſs, from the accounts of this battle [y]. The detachment, which I ſaid, paſſed the ford, had much the ſame ſucceſs. Waller being thus repulſed, and forced to repaſs the river, drew up his men on a hill, and there waited the king's motions. As it was yet but three in the afternoon, the king, believing the enemies were diſcouraged with their ill ſucceſs, ordered Cropedy-bridge and the ford to be attacked by two great detachments. The firſt was repulſed at the bridge, with great loſs on the king's ſide. The other gained the ford; but all that could be done, was to maintain it, expecting in vain, till night, that the firſt detachment would recover the bridge. Night coming on, both ſides retired, Waller remaining maſter of the two paſſes.

The king was ſo prepoſſeſſed with the notion, that the enemies army was entirely diſcouraged, that he reſolved to ſend them an offer of pardon by a herald, imagining it would be immediately accepted, and Waller deſerted. In this belief, he ſent a trumpeter to Waller, to deſire a ſafe conduct for a gentleman to deliver a gracious meſſage from his majeſty. Waller anſwered, he had no power to receive any meſſage without permiſſion from the parliament, to whom his majeſty was to make application. The two armies faced each other for the ſpace of two days, ſtanding in the ſame poſture, after which they both drew off, each taking a different rout [z]. In all appearance, Waller after this loſs, did not think himſelf in condition to go any more in queſt of the king, who was ſuperior to him in number. As it was about this time, that the report of prince Rupert's defeat at Marſton-moor was ſpread, Waller thought, doubtleſs, there was no great neceſſity to hazard a ſecond battle, ſince the king would probably be very much diſtreſſed. When he knew afterwards, the king was marching towards the weſt, he gave himſelf ſtill leſs trouble about what the king might attempt, ſince it belonged to the earl of Eſſex to get off as he could. There was not a ſufficient union between them, for Waller to be much concerned at what might happen to the earl. Perhaps too, his not being able to follow the king, who was marching againſt the earl of Eſſex, was the reaſon why he diſmiſſed the regiments of the London auxiliaries, which, added to his loſs at Cropedy, diſabled him to act till he had freſh troops.

The king, who in the beginning of this campaign was in a ſad ſtrait, found himſelf, a month after, much at eaſe. Of the two armies by which he had been attacked, one was unable to hurt him, and the other was gone into the weſt, where he himſelf was very ſtrong. In the firſt place, he was maſter of all the fortified towns, Plymouth excepted. Secondly, he had at Briſtol a large garriſon, part whereof might be drawn out upon occaſion. In the third place, almoſt all the gentry of the weſtern counties were well affected to him. There were only the meaner ſort of people, who were divided between him and the parliament, but who however were always ready ro join with the ſtrongeſt. Laſtly, prince Maurice had at Exeter, and in the neighbourhood, four thouſand men, which could be eaſily brought to him by the north of Devonſhire, and the earl of Eſſex not be able to prevent it. All theſe conſiderations determined him to march weſtward, to give the earl of Eſſex battle, if an opportunity offered. He had ſcarce begun his march, when he received the ill news of what paſſed at York, which confirmed him in his reſolution. He perceived, that if he remained in the middle of the kingdom, where he had few friends or fortified towns, the three parliament-armies, which were now ſeparated, would not fail to rejoin, and then he ſhould be too weak to withſtand them.

As ſoon as the king had taken this reſolution, he informed prince Maurice of it, that he might be ready to join him, and by the ſame expreſs ſent orders to the lord Hopton, to draw what men he could out of Wales and lead them to Briſtol, that he might meet him on the way with thoſe troops, and as many more as could poſſibly be ſpared from that garriſon. So, the king making eaſy marches, in order to give the Welſh troops time to join him, came the 15th of July to Bath, from whence, after two days, he departed, and at length arrived at Exeter. When all the forces, he had ſent for, had joined him, he ſaw himſelf at the head of an army much more numerous than the earl of Eſſex's.

Five days after the fight at Cropedy-bridge, the king being at Eveſham, cauſed to be drawn up a meſſage for peace to both houſes, a copy whereof was ſent to the earl of Eſſex by the marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to the parliament, it being intimated that the French agent had the original to deliver if required. This meſſage directed To the lords and commons of parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, contained a general offer to treat of peace, and if commiſſioners ſhould be ſent to him, he would grant them a ſafe conduct. The two houſes, ever jealous of the king, thought there was ſome artifice concealed in ſending them only a copy of the meſſage, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original of the French agent. Beſides, they did not conceive themſelves to be owned by the direction of this meſſage as the two houſes of parliament, and therefore imagined, the king had a mind to reſerve to himſelf the power of ſaying, that he did not acknowledge them for the true parliament of England [a], and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, ſince he had publiſhed the fore-mentioned declaration againſt them. Wherefore they reſolved to take no notice of the meſſage, nor return any anſwer.

Whilſt the king ſtayed at Bath, he had aſſembled the inhabitants of Somerſetſhire at Kingſmoor, and made a ſpeech to them, exhorting them to take up arms for him, and furniſh him with money. He told them, "That victory was the only means left to reſtore peace to the nation, that bleſſed peace which he had ſo often ſought for from them at Weſtminſter, and which they had ſo ſcornfully rejected. But, continued he, when I mention peace, I would be underſtood to intend that peace, which is built upon ſuch foundations as are moſt likely to render it firm and ſtable; wherein God's true religion may be beſt ſecured from the danger of popery, ſectaries, and innovations; the crown may poſſeſs thoſe juſt prerogatives which may enable me to protect and govern my people according to law; and the ſubjects be confirmed in thoſe rights which they have derived from their forefathers, and which I have granted them in parliament; to which I ſhall always be ready to add ſuch new graces, as I ſhall find moſt to conduce to their happineſs; this is the peace which I labour for, wherein I may juſtly expect your beſt aſſiſtance with your hearts, and hands, and purſes."

For the clear underſtanding of the king's meaning not only on this, but on all other the like occaſions without exception, it muſt be conſidered, the parliament did not deny, that a king of England ought according to the laws of the land, to enjoy ſuch prerogatives as his majeſty demanded; but they affirmed, it ought to be for the welfare, and not for the deſtruction of the people. They pretended, that Charles I. had abuſed theſe prerogatives to deſtroy the rights of the ſubject, and from thence drew this inference, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to put it out of his power to abuſe them for the future, which could be done only by depriving him of part of the prerogatives he had abuſed. They maintained, only the king's bare word could not be relied on, and there was need of a ſtronger fence to ſecure the laws. The king, on his part, did not deny he had made ill [z] Ruſhworth and Whitelock both ſay the king drew off firſt, and then Waller marched over Cropedy-bridge. Rapin follows the lord Clarendon's account.

uſe of his power. But he had repaired the miſchief he had done, and proteſted his intention was to govern for the future, according to the laws of the land. What therefore was the ground of the war? Why, the parliament would not truſt to the king's word, and the king refuſed to give other ſecurity. When therefore the king ſo frequently offered peace, on condition he ſhould be reſtored to all his prerogatives, excepting thoſe he had departed from in this parliament, far from ſhewing by theſe offers, that he was ſincerely deſirous of peace, he rather demonſtrated, that nothing could ſatisfy him but an entire victory, whether by arms or treaty. On the other hand, when the parliament ſeemed to wiſh for peace, but on condition that the king ſhould be diveſted of his prerogatives, was not this in reality to wiſh for war, ſince it was deſiring to ſecure by a treaty an advantage, which their arms had hitherto rendered very uncertain? We muſt not therefore be miſled by the ſound of the word peace, which was, as appears, a very ambiguous term, and of which both ſides, eſpecially the king, made a parade to dazzle the people. I am in hopes this remark will be of uſe to explain many the like paſſages of this reign.

When the earl of Eſſex heard of the king's approach, he called a council of war, to debate what was to be done in this emergency. His own opinion was, to return, and hinder the king from penetrating farther into the Country, and to give him battle if a favourable opportunity offered. He repreſented, that in Devonſhire or Somerſetſhire, as he ſhould not be ſtraitened in room or proviſions, he might either fight, or avoid it as he ſhould think fit. But the the lord Roberts of Truro [b], field-marſhal in this expedition, whoſe eſtate lay all in Cornwall, poſitively affirmed, that as ſoon as the army ſhould enter that county, the people would all declare for the parliament: that then it would be impoſſible for the king to come there, and the army might eaſily ſubſiſt, and be reinforced with a great number of troops. Upon this aſſurance which afterwards proved very falſe, the lord Roberts, rather by a ſort of violence, than the ſtrength of his reaſons, cauſed it to be reſolved, that the army ſhould march into Cornwall.

Purſuant to this reſolution, the earl of Eſſex entered that county the 26th of July, after forcing the paſſage at New bridge, which was bravely defended [by ſir Richard Grenvil.] The ſame day the king came to Exeter [c], and after a general muſter of his army, followed the earl of Eſſex, who did not find in Cornwall what the lord Roberts had made him expect. He advanced however to Lanceſton, and from thence to Bodmin, where he writ to the parliament, that he did not doubt, the king's deſign was to ſtraiten him for proviſions, and therefore earneſtly deſired, that an army might be ſent into the weſt to lie upon the king's rear, and hinder him from executing his project. But as ſir William Waller was not ready to march, being then in London, ſoliciting ſupplies for his army, all that could be done was to detach colonel Middleton with two thouſand five hundred horſe and dragoons [d], with orders to march weſtwards.

The king ſeeing the Earl of Eſſex intangled in a Country where he wanted proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of his army, thought it a fair opportunity to try to gain him. Wherefore he ſent him a letter under his own hand, perſuading him to free himſelf from his preſent ſtraits, by reſtoring peace to the kingdom, that is, by declaring for ſuch a peace as the king deſired. The earl of Eſſex returning no anſwer to this letter, prince Maurice, and the earl of Forth lately made earl of Brentford, the king's general, writ to him two days after; and the next day he received another letter on the ſame ſubject, ſigned by [the lord Hopton and] many general officers of the king's army. At laſt, he returned a brief anſwer to the earl of Brentford, that he had no commiſſion to treat.

About this time, the lord Wilmot, lieutenant-general of the king's horſe, was arreſted (and ſent priſoner to Exeter) by his majeſty's order, he having taken the liberty to ſend the earl of Eſſex word, that if he would enter into treaty, the officers of the king's army were ſo deſirous of peace, they would conſtrain his majeſty to conclude it upon reaſonable terms. Wilmot's diſgrace bred ſome murmurs amongſt the officers of horſe, by whom he was very much beloved. Nay, they preſented a petition to the king, to pray him to let them know what crime that lord was accuſed of. The king in ſuch a juncture, was very ready to give them this ſatisfaction. Nevertheleſs the lord Wilmot was deprived of his poſt, which was given to the lord Goring, after which, he had leave to retire beyond ſea [e]. It was generally believed in the army, that Wilmot's diſgrace was owing to ſome intrigue of the court, and the king's private hatred of him on account of the part he had acted againſt the earl of Strafford.

The earl of Eſſex perceived too late the vanity of the lord Roberts's promiſes. So far were the people of Cornwall from riſing in his favour, that on the contrary they ran in crowds to join the king's army. The earl could have proviſions but by ſea, and in ſmall quantities, by means of a river which afforded him a communication by ſea with Plymouth [f]. At laſt ſir Richard Greenvil having brought the king a ſupply of troops, it was reſolved in a council of war, to make uſe of the ſuperiority of the number, not to compel the earl of Eſſex to fight, but to cut off his proviſions entirely. This was happily effected, by means of a fort run up on the bank of the river, by which the enemies received their proviſions. Thus the earl of Eſſex being reduced to the laſt extremity, after having kept his poſt almoſt a month, reſolved to abandon his army, to avoid falling into the king's hands. But before he executed that deſign, he ordered ſir William Balfour to endeavour to ſave the horſe, which he performed very fortunately in a dark miſty night, by paſſing unobſerved through the king's quarters [g]. As ſoon as the earl of Eſſex knew the horſe were out of danger, he ſent to the king and demanded a parley, but before the anſwer was returned, took ſhip with ſome officers and retired to Plymouth, leaving major-general Skippon to ſee to procure the beſt terms he could for the foot.

The king having granted the parley deſired by the earl of Eſſex before his departure, a conference was held between ſome officers of both armies, where the following articles were agreed on [h].

I. That on the morrow, being the 2d of September, all the officers and ſoldiers under the command of the earl of Eſſex, ſhall deliver up all their cannons and train of artillery, with all carriages, neceſſaries, and materials thereunto belonging; and likewiſe all arms offenſive and defenſive, with all ammunition whatſoever, except only the ſwords and piſtols of all officers above the degree of corporals.

II. That immediately after, all officers and ſoldiers ſhall march out of their quarters to Leſtwithiel with their colours, trumpets and drums; and that all officers above the degree of ſerjeants, ſhall take with them ſuch horſes and ſervants as properly belong to them, with all their bag and baggage, and waggons with their teams.

III. That they ſhall have a ſafe convoy of one hundred horſe, from their quarters, to Leſtwithiel, and thence in their march to Pool and Wareham.

IV. That in caſe they ſhall march from Pool to any other

II. p. 395. Ludlow adds, he perſuaded the earl to march into Cornwall, that he might have an opportunity to collect his rents in thoſe parts. Tom. I. p. 126.

[e] The lord Goring was juſt come from prince Rupert, with letters to the king, requeſting that Goring might be made general of the Horſe in his room. So that Rapin is miſtaken, in ſaying, he had Wilmot's poſt given him. For his majeſty, the day after his arreſting him, told the officers of horſe he had juſtly reſtrained Wilmot for the preſent, but had not taken away from him his command in the army. However, Wilmot, when he ſaw his mortal enemy Goring put in the command over him, thought himſelf incapable of reparation, or full vindication, ſo deſired leave to retire into France, and had a paſs ſent him for that purpoſe. It ſeems, the earl of Brentford being grown old, the king deſigned to make prince Rupert general. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 398.

[f] The king lay about Leſkard, and Eſſex at Leſtwithiel, from whence the river runs to Foy, of which place Eſſex was maſter.

[g] Others ſay, that they broke through the king's quarters. Ludlow, tom. I. p. 127. Manley p. 74.

[h] Whitelock, who pretends to give an impartial relation of this affair, ſays, that the earl of Eſſex did not ſend to parley, but that after he was gone, ſome came by deſign to the parliament-forces, intimating, that the king was willing to admit of a treaty with them, which was great wiſdom and gallantry in the king, chuſing rather to defeat them with their own conſents, than hazard the doubtful trial of a battle. Upon this, Skippon calls his officers together to a council of war, and declares, he was for fighting his way through the enemy, as the horſe had done. But few of the council did concur with him, ſo the abovementioned articles were agreed upon. Some of the ſoldiers, as they were marching forth, being pillaged by the king's ſoldiers, Skippon rode up to the king, who ſtood to ſee them paſs by, and told him, "It was againſt his honour and juſtice, that the ſoldiers ſhould be pillaged, contrary to the articles, and deſired his majeſty to give order to reſtrain them," which the king did. There were delivered up forty pieces of braſs ordnance, two hundred barrels of powder, and nine thouſand arms for horſe and foot. See, ſays Whitelock, the uncertain iſſue of war! A few weeks before, Eſſex and Waller, with two great armies, were in purſuit of the king, who could ſcarce find a way to avoid them; and now the parliament's army is defeated, diſarmed, and diſperſed, and the king becomes victorious. Whitelock, p. 102.

place by land, that they ſhould not bear arms, more than is allowed in the agreement, until they come to Southampton or Portſmouth.

V. That all the ſick and wounded ſhould be left at Foy, till ſuch time as they can be conveniently tranſported to Plymouth.

VI. That all the officers and ſoldiers ſhall be permitted to receive all monies, proviſions, and other accommodations, as they ſhould be able to procure from Plymouth; to which end they ſhall have a paſs for any twelve perſons whom they ſhall ſend for the ſame.

VII. That there ſhall be no inviting of any ſoldiers, but that ſuch as will voluntarily come to his majeſty's ſervice, ſhall not be hindered.

By this treaty, the king properly gained only artillery, arms, and ammunition. But though it was ſomething to reduce this army to ſuch a condition, it would have been of much more advantage to him, had he made the officers and ſoldiers priſoners of war. For the parliament wanted neither artillery, nor arms, nor ammunition, to repair their army, which indeed was able within five or ſix weeks, to give the king battle. It is to be preſumed, the King had good reaſons to be ſatisfied with this little advantage.

Though the earl of Eſſex might have been juſtly upbraided for the two faults he had committed, in obſtinately purſuing his march into the weſt, contrary to the orders of both houſes, and in prepoſterouſly running himſelf into Cornwall, he was not inſulted for his misfortunes, but at his return was very civilly received. It was then no proper time to examine his conduct. The point was to recruit and arm the ruined army, as well as that of Waller, and accordingly both houſes applied themſelves to it with all poſſible diligence. They ordered alſo colonel Middleton to repair ſpeedily to the earl of Eſſex's army, and the earl of Mancheſter to march the ſame way with his forces.

After the king had gained ſo conſiderable an advantage, he hoped, the frighted parliament would deſire nothing more than to come to an agreement. He plainly perceived, that ſuch a peace as he deſired was impracticable, as long as the parliament was proſperous. But he flattered himſelf with the hopes, that after ſo great a misfortune, his enemies would gladly accept his offers, and inſiſt no longer upon terms he was fully reſolved not to grant. In this belief, he ſent from Taviſtock a freſh meſſage to both houſes, with offers of peace, and annexed to it a duplicate of his former meſſage from Eveſham. This meſſage was ſo worded, that he ſeemed out of pure moderation to offer, after his victory, to be content with having, by a peace, what he was in condition to obtain by force of arms. But if notice be taken of what I before ſaid, to explain what is to be underſtood by the peace offered by the king, it will be found, that through an exceſs of modeſty, moderation, and affection for his people, he would be ſatisfied to obtain by a treaty, what hitherto he had not been able to procure by arms: for that was the real meaning of his offer, though diſguiſed under the ſpecious name of peace. The parliament muſt have underſtood it in that ſenſe, ſince it was not regarded. The king himſelf, doubtleſs, did not believe, he could deceive the two houſes by the bare name of peace, after having ſo often experienced how much they were upon their guard in that reſpect. But theſe frequent offers of peace were properly deſigned to make impreſſion upon the people, who did not diſcover their true meaning.

The 10th of September, the king appeared before Plymouth [i], in hopes, that after his late victory, the gates would be opened to him. But having ſummoned it in vain, and even given ſome aſſaults, he was forced to retire, the ſeaſon not permitting him to undertake ſo important a ſiege, which, probably, would have employed him ſeveral months. Beſides, his deſign was to march to London, where he ſuppoſed all were in the utmoſt conſternation. Mean while, general Goring, with a detachment of the army, became maſter of Barnſtaple.

I have had frequent occaſion to ſpeak of the affairs of the elector Palatine, and to obſerve, how much James I, and Charles I, neglected the intereſts, the one of the king his ſon-in-law, and the other, of the elector his nephew. All the elector's dominions being in the hands of his enemies, he fled for refuge to the king his uncle, who gave him a penſion for his ſubſiſtence. This penſion, it is likely, was ill paid, ſince the king was engaged in the war with Scotland, and ſtill worſe, ſince the beginning of this parliament. So the elector having attended the king till he retired into the north, and ſeeing the war ready to kindle, abruptly quitted the king his uncle at York. He retired into Holland, and ſtaid there till Auguſt 1644, when he ſuddenly came to London to reſide there, under the protection of the parliament. The king hearing of it, writ to him, to know the reaſon of ſo extraordinary a proceeding. It does not appear what anſwer the elector returned; but probably, not knowing how to ſubſiſt, and conſidering the king his uncle was not able to maintain him, he believed, he ſhould find more aſſiſtance in the parliament, which had ever expreſſed a great affection and zeal for his houſe. He was not deceived in his expectations, for the parliament granted him an honourable penſion, which was more regularly paid than the former from the king [k]. He afterwards deſired and obtained leave to hear the debates in the aſſembly of divines. Probably, as he did not care to be concerned in military affairs, he ſought to ſpend his time in converſing with the learned, and improving himſelf in matters of religion.

The king was ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed with the belief, that his victory could not but make a ſtrong impreſſion upon the minds of the people, that he reſolved to march directly to London. He did not queſtion, but his army would conſiderably increaſe by the way, and the people forſake the two houſes, when they ſhould ſee him marching towards the metropolis. It is true, ſuch turns had been formerly ſeen in England, but very ſeldom or never in favour of princes, whom the nation believed to have cauſe to complain of. However, though Charles had given but too much occaſion to complain of his government, yet was he perſuaded, he was beloved by the people, and imputed whatever they did againſt him, to the artifices, calumnies, promiſes, threats, and violences, that were uſed to miſlead or compel them. In this belief, he imagined, the people wanted only an opportunity to free themſelves from the yoke of the parliament, and that the preſent one being very favourable, was not to be neglected. He publiſhed therefore the 30th of September, a proclamation, dated at Chard, wherein he ſet forth, with what earneſtneſs and ſincerity he had always deſired, and offered peace, which had been conſtantly rejected by both houſes, after which he ſaid, "That he had therefore reſolved with his army to draw preſently towards London, and his ſouthern and eaſtern counties, not looking upon theſe parts as enemies to him, but as his poor ſubjects, oppreſſed by power, (of which he was aſſured the greater part remained loyal to him,) and ſo deſerving his protection; hoping, that at a nearer diſtance of place, there might be begot ſo right an underſtanding between him and his people, that at length he might obtain a treaty for peace, and a full and free convention in parliament, and therein make an end of theſe unhappy differences, by a good accommodation; wherein his people might be ſettled in the poſſeſſion of their rights and liberties. And therefore he required his ſubjects within his own quarters, through, or near which he ſhould paſs, forthwith to prepare themſelves with the beſt arms they could get, to be ready to join him. He authorized likewiſe as well the train-bands of London, as his ſubjects of the eaſtern and ſouthern counties, to chuſe their own commanders among thoſe gentlemen and citizens, that were of approved loyalty, and lovers of peace, requiring them at his approach, to put themſelves in arms, and aſſiſt in this expedition, and commanding them to ſeize ſuch places of ſtrength, as the rebels were poſſeſſed of, and to apprehend the perſons of all ſuch as ſhould hinder the ſettling the peace of the kingdom."

All the effect this proclamation produced, was, that the inhabitants of Somerſetſhire, where the king then was, preſented a petition to him, humbly beſeeching his majeſty, "That they might have liberty to wait upon him in perſon, and, at a nearer diſtance of place, become petitioners to both houſes, to embrace his majeſty's offers of peace; and in caſe of refuſal, they promiſed to ſpend their lives and fortunes, in aſſiſting him to compaſs by the ſword, what by fair means could not be effected." But this was only a promiſed aid, and as yet too remote for the king to make any uſe of it in the preſent expedition.

If every thing had happened as the king had imagined; if the people had flocked to his army; if he had been chear-

[k] He had, before his coming, ſent two letters to the parliament, declaring in the firſt, his ſatisfaction in the covenant, wiſhing them ſucceſs; and in the other, the great ſtraights he and his mother were in, for want of the ſtipend they formerly had, bemoaning the courſes his brother prince Rupert took, in fighting againſt the parliament. Upon his landing at Graveſend, a committee of the commons attended him, and in May 1645, the commons ordered him an allowance of 8000l. a year, 2000l. whereof out of the king's revenue, and the reſt out of the eſtates of the lord Cottington, and ſir Nicholas Criſpe. fully ſupplied with all neceſſaries, very probably, he might have arrived at London before the parliament-forces could have been joined to form a new army. But his army, inſtead of increaſing in their march, as he expected, daily diminiſhed by fatigues, by want of money, ſhoes, and ſtockings, by ſickneſs, which diſabled many of his men from following the army [l]. He was obliged to make frequent halts in ſeveral towns to wait for money and other neceſſaries, which, he perceived, would not be ſupplied when he ſhould be removed. The horſe being diſcontented, as well at the lord Wilmot's diſgrace, as at their having received no pay this campaign, he was forced to ſtay till the eaſtern counties ſhould ſupply him with money to ſatisfy them, otherwiſe he durſt not advance. Theſe delays were the reaſon that he came not to Saliſbury till the 15th of October, ſix weeks after the advantage gained in Cornwall. Then it was that he altered his reſolution, and inſtead of marching to London, contented himſelf with returning to his old quarters in and about Oxford. Nay, this project could not be executed without difficulty, conſidering the meaſures taken by his enemies.

Whilſt the king was on his march, the parliament was not idle. They had provided (ſix thouſand) arms, and clothes for the earl of Eſſex's foot, and detached the city brigade conſiſting of five thouſand men [m], beſides the neceſſary recruits, to join him. Sir William Waller had taken the field again, his army being recruited and re-inforced, and was now at Andover ready to march. The earl of Eſſex's horſe, which had fortunately eſcaped in Cornwall, were come to him, as well as thoſe ſent into the weſt, under the command of colonel Middleton. Thus the earl of Eſſex ſaw himſelf in condition to march the 17th of October in order to join ſir William Waller, and the earl of Mancheſter, who were within diſtance. The king having notice that Waller was to march to Reading, advanced with all poſſible diligence towards Andover, to give him battle before he had joined the earl of Eſſex. Nay, he fell upon his rear and killed twenty or thirty of his men. But this could not hinder the junction of the three armies, which was done the 21ſt of October.

Whilſt the king's enemies lay ſo near him, he very unadviſedly, as it ſeems, detached from his army the earl of Northampton with three regiments of horſe, to relieve Banbury caſtle, which had been beſieged ever ſince July the 19th, and was now reduced to extremity. The earl ſucceeded in his expedition, but the king was like to pay dear for it, ſince, a few days after, he was forced to fight, deprived of the aid of theſe three regiments. His deſign, as I ſaid, was only to retire to Oxford, there being no farther reaſon to induce him to purſue his march towards London. But he would firſt beſiege Dennington caſtle, and therefore advanced to Newbury, which lies but a mile from that caſtle, whilſt the parliament-army was at Reading. The next day, that army marched towards Newbury, where the king fortified himſelf in the beſt manner he could, and placed his foot in the intrenchments, whilſt the horſe were poſted in two adjoining open fields, and for ſome days there were frequent ſkirmiſhes between the two armies. At laſt, on the 27th of October (being Sunday) the parliament-generals having divided their forces into two bodies [n], attacked the king's intrenchments at two ſeveral places. The fight, which began about three or four in the afternoon, held till night, and was extremely ſharp, each ſide repulſing the other by turns. This is all that can be gathered with any certainty from the accounts of this battle, except that when night approached, the aſſailants forced part of the intrenchment, and took ſome pieces of ordnance. But night hindered them from improving this advantage, and put an end to the fight [o].

Mean while, the king fearing the enemy would next morning penetrate into his lines, withdrew in the night, and marched to Wallingford, leaving his heavy cannon and baggage in Dennington caſtle. The earl of Eſſex was not in the battle. He had quitted the army ſome days before, whether on account of ſome ſudden indiſpoſition, or perhaps out of ſome diſcontent, not being able to agree, either with the earl of Mancheſter, or ſir William Waller [p].

The parliament-generals, who thought themſelves victorious, ſhould, one would think, have attacked the king in his retreat, which they could not be ignorant of, it being then full moon. They ſuffered him to march however without purſuing him [q], ſo that he ſafely arrived at Oxford. But this was not their greateſt error. The king having left his cannon, ammunition, and baggage in Dennington caſtle, they could have done nothing more advantageous than to employ their whole ſtrength to take the caſtle. But they contented themſelves with ſummoning the governor [r], and, upon his refuſal to capitulate, they remained quiet at Newbury without attempting any thing againſt him. This negligence muſt have been owing to the diſſention amongſt them, the one blaming the other for being the cauſe, that with ſo ſuperior an army, the king's was not entirely routed. This diſſention grew ſo high, that whatever was propoſed by the one, was ſure to be oppoſed by the other. We ſhall ſee hereafter ſtill worſe effects of their diſcord, and the alterations it occaſioned.

Mean while, the king being informed of the diſcord between the parliament-generals, and of their leaving Dennington caſtle unattacked, very wiſely improved ſo favourable a juncture. Some days after his arrival at Oxford, he was joined by prince Rupert, who brought him ſome horſe. He drew a body of foot out of the garriſon of Oxford, and other neighbouring towns, and the earl of Northampton rejoined him with his brigade of horſe. By means of theſe ſupplies he formed an army of ſix thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe, with which he marched back towards Newbury the 2d of November. After the battle, the parliament-army had moved towards Oxford, but was returned to Newbury, on pretence that the ways were unpaſſable. But the chief reaſon was, the generals could not agree, there being no commander in chief. They received ſome intelligence of the king's march; but would not believe it till they heard of his being within ſix miles of Dennington. Whereupon they reſolved to draw up the next day between Dennington and the king's army. To that end, orders were given for all their horſe to rendezvous early on the morrow, it not being poſſible to march that day by reaſon their quarters were too ſeparate and remote. But that very night, the king purſued his march to Dennington, and drawing up his army, between the caſtle and Newbury waited in that poſture to ſee what the enemy would attempt. Though preſently after the parliament-army was alſo drawn up, the generals, having viewed the poſture and ſtrength of the king's, and held a council of war, judged it unſafe to engage. So, after ſome ſkirmiſhes, the king having drawn out what he left at Dennington, marched back to Oxford, where he arrived the 21ſt of November. In his way thither, he ſent a detachment of his army to the relief of (John Pawlet) marquis of Wincheſter, who had been long beſieged in his own caſtle of Baſing. But this detachment found the ſiege already raiſed. Thus ended the campaign of the year 1644, which proved not ſo fatal to the king as he had reaſon to fear, though however he loſt York and all the north.

It is time now to ſpeak of ſome other occurrences of the

I think I knew as much of his mind as others did, and always obſerved him to wish for peace, yet not upon diſhonourable or unjuſt terms. He was a lover of monarchy and nobility, which he ſuſpected ſome deſigned to deſtroy; which humour then beginning to boil up, he reſolved to ſuppreſs. The year 1644, which had no immediate relation to the war, but of which the knowledge is no leſs uſeful and neceſſary than that of conflicts and battles, though they have no natural connection together, nor depend upon each other.

March the 26th 1644, the parliament paſſed an ordinance, enjoining every family (within the bills of mortality, for three months) to forbear one meal a week, and contribute the value thereof for the public occaſions. This was properly laying a tax upon every family. For otherwiſe, very likely the parliament did not much care whether this weekly meal were forborn or not, provided the value (which was to be ſet upon each perſon and family) were paid.

April the 13th an Oxford ſpy was executed in the Palace-yard at Weſtminſter.

The 15th of the ſame month, it was voted by the commons, that the committee of both kingdoms ſhould prepare propoſitions for peace, to be preſented to the king. Not that they deſired then to enter into a new treaty with the king, for, ſince the conferences at Oxford were broken off, nothing had paſſed to induce them to alter their plan. But herein they had a double view, firſt to let the public ſee, they pretended not abſolutely to reject peace, as they were charged by the king: ſecondly, they had thereby a pretence ready to propoſe a peace, in caſe they were forced to it by the misfortunes of war during the campaign. What confirms this to have been their chief aim, is, that theſe propoſitions, which after all were the ſame in ſubſtance with thoſe debated at Oxford, were not ſent up to the lords till the 19th of Auguſt, at the very time that the earl of Eſſex was driven into Cornwall, and not to the king till the 20th of November.

To the year 1644 the affairs of the war were ſo publicly debated in the parliament, that the king was acquainted with the reſolutions there taken, before they were begun to be executed. But this year the managers thought fit to give the committee of both kingdoms, who were charged with the affairs of the war, more power than before, that they might give their orders, and cauſe them to be executed, without being obliged to communicate their reſolutions to both houſes. I do not know whether this was by expreſs vote, or by mere uſurpation, the committee knowing they ſhould at leaſt be avowed by the leading members, in caſe it was attempted to call them to an account. A conſiderable advantage indeed was hereby gained, in that the reſolutions became more private, and the king had not ſo good information. But on the other hand, the committee had by it a power which might be of very dangerous conſequence. And therefore ſeveral members complained, that the moſt important affairs were not communicated, but that the direction and management was reſerved to themſelves alone by the committee. The time for which they had been appointed being about to expire, the commons paſſed an ordinance for the continuance of the committee three months longer, and ſent it up to the lords. But the peers inſtead of paſſing the ordinance as ſent by the commons, added a clauſe to increaſe the number of the committee, with five lords and ten commoners (of their nomination) [s]. It is not to be doubted, the king's private friends uſed their endeavours to increaſe the number of the committee, in hopes of being able to gain ſome one to inform them of what ſhould paſs there. But the commons foreſeeing the conſequence of this addition, refuſed to conſent to it, and deſired the lords, that they would paſs the ordinance without any amendment. The lords declining to do it for ſometime, the commons found means to get the lord mayor and common-council of London to petition them among other things, that the committee of both kingdoms might be continued as it was [t]. Then the lords perceiving that ſince the city of London interpoſed, their reſiſtance would be fruitleſs, paſſed the ordinance four days after. The declarations of the city of London were a curb frequently uſed by the commons to ſtop the career of the king's friends, when by their cabals they were endeavouring to diſturb their deliberations, or to ſow diſcord between the two houſes. Beſides that it would have been dangerous as well as unjuſt to diſoblige that great city, by whom the charges of the war were chiefly born, experience had ſhewn, that the city had infallible expedients to ſupport their friends in the parliament. The hiſtorians of the two parties are in different ſentiments on this ſubject. The king's adherents pretend, that in general the Londoners were for the king, and would gladly have accepted the peace he was pleaſed to offer them, but were over-awed by their magiſtrates, who were almoſt all devoted to the parliament. On the contrary, the parliament's friends affirm, that the number of Londoners who were for the king was far ſhort of that of his enemies, and that the commotions now and then in the city, whether to demand peace, or to diſturb the parliament's debates, were but an effect of the cabals of ſome private perſons, who ſecretly adhered to the king, and endeavoured to ſow diſſention between the parliament and the city. That this manifeſtly appears in the ill ſucceſs of all their attempts.

There was in the London petition above-mentioned, another article of no leſs importance. A great many members of both houſes, as I have obſerved, had deſerted the parliament, before and after the beginning of the war. Some had taken this courſe out of affection to the king, and in order to ſerve him in his army, others by his expreſs command, ſeveral through fear and puniſhment, for endeavouring to force the parliament to a peace, and perhaps, ſome to avoid being expoſed to the outrages of the London mob. By the retreat of theſe members, the oppoſite party to the king was become ſo ſuperior in both houſes, that no man durſt any longer oppoſe whatever they thought proper to move. Indeed, it would have been very fruitleſs, for the king's new friends in the parliament to ſtrive to ſupport his intereſt. The king had therefore perceived, that his policy in diminiſhing the number of members in both houſes, inſtead of being advantageous, had on the contrary, proved very prejudicial to him, for by that means the reſolutions againſt him paſſed in parliament with much greater eaſe. His enemies were now freed from reſtraint, and met with no farther oppoſition. The commons perceiving, that from time to time ſome of theſe members returned to London, thought not proper to to admit them into the houſe, purſuant to a vote paſſed long before upon that head. They were apprehenſive, if ſuch members were admitted, the king might in time ſend them ſo great a number, as would ſuffice to obſtruct their deliberations. Mean while, to juſtify their refuſal to admit them, they ſo managed, that in the petition preſented to them by the common-council of London, was inſerted an article, that none of the members who had deſerted the parliament, ſhould be received, without ſatisfaction firſt given to both houſes for their future fidelity. In purſuance of this deſire it was declared ſoon after, by an ordinance, that ſuch peers as had deſerted, or ſhould deſert the parliament, ſhould not be readmitted without the conſent of both houſes; and that whatſoever member of the houſe of commons had ſo offended, or ſhould ſo offend hereafter, and adhere to thoſe that were levying war againſt the parliament, were and ſhould be abſolutely diſabled from ſitting in the houſe of commons. By this means, ſuch as might intend to return to the parliament for the king's ſervice, had ſufficient warning, that their artifice would be without effect.

(Robert Sidney) earl of Leiceſter, who about this time quitted Oxford, and returned to London, was not of the number of thoſe who forſook the king to do him ſervice. He had too much reaſon to be diſſatisfied with his majeſty, for amuſing him two years together, under colour of ſending him into Ireland, and for appointing at laſt the marquis of Ormond, for lord-lieutenant in his room. The earl of Leiceſter was however ordered into cuſtody at his coming to London; but, in all appearance, it was only to ſhew, that the new ordinance was intended to be rigorouſly executed.

In January 1643-4, the ſtates general of the United Provinces, ſent embaſſadors into England, to offer their mediation, which the two houſes made no great account of, knowing what credit the prince of Orange, the king's ſon-in-law, had in theſe provinces. Beſides, the embaſſadors, who were all ſuppoſed to be the prince of Orange's creatures, refuſed to acknowledge the two houſes of Weſtminſter, for the parliament of England. In ſhort, theſe embaſſadors, after ſeveral journies to Oxford, and attempts to perſuade the parliament to accept their mediation, without the previous acknowledgement required, fully owned the two houſes for the parliament of England, and preſented a memorial to offer their mediation. It muſt be obſerved this was the next day after the news of prince Rupert's defeat at Marſton-moor [u], [s] The reaſon was, 'Becauſe divers of the committee, eſpecially the commons, were apprehended not to be ſo much the general's friends, as others who were deſired to be brought in,' and this cauſed ſome piques among them. Whitelock, p. 87.

[t] This petition, ſays Whitelock, was ſuſpected by the general's friends, to be ſet on foot by his enemies, and jealouſy grew among the grandees of the parliament, p. 88.

[u] On June the 6th, the Dutch embaſſadors addreſſed themſelves to the two houſes in ſuch terms as were acceptable; and it was reſolved they ſhould be admitted to audience, which was done, July the 12th, in each houſe apart. Being brought into the houſe of peers, and chairs prepared for them, they delivered their embaſſy firſt in French, and then a copy thereof in Engliſh. Then they were conducted by the ſerjeant-at-arms, with two members, into the houſe of commons: when they came in, the ſpeaker and all

As they had long delayed this acknowledgement, both houſe left them ſome time, in their turn, without any anſwer, being willing, doubtleſs, to intimate to them, that this mediation did not appear to them ſufficiently impartial. Wherefore the 10th of December, they demanded a public audience, which was granted, and in which they offered again the mediation of their maſters. Both houſes anſwered, that they readily accepted the mediation of the States: but had already ſent propoſitions to the king for a treaty of peace, of which they were to wait the ſucceſs. That, moreover the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, being united together by a ſolemn covenant, they ſhould do nothing without the concurrence of the Scots, which would require ſome time. Thus they evaded the offers of the ſtates-general, not believing ſuch a mediation could be for their advantage.

In July it was ordered by the houſe of commons, that the fine impoſed by the ſtar-chamber upon Mr. Denzil Holles, for his aſſerting the liberties of his country in parliament, ſhould be repaid him out of the king's revenue.

In October, an ordinance of both houſes was publiſhed, commanding, that no quarter ſhould be given to any Iriſhman taken in arms againſt the parliament.

In November, the lord Macguire, and Mac Mahone, were brought upon their trials. They were apprehended at Dublin the very day they were to ſurprize the caſtle, and ſent into England, where they had been confined in the Tower ever ſince. They had found means to break priſon, and conceal themſelves in a houſe in London. But unfortunately hearing a woman crying oyſters in the ſtreet, one of them put his head out of window to call her, and was that inſtant eſpied by a ſervant of ſir John Clotworthy, who knew him, and immediately gave notice to the lieutenant of the Tower. They were both ſeized again, and ſhortly after condemned and executed [w].

Since the famous William Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury had been impriſoned at the end of the year 1640, I have had but little occaſion to ſpeak of him. It is time now to relate the cataſtrophe of his life. He was accuſed by the commons of high-treaſon, December the 18th, 1640, and thereupon committed to the cuſtody of the Black-rod. The 26th of February following, the articles of impeachment were brought in againſt him, and then he was ſent to the Tower. There he remained till October the 23d, 1643, when the commons having added ten freſh articles to the impeachment, he was ordered by the lords to anſwer the 30th of the ſame month. It would be too tedious to ſpecify all the petitions he preſented, and all the expedients his council furniſhed him with, to cauſe his ſentence to be deferred. It ſuffices to ſay, that he gained time till the 11th of November, 1644, on which day he ſpoke ſeveral hours together in his own defence [x]. But whether the commons were afraid their proofs were not ſufficient for his condemnation, or the delays granted him by the lords, gave them cauſe to think, they were inclined to ſave his life, they uſed the ſame method as in the caſe of the earl of Strafford, I mean a bill of attainder, which paſſed their houſe the ſame day the archbiſhop made his defence before the peers, with but one diſſenting vote. The bill being ſent up to the lords, they acquainted the commons at a conference, that indeed they found the archbiſhop guilty of the charge as to matters of fact, but deſired ſome farther ſatisfaction in point of law, whether the matters amounted to treaſon. Whereupon the commons communicated to them the reaſons, whereby they pretended to prove him guilty of that crime. Upon which the lords, the 4th of January, paſſed the bill of attainder, whereby it was ordained, he ſhould ſuffer death as in caſes of high-treaſon, and, on the 6th, both houſes ordered he ſhould be executed the 10th. On the 7th, the lords at a conference informed the commons of a pardon to the archbiſhop from the king, dated the 12th of April, 1643, but it was over-ruled and rejected. The ſame day, the archbiſhop ſeeing there was no remedy, petitioned the lords, that the manner of his execution might be changed to beheading. He deſired alſo, that ſome of his chaplains might be permitted to be with him before and at his death. The lords very readily granted his two requeſts, but the commons refuſed both, and ſent him two miniſters whom he did not aſk for, with one of thoſe he deſired. The next day he preſented a ſecond petition to be beheaded, ſetting forth, that he was a divine, biſhop, privy-counſellor, and peer; whereupon the commons were at length prevailed with. When he was upon the ſcaffold, he made a pretty long ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he inſinuated, that he ſuffered for not forſaking the temple of God, to follow the bleatings of Jeroboam's calves, alluding to the ſchiſm of the preſbyterians. He ſaid,—"He had ranſacked every corner of his heart, and thanked God, he had not found any ſins there deſerving death, by the known laws of the land. The king had been traduced by ſome for labouring to bring in popery, but, upon his conſcience, he knew him to be as free from ſuch a charge as any man living, and held him to be as ſound a proteſtant, according to the religion eſtabliſhed by law, as any perſon in the kingdom. He proteſted he never endeavoured the ſubverſion of the laws of the realm, nor never any change of the proteſtant religion, into popiſh ſuperſtition. He had never been an enemy to parliaments, but did indeed diſlike the miſgovernment of one or two."—After he had prayed, the executioner did his office at one blow. His friends were permitted to take his body, and bury it in Alhallows-Barking church. Such was the end of this famous prelate, who, let his favourers ſay what they pleaſe, was one of the chief authors of the troubles that afflicted England: firſt, by ſupporting with all his power the arbitrary principles, which the court ſtrove for ſeveral years to eſtabliſh: ſecondly, by a too rigid obſervance of trifles in the divine ſervice, and by compelling every one to conform thereto. All that can be ſaid in his favour, is, that he believed in his own conſcience, this rigidneſs was neceſſary [y].

The ſame day the lords paſſed the bill of attainder againſt the archbiſhop, they paſſed likewiſe an ordinance, that the Book of Common-Prayer ſhould be laid aſide, and the Directory eſtabliſhed, which had been framed by the aſſembly of divines. Hereby the church of England was rendered by public authority, completely preſbyterian, to the great ſatisfaction of the Scots, and many of the principal members of both houſes. This was an ill preparative for the peace which was now negociating, and of which I have deferred to ſpeak hitherto, that the narration might not be interrupted.

The king, as hath been often ſeen, ſent meſſage upon meſſage to the two houſes, with overtures of peace; and, no doubt, he would have granted it very willingly, had they been as ready to receive it in his ſenſe. But they perfectly knew what they were to underſtand by the word peace. Beſides, at the very time the king offered to treat with both all the members ſtood up in their places uncovered, and the embaſſadors ſaluted them as they paſſed by them; they ſat down in chairs ſet for them, and the members ſat down likewiſe; and when the embaſſadors were covered the ſpeaker and houſe were covered alſo. They made a ſhort ſpeech, of the affection of their maſters to theſe kingdoms, and their deſire to mediate an agreement between the king and his parliament; and after their ſpeech ended, they returned with the ſame ceremonies as at their coming thither. During the time of their being in the houſe, there lay upon the table, in their view, forty-eight colours, taken from the king's forces in the battle of Marſton-moor. Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 716. [y] The managers at his trial were, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Brown, ſerjeant Wild, Mr. Nicholas, for the commons; and his council were, Mr. Herne, and Mr. Chute. The ſum of his charge was, That he had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England, and inſtead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary government. The chaplains he deſired to have with him, were Stern, Haywood, and Martin; thoſe ſent by the commons, were, Stern, Marſhal, and Palmer. He called his laſt ſpeech a ſermon, and began with a text, Heb. xii. 1, 2. In his printed defence which he left behind him, he excuſes himſelf in moſt particulars, by ſaying, That he was but one of many, who either in council, ſtar-chamber, or high-commiſſion, voted illegal things. His diary ſhews him to be ſuperſtitious, and a regarder of dreams. He was, in the main, a learned, ſincere, and zealous man, humble in his private deportment; but withal, hot and indiſcreet, eagerly purſuing trifles, as bowing to the communion-table, ſports on the lord's day, &c. Ruſhworth, Burnet, Whitelock.——Among other works of piety and magnificence, this great prelate built a court at St. John's college Oxon: procured king Charles to give to the clergy in Ireland all the impropriations then remaining in the crown: ſettled the impropriation of Cudſden on the biſhopric of Oxon: got Commendams annexed to the biſhoprics of the new foundation: obtained very ample charters for the univerſities of Oxford and Dublin, and regulated the ſtatutes of the former: founded an Arabic lecture at Oxford, and an hoſpital in Reading: ſet up a Greek preſs in London, &c. He deſigned other great things, of which ſee an account in Ruſhworth, tom. II. p. 74, 75.——The tranſlator has received in a letter, the following remarks on this famous archbiſhop: the author of the letter thinks Rapin worthy of animadverſion, for ſeeming to grant (in his character, above,) moſt of the fine qualities aſcribed to him by his admirers, namely wiſdom, learning, and good ſenſe. "For (continues he) unleſs giving a ſeries of the moſt violent and tyrannical counſels, be a proof of wiſdom, it does not appear, wherein his wiſdom conſiſted. Some learning indeed he had, with a good ſhare of ſchool-divinity, languages, and antiquities. But theſe of themſelves, are but very ſlender accompliſhments, affording the mind the ſhew, rather than the ſubſtance of knowledge, and tending more to fortify men in their prejudices, than to enlarge their underſtanding. And for his good ſenſe, let his own ſpeeches in the ſtar-chamber remain as everlaſting proofs of it; particularly his argument to excuſe the painter for repreſenting God like an old man, drawn from his being called 'The ancient of days.' Examine either his actions or ſpeeches, and there can hardly be found any thing that looks like good ſenſe, or even common diſcretion. His own diary (however barbarous it was to publiſh it) ſhews him a man of a very mean genius, a bigot, and an enthuſiaſt."

The

houſes, he carefully avoided uſing any term that might intimate his owning them to be a parliament. It was neceſſary therefore, if they deſired to treat with him, either that he ſhould expreſsly acknowledge them, or that they ſhould treat as private perſons without authority. But ſuppoſing they could have reſolved to do ſo, what would ſuch a treaty have ſignified? This was the pretence uſed by both houſes, during the campaign of the year 1644, not to anſwer the king's invitations. Mean while, as the king talked very much of his frequent offers to perſuade the people of his ſincere deſire of peace, and of the refuſal of both houſes, they reſolved to oblige him to explain more clearly, what he meant by peace, that the people might examine whether he offered ſufficient ſecurity. For, as I ſaid, this was the only point in queſtion. The treaty at Oxford, where two propoſitions only were debated, not having fully cleared this matter, the two houſes thought it would be for their advantage to induce the king, by a ſecond treaty, to declare poſitively, that he would give no other ſecurity than his bare word. They hoped this would ſuffice to efface the impreſſions his repeated offers might have made on the minds of the people.

During the campaign, it was no proper ſeaſon for ſuch a negotiation, by reaſon of the variety of accidents produced by the war. It was not till November the 26th, two days after the king's return to Oxford, that the two houſes ſent him the propoſitions, which had been prepared in the ſummer. They had ſent to deſire a ſafe-conduct for their commiſſioners, which the king had granted but as to private perſons, without one word to denote his conſidering them as the parliament's commiſſioners. Though the two houſes were by no means pleaſed with ſuch a ſafe-conduct, they accepted it however, and their commiſſioners repaired to Oxford, where the king arrived the day before [z]. At the firſt audience, the king aſked them, "Whether they had power to treat?" they anſwered, "No; their commiſſion was only to receive his majeſty's anſwer in writing." The king replied, "Then a letter-carrier might have done as much as you." In all appearance, he had expected, that the two houſes would treat with him, without his owning them for the parliament of England, in which he was much miſtaken. He heard the propoſitions read with great attention and patience, and then receiving them from their hands, told them, he would give them his anſwer.

Montague Bartu earl of Lindſey, who was with the king at Oxford, having ſent his compliments to Holles and Whitelock, they two, with the conſent of the reſt of the commiſſioners, returned his civility by a viſit. They found him indiſpoſed, and in his bed; but he received them however, in preſence of ſeveral lords who were in his room. Preſently after, the king came in, and had a long conference with them. He told them, "He knew that they were both deſirous of a peace, and wiſhed, that all the reſt of the members were of their opinion; and therefore, ſays he, out of the confidence I have of you two, I aſk your advice, what anſwer will be beſt for me to give at this time to your propoſitions, which may probably further ſuch a peace, as all good men deſire?" Whitelock anſwered, "The beſt and moſt ſatisfactory anſwer, I humbly believe, would be your majeſty's preſence with your parliament, and which I hope might be without danger to you." The king, perceiving they did not care to ſpeak their minds before ſo much company, ſaid, "I deſire you two to go into the next room, confer a little together, and ſet down in writing what you apprehend may be fit for me to return in anſwer to your meſſage." Whereupon they withdrew into another room, and, by Holles's intreaty, Whitelock wrote down what was their ſenſe in this matter, and what might be fit for the ſubſtance of the king's anſwer. But this he did not in his uſual hand, and without any name to it. The paper thus written being left upon the table, the king went in, and took it up immediately. No perſon was preſent, neither did the king admit any others to hear the diſcourſe which paſſed between him and them. It cannot be denied, it was very extraordinary for theſe commiſſioners to confer in private with the king, unknown to their colleagues, to whom they imparted nothing of what had paſſed between the king and them. [1644-5] Accordingly, ſhortly after, the lord Savile, now made earl of Suſſex, who was in the earl of Lindſey's room when the king came in, and who returned afterwards to the parliament, accuſed them publicly of having held private conferences with the king. But as he was not able to prove what he advanced, the thing reſted there. What I have been ſaying remained a ſecret, till Whitelock publiſhed it in his Memorials, and even there we do not find the contents of the paper written with his own hand [a]. But however, it is not impoſſible to vindicate theſe two commiſſioners, who having, doubtleſs, ſome knowledge of the plot that was now contriving, and of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter, wiſhed that a peace might be concluded before the plot was executed. In all appearance, they adviſed the king, in order to promote a peace, to grant the parliament certain articles, otherwiſe they foreſaw peace would be impoſſible; but the king thought not fit to follow their advice [b].

The next day the king ſent his anſwer ſealed up to the commiſſioners; but they refuſed to receive it, unleſs they had a copy of it. The king denied it ſome time [c], at laſt gave them a copy. The ſubſtance of it was only to demand a ſafe-conduct for the duke of Lenox and the earl of Southampton, to carry his anſwer to the propoſitions. As this anſwer was not directed to any perſon, nor the parliament ſo much as named in it, the commiſſioners made ſome ſcruple to receive it. They were prevailed with however, on the ſuppoſition, that the two houſes would be at liberty to make what uſe of it they pleaſed. This paper being read at a conference of both houſes, the exceptions againſt the form and want of directions were warmly debated; but at laſt, it was carried to lay aſide all objections, and ordered that the earl of Eſſex ſhould write to prince Rupert to this effect: "That if his majeſty will ſend to the parliament of England aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and to the commiſſioners of the kingdom of Scotland, they would with all readineſs grant a ſafe-conduct for the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton." The king was extremely loth to do this; but the affair being debated in his council, none oppoſed it but himſelf. Nevertheleſs he could not be prevailed with, till after he was furniſhed with this expedient, to make a proteſtation againſt it in private, which ſhould be recorded. After that, prince Rupert's anſwer being worded as both houſes deſired, the ſafe-conduct was ſent to Oxford.

The two lords, ſent from the king, being come to London, delivered the king's anſwer to both houſes [d], dated the 13th of December, containing only, That whereas he found it very difficult to return a poſitive anſwer, before a full debate, to their propoſitions, if the two houſes would appoint commiſſioners, he would nominate the like number to treat with them at any place that ſhould be agreed on. As the king thought a common-letter carrier might have done the office of the commiſſioners, who brought the propoſitions, ſo it might be aſked, where was the neceſſity of ſending two of the principal men of his court and council, to carry this anſwer to both houſes. But, in all appearance, the king's aim was to get information, by means of theſe two lords and his friends in London, of ſome things which he was not fully acquainted with [e]. However this be, not to dwell too long upon preliminaries, the particulars whereof are not abſolutely neceſſary, it ſuffices to ſay, that the following articles were agreed on: That the commiſſioners of both parties ſhould meet at Uxbridge: that the conferences ſhould begin the 30th of January 1644-5, and ſhould laſt twenty days: that the propoſitions, as well on the king's as the [z] The propoſitions having been prepared by the committee of both kingdoms, and approved of by both houſes, the commiſſioners were appointed, namely, for the peers, the earl of Denbigh, and the lord Maynard; for the commons, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Holles, Mr. Whitelock, and the lord Wenman; and for Scotland, the lord Maitland, ſir Charles Erſkine, and Mr. Barclay. Whitelock, p. 111.

[a] Rapin has committed ſome miſtakes in his account of this matter, particularly he makes the paper to be written by Holles; but they are corrected in the tranſlation, with ſome ſmall additions from Whitelock's Memorials; which, though mentioned here and elſewhere by the author, he never ſaw but as quoted in Ruſhworth.

[b] Whitelock, in his ſpeech to the houſe, when accuſed by the lord Savile, ſays, the king preſſed very much the unreaſonableneſs of the propoſitions, particularly thoſe concerning religion and the militia; but he was told, that unleſs he would grant them, it would be in vain to treat of any peace, p. 154, 155.

[c] And told them, "What is the anſwer to you, who are but to carry what I ſend; and if I ſend the ſong of Robin Hood and Little John, you muſt carry it?" This, and other paſſages there were, which ſhewed the king to be then in no good humour, and it was wondered at, ſince the diſobliging the commiſſioners could be of no advantage to the king. Whitelock, p. 114, 115.

[d] The houſes were ſomewhat at a loſs about the manner of their delivering their meſſage, as it was directed to the Scotch commiſſioners, as well as to the parliament. But at laſt it was reſolved, that their reception ſhould be by a committee of fourteen lords, and twenty-eight commoners, and the Scotch commiſſioners, in the painted chamber. Ruſhworth, tom. 5. p. 790.

[e] Had Rapin ſeen Whitelock's Memorials, he would have found his conjecture confirmed. He ſays, both houſes deſired of the duke of Richmond, and the earl of Southampton, a liſt of their retinue, to the end no affront might be offered to them, but chiefly to diſcover ſuch as came to town with theſe lords, under pretence of being of their retinue, when they were not, but came to do ill offices to the parliament. Whitelock ſays, they were civilly treated, whereas at Oxford, he and the reſt had been ſeurvily uſed, p. 118.

parliament's ſide, ſhould be reduced to theſe three heads, religion, the militia, and Ireland: that religion ſhould be treated upon, three days together; then the militia three days more; and after that, Ireland, as many; which done, the affairs of religion ſhould be reſumed for three days; then the buſineſs of the militia; and laſtly, Ireland for the ſame time. The king's commiſſioners were, the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earl of Southampton, the earl of Kingſton, the earl of Chicheſter, and eleven others, among whom was ſir Edward Hyde chancellor of the exchequer, afterwards earl of Clarendon [f]. Thoſe for the parliament were twelve in number, the chief whereof were the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Saliſbury, aud Denbigh [g]; and for Scotland the principal were, the earl of Lowdon lord-chancellor of Scotland, and the marquis of Argyle [h]. I intend not to relate the particulars of this negotiation, which was tranſacted by papers and anſwers in writing, but ſhall content myſelf with mentioning the principal matters. The king's propoſitions were in ſubſtance the ſame with thoſe he had given at Oxford, without any alteration as to the ſenſe. The parliament's were not much different from the Oxford ones, but more large and full, and therefore I think it proper to inſert them.

That the militia of the city of London, and of the pariſhes without, may be in the ordering and government of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council.

"That the Tower of London may be in the government of the city of London, and the chief officer and governor thereof from time to time be nominated and removeable by the common-council.

"That the citizens or forces of London ſhall not be drawn out of the city into any other parts of the kingdom, without their own conſent, and that the drawing of their forces into other parts of the kingdom in theſe diſtracted times, may not be drawn into examples for the future.

"And for prevention of inconveniences, which may happen by the long intermiſſion of common-councils, it is deſired, that there be an act, that all by-laws and ordinances already made, or hereafter to be made, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council, touching the calling, continuing, and regulating of the ſame, ſhall be as effectual in law, as if the ſame were particularly enacted by the authority of parliament. And that the lord mayor, aldermen and common-council may add to, or repeal the ſaid ordinances from time to time, as they ſhall ſee cauſe.

"That ſuch other propoſitions as ſhall be made for the city for their farther ſafety, welfare, and government, and ſhall be approved of by both houſes of parliament, may be granted and confirmed by act of parliament."

If, after the reading of theſe propoſitions, it ſhould be inquired what authority the two houſes intended to leave the king, ſuppoſing he had accepted them, it would be difficult to diſcover it. They pretended, as it evidently appears, to leave him only an empty title, and inveſt themſelves with the ſovereignty, and that, not by artifice, but openly and publicly. Their principle was, that the king, having rendered himſelf unworthy, by the breach of his oaths, and of the truſt repoſed in him by the people, to hold the reins of the government, the ſupreme authority was to return to its original fountain, that is, to the people, repreſented by the two houſes. Accordingly they did not pretend that the juſtice or injuſtice of theſe propoſitions ſhould be debated in the treaty of Uxbridge; for it would have been ridiculous to aſſign but twenty days for ſuch an examination; but they gave them as conditions from which they would not depart, and which the king was to embrace or reject. For this reaſon, the king's commiſſioners endeavoured in vain to enter into a diſcuſſion of the propoſitions. All they gained by that was, that the parliament's commiſſioners offered to demonſtrate by word of mouth, in private conferences, that the propoſitions were very juſt. After that, pretending to have urged ſatisfactory arguments, they coldly demanded their aſſent, though the king's commiſſioners were far from being convinced by the reaſons alleged to them. This method of proceeding baffled the king's commiſſioners, who had prepared many arguments, objections, and difficulties againſt the propoſitions, and determined to find fault with every expreſſion. For, after all, the king was no more deſirous of a peace than the two houſes, as will preſently appear, and indeed it was almoſt impoſſible, conſidering the contrariety between the principles on which the two parties founded their reſpective rights. To ſay all in one word, the parliament's commiſſioners departed not from one tittle of what was contained in the propoſitions.

In the firſt place, as to religion, the need both houſes ſtood in of Scotland, and the covenant made between the two nations, allowed them not to queſtion the juſtice of that covenant, which had now been ſworn to in both kingdoms. Accordingly it may be affirmed, their commiſſioners defended this article very ill. For, to prove the neceſſity of the alterations made in religion, and in the diſcipline of the church, the confirmation whereof they demanded, the beſt argument they alleged was the covenant itſelf. It is true, in ſome conferences their miniſters were ordered to ſpeak, and endeavour to ſhow that epiſcopacy was not jure divino. But this did not prove the abſolute neceſſity of deſtroying it in England. All their reaſonings were built upon the pretended miſchiefs it had occaſioned. But when the king's commiſſioners propoſed to ſuffer epiſcopacy to remain, and to reform the abuſes thereof, the reaſons alleged by thoſe of the parliament not to agree to it were extremely weak [1].

For the militia, an article which included the ordering of the forces of the kingdom, the cuſtody of places, the nomination to great poſts, &c. the parliament could not depart from it, without owning, they were making war very wrongfully, ſince they pretended to do it, but in order to obtain ſuch ſecurities, as they believed they had a right to demand. If by a treaty, they ſhould have accepted the king's word as ſufficient ſecurity, every one would have perceived they might have avoided the war, by accepting that ſecurity which the king had always offered before the breach. It muſt however be confeſſed, this article might very juſtly have been deemed a proper ſubject for a treaty. But the parliament ſeems to have firmly adhered to the article of the militia, only to lay invincible obſtacles to a peace. For it may be affirmed, that neither party deſired peace, unleſs greater advantages could be procured by a treaty than by arms.

As for Ireland, the two houſes thought they had upon this article ſo great an advantage, that they were glad to expoſe the king to give ill reaſons in his defence. It is therefore certain, it was not properly with deſign to make peace that the two houſes ſent their commiſſioners to Uxbridge. Their ſole aim was, to let their party ſee, they were determined to ſupport the alterations they had made in religion, and the eſtabliſhment of preſbyterianiſm: to ſhew the public, the king, when he ſo frequently offered peace, offered only a peace very deſtructive and dangerous to the nation: laſtly, to confirm the people in their ſuſpicions, that the king did not proceed as he ought in the affairs of Ireland.

The king, on his part, was no more inclined to ſeek expedients for a peace than the two houſes. If he ſent his commiſſioners to Uxbridge, it was, firſt, becauſe having ſo often expreſſed his earneſt deſire to treat, he could not decently recede, when he was, as I may ſay, taken at his word. Secondly, he knew, it had been moved in the parliament to purſue the war more vigorouſly than ever, and that in order to do it with greater ſucceſs, ſuch alterations in the army were contriving, as could not but be diſadvantageous to him. He hoped therefore by means of the treaty of Uxbridge, to retard the execution of that project, as well as the parliament's preparations. Thirdly, he did not queſtion, but the unreaſonable demands of both houſes would produce a good effect for him in the minds of the people, becauſe they would clearly ſee, that the parliament's aim was to deſtroy entirely the worſhip of the church of England, practiſed ever ſince the reformation; to aſſume to themſelves the ſovereignty under colour of curbing the power of the crown; and, in a word, to change the conſtitution of the government in church and ſtate. But though he had conſented to treat of the parliament's propoſitions, he was however reſolved never to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy, or diminution of the regal authority, nor to deprive himſelf of the aid he expected to receive from Ireland, by a peace with the rebels, unleſs he was firſt ſure of peace in England.

[1] Upon the entrance into the debate of religion, Dr. Stewart ſpoke againſt preſbyterian government, and for epiſcopal, which he alleged to be jure divino. Mr. Henderſon anſwered him, and aſſerted, that epiſcopacy was not ſo ſuitable to the word of God as preſbytery, which he urged to be jure divino. Whereupon the marquis of Hertford ſpoke to this effect: "My lords, here is much ſaid concerning church-government in the general; the reverend doctors on the king's part affirm, that epiſcopacy is jure divino; the reverend miniſters of the other part do affirm, that preſbytery is jure divino: for my part, I think that neither the one nor the other, nor any government whatſoever, is jure divino; and I deſire we may leave this argument, and proceed to debate upon the particular propoſals. The earl of Pembroke, ſays Whitelock, and many of the commiſſioners, were of the ſame judgment. Whitelock. p. 128.

What has been advanced concerning the little inclination of both parties to peace, wants no proof with reſpect to the parliament. Their propoſitions, the proceedings of their commiſſioners, and the ſhort ſpace they aſſigned for the treaty, are clear evidences of it. As for the king, there are ſtill more convincing proofs. Firſt, there is not the leaſt likelihood, that in his ſituation, if he had really and ſincerely reſolved to labour for peace, he would have been willing, I won't ſay to accept, but even to liſten to propoſitions, which tended to leave him only the empty title of king, and to deprive him wholly of the exerciſe of the royal power. Had he been priſoner in the hands of the parliament, harder terms could ſcarce have been propoſed to him. And indeed, when that misfortune befel him afterwards, the parliament made very little additions to theſe terms propoſed to him at Uxbridge, when he was yet able to defend himſelf. Secondly, the intentions I aſcribe to the king, with regard to peace, are proved by ſeveral papers found in his cabinet in the battle of Naſeby, fought a few months after, and which the parliament ordered to be printed and publiſhed. I ſhall give here ſome extracts of them, becauſe they relate to the treaty at Uxbridge, of which I am now ſpeaking. I own, it is not impoſſible, theſe papers may have been curtailed or forged by the publiſhers. But a bare poſſibility, without other proofs, would not be ſufficient to take away all credit from theſe papers, the originals whereof the parliament boaſted to have in their hands. Beſides, the impartial reader can find nothing in them contrary to the genius and character of Charles I. or to the ſtate of his affairs.

Directions for my Uxbridge commiſſioners.

Firſt, concerning religion.

"IN this, the government of the church (as I ſuppoſe) will be the chief queſtion, wherein two things are to be conſidered, conſcience and policy.

"For the firſt, I muſt declare unto you, that I cannot yield to the change of the government by biſhops, not only as I fully concur with the general opinion of Chriſtians in all ages, as being the beſt, but likewiſe I hold myſelf particularly bound, by the oath I took at my coronation, not to alter the government of this church, from what I found it, And as for the church's patrimoney, I cannot ſuffer any diminution or alienation of it, it being, without peradventure, ſacrilege, and likewiſe contrary to my coronation-oath. But whatſoever ſhall be offered for rectifying of abuſes, if any have crept in, or yet for the eaſe of tender conſciences, (ſo that it endamage not the foundation) I am content to hear, and will be ready to give a gracious anſwer thereunto.

"For the ſecond; as the king's duty is to protect the church, ſo it is the church's to aſſiſt the king in the maintenance of his juſt authority; wherefore my predeceſſors have been always careful, (eſpecially ſince the reformation) to keep the dependency of the clergy entirely upon the crown, without which it will ſcarcely ſit faſt upon the king's head; therefore you muſt do nothing to change or leſſen this neceſſary dependency.

"Next concerning the militia. After conſcience, this is certainly the fitteſt ſubject for the king's quarrel: for without it the kingly power is but a ſhadow, and therefore upon no means to be quitted, but to be maintained according to the ancient known laws of the land: yet becauſe (to attain to this ſo-much-wiſhed peace by all good men,) it is in a manner neceſſary, that ſufficient and real ſecurity be given for the performance of what ſhall be agreed upon, I permit you, either by leaving ſtrong towns, or other military force to the rebels poſſeſſion (until articles be performed) to give ſuch aſſurance for performance of conditions, as you ſhall judge neceſſary for to conclude a peace, provided always, that you take (at leaſt) as great care, by ſufficient ſecurity, that conditions be performed to me, and to make ſure, that the peace once ſettled, all things ſhall return into their ancient channels.

"As for Ireland, I confeſs they have very ſpecious popular arguments to preſs this point, the gaining of no article more conducing to their ends than this; and I have as much reaſon, in both honour and policy, to take care how to anſwer this as any. All the world knows the eminent, inevitable neceſſity, which cauſed me to make the Iriſh ceſſation; and there remain yet as ſtrong reaſons for the concluding of that peace; wherefore you muſt conſent to nothing to hinder me therein, until a clear way be ſhewn me how my proteſtant ſubjects there, may probably (at leaſt) defend themſelves, and that I ſhall have no more need to defend my conſcience and crown from the injuries of this rebellion."

Memorials for ſecretary Nicholas, concerning the treaty at Uxbridge.

Oxford, Feb. 1644.

"I. FOR religion and church-government, I will not go one jot farther than what is offered by you already.

"II. And ſo for the militia, more than what ye have allowed by me; but even in that you muſt obſerve, that I muſt have free nomination of the full half; as if the total number of Scots, and all, be thirty, I will name fifteen. Yet if they (I mean the Engliſh rebels) will be ſo baſe as to admit of ten Scots, to twenty Engliſh, I am contented to name five Scots, and ten Engliſh; and ſo proportionably to any number that ſhall be agreed upon.

"III. As for gaining of particular perſons, beſides ſecurity, I give you power to promiſe them rewards for performed ſervices, not ſparing to engage for places, ſo they be not of great truſt, or be taken away from honeſt men in poſſeſſion, but as much profit as you will. With this laſt you are only to acquaint Richmond, Southampton, Culpepper, and Hyde."

The queen to the king.

Paris, Jan. 6. Decemb. 27, 1644-5.

"——— I UNDERSTAND that the commiſſioners are arrived at London; I have nothing to ſay, but that you have a care of your honour, and that if you have a peace, it may be ſuch as may hold; and if it fall out otherwiſe, that you do not abandon thoſe who have ſerved you, for fear they do forſake you in your need: alſo, I do not ſee how you can be in ſafety without a regiment of guards; for myſelf I think I cannot be, ſeeing the malice which they have againſt me, and my religion, of which I hope you will have a care of both; but, in my opinion, religion ſhould be the laſt thing upon which you ſhould treat: for if you do agree upon ſtrictneſs againſt the catholics, it would diſcourage them to ſerve you; and if afterwards there ſhould be no peace, you could never expect ſuccours either from Ireland, or any other catholic prince, for they would believe you would abandon them, after you have ſerved yourſelf."—

His majeſty's letter to the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, Dec. 1644.

"——— KNOW (as a certain truth) that all, even my party, are ſtrangely impatient for peace, which obliged me ſo much the more, at all occaſions, to ſhew my real intentions to peace; and likewiſe, I am put in very good hopes, (ſome hold it a certainty) that if I ſhould come to a fair treaty, the ring-leading rebels could not hinder me from a good peace: firſt, becauſe their own party are moſt weary of the war, and likewiſe for the great diſtractions which at this time moſt aſſuredly are amongſt themſelves, as preſbyterians againſt independents in religion, and general againſt general in point of command. Upon theſe grounds a treaty being moſt deſirable, (not without hope of good ſucceſs) the moſt probable means to procure it was to be uſed, which might ſtand with honour and ſafety. Amongſt the reſt, (for I will omit all thoſe which are unqueſtionably concealable) the ſound of my return to London, was thought to have ſo much force of popular rhetoric in it, that upon it a treaty would be had, or if refuſed, it would bring much prejudice prejudice to them, and be advantageous to me; yet, leſt fooliſh or malicious people ſhould interpret this, as to proceed from fear or folly, I have joined conditions with the propoſition (without which this ſound will ſignify nothing) which thou wilt find to be moſt of the chief ingredients of an honourable and ſafe peace. Then obſerve, if a treaty at London, with commiſſioners for both ſides, may be had without it, it is not to be uſed, nor in caſe they will treat with nobody but myſelf; ſo that the conditions ſave any aſperſion of diſhonour, and the treating at London, the malignity which our factious ſpirits here may infuſe into this treaty upon this ſubject. This I hope will ſecure thee from the trouble, which otherwiſe may be cauſed by falſe malicious rumours; and though I judge myſelf ſecure in thy thoughts, from ſuſpecting me guilty of any baſeneſs, yet I held this account neceſſary, to the end thou may make others know, as well as thyſelf, this certain truth, that no danger of death or miſery (which I think much worſe) ſhall make me do any thing unworthy of thy love.—I conclude, by conjuring thee as thou loveſt me, that no appearance of peace, nor hopeful conditions of mine, make thee neglect to haſten ſuccour for him, who is eternally thine."

To the queen.

Jan. 1, 1644.

"——— I SHALL now tell thee, That the rebels are engaged into an equal treaty,—and that the diſtractions of London were never ſo great, or ſo likely to bring good effect as now. Laſtly, that the aſſiſtance was never more needful, never ſo likely as now to do good to him, who is eternally thine."

To the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, Jan. 2, 1644.

"——— As for my calling thoſe at London a parliament, I ſhall refer thee to Digby for particular ſatisfaction; this is in general: if there had been but two (beſides myſelf) of my opinion, I had not done it: and the argument that prevailed with me was, that the calling did no ways acknowledge them to be a parliament. Upon which condition and conſtruction I did it, and no otherwiſe, and accordingly it is regiſtered in the council-books, with the council's unanimous approbation."—

To the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, Jan. 22, 1644.

"——— I BELIEVE thou wilt approve of my choice of treators; and for my propoſitions, they differ nothing in ſubſtance (very little in words) from thoſe which were laſt.

"Now upon the whole matter, I deſire thee to ſhew the queen and miniſters there, the improbability that this preſent treaty ſhould produce a peace, conſidering the great ſtrange difference (if not contrariety) of grounds that are betwixt the rebels propoſitions and mine, and that I cannot alter mine, nor will they ever theirs, until they be out of hope to prevail by force, which a little aſſiſtance by thy means will ſoon make them ſo; for I am confident, if ever I could put them to a defenſive (which a reaſonable ſum of money would do) they would be eaſily brought to reaſon."

The queen to the king.

My dear heart, Paris, Jan. 17th, 27th, 1644.

"——— TOM Elliot, two days ſince, hath brought me much joy and ſorrow; the firſt to know the good eſtate in which you are, the other, the fear I have that you go to London. I cannot conceive where the wit was of thoſe who gave you this counſel; unleſs it be to hazard your perſon to ſave theirs: but thanks be to God, to day I received one of yours by the embaſſador of Portugal, dated in January, which comforted me much to ſee that the treaty ſhall be at Uxbridge. For the honour of God, truſt not yourſelf in the hands of theſe people; and if you ever go to London, before the parliament be ended, or without a good army, you are loſt. I underſtand that the propoſitions for the peace muſt begin by diſbanding the army; if you conſent to this, you ſhall be loſt, they having the whole power of the militia, they have done and will do whatſoever they will. I received yeſterday letters from the duke of Lorrain, who ſends me word, if his ſervice be agreeable to you, he will bring you ten thouſand men. Dr. Goffe, whom I have ſent into Holland ſhall treat with him in his paſſage upon this buſineſs, and I hope very ſpeedily to ſend good news of this, as alſo of the money; aſſure yourſelf, I will be wanting in nothing you ſhall deſire, and that I will hazard my life, that is, to die by famine, rather then not ſend to you. Send me word always by whom you receive my letters; for I write both by the embaſſador of Portugal, and the reſident of France: above all, have a care not to abandon thoſe who have ſerved you, as well the biſhops, as the poor catholics. Adieu."—

The king to the queen.

Jan. 30.

"——— THE treaty begins this day. I deſire thee to be confident, that I ſhall never make a peace by abandoning my friends, nor ſuch a one as will not ſtand with my honour and ſafety."—

To the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, Feb. 15th, 25th, 1644.

"——— AS for our treaty there is every day leſs hopes than other, that it would produce a peace, but I will abſolutely promiſe thee, that if we have one, it ſhall be ſuch as ſhall invite thy return; for I vow, that without thy company, I can neither have peace nor comfort within myſelf. The limited days for treating are now almoſt expired, without the leaſt agreement upon any one article; wherefore I have ſent for enlargement of days, that the whole treaty may be laid open to the world; and I aſſure thee, that thou needeſt not doubt the iſſue of this treaty, for my commiſſioners are ſo well choſen, (though I ſay it) that they will neither be threatened nor diſputed from the grounds I have given them, which, upon my word, is according to the little note thou ſo well remembereſt, and in this not only their obedience, but their judgments concur.—

"In ſhort, there is little or no appearance, but that this ſummer will be the hotteſt for war of any that hath been yet; and be confident, that in making peace, I ſhall ever ſhew my conſtancy in adhering to biſhops and all our friends, and not forget to put a ſhort period to this perpetual parliament. But as thou loveſt me, let none perſuade thee to ſlacken thine aſſiſtance for him who is eternally thine."

C. R.

To the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, Feb. 19, 1644.

"I cannot yet ſend thee any certain word concerning the iſſue of our treaty, only the unreaſonable ſtubbornneſs of the rebels gives daily leſs and leſs hopes of any accommodation this way; wherefore I hope no rumours ſhall hinder thee from haſtening all thou may, all poſſible aſſiſtance to me, and particularly that of the duke of Lorrain's, concerning which I received yeſterday good news from Dr. Goffe, that the prince of Orange will furniſh ſhipping for his tranſportation, and that the reſt of his negotiations goes hopefully on.—

"As for truſting the rebels, either by going to London, or diſbanding my army before a peace, do no ways fear my hazarding ſo cheaply or fooliſhly; for I eſteem the intereſt thou haſt in me at a far dearer rate, and pretend to have a little more wit."—

To the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, March 5, 1644.

"NOW is come to paſs what I foreſaw, the fruitleſs end (as to a preſent peace) of this treaty; but I am ſtill confident, that I ſhall find very good effects of it: For beſides that my commiſſioners have offered, to ſay no more, full meaſured reaſon, and the rebels have ſtucken rigidly to their demands, which I dare ſay had been too much, though they had taken me priſoner, ſo that aſſuredly the breach would light foully upon them. We have likewiſe at this time diſcovered, and ſhall make it evidently appear to the world, that the Engliſh rebels (whether baſely or ignorantly will be no very great difference) have, as much as in them lies, tranſmitted the command of Ireland from the crown of England to the Scots, which, beſides the reflection it will have upon theſe rebels, will clearly ſhew, that reformation of the church is not the chief, much leſs the only end of the Scotch rebellion.

"But it being preſumption, and no piety, ſo to truſt to a good cauſe, as not to uſe all lawful means to maintain it; I have thought of one means more to furniſh thee with for my aſſiſtance, than hitherto thou haſt had; it is, that I give thee power to promiſe in my name (to whom thou thinkeſt moſt fit) that I will take away all the penal laws againſt the Roman catholics in England, as ſoon as God ſhall make me able to do it, ſo as by their means, or in their favours, I may have ſo powerful aſſiſtance as may deſerve ſo great a favour, and enable me to do it. But if thou aſk what I call that aſſiſtance, I anſwer, that when thou knoweſt what may be done for it, it will be eaſily ſeen if it deſerve to be ſo eſteemed. I need not tell thee what ſecrecy this buſineſs requires; yet this I will ſay, that this is the greateſt point of confidence I can expreſs to thee, for it is no thanks to me to truſt thee in any thing elſe but this, which is the only thing of difference in opinion betwixt us: and yet I know thou wilt make as good a bargain for me, even in this, I truſting thee (though it concerns religion) as if thou wert a proteſtant, the viſible good of my affairs ſo much depending on it."—

To the queen.

Dear heart, Oxford, March 15, O. S.

"WHAT I told thee the laſt week concerning a good parting with our lords and commons here, was on Monday laſt handſomely performed: and now if I do any thing unhandſome or diſadvantageous to myſelf or friends in order to a treaty, it will be merely my own fault; for I confeſs, when I wrote laſt, I was in fear to have been preſſed to make ſome mean overtures to renew the treaty, (knowing there was great labourings to that purpoſe; but now I promiſe thee, if it be renewed, (which I believe will not without ſome eminent good ſucceſs on my ſide) it ſhall be to my honour and advantage, I being now as well freed from the place of baſe and mutinous motions, (that is to ſay, our mungrel parliament here) as of the chief cauſers, from whom I may juſtly expect to be chidden by thee, for having ſuffered thee to be vexed by them; Wilmot being already there, Percy on his way, and Suſſex within few days taking his journey to thee."—

I ſhall make no other remark on theſe letters, than that they evidently ſhew, the peace which the king ſeemed to deſire ſo earneſtly, was an empty ſound which had nothing real, but as taken in his private ſenſe of the word. I have ſhewn on the other ſide, that the two houſes were not more inclined to peace. Wherefore I hope my readers will not take it ill, that I forbear to enter into a long detail of the conferences at Uxbridge, where both parties fought rather to amuſe the public than expedients to conclude. I ſhall therefore content myſelf with briefly relating, how far the condeſcenſion of the two parties reached towards making that peace they ſeemed to wiſh for ſo ardently.

Upon the article of religion, the king's commiſſioners, after many diſputes, conſented at laſt to the following particulars.

"1. That freedom be left to all perſons, of what opinions ſoever, in matters of ceremony, and that all the penalties of the laws and cuſtoms which enjoin theſe ceremonies be ſuſpended. (1.)

Remark (1.) Since the penal laws were not to be aboliſhed, but only ſuſpended, it followed that the preſbyterians could rely on that freedom no longer than it was out of the king's power to deprive them of it.

"2. That the biſhop ſhall exerciſe no act of juriſdiction or ordination, without the conſent and council of the preſbyter, who ſhall be choſen by the clergy of each dioceſe out of the learnedeſt and graveſt miniſters of the dioceſe [k].

"3. That the biſhop keep his conſtant reſidence in his dioceſe, except when he ſhall be required by his majeſty to attend him upon any occaſion, and that (if he be not hinder-by the infirmities of old age or ſickneſs) he preach every Sunday in ſome church within his dioceſe. (3.)

Rem. (3.) This was no more than the biſhops duty, and it was not for the king's honour to let this be conſidered as a condeſcenſion to promote the peace.

"4. That the ordination of miniſters ſhall be always in a public and ſolemn manner, and very ſtrict rules obſerved, concerning the ſufficiency and other qualifications of thoſe men, who ſhall be received into holy orders; and the biſhop ſhall not receive any into holy orders, without the approbation and conſent of the preſbyters, or the major part of them.

"5. That competent maintenance and proviſion be eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, to ſuch vicarages as belong to biſhops, deans, and chapters, out of the impropriations, and according to the value of thoſe impropriations, of the ſeveral pariſhes. (4.)

Rem. (4.) One of the principal things urged againſt the church of England by the preſbyterians, was, that the churches were ill ſerved, becauſe the biſhops, deans and chapters, committed the cure of thoſe which belonged to them, to inſufficient preachers for cheapneſs ſake. This abuſe, doubtleſs ought to have been reformed, without making it one of the conditions of the peace.

"6. That for the time to come, no man ſhall be capable of two parſonages or vicarages with cure of ſouls.

"7. That towards the ſettling of the public peace, one hundred thouſand pounds ſhall be raiſed by act of parliament, out of the eſtates of biſhops, deans and chapters, in ſuch manner as ſhall be thought fit by the king and the two houſes of parliament, without the alienation of any of the ſaid lands. (5.)

Rem. (5.) By the treaty between the parliament and Scotland, the lands of the biſhops, deans, and chapters were aſſigned for the payment of the Scotch troops. The king ſeemed by this conceſſion to agree, that one hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed upon thoſe lands. But in ſuppoſing likewiſe the neceſſity of the king's conſent for the applying that ſum, the Scots could not be ſure he would agree that it ſhould be aſſigned to them.

"8. That the juriſdiction in cauſes teſtamentary, decimal, matrimonial, be ſettled in ſuch a manner as ſhall ſeem moſt convenient by the king and the two houſes of parliament. (6.)

Rem. (6.) This conceſſion ſignified nothing, for ſince the king meant not to give up his negative vote in parliament, to ſay, that after the peace this article ſhould be ſettled by the king and the two houſes, was as much as to ſay, there ſhould be no alteration in it but what the king pleaſed.

"9. That one or more acts of parliament be paſſed, for regulating of viſitations, and againſt immoderate fees in eccleſiaſtical courts, and the abuſes by frivolous excommunications, and all other abuſes in the exerciſe of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, in ſuch manner as ſhall be agreed upon by his majeſty, and both houſes of parliament. (7.)

Rem. (7.) This pretended conceſſion is like the former; for after the peace ſhall be made, it would be ſtill in the king's breaſt to give or with-hold his aſſent to the reformation of the abuſes; whereas the point was to ſettle what ought to have been reformed.

When theſe conceſſions are compared with the parliament's demand, that epiſcopacy ſhould be aboliſhed; it is no wonder, the parliament's commiſſioners were not ſatisfied with them. Accordingly, without loſing time in diſputing upon theſe articles, they rejected them as inſufficient, and offered not to qualify their demand in the leaſt.

As to the militia, the king's commiſſioners, after long diſputing, and alleging various arguments to ſhew the injuſtice of depriving the king of one of the moſt eſſential prerogatives of the crown, and the inconveniences which would infallibly flow from thence, were willing to grant:

"That all the forces of the kingdom, both by ſea and land, ſhould be put into the hands of twenty commiſſioners, ten to be named by the king, and ten by the two houſes, and that the ſame thing ſhould be done in Scotland. But they would not conſent, the commiſſioners for Scotland ſhould be joined with thoſe for England, ſo as to form one committee, or that the firſt ſhould in any manner meddle with the affairs of England. Upon theſe conditions, they offered, that the king ſhould be content that this commiſſion ſhould continue for three years." But ſtill the power of theſe commiſſioners was firſt to be ſettled, wherein there were very great difficulties.

The parliament's commiſſioners would not agree, that the king ſhould name ten of the perſons that were to be intruſted with the militia. Their reaſon was, that the point being to give the people ſecurity, they would have none, if half the commiſſioners were nominated by the king: nay, rather it would be a means to re-kindle the war, there being no likelihood that theſe commiſſioners, thus equally divided, would ever agree, ſince they would be of oppoſite principles. Moreover, proceeding upon the foundation of the union between England and Scotland, and upon the dangers being common to both kingdoms, they perſiſted to demand, that the commiſſioners of both kingdoms ſhould act in common. Upon theſe two conditions they agreed, that the commiſſion ſhould continue but ſeven years, after having long contended for an unlimited time. Thus the negotiation upon this, ſucceeded no better than upon the foregoing article [l].

As to Ireland, the commiſſioners agreed upon nothing.

[k] Rapin leaving out the words [by the clergy of each dioceſe] made a needleſs remark, that it was not declared who was to chuſe the preſbyter, which is therefore omitted.

[l] The parliament ſent an expreſs to Uxbridge, with their vote, to propound a limitation of the militia for three years, after the three kingdoms are declared by the king and parliament to be ſettled in peace, or to have it ſettled in the parliament for ſeven years, after the time the king is willing to ſettle it. When they firſt treated of the militia, ſir Edward Hyde would have had it taken for granted, That the whole power of the militia, by the law of England, is in the king only. This by Mr. Whitelock, was denied to

The parliament would have the ceſſation to be void, and for the future, neither peace nor truce to be made without the conſent of both houſes. The king's, knowing his majeſty's mind, that he would not only maintain the ceſſation, but even deſigned to make peace with the Iriſh, were far from conſenting to the parliament's demand. So, the whole diſpute turned upon this point, whether the king had power to conclude a ceſſation, without the privity of the two houſes, ſome affirming, others denying it. On each ſide the ſame arguments were frequently repeated, with mutual reproaches for ſeveral proceedings; and almoſt all the facts alleged by one ſide, were denied by the other, ſo that neither of the parties made any conceſſion.

After a negotiation of eighteen days upon the three articles I have been ſpeaking of, the king's commiſſioners deſired, his majeſty's propoſitions, particularly thoſe concerning the ceſſation of arms and the king's return to the parliament, might be conſidered. The other commiſſioners anſwered, that when the two houſes ſhould ſee the treaty like to ſucceed, they would conſent to prolong it. The two remaining days were ſpent by the king's commiſſioners, in trying to obtain a prolongation of the treaty, but they could not prevail. It muſt be remembered, that the king's aim was to gain time for two principal reaſons: firſt, as he was perſuaded, that as long as the people had any hopes of peace, they would not eaſily be induced to find the parliament the neceſſary ſupplies for the continuation of the war, and ſo the preparations of the two houſes would be retarded. The ſecond was, that he rightly judged, the parliament would not ſeriouſly think of executing their project concerning the army, whilſt there ſhould be any expectation of peace. The two houſes perceiving the king's intention, avoided the ſnare, and the conferences broke off upon the expiration of the twenty days [m].

The houſe of commons, or rather, a new party which had been formed in the houſe, waited only for this rupture, to execute a project which I have juſt mentioned, but of which it will be neceſſary to ſpeak here more largely, ſince the execution of this project ſerves for foundation to all the events which afterwards happened.

Before the parliament was aſſiſted by Scotland, the war had not been much to their advantage. The ſucceſſes of the two firſt campaigns were ſo far from anſwering their expectations, that very probably, without the aſſiſtance of the Scots, they would have been forced to make ſuch a peace as the king deſired. If in the third, the king had loſt all the North, he had made himſelf amends, by gaining almoſt all the weſtern counties, and, after the ſecond battle of Newbury, he was ſtill at Oxford, in condition to withſtand his enemies. The ſcotch army, which, having ſubdued all the North, was advancing towards the middle of the kingdom, was therefore what made the balance incline to the parliament's ſide, and what, probably, was to give them the ſuperiority in the fourth campaign, for which both ſides were preparing. This aid came very ſeaſonably to eſtabliſh the affairs of the preſbyterians, who were then all-powerful in the parliament, and diſpoſed of every thing as they pleaſed.

They were the men who had moſt conduced to engage the kingdom in a war, and called in the Scots, becauſe they could not hope to execute their deſigns, unleſs the parliament's arms were victorious. But before I proceed, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to make known theſe preſbyterians, who till then ſeemed to make but one and the ſame party, though in reality they conſiſted of two, very different from each other, both in principles and intereſts.

After all my pains, I have not been able to diſcover preciſely, the firſt riſe of the independent ſect or faction. Thus much is certain, their principles were very proper to put the kingdom in a flame, as they did effectually. With regard to the ſtate, they abhorred monarchy, and approved only a republican government. As to religion, their principles were contrary to thoſe of all the reſt of the world. They not only were averſe to epiſcopacy, and the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy; but would not ſo much as endure ordinary miniſters in the church. They maintained, that every man might pray in public, exhort his brethren, interpret the ſcriptures, according to the talents God had endued him with; whereas very often miniſters were ordained without proper endowments, whilſt thoſe of many laymen remained uſeleſs for want of external ordination. So with them, every one prayed, preached, admoniſhed, interpreted the holy ſcriptures, without any other call than what he himſelf drew from his zeal, and ſuppoſed gifts, and without any other authority than the approbation of his auditors [n].

I cannot exactly tell, whether this ſect or faction was intirely formed at the beginning of the parliament, or whether it ſprung up during the ſeſſions. But there is, I think, a diſtinction to be made upon this ſubject. I conjecture, that the ſect was already formed, with reſpect to civil government, and aroſe from the principles of arbitrary power, which James I. and Charles I. laboured to eſtabliſh, but that with regard to religion, it was formed during this parliament. I build my conjecture upon this. When the long parliament began, there were but two known parties in the Engliſh church, namely, the epiſcopalians, or church of England men, and the preſbyterians. The name of Independent was entirely unknown, and thoſe, afterwards called independents, were certainly united with the preſbyterians, and made a very conſiderable part of them. But they were different from the other preſbyterians, as they propoſed for their end to change the monarchy into a common-wealth, which cannot be imputed to the preſbyterians in general. It is very true, the preſbyterians were for humbling the regal power, and leaving the king only the ſhadow of ſovereignty; but they preſerved a ſort of attachment to the name of king, and at leaſt an external reſpect for royalty. If we examine the propoſitions they preſented to the king at ſeveral times, we ſhall find them all built upon this foundation. They were in that like the Scots, who cannot juſtly be accuſed of intending to aboliſh monarchy, though they propoſed to reduce it within very narrow bounds. The independents, after having lent their utmoſt aſſiſtance to diminiſh the regal power, in hopes thereby to attain their end, the deſtruction of the monarchy, perceived at laſt, they ſhould not be able, without great difficulty, to accompliſh their deſign. The reaſon was, becauſe neither the Engliſh, nor Scotch preſbyterians, had any inclination to eſtabliſh a common-wealth, and becauſe their whole clergy, who had a great influence in that party, were of the ſame principles. They judged therefore, it would be very advantageous to them to deſtroy the clergy's authority, by intimating them to be unneceſſary, and their vocation eſtabliſhed upon no good foundation. Then it was that the independent ſect began to be formed with regard to religion; for there are no ſigns of it, till about the end of the year 1644. I own this to be only conjecture, which may be rejected if any thing more plauſible occurs.

to be ſo very clear; and he undertook to make it out, That our law doth not poſitively affirm, where that great power is lodged, and doubted not, but to ſatisfy the commiſſioners fully in that point. Whereupon it was moved, that a day might be appointed to hear their arguments: but on account of the time, it was thought fit to lay aſide the debate. The commiſſioners of both kingdoms, at their return from their quarters, thanked Whitelock for encountering ſir Edward Hyde, upon the point of the right of the militia, wherein he was ſo confident, Whitelock, p. 129, 133.

[m] A great many of the king's friends, and particularly the earl of Southampton, went poſt from Uxbridge to Oxford, to preſs the king again and again upon their knees, to yield to the neceſſity of the times; and by giving his aſſent to ſome of the moſt material propoſitions that were ſent him, to ſettle a laſting peace with his people. The king was at laſt prevailed with to follow their counſel; and the next morning was appointed for ſigning a warrant to his commiſſioners to that effect. But when they came early next morning to wait on him, with the warrant agreed upon over-night, they found his majeſty had changed his reſolution, and was become inflexible in theſe points. This alteration was occaſioned by a confident letter, dated February 3, which his majeſty received, a few hours before he was to ſign, from the marquis of Montroſe, giving an account of the earl of Argyle's defeat, and diſſuading his majeſty from treating with his rebel-ſubjects; becauſe, as the marquis affirmed, "He doubted not, but before the end of the ſummer, he ſhould be able to come to his majeſty's aſſiſtance with a brave army." Welwood's Mem. p. 62, 63, 302, &c. Burnet's Hiſt.

[n] The independents, called at firſt Congregationaliſts, owed their riſe chiefly to Goodwin, Nye, Bridge, Sympſon, and Burroughs, who tranſported themſelves into Holland for liberty of conſcience. From whence, upon the downfall of epiſcopacy, they returned to England, and addreſſed the parliament with an apologetical narrative for indiſturbance and toleration. In this apology they declare, That they conſulted the ſcriptures without any prepoſſeſſion: they look upon the word of Chriſt as impartially and unprejudicedly as men of fleſh and blood are like to do in any juncture of time, they having no temptation to any bias. As to church government, they ſaid, they confined themſelves to ſcripture precept and precedent, leaving room for alterations upon farther inquiry. Purſuant to theſe grounds, they held a middle courſe between preſbytery and Browniſm. The firſt they counted too arbitrary, the other too looſe. Their main characteriſtic was, the diſallowing parochial and provincial ſubordinations, and forming all their congregations upon a ſcheme of co-ordinacy. As to the manner of their ſervice, they prayed publicly for kings and all in authority; they read the ſcriptures, and expounded the leſſons upon proper occaſions: they adminiſtered the ſacraments: they ſung pſalms, and made collections for the poor every lord's-day. Their public officers were paſtors, teachers, ruling elders, (which were eccleſiaſtics) and deacons. As for church-cenſures, they had none but admonition and excommunication. The five above mentioned independents were all or moſt of them members of the aſſembly of divines. Rapin ſeems to confound them with the Browniſts. See their Apologetical Narrative, and Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. tom. II. p. 829.——They were called independents from their declaring againſt the dependency of churches: which, as is ſaid above, was their main characteriſtic.

In

It is no wonder therefore, that from the beginning of this parliament, the independents had earneſtly contributed to put it out of the king's power to preſerve his authority but by a war, and to ruin the church of England. It is rather to be conſidered, that this was the natural conſequence of their principles, and a very proper means to lead them to their end. The humbling of the king, and the deſtruction of the church of England, were two points that were neceſſarily to be gained, before the eſtabliſhment of a common-wealth was endeavoured. It was not therefore proper, they ſhould ſeparate from the preſbyterians, as long as theſe concurred with them in their deſign to gain the two principal points. For that reaſon, they readily conſented to call in the Scots, and made no ſcruple to approve of the covenant, and whatever elſe was acquired by the Scots. The buſineſs then was to be able to reſiſt the king, who had acquired ſome ſuperiority, by the happy ſucceſs of his arms. This was the common intereſt of the preſbyterians and independents, who would have been equally ruined, if the king's party had prevailed.

Mean while, the Scotch army, in ſtrengthening alike the preſbyterians and independents againſt the king, confirmed withal to the firſt, the ſuperiority they had for ſome time enjoyed. As long as this ſuperiority laſted, it was almoſt impoſſible for the independents to attain their ends. They judged it therefore abſolutely neceſſary, to undermine the great power of the preſbyterians, not openly, for fear of being oppreſſed before they had well laid their meaſures, but ſecretly, and by artifice. To that purpoſe, the leaders of this party, as Vane, Cromwell, Tate, Haſlerig, and ſome others, began to make themſelves very popular, and to expreſs a great zeal for the public, in order to gain the good will of the people. They had their emiſſaries every where, who diligently aggravated the faults committed ſince the beginning of the war, as well in the adminiſtration of the government, as in the military actions, and inſinuated, they were intirely to be aſcribed to the private views of the members of parliament, who poſſeſſing all the places and offices, were very unmindful to put an end to the troubles. That ſome of the generals had deſignedly miſſed opportunities of fighting with advantage, and that, in a word, the greateſt part dreaded nothing ſo much as a deciſion, either by arms or a good peace.

In ſupport of theſe rumours which were ſpread abroad, Cromwell came to the parliament at the end of the campaign, and publicly accuſed the earl of Mancheſter of not having done his duty at the battle of Newbury, and the affair of Dennington-caſtle; inſinuating, he was afraid of putting too ſpeedy an end to the war [o]. The earl anſwered by a memorial, which he preſented to the lords, and Cromwell thought not fit to proſecute his accuſation, which was properly a preparative only to begin the execution of a greater project.

This public proceeding of Cromwell raiſed a ſuſpicion, that he was one of the principal authors of the rumours which tended to render the people jealous of the parliament. There was even a conference held at the earl of Eſſex's, where it was conſidered, whether he ſhould be arreſted. But as the proofs appeared not ſufficiently clear, it was reſolved to wait till he ſhould have laid himſelf more open. Probably, ſome of thoſe that were preſent at this conference informed him of it, which made him haſten the execution of the project formed by himſelf and his friends [p].

This project was to exclude all the members of parliament from enjoying any office or command military or civil. It is certain, that from the beginning of the war, the parliament, in the diſtribution of poſts, had not forgot their own members, or rather to ſay the truth, all the principal poſts were poſſeſſed by the members of one or other houſe. Hence ſprung two great inconveniencies. The firſt, that as, ſince the breach with the king, the two houſes had ruled with an abſolute ſway, the members who had poſts in the army, had ſo great influence there, that no man durſt oppoſe their ſentiments, or take notice of their faults or miſdemeanours, which by that means were always unpuniſhed. This had at length bred at the end of the laſt campaign thoſe great diſſenſions between the generals, which proved ſo prejudicial to the common cauſe. The ſecond inconvenience was, that it was undeniably the particular intereſt of the members of parliament to prolong the war; ſince the end of the troubles, whether it happened by a deciſive battle, or a treaty, would ſtrip them of their employs. This project was therefore founded upon reaſons very plauſible, and apt to make impreſſion on the people. But withal, it was of great advantage to the independents, in that the power of the preſbyterian party would be conſiderably leſſened, and they had ſo well laid their meaſures, that they were almoſt ſure the vacant poſts would be filled with men of their party. This was the more feaſible, as hitherto the independents not having yet pulled off the maſk, it was not eaſy to diſcover who were ſo, ſince they were ſtill confounded with the preſbyterians.

To execute this grand project, the leaders of the independents reſolved to move two things in the parliament. The firſt, to put the army under a new model, that is, to form new regiments of horſe and foot out of the preſent troops, ſo that there would be ſtill the ſame officers and ſoldiers, but new bodies otherways compoſed than before. The ſecond, that the parliament ſhould paſs an ordinance excluding the members of either houſe from enjoying or executing any office or command civil or military. The firſt was founded upon the neceſſity of putting an end to all factions and cabals, which might be formed in the ſeveral bodies of the army; the ſecond, upon the neceſſity of demonſtrating to the people, that the parliament was not influenced by private views, but preferred the public good to the intereſt of their own members. But the preſbyterian members thereby loſt at once all their poſts and credit in the army. This was the true reaſon of the proceedings of the independents, which however they carefully concealed. The other reaſons were ſo plauſible, that they did not queſtion they would be very agreeable to the people, who were already diſpoſed to approve them. And therefore it was thought ſeveral members would not venture to contradict them, for fear of raiſing a ſuſpicion of their acting from motives of intereſt.

On the 9th of December 1644, theſe motions were made in the houſe of commons, at the time when the treaty of Uxbridge was preparing. The managers of the affair [q], moved to take into conſideration the ſtate of the kingdom, the reaſons why the war laſted ſo long, and the conſequences of the treaty of Uxbridge, in caſe it was unſucceſsful. This motion being approved of, the houſe voted themſelves into a grand committee, to debate upon theſe points. A general ſilence being kept for ſome time, Oliver Cromwell ſtood up at laſt, and ſpoke briefly to this effect:

"That it was now a time to ſpeak, or for ever to hold the tongue: the important occaſion being no leſs than to ſave a nation out of a bleeding, nay, almoſt dying condition, which the long continuance of the war had already brought it into; ſo that, without a more ſpeedy, vigorous, and effectual proſecution of the war, caſting off all lingering proceedings, like ſoldiers of fortune beyond ſea, to ſpin out a war, we ſhall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a parliament. For what do the enemy ſay? Nay, what do many ſay that were friends at the beginning of the parliament? Even this, that the members of both houſes have got great places and commands, and the ſword into their hands, and what by intereſt in parliament, what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themſelves in grandeur, and not permit the war ſpeedily to end, leſt their own power ſhould determine with it. This I ſpeak here to our own faces, is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any; I know the worth of thoſe commanders, members of both houſes, who are yet in power; but if I may ſpeak my conſcience without reflection upon any, I do conceive, if the army be not put into another method, and the war more vigorouſly proſecuted, the people

[o] In that accuſation it was ſaid, that, "Since the taking of York, the earl had declined whatever tended to further advantage upon the enemy; neglected, and ſtudiouſly ſhifted off opportunities for that purpoſe." Ruſhworth, tom. V. p. 732.

[p] One evening, Maynard and Whitelock were ſent for by the earl of Eſſex; and when they came, they found him with the Scots commiſſioners, Holles, Stapleton, Meyrick, and others of his ſpecial friends. Being deſired to give their opinion, Whether Cromwell might be accuſed of being an incendiary (which was agreed upon to be one that raiſed the fire of contention in a ſtate) they anſwered, Cromwell's great parts and intereſt in both houſes were to be conſidered, and therefore adviſed not to proceed againſt him without clear proof, becauſe it would reflect upon their honour and wiſdom, to begin ſuch a thing, and not be able to make it good. Wherefore, inſtead of accuſing him, they thought it beſt, that direction be given to collect ſuch particulars relating to him, by which it might be judged, Whether they would amount to prove him an incendiary or not. The Scots liked this advice; but Holles and Stapleton were for an accuſation. Whitelock ſays, he had cauſe to believe, that ſome who were preſent informed Cromwell of all that paſſed. And after that, Cromwell, though he took no notice at that time of any thing, ſeemed more kind to Whitelock and Maynard than formerly, and carried on his deſign more actively of making way for his own advancement. Whitelock, p. 116.

[q] The excluſion of the members from all offices, was moved firſt by Mr. Zouch Tate, who brought it in with a ſimilitude of a boil upon his thumb; and was ſet on by that party who contrived the turning out of the earl of Eſſex. He was ſeconded by ſir Henry Vane and others. Whitelock, p. 118. Ludlow, tom. I. p. 145.

can bear the war no longer, and will enforce you to a diſhonourable peace. But this I would recommend to your prudence, not to inſiſt upon any complaint or overſight of any commander in chief upon any occaſion whatſoever; for as I muſt acknowledge myſelf guilty of overſights, ſo I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs; therefore waving a ſtrict inquiry into the cauſes of theſe things, let us apply ourſelves to the remedy which is moſt neceſſary. And I hope we have ſuch true Engliſh hearts and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother country, as no members of either houſe will ſcruple to deny themſelves, and their own private intereſts, for the public good; nor account it to be a diſhonour done to them, whatever the parliament ſhall reſolve upon in this weighty matter."

Cromwell was ſeconded by others who ſpoke, like him, in a general manner, without making any particular propoſition. At laſt, Zouch Tate and ſir Henry Vane moved expreſly, to have all members of parliament excluded from commands and offices. This motion was long debated, and at length approved by a majority of voices, and a committee was appointed to prepare an ordinance to that purpoſe. Two days after this ordinance was brought into the houſe, and it was reſolved, that the 18th of the ſame month ſhould be ſet apart for a faſt, to implore a bleſſing on this affair, as well as on the intended new model of the army, which had been alſo voted, though I could not find the day. The 14th of December this ordinance was again taken into conſideration, and canvaſſed in a grand committee very ſeriouſly on both ſides[r]. The 18th the faſt was kept, and the 19th the ordinance paſſed the houſe of commons. It was called the ſelf-denying ordinance, becauſe the houſe, in paſſing it, renounced their own advantages.

The affair however was not finiſhed till the lords had approved of the ordinance, to which they were by no means inclined. On the contrary, at a conference with the commons, they urged ſeveral reaſons againſt it. Whereupon, the 13th of January, the whole houſe of commons went up to the peers with a meſſage to preſs them to paſs the ſelf-denying ordinance. Nevertheleſs they rejected it that ſame day[s].

Notwithſtanding this, the commons proceeded in forming a new model of the army, which they voted ſhould conſiſt, in the whole, of one and twenty thouſand men, namely, ſix thouſand horſe, one thouſand dragoons, and fourteen thouſand foot: that the horſe ſhould be divided into ten regiments; the dragoons into ten ſingle companies; and the foot into ten regiments of at leaſt twelve hundred men each. After that, they appointed ſir Thomas Fairfax to be general, ſon to the lord Fairfax who commanded in the north. This done, they paſſed an ordinance for raiſing money for the maintenance of the army which was to ſerve under the command of the new general, and, on the 28th of January, ſent it up to the lords for their concurrence[t]. The lords ſcrupled to conſent to ſeveral articles concerning the nomination of the principal officers. But as there were but few peers, they were told, they would do themſelves unſpeakable prejudice if they pretended to oppoſe the reſolutions of the commons, and, in ſhort, that their concurrence was not neceſſary. In all appearance, this made the lords paſs the ordinance the 15th of February, without any amendments[u].

The 19th of the ſame month, ſir Thomas Fairfax being conducted to the houſe by four members, was complimented by the ſpeaker. After that, he delivered a liſt of the colonels he had appointed, by virtue of a clauſe in his commiſſion, among whom there was not a ſingle member of parliament[w]. There was alſo upon this occaſion ſome difference between the two houſes. But after ſeveral conferences, the lords approved of the liſt the 18th of March.

[1645] Thus the new model was compleated, and, though the ſelf-denying ordinance had been thrown out by the lords, the commons had now obtained, by empowering the general to nominate the officers of the army, the excluſion of the members of parliament from all military poſts. This made them hope, it would not be impoſſible to cauſe their ordinance to paſs. And indeed, they reſumed the debate of it March 24, and, on the 31ſt, it was ſent up to the lords for their conſent, though they had already refuſed it. Then the earls of Eſſex, Denbigh, and Mancheſter, perceiving it would be in vain to ſtrive againſt the ſtream, and that their houſe was not in condition to withſtand the commons, ſurrendered their commiſſions, and received the thanks of both houſes[x]. The next day, the 3d of April, the lords paſſed the ſelf-denying ordinance; and thus ended this affair, which had been depending four months[y].

When it is conſidered, with what earneſtneſs the commons proceeded in the ſelf-denying ordinance, one is apt at firſt to believe, either that the number of the independents was very ſuperior in the houſe, or that the members were very diſintereſted. But neither of theſe was the caſe. The preſbyterians ever preſerved a ſuperiority of number, which became ſtill greater by the members excluded from their poſts, who, not being employed in the army or elſewhere, increaſed their party in the parliament. As to the diſintereſtedneſs of the members, it is not to be imagined, that men who had till now expreſſed ſuch a greedineſs, as to monopolize, as I may ſay, and ingroſs to themſelves all the places of truſt and profit, ſhould thus ſuddenly change from black to white, and ſincerely deſire to relinquiſh them. But the caſe was, they were attacked on their weak ſide, and ſo could vindicate themſelves only by ſhewing a diſintereſtedneſs, which might at leaſt make it doubtful whether it was through ſelfiſhneſs that they had ingroſſed to themſelves all the offices and poſts. The independents, before they diſcovered their deſign, had taken care to prepoſſeſs the people with ſuch plauſible reaſons, that the parliament was in danger of being entirely deſerted, if they undertook to juſtify their conduct, and maintain their partiality. This certainly was what cauſed the ordinance to paſs, though it was manifeſtly deſigned to ruin the preſbyterian party. For though their ſuperiority of number in the parliament did not ceaſe, the independents knew, that by having the army on their ſide, it would be in their power to obey the parliament no farther than they pleaſed. According to this, they bent all their endeavours, as ſoon as things were regulated as they had projected. The new general was reckoned a zealous preſbyterian, and by that the parliament had been allured to chuſe him. But Cromwell had ſuch an influence over him, that he made him do whatever he pleaſed. He had artfully perſuaded him, that his ſole view was the welfare of religion, and the good of his country, and thereby prepared him to receive his counſels, and place an entire confidence in him. For though the independent party began to ſhew themſelves very openly, they did not yet pretend to form a ſeparate party from that of the preſbyterians, and it was more than a year before they appeared at laſt entirely unmaſked. Cromwell eſpecially, more than any other of this party, put on the appearance of a rigid preſbyterian, and ſeemed to intend only the firm eſtabliſhment of preſbyterianiſm. This was neceſſary to preſerve the confidence of the new general, and make him act according to his views, without diſcovering the end to which he meant to conduct him. But it was not yet time to make known his deſigns. There were then but two things abſolutely neceſſary for the advantage of his party. The firſt, in new modelling the army, to order it ſo, that the officers, whom the independents thought they could confide in, might keep their commiſſions, and thoſe whom they conſidered as their enemies, might be caſhiered. For as three armies were to be reduced into one, many officers would of courſe be diſmiſſed. The ſecond thing was to proſecute the war more vigorouſly than hitherto, and endeavour more ſtrenuouſly to diſable the king to maintain it. It is evident the deſigns of the independents could not be executed but by the king's deſtruction. This was neceſſarily to be ſuppoſed, and, conſequently, all riſks were to be run to put a ſpeedy concluſion to the war, as nothing could be more prejudicial to them than its continuation.

As ſoon as ſir Thomas Fairfax had received his commiſ-

[r] Whitelock ſpoke againſt it. See his ſpeech in his Memorials, p. 119. ——And the reaſons that were given for the ſelf-denying ordinance, ſee in Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 5. It was ſent up to the lords, December 21, by Mr. Pierpoint: bnt their lordſhips did not begin their debates about it till December 30, and then they committed it to eight lords, to report their opinions about it; which they having done, the lords had, on January 7, the conference here mentioned. Idem, p. 7.

[s] And here, ſays Whitelock, firſt began to increaſe the great difference between the two houſes of parliament, which ſwelled to ſo great height, as will be ſeen afterwards. Whitelock, p. 123.

[x] And to ſweeten the earl of Eſſex, (as Whitelock expreſſes it, p. 121.) an order was made for the better payment of 10,000l. per annum, formerly granted to him out of delinquents eſtates.

[y] Here ended (ſays Whitelock) the firſt ſcene of our tragic civil wars, in the exit of this brave perſon Eſſex, who being ſet aſide, and many gallant men his officers with him, the king's party looked upon the new army, and ſion from the parliament, he came to Windſor, his head quarters, and from thence ſent commiſſioners wherever there were troops, to form the new regiments, and diſband the ſupernumerary officers. No doubt, theſe commiſſioners, who were moſtly general officers, had private inſtructions concerning the officers they were either to continue or break; and Cromwell had framed, in great meaſure, theſe inſtructions, though he did not appear to be concerned. The parliament undertook this reform in a very dangerous ſeaſon [z]. It was in April, when the king was preparing to take the field. If, unhappily, they had met with reſiſtance in the troops, as many were apprehenſive, and if this change had occaſioned revolts, which might eaſily have happened by the inſtigations of the diſbanded officers, they would have been without an army, at the beginning of a campaign, and conſequently unable to withſtand the king's forces. But they heard with pleaſure, that every thing was effected with great tranquility, and their orders every where perfectly obeyed.

The general remained at Windſor all April, not being able ſooner to finiſh what was to be done to prepare the army for action. During this time, he received a letter from the committee of both kingdoms [a], informing him, that the king had ſent to prince Rupert, to come and join him with two thouſand horſe. Wherefore, he was ordered to diſpatch a party of horſe towards Oxford to hinder that junction. And as the ſelf-denying ordinance was not to take place till after forty days, namely, on the 13th of May, the charge of this ſervice was by the committee particularly recommended to lieutenant-general Cromwell.

Cromwell departing from Windſor the 24th of April, met near Iſlip-bridge [b], with a brigade of the king's horſe, conſiſting of the queen's, and three other regiments, and utterly routed them [c]. Then he marched to ſir Thomas Coggin's at Blechington, where colonel Windebank, ſecretary Windebank's ſon, kept a garriſon for the king, and ſummoned the colonel with a ſharp meſſage, who immediately ſurrendered. The king was ſo incenſed with his cowardice, that he cauſed him to be condemned by a council of war, and afterwards ſhot to death. Cromwell gained ſome other advantages in thoſe parts, but was repulſed in an aſſault upon Farrington.

After the earl of Eſſex's diſaſter in Cornwall, the parliament was very weak in the weſtern counties. They had in Dorſetſhire only Pool, Lyme, and Weymouth; in Devonſhire, Plymouth alone, and that beſieged; and in Somerſetſhire, only Taunton, cloſely inveſted by ſir Richard Greenvil, and in great diſtreſs. The parliament, fearing to loſe that important place, ſent expreſs orders to the general to march with his whole army and raiſe the ſiege, not conſidering that the midland counties would be left defenceleſs, juſt as the king was going to take the field. Mean while Fairfax, in obedience to the orders, began his march the 30th of April, and on the 7th of May was beyond Saliſbury.

The committee of both kingdoms having intelligence, that the king was on the 7th of May to head his army, perceived their error in ſending all their forces into the weſt and leaving the middle of the kingdom defenceleſs. Wherefore they diſpatched with all ſpeed an order to the general, which reached him at Blandford, to return, and ſend only a party to relieve Taunton. The general immediately obeyed, and detached colonel Welden with about five thouſand foot, and eighteen hundred horſe to Taunton, and returned back to Newbury, where he ſtayed ſome days to refreſh his troops.

At the approach of the party ſent to Taunton, ſir Richard Greenvil raiſed the ſiege of that place, where relief could not come more ſeaſonably, ſo much was it preſſed. But ſhortly after, general Goring came into Somerſetſhire with three thouſand horſe, given him by the king when he heard Fairfax was marching to the weſt. Then, Greenvil joining him, they went together, and laid ſiege again to Taunton, where the party that relieved the town were ſhut up.

During theſe motions of the parliament's forces, the king, on the 7th of May, took the field, and marched with about eight thouſand men towards Cheſter, to relieve the place, beſieged by ſir William Brereton [d]. But he heard by the way, the ſiege was raiſed; and having nothing more to do there, marched to Leiceſter, which he took by ſtorm the 30th of May.

Mean time, the parliament perceiving the king was marching towards Cheſter, ſent orders to general Fairfax to beſiege Oxford. Accordingly Fairfax approached the city, and began the ſiege. But within a few days, the parliament having intelligence of the taking of Leiceſter, were apprehenſive, the king's deſign was to enter the aſſociated eaſtern counties, and therefore ordered their general to raiſe the ſiege of Oxford, and follow the king. Fairfax therefore marched away on the 7th of June. As, very likely, a battle would quickly enſue, he writ to deſire the parliament to diſpenſe with Cromwell's abſence from the houſe, and to order him to march to the army, and command the horſe, which was readily granted. Thus, Cromwell, who had been one of the moſt forward to paſs the ordinance for the excluſion of the members of parliament from all offices and poſts, civil and military, was the only perſon that kept his ſeat in parliament, and his command in the army. This would be a very honourable diſtinction for him, were there not room to ſuſpect, it was owing to his own intrigues [e].

Mean while, the king was very uneaſy. He was informed of the ſiege of Oxford, but did not yet know it was raiſed, and that the enemy was marching directly towards him. This made him reſolve to move towards Oxford, in order to relieve a city of ſo great importance to him. To that end, he encamped at Harborough, from whence he ſent an expreſs to general Goring, to order him to come and join him with all poſſible ſpeed. Here it was he received intelligence, that Fairfax was drawn off from Oxford, and had been repulſed with great loſs, in an aſſault upon Borſtal houſe [f]. His troops, as was uſual with them, were ſo elated at this news, that they imagined the enemies to be in the utmoſt conſternation, which ought to be improved by immediately giving them battle. The king himſelf was prepoſſeſſed with this notion, which made him contemn his enemies, and unfortunately induced him to advance to Daventry in Northamptonſhire, in a belief it would always be in his power to fight when he pleaſed, and that his enemies would never dare to attack him. Otherwiſe, he might have retired to Leiceſter, and there quietly expected the three thouſand men, colonel Gerrard was to bring him from Wales, and Goring's three thouſand horſe from the weſt. As to Goring, an accident happened, which very much conduced to haſten a battle. Fairfax had ſent a man to Oxford, who pretending to ſerve the king, had managed ſo artfully, that ſecretary Nicholas had intruſted him with a packet to general Goring, who was before Taunton. This man having diſcharged his commiſſion, Goring thought he could not employ, to carry a letter to the king, a more truſty meſſenger than the perſon ſent to him by ſecretary Nicholas. He gave him therefore a letter for the king, wherein he told his majeſty, that he hoped to be maſter of Taunton in a ſhort time, conjuring him not to engage, but to ſtand upon the defenſive, for he did not queſtion, in twelve or fourteen days to join him with the forces under his command. The king knew nothing of the letter which was brought to Fairfax. But it convinced the parliament-generals of the abſolute neceſſity of fighting, before that aid ſhould come to the king.

Purſuant to this reſolution, Fairfax continued to advance towards the king, who being better informed of the number and deſigns of his enemies, reſolved to retire to Leiceſter. To that purpoſe, he began to march towards Harborough, where his van arrived, whilſt the reſt of the army was yet above two miles behind. That ſame night, he heard the enemies were within ſix miles of Harborough, and indeed general Ireton, Cromwell's ſon-in-law, had now fallen upon ſome of the king's quarters, and taken ſeveral priſoners. Whereupon it was reſolved at a council of war, held in the night, to march back and meet the enemy, conſidering the impoſſibility of going to Leiceſter, without expoſing the rear to certain deſtruction. So, the king returning in the morning, the 14th of June, met the parliamentarians, who upon the news of his march had drawn up near Naſeby. Here was fought the fatal battle that decided the quarrel between the king and the parliament.

Lately

Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the king's army, and ſir Marmaduke Langdale the left. Sir Jacob Aſtley [g] led the main body of the foot, and the king was at the head of the reſerve of horſe [h]. On the parliament's ſide, the right wing of horſe was commanded by Cromwell, the left by Ireton. General Fairfax, and major-general Skippon, were both at the head of the main-body, the firſt on the right, and the other on the left [i].

Prince Rupert began with charging the left wing, commanded by Ireton, and after a long conflict, wherein he met with great reſiſtance, broke that body of horſe, put them to flight, and chaſed them almoſt to Naſeby town [k]. In his return, he loſt ſome time in trying to become maſter of the parliament's artillery. He even ſummoned the train, but they being well defended with fire-locks, and a rear guard, and he without foot, he could not execute his deſign.

At the ſame time, Cromwell was ingaged in a very obſtinate fight with ſir Marmaduke Langdale, but at length the king's horſe took to flight, and were purſued about a quarter of a mile. After that, Cromwell leaving a party of horſe to oppoſe the king's, in caſe he ſhould rally, returned with ſpeed to the field of battle, where his aſſiſtance was very much wanted by his friends.

The parliament's foot were ingaged with the king's, and began to be preſſed in ſuch a manner, that they were in great diſorder. Cromwell, who was returned victorious, changed the face of the battle, by charging the king's infantry in flank, who could not ſtand ſo vigorous an attack. Fairfax and Skippon, took advantage of this aſſiſtance to rally their troops, who had been roughly uſed at the beginning of the battle [l], and at laſt, the king's foot were ſo routed, that there was no poſſibility of rallying them.

In the mean time, the prince not being yet returned from the chace, the king was, with his reſerve of horſe, unable to charge Cromwell, who was ſtronger than himſelf, and was alſo re-joined by the party he had left behind. As ſoon as prince Rupert was returned with his victorious horſe, and had joined the reſerve, the king uſed his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade them to charge once more the enemy's horſe not queſtioning, that if he could put them to rout, he ſhould afterwards eaſily vanquiſh the foot. But he could not prevail with them to make a ſecond charge [m]. This is not very ſtrange, ſince it could not be done without manifeſt danger. Fairfax, Skippon, and Cromwell, without loſing time in purſuing the king's diſperſed infantry, had ſpeedily rallied their troops. They faced the king's horſe, and prepared to receive, or to charge them. So, to renew the fight, the king muſt, with one ſingle wing of horſe, and his ſmall body of reſerve, have fallen upon the enemies army, which wanted only the wing that was routed. This the cavaliers clearly perceived, and was what hindered them from obeying the king's orders. At the ſame time, an accident happened, which induced them to take flight, or furniſhed them with a pretence. Robert Dalziel earl of Carnewarth, ſeeing the king, notwithſtanding the unwillingneſs of his own troops, bent upon charging the enemies rode up to him and ſaid, "Sir, will you go upon your death, in an inſtant?" And withal, laying hold of the king's bridle, turned his horſe to the right. The king's cavalry, ſeeing his majeſty's horſe turned, without knowing the cauſe, took occaſion to diſband, and rode upon the ſpur without looking behind them. So, the king was alſo forced to retire, and leave his enemies maſters of the field. All his infantry were ſo diſperſed, that the enemies took as many priſoners as they pleaſed. He loſt his whole train of artillery, all his bag and baggage, with his cabinet wherein were his moſt ſecret papers and letters, which the parliament were ſo cruel as to print and publiſh, particularly his letters concerning the treaty of Uxbridge, of which the reader has before ſeen ſome extracts. After this, he was never more able to bring a conſiderable army into the field. It is ſaid, there were not ſlain on the king's ſide above ſix hundred men, but amongſt them were more than one hundred and fifty officers; and beſides, the enemy took above five thouſand priſoners [n].

The king and prince Rupert that ſame day retreated by Leiceſter to Aſhby de la Zouch, from whence, after a few hours refreſhment, they continued their march with their horſe in very great diſorder to Hereford, where they parted. Prince Rupert haſted to Briſtol, to prepare the city for a ſiege, there being great likelihood, it would quickly be attacked. The king retired into Wales, and made ſome ſtay at Ragland-caſtle, not deſpairing of being able to form another army in thoſe parts. The reaſon is unknown, why he was bent, contrary to all appearance, upon raiſing a new army in Wales, and the neighbouring counties, inſtead of marching into the weſt with his horſe, where he had a ſtrong body of troops, under the command of Goring and Greenvil, with which he might have long continued the war.

Mean while, Fairfax advanced towards Leiceſter, which ſurrendered by capitulation, four days after the battle of Naſeby. Then, he marched with all ſpeed to the weſt, where it was very neceſſary to lead the army, as well to relieve Taunton and the party there ſhut up, as to reduce to the obedience of the parliament the weſtern counties, which were all for the king. At the approach of the army, Goring raiſed the ſiege of Taunton [o], and in few days was defeated by Fairfax at Langport, who killed many of his men, took twelve hundred horſes, and fourteen hundred priſoners [p]. This victory was followed with the taking of Bridgewater, Bath, and Sherburn, after which, Fairfax laid ſiege to Briſtol.

It was univerſally expected, prince Rupert would, according to cuſtom, perform wonders in the defence of this city, which was ſtrongly garriſoned, [q] and well ſtored with proviſions and ammunition. Nay, the prince himſelf had ſent the king word, he hoped to hold out at leaſt four months. And yet, the parliament-army approaching the lines drawn about the place, and repulſing ſeveral ſallies, the prince, upon the ſummons, agreed to capitulate. Fairfax came near the lines the 23d of Auguſt, and the capitulation was ſigned the 10th of September, before the beſiegers had approached the walls. When the king heard, prince Rupert had ſurrendered Briſtol in this manner, he was ſo enraged at it, that he ordered him by a letter to depart the kingdom, and revoked all his commiſſions. The prince publiſhed a manifeſto in vindication of his conduct. But he did not ſufficiently demonſtrate the neceſſity of ſurrendering ſo ſoon a place of ſuch importance [r].

Immediately after the taking of Briſtol, Fairfax marched again to the weſt, as well to relieve Plymouth which was ſtill inveſted [s], as to ſubdue all thoſe counties to the parliament. But to prevent the miſchiefs incurred by the earl of Eſſex the laſt year, for want of an open communication with [g] Lately created lord Aſtley of Reading.

[h] Though Rapin quotes Ruſhworth, he has followed the diſpoſition of the army, as related by Clarendon. For both Ruſhworth and Whitelock ſay, the king commanded the main body himſelf, ſir Jacob Aſtley, with the earl of Linſey, the righr-hand reſerve, and the lord Bard and ſir George L'iſle the left. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 42. The king's forces, according to the lord Clarendon's computation, were in all but about ſeven thouſand four hundred men. Tom. II. p. 506.

[i] The reſerves were brought up by colonel Rainſborough, Hammond, and Pride. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 42.

[k] Ireton had his horſe killed under him, was run through the thigh, wounded in the face with a pike, and made priſoner, but found means to eſcape upon the turn of the battle. Whitelock, p. 150.

[l] Fairfax had his helmet beat off, but however, rid up and down bare-headed. Whereupon. colonel Charles D'oyley told him, he expoſed himſelf to too much danger, and offered him his helmet, but he refuſed it, ſaying, "It is well enough, Charles." Then he ordered him to charge a body of the king's foot, which ſtood unbroken in the front, whilſt he would do the ſame in the rear, and meet him in the middle. Which was done accordingly. In this charge Fairfax killed the enſign, and one of D'oyley's troopers took the colours, bragging, he had killed the enſign, for which D'oyley chiding him, Fairfax ſaid. "Let him alone, I have honour enough, let him take that honour to himſelf." Skippon being wounded in the beginning of the fight, was deſired to go off the field, but he anſwered, "He would not ſtir "as long as a man would ſtand." Whitelock, p. 151.

[m] Here the lord Clarendon makes the following remark. This difference, ſays he, was obſerved all along in the diſcipline of the king's troops and of thoſe under Fairfax and Cromwell, that though the king's troops prevailed in the charge, they ſeldom rallied themſelves again in order, nor could be brought to make a ſecond charge the ſame day. Whereas the other troops, if they prevailed, or though they were beaten, preſently rallied again, and ſtood in good order, till they received new orders. The ſame thing, he ſays, was not obſervable in the forces under Eſſex and Waller. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 508.

[n] Whitelock ſays, that on the parliament's ſide were wounded and ſlain above a thouſand officers and common ſoldiers; and, that the king ſhewed himſelf this day a courageous general, keeping cloſe with his horſe, and in perſon rallying them to hot encounters. Mem. p. 151. This battle was fought in a large fallow-field, on the northweſt ſide of Naſeby, about a mile broad; there are now no ſigns of a fight remaining, excepting ſome few holes, which were the burying place of dead men and horſes. He

London, he ordered Cromwell, with a party of horſe, to take ſuch places as might hinder that communication. He alſo detached colonel Rainſborough to beſiege Berkley-caſtle, the only garriſon the king had between Gloceſter and Briſtol. He went himſelf to Bath the 17th of September, where he remained till his orders were executed.

Cromwell with his party appeared before the caſtle of the Devizes in Wiltſhire, ſituate in the road of traffic between London and the eaſtern counties. The governor ſir Charles Lloyd made a ſhew of defending himſelf, but however capitulated on the morrow. The ſame day Cromwell detached colonel Pickering, who became maſter of Laycock-houſe, where was a garriſon of the king's kept by colonel Bovile. After that, Pickering rejoined the army, as did colonel Rainſborough, Berkley-caſtle having been ſurrendered by the governor Charles Lucas upon articles.

September the 26th, the general called a council of war, where it was reſolved that the army ſhould march farther weſtward. But as the prince of Wales, the king's eldeſt ſon, was in thoſe parts with Goring's, Grenvil's, and ſome other troops, which altogether made a conſiderable body, the general was apprehenſive of meeting many difficulties in that expedition, and therefore thought it incumbent upon him to ſecure the communication with London. To that purpoſe, he detached Cromwell once more with orders to endeavour to take the caſtle of Wincheſter, and then Baſing-houſe, which had been twice beſieged in vain.

Cromwell, with his wonted activity, marching directly to Wincheſter, took the city and caſtle upon articles. A complaint being made by ſome of the garriſon that they were plundered in their marching out, he cauſed ſtrict inquiry to be made after the offenders, of whom ſix were found and condemned to die. After lots caſt for their lives, he, whoſe lot it was, was executed; and the other five were ſent to ſir Thomas Glemham governor of Oxford, to be puniſhed as he pleaſed. But the governor ſent them back with an acknowledgement of Cromwell's juſtice and civility.

From Wincheſter, Cromwell advanced to Baſing. the houſe of the marquis of Wincheſter, which he having fortified kept garriſon there for the king[t]. As he refuſed to ſurrender, he was ſo ſuddenly and briſkly aſſaulted, that the place was carried by ſtorm, and himſelf taken priſoner and ſent to London. After that Cromwell took Lanford-houſe near Saliſbury, which ſurrendered upon articles.

In the mean time, Fairfax purſuing his march into the weſt, came before Tiverton. It was reſolved at a council of war to ſtorm the town: but whilſt they were conſulting how to order the attack, a round-ſhot happened to break the chain of the draw-bridge, which falling down, the ſoldiers, without waiting for orders, poſſeſſed themſelves of the town.

After that, the army marched towards Exeter, the capital of Devonſhire. But as this place was ſtrong and well garriſoned, and the ſeaſon not proper for ſo important a ſiege, it was reſolved to block it up till it could be inveſted in form.

Whilſt the general was employed in ordering the blockade, which held till December, and in building neceſſary forts on the eaſt-ſide of the Ex, the prince of Wales had time to aſſemble all the king's forces in thoſe parts, with the militia of Cornwall, and form an army of eight thouſand men. Fairfax hearing the enemies were preparing to march againſt him, reſolved to prevent them by advancing towards them. He made ſuch ſpeed that he ſurpriſed a brigade of their horſe, commanded by the lord Wentworth, and took between three and four thouſand horſes. This obliged the king's generals to proceed with more caution, raiſe the blockade of Plymouth to ſtrengthen their army, and paſs the Tamar, in order to retire into Cornwall.

The prince's retreat into Cornwall gave Fairfax opportunity to attack Dartmouth, a ſea-port of great conſequence, which he took by ſtorm, the ſeaſon not allowing him to beſiege it in form.

After all theſe advantages, Fairfax returned to Exeter, and finiſhed the blockade of that city. Shortly after, he left the command of it to ſir Hardreſs Waller, and went himſelf to meet the lord Hopton, who was marching to the relief of Exeter, at the head of ſeven or eight thouſand men. General Goring being withdrawn into France, the prince of Wales had given the command of his army to the lord Hopton. Fairfax approaching the enemies, heard the lord Hopton was intrenched in Torrington, to oblige him either to attack him thus advantageouſly poſted, or to keep the field in a very rainy ſeaſon, in a country where there were few villages to ſhelter his army from the weather. Fairfax having weighed the inconveniencies of leaving the enemies thus intrenched, reſolved to attack them. To that end, he advanced within a mile of Torrington, and poſſeſſed himſelf of ſome poſts, with deſign to engage on the morrow. But in the night Hopton's troops attempting to diſlodge the parliamentarians, and theſe receiving aſſiſtance from the army, the battle began inſenſibly, and held almoſt the whole night. [1745-6] In ſhort, after a long conflict in the dark, the lord Hopton's intrenchments were forced, and himſelf obliged to retire with his horſe and only four or five hundred of the four thouſand foot, he had before the battle. Thus all his infantry were ſlain or taken, or ſo diſperſed, that it was not poſſible for thoſe that eſcaped to rejoin their general, who was retired into Cornwall[u].

After this freſh victory, Fairfax judged, his main buſineſs was, utterly to deſtroy the enemies horſe that eſcaped from Torrington, conſiſting of three thouſand, and to hinder them from joining the king. Inſtead therefore of returning to Exeter, he reſolved to march into Cornwall with his whole army. He ſet out the 23d of February, and ſeizing the paſſes of the river Tamar, left there ſtrong guards, as alſo in all places where he thought the enemies might try to paſs, in caſe they intended, as was very likely, to join the king. The lord Hopton finding Fairfax was advancing towards him, and not being able to fight him, quitted Bodmin, where he had poſted himſelf, and retired farther weſtward. Mean while, Fairfax ſtill advanced, taking all poſſible care to guard all the paſſes by which the enemy might eſcape him.

The approach of the parliament-army cauſed the prince of Wales to reſolve to ſecure his perſon by retiring into Scilly, where he ſafely arrived[w]. Mean while, the lord Hopton was extremely embaraſſed. and the more, as the people of the country who before were devoted to the king, began to alter their minds, and even voluntarily offered themſelves to general Fairfax, to block up the paſſes and hinder the king's forces from eſcaping. At laſt, the parliament-army approaching Truro, where Hopton had his head-quarters, Fairfax ſent and offered him honourable terms if he would capitulate. Whilſt he waited for an anſwer, he ſtill advanced towards the enemies, and beating up one of their quarters, took three hundred horſes. In ſhort, not to deſcend to unneceſſary particulars, I ſhall content myſelf with briefly ſaying, that the lord Hopton ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, and deſparing to eſcape, agreed to capitulate. By the treaty, ſigned the 14th of March, it was agreed, that all the forces under the command of the lord Hopton ſhould within ſix days be diſbanded, with leave to go beyond ſea, or to their homes. That all the horſes and arms ſhould be delivered to general Fairfax, and upon performance thereof, each trooper ſhould receive twenty ſhillings, or his horſe. That paſſes ſhould be given to ſuch as defired to go beyond ſea, upon their promiſing not to bear arms any more againſt the parliament of England[x]. There were ſeveral other articles which it is needleſs to ſpecify, as they concerned only the manner how the treaty was to be executed[r]. The lords Hopton and Culpepper retired to Scilly before the treaty was ſigned. Thus the king's army in the weſt was entirely diſperſed. After this, Fairfax returns before Exeter, which was ſurrendered upon articles the 9th of April 1646. With the taking of that city, Fairfax ended his weſtern expedition, which could not be more glorious to him, or more advantageous to the parliament, ſince the king had neither towns nor forces left in the country.

It is time now to ſee what paſſed in the reſt of the kingdom, whilſt the parliament-army was employed in reducing the weſtern counties.

The Scotch army having taken Newcaſtle in October 1644, divided themſelves in two bodies, one whereof be-

[u] There were not above five hundred ſlain, the greateſt part were diſperſed. Among the colours were taken the lord Hopton's own, with this motto, I will ſtrive to ſerve my ſovereign king. Idem, tom. VI. p. 103.

[w] The king his father, by two letters dated November 7, and December 7, ordered him, as ſoon as he ſhould find himſelf in a probable danger of falling into the enemy's hands, to retire into Denmark, or ſome other place beyond ſea. See Clarendon, tom. II. p. 546, 547. The prince, on April 16, 1646, embarked for Jerſey, whrre he landed the next day, and from thence paſſed into France. Idem, tom. III. p. 3, 4.

Where

fieged Carliſle, which ſurrendered upon articles in June 1645.

The other part of the army durſt not engage in a ſiege, becauſe the marquis of Montroſe, who ſerved the king in Scotland, having had great ſucceſs there, it was to be feared the king would think of ſending him reinforcements. Wherefore the Scots always kept in a readineſs to oppoſe it. This became ſtill more neceſſary after the battle of Naſeby, there being great likelihood of the king's reſolving to join the earl of Montroſe with his cavalry. Beſides, the Scots by keeping thus in the middle of the kingdom, prevented the king from making new levies in thoſe parts. At laſt, after the taking of Carliſle, the two bodies being rejoined, they beſieged Hereford about the end of July. But after having in vain carried on the ſiege above a month, they raiſed it in the beginning of September. The earl of Leven their general publiſhed, on this occaſion, a ſort of apology, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, that for ſix or ſeven months paſt, they had received but one month's pay: that they had been promiſed to be ſupplied with all things neceſſary for a ſiege: in which they had been extremely diſappointed, ſince they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty balls to each: that they had but few horſe, and being informed the king was marching towards them with three thouſand horſe, it was impoſſible to continue the ſiege. Laſtly, that general Leſly was obliged to go into Scotland with his whole party of horſe and dragoons, to oppoſe Montroſe.

After the ſiege of Hereford was raiſed, the Scotch army retired into Yorkſhire, complaining pretty openly of being entirely neglected. Whereupon, the parliament aſſigned them thirty thouſand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark upon the firſt of November, and ordered that the eaſtern aſſociation ſhould pay them fourteen hundred pounds a week. The Scots agreeing to theſe terms, the ſiege of Newark was begun about the end of October 1645, and laſted May 1646.

In July, Pomfret-caſtle was ſurrendered to the parliament, and four days after, that of Scarborough capitulated alſo having maintained a long ſiege under ſir Hugh Cholmley, in which ſir John Meldrum was killed.

I left the king in Wales after the battle of Naſeby, where he was employed in ſeeking means to raiſe a new army. As to the diſpoſing of his perſon, it was hardly poſſible for him to come to any reſolution, before he knew what his enemies intended to do after their victory. But when he ſaw general Fairfax, with his army, engaged in the weſtern counties, he departed from his retreat with his cavalry, conſiſting of three thouſand horſe. As the parliament had but very few forces in the mid-land parts, the king came without danger to Litchfield, and from thence, entering the aſſociated eaſtern counties, took Huntington, where he met with a great booty, after which he came to Oxford*. From thence he departed in three days, taking with him what forces could be ſpared, and marched to Cambden.

The parliament, thinking the king's deſign was to relieve either Briſtol or Hereford, which were both beſieged at the ſame time, gave orders to major-general Pointz and colonel Roſſiter to aſſemble what forces they could, and diligently attend the king's motions. Accordingly they drew together about two thouſand horſe, and poſted themſelves between the king and Oxford. But at the ſame time, the Scots having raiſed the ſiege of Hereford of their own accord, the king marched thither, where he continued till the 20th of September. Here he received the news of the ſurrender of Briſtol.

About the ſame time, colonel Jones, with adjutant-general Louthian, who ſerved the parliament, beſieged Beeſton-caſtle, drew of thence on a ſudden a party of thirteen hundred men, and went to ſurpriſe Cheſter, in which they partly ſucceeded. But as they had not ſufficient forces to become maſters of the reſt of the city, they were content to keep what they had got, expecting ſir William Brereton, who was to bring them a ſupply. As the king then expected a body of troops from Ireland, which could land but at Cheſter, this city was of ſo great conſequence to him, that he immediately marched to diſlodge the enemies from that part they had in their power. He was no ſooner on his march, but Pointz cloſely followed him, and overtook him on Routon-heath within two miles of Cheſter, which obliged him to turn againſt his purſuers. The fight at firſt was pretty obſtinate, but as the king had five thouſand, and Pointz only two thouſand men, Pointz was briſkly repulſed, and put into great diſorder. Mean while, juſt as the king thought himſelf entirely victorious, Jones and Louthian came from Cheſter with eight hundred men, and falling upon the king's rear, forced them to turn againſt them. This gave Pointz time to rally his men, and then charge the king's army, who finding themſelves at once attacked before and behind, were at laſt utterly routed, with the loſs of ſix hundred men, and a thouſand priſoners. Bernard Stewart earl of Litchfield, and ſome other officers of quality were killed. It was with great difficulty, that the king with the remains of his army, got into Denbigh-caſtle in Wales, where he continued ſome time; after which, with a party of about three thouſand men, he came to Newark in Nottinghamſhire. He ſtayed in that town, till fearing to be beſieged by the Scots, who were approaching, he went away by night, and ſafely arrived at Oxford the 6th of November, there being no other remedy left than to make a peace with the parliament.

But this peace was not eaſy to be made. The king would have willingly granted, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs, ſomething of what he had before refuſed, but did not care to yield all. The parliament, on their ſide, were willing to make peace like conquerors, and by aggravating the terms inſtead of rendering them more tolerable.

Mean while, notwithſtanding the difficulties which were naturally to occur in the concluſion of a peace, the king's friends at London made him hope, that the diſſenſions between the preſbyterians and the independents might turn to his advantage. It was intimated to him, that the preſbyterians were inraged to ſee the independent party daily increaſe in number and ſtrength, and that it was not doubted, but if he could obtain leave to come and treat in perſon with the two houſes, the preſbyterian members would find means to conclude a peace, in order to be freed from the yoke of the independents: that the city of London was almoſt wholly preſbyterians; that the king had there alſo many friends, and if the parliament expreſſed an inclination to peace, which was very likely, it would not be in the power of the independents to prevent the concluſion. This was all very well; but they ſhould have firſt explained what was to be underſtood by the word peace. Very probably, the parliament, or preſbyterian party, which ſtill prevailed, would have very gladly conſented to a peace, if the king had been willing to grant two points, which were conſidered by them as abſolutely neceſſary, namely, the abolition of epiſcopacy, and ſufficient ſecurity for the performance of his promiſes. For in theſe two points conſiſted the parliament's ſcheme for a peace. But this was not the king's ſcheme. He always meant that ſuch a peace ſhould be made as he deſired, and which I have often explained. It is true, that in his preſent circumſtances he was willing, with regard to the ſecurity, to grant ſomething more than what he had yet offered: but nothing could prevail with him to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy. So, by ever preſerving the ambiguity in the term of peace, he imagined if he could obtain liberty to come and treat at London with the two houſes, it would not be impracticable, with the help of his friends, to force the parliament to make peace with him in his ſenſe of the word, though nothing was further from the intention of both houſes.

In this belief the 5th of December, he demanded of the two houſes a ſafe conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, John Aſhburnham, and Jeffery Palmer, eſquires, who were to bring propoſitions for a peace.

The 15th of the ſame month he renewed his demand, complaining of his having received no anſwer.

The 26th he ſent them a third meſſage, wherein he ſaid:

"That conceiving the former treaties had hitherto proved ineffectual, chiefly for want of power in thoſe perſons that treated, as likewiſe, becauſe thoſe from whom their power was derived, could not give ſo clear a judgment as was requiſite; if therefore he might have the engagement of the two houſes at Weſtminſter, the commiſſioners of the parliament of Scotland, the mayor, aldermen, common-council, and militia of London; of the chief commanders in ſir Thomas Fairfax's army, as alſo of thoſe in the Scots army, for free and ſafe coming to, and abode in London or Weſtminſter for the ſpace of forty days; he would come and have a perſonal treaty with the two houſes of parliament at Weſtminſter, and the commiſſioners of the parliament of Scotland, upon all matters which might conduce to the reſtoring of peace and happineſs to his kingdoms.

"He declared beforehand, that he was willing to commit the great truſt of the militia, for ſuch time, and with ſuch powers, as were expreſſed in the paper delivered by his commiſſioners at Uxbridge, to thirty perſons he named. But if this did not ſatisfy the parliament, then he offered to name the one half, and leave the other to the election of the two houſes."

Before the two houſes received this laſt meſſage, they had ſent the following anſwer to the two firſt:

"That finding that former treaties had been made uſe of for other ends, under the pretence of peace, and had proved dilatory and unſucceſsful, they could not give way to a ſafe-conduct, according to his majeſty's deſire. But both houſes of the parliament of England, having under their conſiderations, propoſitions and bills for the ſettling of a ſafe and well grounded peace, which were ſpeedily to be communicated to the commiſſioners of the kingdom of Scotland, did reſolve, after mutual agreement of both kingdoms, to preſent them with all ſpeed to his majeſty."

The king replied, the 29th of December. He complained that a ſafe-conduct was denied for the perſons he intended to ſend. He inſiſted upon his demand of a perſonal treaty, and deſired an anſwer to his meſſage of the 26th. He ſaid, he ſhould never have thought of coming to London, if it was not his ſincere intention to make peace.

The 15th of January 1645-6, he ſent another meſſage to both houſes, wherein he complained of not having an anſwer: he ſaid, "That what he earneſtly deſired was peace, and the means, his perſonal preſence at Weſtminſter, where the government of the church being ſettled as it was in the times of queen Elizabeth and king James, and full liberty for the eaſe of their conſciences who would not communicate in that ſervice eſtabliſhed by law, and likewiſe for the free and public uſe of the directory, to ſuch as ſhould deſire to uſe the ſame; and all forces being agreed to be diſbanded, his majeſty would then forthwith join with his two houſes of parliament, in ſettling ſome way for the payment of the public debts to his Scotch ſubjects, the city of London, and others. And having propoſed a fair way for the ſettling of the militia he would endeavour upon debate with his two houſes, ſo to diſpoſe of it, as likewiſe of the buſineſs of Ireland, as might give them and both kingdoms ſatisfaction. Not doubting alſo, but to give good contentment to his two houſes of parliament in the choice of the lord-admiral, the officers of ſtate, and others."

The 13th of January 1645-6, two days before the date of the laſt meſſage, both houſes had returned an anſwer to that of the 29th of December.

"That there had been a great deal of innocent blood of his ſubjects ſhed in the war, by his majeſty's commands and commiſſions.

"That there had been Iriſh rebels brought over into both kingdoms, and endeavours to bring over more as alſo forces from foreign parts.

"That his majeſty was in arms in thoſe parts, and the prince at the head of an army in the weſt; there were alſo forces in Scotland againſt that parliament and kingdom, by his commiſſion; and the war in Ireland was fomented and prolonged by his majeſty.

"That until ſatisfaction and ſecurity was firſt given to both kingdoms, his majeſty's coming to the parliament could not be convenient, nor by them aſſented unto.

"That they could not apprehend it a means conducing to peace, that his majeſty ſhould come to his parliament for a few days, with any thoughts of leaving it, eſpecially with intentions of returning to hoſtility againſt it.

"That his majeſty deſired the engagement not only of his parliament, but of the lord-mayor of London, &c. which was againſt the privileges and honour of the parliaments, thoſe being joined with them, who were ſubject, and ſubordinate to their authority.

"That the only way for the obtaining an happy and well-grounded peace, was, for his majeſty to give his aſſent to thoſe propoſitions that ſhould be ſent to him.

"That there was not ſo much as any mention of Scotland."

The king, in a reply to this anſwer, greatly complained of the aſperſions caſt upon him by both houſes, and reproached them in his turn. He inſiſted upon an anſwer to his meſſage of the 15th of December, ſaying, "No rational man could think their laſt paper, to be any anſwer to his former demands."

But the 24th of the ſame month, he ſent a farther reply to every particular article of that anſwer. The ſubſtance whereof was:

1. "That a great deal of innocent blood had been ſpilt. That is the very reaſon why he preſſeth that there ſhould be no more. (1.)

Remark (1.) The meaning of this objection of both houſes was, that there having been a great deal of blood ſpilt in the war, it was reaſonable the authors thereof ſhould be puniſhed, and that the king continuing to protect them, it was neceſſary to proſecute the war till he ſhould be obliged to deliver them to juſtice. So, the king's general reply upon this article anſwered not the objection.

2. "That he had cauſed ſome Iriſh to repair to his aſſiſtance."

He anſwered, that thoſe whom they called Iriſh, were indeed (for the moſt part) ſuch Engliſh proteſtants as had been formerly ſent into Ireland by the two houſes, and unable to ſtay there any longer, by the neglect of thoſe that ſent them thither, who ſhould have better provided for them. (2.)

Rem. (2.) The objection did not relate to the Engliſh forces the king had ſent for from Ireland. The two houſes were far from giving theſe ſoldiers the name of Iriſh. But they meant the Iriſh papiſts entertained by the king in his army, and particularly ten thouſand men which the earl of Glamorgan was to bring over. The king feigned not to underſtand the two houſes, and made an evaſive anſwer to the objection.

3. "That the prince was at the head of an army." The king anſwered, it was no great wonder, ſince there was yet no peace.

4. "That he deſired to come to his parliament but for a few days." He anſwered by proteſting, that he ſought that treaty to avoid future hoſtility, and procure a laſting peace. (3.)

Rem. (3.) The parliament did not queſtion it: but they thought the king would come to London only to compel, by means of his friends, both houſes to make ſuch a peace as he deſired. So, this general anſwer was not capable of giving them ſatisfaction.

5. "That the engagements which his majeſty had deſired for his ſecurity, were a breach of privilege." The king anſwered, that whoſoever ſhould call to mind the particular occaſions that enforced him to leave the city of London and Weſtminſter, would judge his demand very reaſonable and neceſſary for his ſafety. But he no way conceived how the lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. of London, were either ſubject or ſubordinate to the authority of the two houſes.

6. "That he had made no mention of Scotland." He anſwered, it was included in his former, and had been particularly mentioned in his latter, meſſage of the 15th.

Laſtly, He deſired a poſitive anſwer to his former meſſages.

The 29th of January the king ſent another meſſage to both houſes, where he expreſly diſavowed the earl of Glamorgan, concerning the treaty with the Iriſh rebels: and ſaid, "That that earl having made offer unto him to raiſe forces in the kingdom of Ireland, and to conduct them into England for his majeſty's ſervice, he had granted him a commiſſion to that purpoſe, and to that purpoſe only: but that he had no commiſſion at all to treat of any thing elſe, without the privity and directions of the lord-lieutenant. And this clearly appeared by the lord-lieutenant's proceedings with the ſaid earl, who had orders to call him to an account. (4.)

Rem. (4.) The diſguiſe uſed by the king on this occaſion will manifeſtly appear in what will be ſaid preſently concerning this treaty.

The king added, "That if two houſes would admit of his repair to London for a perſonal treaty, ſpeedy notice ſhould be given him thereof, and a ſafe-conduct with a blank ſent for a meſſenger to be immediately diſpatched into Ireland, to ſtop the concluſion of the peace, the lord-lieutenant being empowered to treat and conclude it.

"That he would leave the management of the buſineſs of Ireland wholly to the two houſes, and make no peace there but with their conſent, in caſe his endeavours in the treaty ſhould be bleſſed with ſucceſs.

"That if his perſonal repair to London ſhould be admitted, and a peace thereon enſue, he would then leave the nomination of the perſons to be intruſted with the militia, wholly to his two houſes, with ſuch power and limitations as were expreſſed in the paper delivered by his majeſty's commiſſioners at Uxbridge, the 6th of February 1644-5.

"That if the peace ſucceeded, he would be content, that 'pro hac vice,' the two houſes ſhould nominate the admiral, officers of ſtate, and judges, to hold their places during life, or or 'quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint,' to be accountable to none but the king and the two houſes of parliament.

"That as for matter of religion, he intended, that all proteſtants ſhould have the free exerciſe of their religion according to their own way.

"That upon the concluſion of peace there ſhould be a general act of oblivion and free pardon.

"And this to extend to Scotland."

The king had never made ſuch advances before, and yet all his endeavours to obtain a ſafe-conduct were fruitleſs. The two houſes were ſo perſuaded of his ability in the choice of his expreſſions, which were commonly ambiguous, and capable of a different ſenſe from what appeared at firſt ſight, that they could not reſolve to treat with him upon his own propoſitions. Beſides, they did not doubt, but the overture of a perſonal treaty was deſigned for a ſnare to force them to ſuch a peace as he deſired. They ſent therefore to his ſeveral meſſages no other anſwer than what has been ſeen. So, this ſort of negociation, of which the king expected a happy event, only left things juſt as they were.

Both houſes, as we have ſeen, reproached the king, that he was now endeavouring to bring Iriſh troops into England; the king did not diſown it, but denied the giving of the earl of Glamorgan power to treat with the rebels upon any other article. This was literally true, but the king took care not to diſcover the whole extent of this article, and yet both houſes were perfectly informed of it, as will hereafter appear. To underſtand fully the objection and anſwer, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed in Ireland upon this ſubject. This is not one of the leaſt curious points of the reign of Charles I. though the lord Clarendon has thought fit to paſs it over in ſilence.

The ceſſation made by the king with the Iriſh rebels, had not intirely ſuſpended hoſtilities in that iſland. Murrough O'Bryen lord Inchiquin, who commanded in Munſter for the parliament, and major-general Monroe, who was at the head of the Scots in Ulſter, had refuſed to accept of the ceſſation [t]. On the other hand, the Engliſh forces drawn by the king out of Ireland, had been intirely ruined and diſperſed in England. Thus the king had reaped no advantage by the ceſſation, the motives whereof he had concealed with all poſſible care. He had pretended, he was indiſpenſably obliged to conclude it, in order to ſave the Engliſh from the utter deſtruction they were threatened with, by the ſuperiority of the rebels and the parliament's neglect to ſend ſupplies into Ireland. But when theſe Engliſh troops were ſeen to come into England, it was eaſy to perceive the true reaſon of the ceſſation.

The king not having reaped from this artifice all the advantage he expected, deſiſted not from the deſign of making uſe of the aſſiſtance of the Iriſh to continue the war againſt the parliament. On the contrary, he formed the project of a peace with the rebels, in order to employ, not only the reſt of the Engliſh troops ſtill in Ireland, but alſo a good body of Iriſh, whom he intended to ſend for into England. He ordered therefore the marquis of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, to negociate this peace, wherein however difficulties ſeemingly inſurmountable occurred. To make peace with the Iriſh, they were neceſſarily to be ſatisfied in point of religion. But this the king could not do without running counter to all his proteſtations concerning his great zeal for the proteſtant religion, and without confirming in ſome meaſure, the ſuſpicions of thoſe who believed he was concerned in the Iriſh rebellion. In a word, he could not take this ſtep, without relinquiſhing the intereſt of the Iriſh proteſtants, and giving the catholics ſuch advantages, as would render them very ſuperior to the proteſtants. The intereſts of England were alſo to be abandoned, and the dominion ſhe had always enjoyed over Ireland, ſince the conqueſt of that kingdom, was in great meaſure to be forfeited. Nay, he was in danger by ſuch a proceeding to loſe many friends in England. Thoſe who were ſincerely attached to him, and perſuaded, that he acted upon motives of juſtice and religion, muſt have opened their eyes, when they ſaw him manifeſtly betray the intereſt of England, and the proteſtant religion, if he had concluded with the Iriſh ſuch a peace as they demanded. Theſe were great difficulties which could be ſurmounted but by one of theſe ways; either by perſuading the Iriſh to rely on his general promiſes, that he would content them at a better juncture, and when it was more in his power; or elſe, colouring with ſome ſpecious pretence, the favours he ſhould be obliged to grant them for a peace. As to the firſt way, the king forgot nothing that he believed apt to induce the Iriſh to truſt to his promiſes, and herein the marquis of Ormond was long employed without any effect. The Iriſh were immoveable, and would not be contented with bare words. The ſecond way was ſtill more impracticable: for what colour could be put upon an intire relinquiſhing of the intereſts of religion and England?

Mean while, as the king hoped, that with the ſuccours from Ireland, he ſhould be able to give law to the parliament, and then, be obliged to uſe no farther ceremony; he reſolved not to deprive himſelf of ſuch an advantage, but to grant the Iriſh whatever they demanded. However, to avoid the prejudice ſuch a proceeding might create him in England, he choſe to conclude a private peace with the Iriſh, without ſolemnity, or the intervention of the lord-lieutenant, and to bind himſelf to have it effectually executed, till it ſhould be in his power to ratify it ſolemnly, with which the Iriſh were content.

To this purpoſe, whilſt the marquis of Ormond was ſeemingly labouring with great earneſtneſs to make a peace with the rebels, by trying to perſuade them to deſiſt from part of their demands, Edward Somerſet earl of Glamorgan, authorized by the king, was treating ſecretly and more effectually with them. He granted them, on the king's behalf, all their demands, on condition they would furniſh him with ten thouſand men, who ſhould paſs into England, under the command of the ſame earl of Glamorgan. But as this lord's bare promiſe was not a ſufficient ſecurity for the Iriſh, the king ſent him full powers, the tenor whereof was as follows:

CHARLES R.

"CHARLES by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our truſty, and right well-beloved couſin, Edward earl of Glamorgan, greeting. We, repoſing great and eſpecial truſt and confidence in your approved wiſdom, and fidelity, do by theſe (as firmly as under our great-ſeal, to all intents and purpoſes) authoriſe, and give you power, to treat and conclude, with the confederate Roman catholics in our kingdom of Ireland, if upon neceſſity any be to be condeſcended unto, wherein our lieutenant cannot ſo well be ſeen in, as not fit for us at the preſent publicly to own: therefore we charge you to proceed according to this warrant, with all poſſible ſecrecy: and for whatſoever you ſhall engage yourſelf, upon ſuch valuable conſiderations, as you in your judgment ſhall deem fit, we promiſe, on the word of a king, and a chriſtian, to ratify and perform the ſame that ſhall be granted by you, and under your hand and ſeal; the ſaid confederate catholics, having, by their ſupplies, teſtified their zeal to our ſervice. And this ſhall be, in each particular to you, a ſufficient warrant."

Given at our court at Oxford, under our ſignet, and royal ſignature, the 20th day of March, in the twentieth year of our reign, 1644.

The date of this warrant is remarkable, for it was at a time when the king's affairs did not ſeem abſolutely to require his employing the Iriſh catholics. In the foregoing campaign, he had gained a ſignal advantage over the earl of Eſſex, with all the weſtern counties. He had fought a battle at Newbury, which had not procured his enemies any real advantage, and on the contrary, had ſhewn in the affair of Dennington, that he believed to have no reaſon to fear them. It was juſt after the treaty of Uxbridge, where he did not think himſelf under a neceſſity of making any conceſſions. In a word, it was at a time when the parliament, by reaſon of the ill ſucceſs of their arms, were labouring to new-model their army. It cannot therefore be ſaid, that the king was driven by deſpair, to make uſe of the aſſiſtance of the Iriſh. It is rather very eaſy to perceive, it was ſolely to encreaſe the ſuperiority he then had over the parliament.

By virtue of this warrant, the earl of Glamorgan concluded a treaty with the popiſh biſhops, concerning the clergy-livings. This was a preliminary treaty, upon which the biſhops made the following inſtrument:

"Whereas in theſe articles touching the clergy-livings, the right honourable the earl of Glamorgan, is obliged in his majeſty's behalf, to ſecure the conceſſions in theſe articles by act of parliament: we holding that manner of ſecuring thoſe grants, as to the clergy-livings, to prove more difficult and prejudicial to his majeſty, than by doing thereof, and ſecuring thoſe conceſſions otherwiſe, as to the ſaid living, the ſaid earl undertaking and promiſing, in the behalf of his majeſty, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, as hereby he doth undertake, to ſettle the ſaid conceſſions, and ſecure them

[t] The lord Inchiquin refuſed to accept it, becauſe he could not obtain the preſidency of Munſter. See Borlaſe, p. 146.

He

to the clergy, and their reſpective ſucceſſors, in another ſecure way, other than by parliament, at preſent, till a fit opportunity be offered for ſecuring the ſame; do agree, and condeſcend thereunto: and this inſtrument by his lordſhip ſigned, was before the perfecting thereof intended to that purpoſe, as to the ſaid livings, to which purpoſe we mutually ſigned this indorſement: and it is further intended, that the catholic clergy ſhall not be interrupted by parliament, or otherwiſe, as to the ſaid livings, contrary to the meaning of theſe articles."

GLAMORGAN.

The earl of Glamorgan added alſo the following proteſtation or oath:

"I Edward earl of Glamorgan do proteſt, and ſwear, faithfully to acquaint the king's moſt excellent majeſty with the proceedings of this kingdom, in order to his ſervice, and to the endearment of this nation, and punctual performance of what I have (as authoriſed by his majeſty) obliged myſelf to ſee performed; and in default, not to permit the army intruſted to my charge to adventure itſelf, or any conſiderable part thereof, until conditions from his majeſty, and by his majeſty be performed."

Sept. 3, 1645. GLAMORGAN.

The ſubſtance of the treaty between the earl of Glamorgan, and the confederate Iriſh catholics.

IT was ſaid in the beginning of the treaty, that much time had been ſpent in meetings and debates betwixt James marquis of Ormond lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and the commiſſioners of the catholic council of Kilkenny, for the treating and concluding of a peace; and thereupon many difficulties ariſing, the earl of Glamorgan was entruſted and authoriſed by his majeſty, to grant and aſſure to the ſaid confederate catholics, further grace and favours, which the ſaid lord-lieutenant had not as yet, in that latitude as they expected, granted unto them; in purſuance therefore of his majeſty's authority, under his ſignature royal and ſignet, bearing date at Oxon the 12th day of March, in the 20th year of his majeſty's reign.—"It is accorded and agreed between the ſaid earl of Glamorgan, for and on the behalf of his majeſty, and Richard lord viſcount Mountgarret preſident of the ſupreme council at Kilkenny, Donnough lord viſcount Muſkerry, &c. commiſſioners appointed by the confederate Roman catholics:

"I. That all the profeſſors of the Roman catholic religion in Ireland ſhall enjoy the free and public uſe and exerciſe of their religion.

"II. That they ſhall hold and enjoy all the churches by them enjoyed within that kingdom, or by them poſſeſſed at any time ſince the 23d of October 1641, and all other churches in the ſaid kingdom, other than ſuch as are now actually enjoyed by his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects.

"III. That all the Roman catholics ſhall be exempted from the juriſdiction of the proteſtant clergy, and that the Roman catholic clergy ſhall not be puniſhed or moleſted, for the exerciſe of their juriſdiction over their reſpective catholic flocks.

"IV. That the following act ſhall be paſſed in the next parliament to be holden in Ireland. [Here is inſerted the form of an act for ſecuring all the king's conceſſions to the catholics.]

"V. That the marquis of Ormond, or any others, ſhall not diſturb the profeſſors of the Roman catholic religion in the profeſſion of the articles above ſpecified.

"VI. The earl of Glamorgan engages his majeſty's word for the performance of theſe articles.

"VII. The public faith of the kingdom ſhall be engaged unto the ſaid earl by the commiſſioners of the confederate catholics, for ſending ten thouſand men by order of the general-aſſembly at Kilkenny, armed the one half with muſquets, and the other half with pikes, to ſerve his majeſty in England, Wales, or Scotland, under the command of the earl of Glamorgan."

Signed the 25th of Auguſt 1645.

Moreover, the Iriſh commiſſioners engaged their word and the faith of the ſupreme council of Kilkenny, that two thirds of the clergy's revenues ſhould be employed for the ſpace of three years, towards the maintenance of the ten thouſand men, the other third being reſerved for the clergy's ſubſiſtence.

This treaty, though made very ſecretly, was however diſcovered by an extraordinary accident. The archbiſhop of Tuam, preſident of Connaught, going into Ulſter about ſome affairs, met with a body of Iriſh troops marching to beſiege Sligo and joined with them, whether for ſecurity's ſake or ſome other deſign[u]. When they came near Sligo, the garriſon made a ſally, charged the troops that were come to beſiege them, utterly routed them, and killed the archbiſhop of Tuam. In his pockets it was that authentic copies, atteſted and ſigned by ſeveral biſhops, were found, of the forementioned treaty, and of the king's warrant to the earl of Glamorgan, which were ſent to the parliament.

The marquis of Ormond, the lord Digby then in Ireland, and ſome others having ſoon heard that the ſecret was diſcovered, found no better expedient to clear the king, than to arreſt the earl of Glamorgan, for having, in a preſumptuous manner, worthy of ſevere puniſhment, exceeded his orders, and concluded a treaty with the Iriſh. This is what the king alſo inſinuated in his meſſage to both houſes of the 19th of January 1645-6.

Ruſhworth has inſerted in his collections two intercepted letters of the earl of Glamorgan, one to his counteſs dated in January, acquainting her that his impriſonment did not give him much uneaſineſs. In the other of the 26th of February, directed to the king, he told him, that he was at Waterford providing ſhipping to tranſport ſix thouſand foot immediately, and that four thouſand more were to follow them by May[w]. Theſe troops came not however into England, probably by reaſon of the change in the king's affairs, which were in a melancholy ſituation after the battle of Naſeby. All his towns were taken one after another. The Scots were now before Newark, and general Fairfax having reduced all the weſt to the obedience of the parliament, was preparing to beſiege the king in Oxford.

Whilſt the king was in this melancholy ſtate, the court of France ſent Montreuil into England, on pretence of procuring a peace between the king and the parliament: but their real intention was, that Montreuil ſhould endeavour a private agreement between the king and the Scots[x]. This could not be done without the king's entirely forſaking the biſhops, and conſenting to the eſtabliſhment of the preſbyterian government in the church of England. The court of France and the queen of England hoped, this project would ſucceed the more eaſily, as it was agreeable to good policy and the king's intereſts. The king would thereby have gained not only the Scots, who had a ſtrong army in England, but alſo the city of London and the majority of the members of parliament, who, for the moſt part, inſiſted upon the other points in diſpute only to obtain this the more eaſily. This was properly the ſole means of balancing or ſurmounting the great power of the independents, who were in a manner maſters of the army. If the king had taken this courſe, it is very evident, it would have turned greatly to his advantage: whereas, at the time it was propoſed to him, he was entirely without remedy. But his zeal for epiſcopacy would not ſuffer him to accept of ſuch an overture; and he told Montreuil, he would never conſent to it. About the ſame time the queen ſent ſir William Davenant to perſuade the king to join with the preſbyterians, as the only means to free himſelf from his ſad condition. The moment Davenant offered to ſpeak to him, he commanded him to hold his tongue, and never more appear in his preſence.

Mean while, Montreuil at his arrival in England being poſſeſſed with the notion, that the king would not refuſe the courſe, which was to be propoſed to him, had made ſome overtures to the Scotch commiſſioners reſiding in London, and found them inclinable to treat with the king: but after he had ſpoke and writ to his majeſty ſeveral times, he found him immoveable. The Scots, on their part, being no leſs inflexible, conſtantly refuſed to promiſe the king any aſſiſtance, unleſs he conſented to the abolition of epiſcopacy[y].

[u] He attended the army at this time to viſit his dioceſe, and put in execution an order for the arrears of his biſhopric, granted to him by the council of Kilkenny. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 239.

[w] This letter to the king, with the lord Digby's narrative of his proceedings againſt the earl of Glamorgan, &c. came to the parliament's hands in the following manner: whilſt Fairfax was in Cornwall hemming in the lord Hopton, a ſhip came into Padſtow from Ireland, not doubting but to have been well received; whereas the town's people, with the help of ſome parliament dragoons, ſeized and boarded her. The captain, one Allen of Waterford, had thrown a packet of letters over-board, which were found floating on the water and carried to Fairfax, who found, amongſt others, the letter and narrative above-mentioned. Theſe letters being ſhewed and read to the people of the county, who were ſummoned to appear on the downs by Bodmin, made great impreſſion on them, ſo that many of them offered to aſſiſt in blocking up all paſſages, to prevent the royal cavalry from breaking through. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 104.

[x] The lord Clarendon affirms, That the Scots were under terrible apprehenſions of being diſappointed of all their hopes, by the prevalence of the independent army, and therefore wiſhed for nothing more, than an opportunity to make a firm conjunction with the king.

[y] The Scots produced a writing ſigned by the queen, wherein were ſuch expreſſions, as did not pleaſe the king, and made him look upon that negociation, as rather a conſpiracy againſt the church, between the catholics and preſbyterians, than as an expedient for his reſtoration or preſervation. Clarendon, tom. II. p. 579.

Whilſt the affair was delayed by this difficulty, and Montreuil gone to the Scotch army before Newark, to try to find ſome medium favourable to the king, Fairfax was advancing with his army, ſo that the king was in danger of being incloſed in Oxford. The king's principal concern was then to deliver himſelf from this imminent danger. Though he had till that time demurred upon going to the Scotch army, on account of the forementioned difficulty, he ſaw however no other remedy when the danger approached. The Scotch officers had made him ſome general promiſes, founded probably upon their hopes of his conſenting at laſt to their demands. He ſent them word of his intention to come to their army, and they promiſed to receive him and provide for his ſafety. He had not time, doubtleſs, to make a more particular treaty. At leaſt it is not known to this day upon what terms the king put himſelf into the hands of the Scots, and on what conditions they received him. However, the king having no time to loſe, that he might not be inveſted in Oxford, departed privately, and came to the Scotch army, the 5th of May, 1646 [z].

[1646] The king had, on the 13th of April, imparted by letter to the marquis of Ormond his deſign to throw himſelf into the arms of the Scots, in theſe words: "Having lately received very good ſecurity that we, and all that do, or ſhall adhere to us, ſhall be ſafe in our perſons, honours, and conſciences, in the Scottiſh army; and that they ſhall really and effectually join with us, and with ſuch as will come in to us, and ſhall employ their armies and forces to aſſiſt us to the procuring of a happy and well-grounded peace—If it ſhall pleaſe God that we come ſafe thither, we are reſolved to uſe our beſt endeavour, with their aſſiſtance, and with the conjunction of the forces under the marquis of Montroſe, and ſuch of our well-affected ſubjects of England as ſhall ariſe for us to procure, if it may be, an honourable and ſpeedy peace."

The marquis of Ormond ſent a copy of this letter to general Monroe, who commanded the Scotch troops in Ireland, and Monroe communicated the ſame to the commiſſioners of the parliament in Ulſter, by whom copies of the letter, as printed at Dublin, were ſent over to both houſes, and it was read in the houſe of commons on Saturday June the 9th. Whereupon, on the Monday following, the Scotch commiſſioners delivered a declaration to the houſe of peers, poſitively denying, that their army had made any treaty with the king to aſſiſt him. Thus we ſee on one ſide, the king affirming he had received very good ſecurity that the Scots would declare for him; and on the other, the commiſſioners of Scotland denying that their army had made any treaty with the king to aſſiſt him.

In all probability, the Scotch commiſſioners and the general officers of their army had given Montreuil hopes, they would declare for the king, but on condition he would renounce epiſcopacy; without which condition, it is not eaſy to conceive, that the commiſſioners or officers ſhould have made ſuch a promiſe, which was not in their power; ſince they could not engage contrary to the expreſs tenor of the covenant, and without poſitive orders from thoſe who governed Scotland. Wherefore, it could only be hopes, and thoſe conditional, which the king prepoſterouſly took for aſſurances, and which Montreuil, perhaps, confounded as well as he. It is true, the earl of Clarendon cites a paper ſigned by Montreuil, wherein he ſays, "I do promiſe in the name of the king and queen (my maſter and miſtreſs) and by virtue of the powers I have from their majeſties, that if the king of Great-Britain ſhall put him himſelf into the Scottiſh army, he ſhall be there received as their natural ſovereign, and ſhall be with them in all freedom of his conſcience and honour.—And that the Scots ſhall employ their armies and forces to aſſiſt his majeſty in the recovery of his juſt rights, &c."

But it muſt be obſerved, there is not in this paper a ſingle word to ſhew that Montreuil was impowered to make this promiſe, either by the commiſſioners, or the general officers, or the parliament of Scotland: nay, it does not ſo much as appear that he was accepted for a mediator in the affair; that beſides, he could not engage the authority of the king of France and queen-regent to make ſuch a promiſe, unleſs he was furniſhed with a treaty, which however has never appeared. The lord Clarendon intimates, that Montreuil had the word of the principal officers in the Scotch army, but that afterwards, finding them grown cold, he writ to the king, to diſſuade him from venturing his perſon among them. Indeed it is hard to conceive that Montreuil ſhould ſign ſuch a promiſe without being authorized. But on the other hand, is it likely that, if he had been authorized by a treaty or other warrant, he would not have mentioned it in his paper?

But what ſeems ſtill more impoſſible, is that the Scots ſhould promiſe without condition, as this engagement intimates, contrary to the tenor of the covenant between the two nations, ſince the king would not ſo much as hear of the abolition of epiſcopacy. There muſt therefore have been ſome miſtake in the negotiation carried on by Montreuil's mediation, and the king and the mediator muſt have taken, for poſitive aſſurances, promiſes which were conditional only, as appears in the king's letter to the marquis of Ormond, and the ſolemn denial of the Scots. However this be, Montreuil was recalled and diſgraced, and as there is reaſon to believe, it was for engaging the word and honour of the king his maſter, and the queen-regent, upon ſo trifling a foundation. The lord Clarendon, probably, to hinder the king from being blamed for putting himſelf into the hands of the Scots too haſtily, and without good ſecurity, ſays, this envoy's diſgrace was an artifice of cardinal Mazerin, who had a mind to conceal the inſincerity of the court of France. I own I cannot comprehend the meaning of theſe words. But if it be true, that Montreuil was not authorized to promiſe what he did, as it does not appear that he was, I do not ſee any occaſion to ſeek for other cauſe of his diſgrace.

The king being come to the Scotch army [a], which had been before Newark ever ſince November, the general repreſented to him, that it would be proper, for the ſafety of his perſon, for the army to march northward, near the borders of Scotland. But as this could not be done before the taking of Newark, he deſired him to order the town to ſurrender. The king perſuaded by this reaſon, gave orders to the lord Ballaſis the governor to ſurrender Newark, which was done accordingly; and immediately after the army began to march and came with the king to Newcaſtle.

May the 18th, the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes, recommending to them the ſpeedy ſettling of religion, and the taking to that end the advice of the divines of both kingdoms aſſembled at Weſtminſter.

Concerning the militia, he agreed that the two houſe ſhould name all the commiſſioners for that truſt for the ſpace of ſeven years, and after the expiration of that term, a regulation ſhould be made by the king and both houſes.

He offered the like for the kingdom of Scotland.

Concerning the wars in Ireland, he ſaid in general, he would do whatever was poſſible for him to give full ſatisfaction therein.

In a poſtcript, he offered to diſband his forces at Oxford, and conſent that the fortifications of that city ſhould be demoliſhed, provided honourable terms were granted to the garriſon, which done, he would give the like order to the reſt of his garriſons.

The next day, the king writ to the city of London, to acquaint them, that he was ready to comply with the parliament in every thing.

June the 10th, he preſſed the two houſes by another meſſage, to ſend their propoſitions for peace, that he might give them all juſt ſatisfaction; and deſired again the liberty to come to London and treat in perſon with them [b].

[z] According to the lord Clarendon, the king was not reſolved, when he left Oxford, whither he ſhould go to London or the Scotch army. He ſays, the king went away the 27th of April, attended only by John Aſhburnham, groom of his bed-chamber, and one Mr. Hudſon a divine, who underſtood the by-ways. It was nine days after his leaving Oxford before it was known where the king was. It ſeems the king had waſted that time in ſeveral places, purpoſely to be informed of the condition of the marquis of Montroſe, and to find a ſecure paſſage to get to him, which he exceedingly deſired. Clarendon, tom. III. p. 17.——Hudſon, upon his examination, ſaid, That the king croſſed the country, was at Henley, Brentford, and Harrow on the Hill, where he ſtaid ſome time, and was almoſt perſuaded to come to London; and then he went to St. Albans, and ſo to Harborough in Leiceſterſhire, where the French agent was to have met him with ſome horſe, to conduct him to the Scots army, but came not; from thence the king went to Stamford, where he lay one night; and from thence to Downham in Norfolk, where he ſtayed at a petty alehouſe, from April 30 to May 4; that he paſſed ſometimes by the name of Hudſon's tutor, ſometimes doctor, and ſometimes as Aſhburnham's ſervant. Whitelock, p. 209. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 267. Heath, p. 99.

[a] The parliament received, on May 6, intelligence of the king's repairing to the Scots army, and thereupon immediately voted, That his majeſty ſhould be ſent to Warwick-caſtle. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 268.

[b] The parliament, in their debates about the propoſitions for peace to be ſent to the king, voted, That ſir Thomas Fairfax ſhould be made a baron, and have 5000l. a year ſettled upon him; and his father made an earl. Oliver Cromwell a baron, with 2500l. per annum. The earls of Northumberland, Eſſex, Warwick, and Pembroke, be made dukes. The earls of Saliſbury and Mancheſter, marquiſſes, The lords Roberts, Say, Willoughby of Parham, Wharton, and Howard, earls. Mr. Holles, a viſcount. Sir Henry Vane, ſenior, a baron. Sir William Waller, a baron, with 2500l. per annum. Sir Arthur Haſlerigge, and ſir Philip Stapleton, barons, with 2000l. per annum each. Sir William Brereton, to have 1500l. and Skippon 1000l. per annum. Whitelock, p. 181, 182.

The 25th of the ſame month, the Scotch commiſſioners preſented a memorial to the parliament, whereby they conſented, that the propoſitions for peace, which had been communicated to them, ſhould be ſent to the king, with proteſtation however, that they were not all agreeable to their ſentiments. They deſired alſo, that money might be ſent to their troops both in England and Ireland, their accounts ſtated, and all armies ſpeedily diſbanded.

Mean while, the Scotch army at Newcaſtle, underſtanding it was reported at London, that they had made a treaty with the king to aſſiſt him againſt the parliament, publiſhed a declaration, proteſting, it was always their intention to maintain the covenant between the two kingdoms, and that they abhorred all public and private ways tending to violate the ſame, or to create a miſunderſtanding between the two nations. At the ſame time, they preſented a petition to the king, beſeeching him to take a ſpeedy courſe of ſettling of religion in England, according to the example of the beſt reformed churches, and for eſtabliſhing the privileges and liberties of his kingdoms; expreſſing their great grief for his not having yet authorized and ſigned the covenant [c]. They alſo prayed him to comply with the counſels of his parliament. The king returned to this petition a general anſwer, without entering into particulars.

The general aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland writ likewiſe to the parliament of England, the city of London, the aſſembly of divines, to deſire them to promote the work of reformation, according to the tenor of the covenant.

July the 6th, the houſe of commons voted, That England had no further need of the Scotch army, and that the commiſſioners of Scotland ſhould be deſired to withdraw their forces.

Some days after, the two houſes ſent [d] propoſitions for peace to the king at Newcaſtle, which were little different from thoſe debated at Uxbridge. Wherefore I do not think it neceſſary to repeat them. I ſhall content myſelf with relating the 13th article, being an addition to the former claims of both houſes with reſpect to the militia:

"That during the ſpace of twenty years, the two houſes of parliament alone ſhall have power to arm, train, and diſcipline the militia; and that neither the king, or his ſucceſſors, ſhall during the ſaid ſpace of twenty years, exerciſe any power over them.

"The like for the kingdom of Scotland, if the eſtates of the parliament there ſhall think fit.

"That monies be raiſed for the maintenance of the ſaid forces for land-ſervice, and of the navy, as the lords and commons ſhall, during the ſaid ſpace of twenty years, think fit; and that the ſaid forces be employed, ordered, and diſpoſed, as the two houſes ſhall appoint, and not otherwiſe: that they ſhall have power, 1. To ſuppreſs all forces raiſed without their authority and conſent. 2. To ſuppreſs all foreign forces, who ſhall invade any of the Engliſh dominions. 3. To conjoin the forces of England with thoſe of Scotland.

"That after the expiration of the ſaid twenty years, no perſon under any pretence whatſoever, ſhall any way diſpoſe of the Engliſh forces, without the conſent of both houſes.

"That after the ſaid twenty years, if any bills are paſſed by the lords and commons, for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the royal aſſent is not given to them within ſuch time as the houſe of peers ſhall judge convenient; that ſuch bills ſhall nevertheleſs be as valid to all intents and purpoſes, as if the royal aſſent had been given thereunto."

The parliament's commiſſioners preſented theſe propoſitions to the king the 24th of July; and as they declared to him, they were limited not to ſtay above ten days at Newcaſtle, the king gave them his anſwer the 1ſt of Auguſt.

"That the propoſitions tendered to him did import ſo great alterations in government, both in the church and kingdom, that it was very difficult for him to return a particular and poſitive anſwer to them, before a full debate, wherein thoſe propoſitions, and the neceſſary explanation, true ſenſe, and reaſons thereof, were rightly weighed and underſtood: which he found the commiſſioners were not authorized to admit, nor able to give him. That he deſired to come to London, with freedom, honour, and ſafety, where he might have thoſe doubts cleared, and thoſe difficulties explained to him. That he aſſured them, that as he could never condeſcend to what was abſolutely deſtructive to that juſt power, which, by the laws of God and the land, he was born unto, ſo he would chearfully grant and give his aſſent to all ſuch bills, as ſhould be really for the good and peace of his people, not having regard to his own particular."

Before the king delivered his anſwer to the parliament's commiſſioners, the earl of Loudon, lord-chancellor of Scotland, made a ſpeech to him, to perſuade him to accept the propoſitions. His reaſons were the ſtronger and more preſſing, as drawn from the neceſſity the king was in. But his majeſty was not pleaſed to take his advice. This anſwer being read in the parliament the twelfth of Auguſt, was the cauſe of great joy to thoſe who wiſhed not for peace [e].

The ſame day, the Scotch commiſſioners preſented a memorial to the lords, offering to ſend their army into Scotland, upon reaſonable ſatisfaction for their pains, hazards, charges and ſufferings. They alſo ſaid, ſince his majeſty had not agreed to the propoſitions preſented to him, it was neceſſary to conſult with them, what was to be done, as well concerning the king's perſon, as the peace and ſafety of the two kingdoms. Both houſes returned them thanks, and appointed a committee to examine their accounts.

Some days after they delivered in an account of arrears, amounting to two millions. The parliament diſputed ſeveral articles, and deducted ſuch ſums as the Scots had received. The Scots allowed the juſtice of ſome of theſe deductions, but could not agree to others [f]. At laſt, after many debates, the Scots offered to accept of a ſum in groſs, for a full diſcharge of their arrears. Whereupon they were aſked, what ſum they demanded, and at firſt they inſiſted upon five hundred thouſand pounds. The houſe of commons offered two hundred, and afterwards three hundred thouſand pounds. At length, the Scots abating one hundred thouſands pounds of their demand, it was agreed to allow them four hundred thouſand, one half to be paid upon their removal out of the kingdom, and the other at certain times. This is the fatal bargain, whereby it is pretended, the Scots ſold the king to the parliament of England, becauſe indeed they delivered him up ſome months after. But it muſt be obſerved, that this is only a ſuſpicion, a bare conjecture, and if it be true, that the Scots, when they agreed upon this ſum of four hundred thouſand pounds, obliged themſelves to give up the king to the parliament, which I will neither affirm nor deny, at leaſt, they acted with ſo much addreſs, that there appeared no expreſs proof of it. No treaty, no paper, concerning this affair ever came to the knowledge of the public. The ſum was promiſed them for arrears due to their army, from the 18th of January 6431-4, to the 18th of September 1646. If it could be proved, that in all that time the Scotch army had been regularly paid, according to the treaty between the two nations, and that no arrears were due to them, this, doubtleſs, would be a confirmation of the aforementioned ſuſpicion. But this proof is very difficult. For if on one ſide, the Scots, to mount the debt to five hundred thouſand pounds, inſerted in their accounts ſeveral unjuſt articles, which ought to have been abated, the Engliſh on their ſide, acted with no leſs injuſtice, in pretending to make unfair deductions. This appears by the particulars of the accounts brought in by both parties, which are to be ſeen in Ruſhworth's Collections. Nay, it ſeems, if the Engliſh had been deſirous to conceal the ſecret motives of this bargain, they ſhould not have diſputed the debt, ſince nothing would have been more proper to remove the ſuſpicion of their giving this ſum to the Scots, to engage them to deliver up the king, than to ſhew it was really due to them for arrears.

Another, and no leſs important, remark may be made upon this ſubject. The thing that has rendered odious this pretended ſale of the king's perſon, is the tragical death of that prince, of whch it was the occaſion. But it muſt be conſidered, it was ſo only by accident. Nothing was at that time farther from the thoughts, both of the parliament and the Scots, than putting the king to death. The independents, mortal enemies of the king, Scots, and Preſbyterians, were the men who twice took away the king from the parliament, by means of the army, and cut off his head, at the very time the parliament and Scots were heartily labouring to reſtore him, as will hereafter appear. If therefore this pretended ſale, ſuppoſing it real, was the occaſion of the king's death, it may be affirmed, it was the innocent occaſion, and its effects ought not to be imputed to the parliament, ſuch as it was at that time, ſince it is certain, neither both houſes, nor the Scots, did they carry their views ſo far, nor could poſſibly foreſee what afterwards happened. But, as I ſaid before, it can by no means be proved, that the Scots did indeed ſell the king to the Engliſh. We ſhall ſee preſently, the reaſons why the Scots would not take charge of the king's perſon.

In the beginning of September, the duke of Hamilton, who had been releaſed out of Michael's Mount in Cornwall, upon the parliament's taking that place, came to Newcaſtle, with ſome other Scotch commiſſioners, and earneſtly preſſed the king to accept the propoſitions for peace. If the Scots had bargained, by a ſecret treaty, to give up the king to the parliament, this proceeding ſeems to have been prejudicial to them, ſince the king's compliance would have voided their bargin with the Engliſh, and deprived them of the promiſed ſum.

The king anſwered the duke and the other commiſſioners, "That he only deſired to be heard, but could not obtain his deſire. That he did not give a denial to the propoſitions, but only deſired to be rightly informed of what was demanded, and that his reaſons might be heard."

In another anſwer given them in writing the next day, he ſaid, "he ſhould be content to reſtrain epiſcopal government to ſome few dioceſes, at Oxford, Wincheſter, Briſtol, Bath and Wells, and Exeter; leaving all the reſt of England fully to the preſbyterian government, with the ſtricteſt clauſes they ſhould think upon againſt papiſts and independents. In a poſtſcript, he required them, to give a particular account of this offer to the general aſſembly in Scotland; aſſuring them, that he would punctually make good his laſt letter to them. And hoped, that they, as churchmen, would not preſs him to comply with what was againſt his conſcience, till he ſhould have leiſure to be better informed."

This anſwer was a plain intimation, that when the king ſaid, he deſired to be heard, it was only a pretence to have liberty to come to London, to cauſe, if poſſible, the propoſitions to be altered. We ſee alſo by this anſwer, that he conſidered the affair of church government, as the principal and moſt difficult point. In a word, his offer ſhews he was very hard preſſed, ſince he agreed, that preſbyterian government ſhould be eſtabliſhed throughout the whole kingdom, a few dioceſes excepted.

Some time after, he ſent a letter to the duke of Hamilton, (who was now retired, finding the king immoveable) telling him, that the two houſes thought of getting him into their hands, by ſaying, they did not intend to make him a priſoner, but only to give him an honourable guard; but for his part, he would not be left in England, when the Scotch army retired, without a viſible force upon his perſon. Probably therefore, when he demanded leave to come to London to treat in perſon with both houſes, he meant, that he ſhould remain in perfect liberty [g]. Perhaps he intended to eſcape into France, or elſewhere. But how could he imagine, he ſhould be left at perfect liberty, on the bare preſumption, that a negotiation with him would be ſucceſsful?

At laſt, on the 18th of September, it was voted, that the king's perſon ſhould be diſpoſed of as both houſes of parliament ſhoud think fit. But as he was not properly in their power, they appointed a committee to confer with the commiſſioners of Scotland upon that head.

In one of theſe conferences, the lord Loudon, chancellor of Scotland, endeavoured to ſhew, that one of the two kingdoms had no more right than the other, to diſpoſe of the king's perſon, becauſe he was equally king of both, and that beſides they were united in the ſame intereſt by their covenant. The Engliſh commiſſioners anſwered, That the king being in England, it belonged to the Engliſh to diſpoſe of his perſon, and though he had retired to the Scotch army, that army being only auxiliaries, and in the pay of England, it was the ſame as if he had retired to the parliament's army, whereof the Scotch forces were a part.

In another conference, the ſame lord ſtrenuouſly continued to prove, the principle advanced by him in the former, namely.

"That the diſpoſing of his majeſty's perſon did belong to both kingdoms, and therefore, that he ought not to be diſpoſed of by any one of the kingdoms, but by joint advice of both. He explained the word "diſpoſe", which was liable to be miſunderſtood: and ſaid, he meant thereby, either that his majeſty ſhould be put under reſtraint, or be at freedom with honour and ſafety. As for the way of reſtraint, he ſaid, he looked upon it as a remedy more dangerous than the diſeaſe, and as a means to draw the war of foreign kings upon the nation, (eſpecially the prince being in other kingdoms) rather than to quiet the troubles at home. And therefore he concluded, that he would lay aſide the way of reſtraint, and ſpeak of the way which might be with freedom, honour, and ſafety; and that could be no other, but that his majeſty ſhould go into Scotland, or come to his parliament, or ſome of his houſes about London. His going into Scotland, he obſerved, was full of dangers and inconvenience to both kingdoms: for the Iriſh, banded with a crew of malignants, poſſeſſed the mountains and highlands, which were the ſtrong-holds, and never-conquered parts of that kingdom. That they had not laid down their arms, but kept in a body together; and they were ſo near Ireland, as the forces of the rebels there might in two or three hours ſpace come over and join with them; and Scotland not being able to keep and entertain armies long, the king being there, might raiſe ſuch forces in that kingdom, as might make way quickly into England. And therefore his majeſty's going into Scotland being of moſt dangerous conſequence to both kingdoms, he offered to their lordſhips conſideration, his majeſty's coming to London, or ſome of his houſes thereabouts." The principal reaſon on which he grounded his opinion, was the ſame as the king himſelf had alledged. "That he had not refuſed his aſſent to the propoſitions, but only deſired to have his doubts cleared, and difficulties explained."

But in this reaſoning there was a material defect, which muſt have been viſible to all. And that is, the chancellor ſuppoſed, the king ſhould not be put under reſtraint, but left at full liberty in Scotland, at London, or ſome one of his houſes; which certainly was very far from the thoughts of the perſon that ſpoke, of the Scots, and of the parliament of England. In building therefore upon ſo wrong a foundation, the lord Loudon could not expect that his reaſoning ſhould be conſidered as of much weight, if he had not been to deal with men whoſe intereſt it was to feign, they thought it very ſolid.

Nothing ſeems more apt to comfirm the ſuſpicion of the Scots being engaged to deliver the king to the parliament, than this artifice of the lord Loudon to that end. For though he ſuppoſed, the king would be in one of his houſes with honour and ſafety, he knew the contrary, and that the parliament would always be maſter of his perſon. Conſequently it was the ſame thing as delivering him to the parliament, the condition that he ſhould be there with honour and ſafety, being only dazzling terms, to which the parliament might always give what ſenſe they pleaſed. But it muſt be conſidered, this is not a real proof, but a bare conjecture, which even ſeems to be deſtroyed by what happened ſhortly after. The commiſſioners of Scotland having cauſed an account of what paſſed at theſe conferences to be printed, with the ſpeeches to prove that England had no more right than Scotland to diſpoſe of the king's perſon, the commons were ſo offended at it, that they ordered all the copies to be ſeized, and the printer committed. They made likewiſe a long anſwer to the account of the Scots, and ſent it to the Scotch commiſſioners, who refuſed to receive it, becauſe it came only from one of the two houſes; but the commons ordered it be printed, and publiſhed. If it be true that the Scots had engaged to deliver the king to the parliament for the ſum of four hundred thouſand pounds, nothing was more prepoſterous than this diſpute, which was mixed with great bitterneſs, unleſs it is ſuppoſed, the parliament and Scotch commiſſioners, had agreed together to act this ſort of farce.

This diſpute, real or feigned, hindered not the Scotch army from preparing to return home. But as they were to be paid two hundred thouſand pounds, before they began their march, they might yet have ſtaid ſeveral weeks in England, had not the city of London engaged to advance that ſum. It was however upon two conditions; the firſt, that the lenders ſhould have 8l. per cent. intereſt for their money; and that the payment of the principal ſhould be ſecured out of the receipts of the grand exciſe, and the ſale of biſhops-lands[h]. For this reaſon both houſes made haſte to ſequeſter theſe lands, and appoint a committee to expoſe them to ſale[i].

The 16th of December, the parliament of Scotland took into conſideration what was to be done with the king's perſon. After great debates, it was at length reſolved, that the commiſſioners reſiding at London ſhould demand of both houſes, from the parliament of Scotland, that the king might return to London with honour and ſafety: that they ſhould declare to them, that the parliament of Scotland was reſolved to ſupport monarchy in the perſon of the king and his juſt title to the crown of England. This reſolution ſeems directly contrary to the engagement to give up the king to the parliament.

But the next day the commiſſioners of the general-aſſembly preſented to the parliament a paper, intitled, "A ſolemn and ſeaſonable warning to all eſtates and degrees of perſons throughout the land," wherein they repreſented the heinous crime of forſaking the covenant, and endeavouring a breach with England. They maintained, that ſuch projects were infuſed into ſome by the devil, and that they who attempted to ſow diviſion between the two nations and violate the covenant, which was their chief ſtrength, could not but be enemies to the ſtate. Then, as to the diſpoſal of the king's perſon, they ſaid, that ſo long as his majeſty did not approve in his heart, and ſeal with his hand, the league and covenant, he could not be received in Scotland without expoſing the kingdom to freſh troubles. That, on the other hand, to diſpoſe of the king's perſon without the conſent of the parliament of England, was openly breaking the covenant, and incurring the guilt of perjury. That it was very true, they were engaged by the covenant to defend the king's perſon, but it was no leſs true, that the end of the union between the two nations, was to ſettle religion in both kingdoms, according to the tenor of the covenant, and that theſe two engagements could not be ſeparated. That for theſe reaſons they deſired, that freſh endeavours might be uſed to prevail with his majeſty to give ſatisfaction to both kingdoms, that he might return to his parliament of England as a reconciled prince to ſatisfied ſubjects, in order to eſtabliſh a happy peace.

This paper being read in the parliament, the matter was again taken into conſideration, and at laſt after a great debate it was reſolved, "That his majeſty ſhould be deſired to grant the whole propoſitions; and in caſe of refuſal, the certifications given to his majeſty ſhould be put in execution, namely, to ſecure the kingdom without him;" and it was declared, "That the kingdom of Scotland cannot lawfully engage themſelves for his majeſty: he not taking the covenant, ſatisfying as to religion, &c. Nor would they admit him to come into Scotland, unleſs he gave a ſatisfactory anſwer to the whole propoſitions lately preſented to him in the name of both kingdoms[k].

The king having notice of this reſolution from the earl of Lanerick, ſent a meſſage to both houſes at Weſtminſter, to deſire again to come to London, or any of his houſes thereabouts, upon the public faith and ſecurity of his parliament and the Scotch commiſſioners, that he ſhould be there with honour, freedom and ſafety, in order to have his doubts cleared, and difficulties explained: aſſuring them, that he would moſt willingly condeſcend to them in whatſoever ſhould be really for their good and happineſs: praying them to conſider, it was their king who deſired to be heard, which if refuſed to a ſubject by a king, he would be thought a tyrant for it.

Upon this meſſage the lords voted, that the king might come to Newmarket, there to remain with ſuch attendants about him, as both houſes ſhould appoint: But the commons voted, that Holmby-houſe in Northamptonſhire would be the fitteſt place for his majeſty, to which the lords conſented. Then it was reſolved, "That his coming to Holmby ſhould be with reſpect to the ſafety and preſervation of his majeſty's perſon, and in defence of the true religion, according to the covenant[l]."

[1646-7] The 5th of January a committee of both houſes was appointed to go down and receive the king from the Scots[m]. For though both houſes had declared, he ſhould be at Holmby with honour and ſafety, they meant not to leave the manner to his choice, and whatever expreſſions they might uſe, it was to be in effect a real impriſonment.

Some days after, the two houſes received from the parliament of Scotland, the following declaration:

"THAT the king's majeſty came to their quarters before Newark, and profeſſed he came there with a full and abſolute intention to give all juſt ſatisfaction to the joint deſires of both kingdoms, and with no thought either to continue this unnatural war any longer, or to make diviſion betwixt the kingdoms; but to comply with his parliaments, and thoſe intruſted by them, in every thing for ſettling of truth and peace; and that he would apply himſelf totally to the counſels and advices of his parliament: which he did not only profeſs verbally to the committee of eſtates with the Scottiſh army, but alſo in his ſeveral letters and declarations under his hand, to the committee of eſtates of Scotland, and to the two houſes of parliament of England reſpectively. In confidence whereof, and of the reality of his intentions and reſolutions, which he declared did proceed from no other ground, than the deep ſenſe of the bleeding condition of his kingdoms: the committees of the kingdom of Scotland, and general officers of the Scottiſh army, declared to himſelf, and to the kingdom of England, their receiving his royal perſon to be on theſe terms (which is truth, notwithſtanding what may be ſuggeſted or alleged to the contrary, by any within or without the kingdoms) and repreſented to him, that the only way to his own happineſs and peace of his kingdoms, under God was, to make good his propoſitions of peace, (which after ſerious and mature deliberation were agreed upon) tendered to him in the name of both his kingdoms for his royal aſſent thereunto; but alſo the chief judicatories of this kingdom, both civil and eccleſiaſtical, made their humble and earneſt addreſſes to his majeſty, by ſupplications, letters, and commiſſioners for that end; and did freely repreſent all the prejudices and inconveniencies of the delay or refuſal of his aſſent, and in particular, that this kingdom would be neceſſitated to join with the kingdom of England, conform to the league and covenant, in providing for the ſecurity of both kingdoms, and ſettling the government of both, as might conduce moſt to the good of both. And the parliament of Scotland being now to retire their army out of England, have again, for their further exoneration, ſent commiſſioners, to repreſent their new deſires to his majeſty, with the danger that may enſue by his delay or refuſal to grant the ſame; and that till then, there was no danger to the cauſe, to his majeſty, to his kingdom, and to the union betwixt both the kingdoms, by his coming to Scotland; and that therefore there would be a joint courſe taken by both the kingdoms concerning the diſpoſal of his perſon. And conſidering, that his majeſty by his anſwer to the propoſitions of peace in Auguſt laſt, and alſo by his late meſſage ſent to the two houſes, and by his warrant communicated to the eſtates of this kingdom, hath expreſſed his deſires to be near to his two houſes of parliament: and ſeeing alſo the parliament of England have communicated to the Scottiſh commiſſioners at Newcaſtle, and by them to this kingdom, their reſolution, that Holmby-houſe in the county of Northampton, is the place which the houſes think fit for the king to come unto, there to remain with ſuch attendance about him as both houſes of parliament ſhall appoint, with reſpect had to the ſafety and preſervation of his royal perſon, in the preſervation and defence of the true religion and liberties of the kingdoms according to the covenant. Therefore, and in regard of his majeſty's not giving a ſatisfactory anſwer to the propoſitions as yet, and out of their earneſt deſire to keep a right underſtanding betwixt the kingdoms, to prevent trouble within the ſame, to ſatisfy the deſire of his majeſty, of the two houſes of the parliament of England, and of this kingdom, for his reſidence in ſome of his houſes near the [h] The other condition was, That ſuch as had formerly contributed upon the propoſitions for horſe, monies, and plate, might advance the like ſum upon this propoſition, and be ſecured as above. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 326.—At the ſame time that the biſhops-lands were given in as ſecurity for the repayment of the aforeſaid ſums, the whole order of archbiſhops and biſhops was aboliſhed, by an ordinance of October 9.

[i] Money came in ſo faſt upon thoſe ſecurities, that the whole ſum of 200,000l. was made up by the 27th of November; and on the 16th of December, it was ſent out of London in thirty-ſix carts. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 389.

For

parliament of England: the eſtates of the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, to declare their concurrence, for the king's majeſty's going to Holmby-houſe, or ſome other of his majeſty's houſes in or about London, as ſhall be thought fit, there to remain until he gives ſatisfaction to both his kingdoms in the propoſitions of peace; and that in the interim there be no harm, prejudice, or injury, nor violence done to his royal perſon: that there be no change of government other than had been theſe three years paſt: and that his poſterity in no ways be prejudiced in their lawful ſucceſſion to the crown and government of theſe kingdoms."

January the 23d the parliament's commiſſioners came to Newcaſtle, and on the 30th of the ſame month the king was delivered to them. That very day the Scotch army began to march towards Scotland, and the king arrived at Holmby the 16th of February.

Hitherto the preſbyterians and independents had acted as in concert, becauſe it was equally advantageous to them, or rather neceſſary, the king ſhould be diſabled from hurting both. When the king was reduced to his preſent condition, in the hands of a parliament conſiſting of two parties which had equally plotted his ruin, theſe two parties, who had till then ſeemed united, began to be openly divided, each plainly perceiving, this was the critical time to make the advantages gained in common upon the king, to turn to their own benefit. The preſbyterians were ſuperior in the parliament and in London: but the independents were, as I may ſay, maſters of the army, and by that their party was grown very conſiderable. The preſbyterians grand affair was therefore to diſband the army, under colour of its being unneceſſary, ſince the war was ended; and the independents grand affair was, to hinder this diſbanding, which could not but be fatal to their party. It is certain, the parliament, being almoſt wholly preſbyterian, ſeriouſly thought of diſcarding the independents, and particularly the generals and officers of that party. As they were obliged to ſend an army into Ireland, their project was to take for that ſervice ſuch ſoldiers out of the foot, horſe, and dragoons, as ſhould be willing to go thither, form them into companies, and give them officers, they could confide in. After that, their intent was to diſband the reſt of the forces, keeping only as many as ſhould be neceſſary for the garriſons. Had this project ſucceeded, the independent party would have been irrecoverably ruined. But the parliament had to deal with men who were too wiſe to give them time to take all their meaſures. Oliver Cromwell, a perſon of uncommon valour, great parts, and profound diſſimulation, was then at the head of the independents, though he affected ſtill to paſs for a rigid preſbyterian. He was preſent at the ſermons of the preſbyterians with a ſeemingly extraordinary devotion. He made uſe of certain ſcripture-expreſſions after the manner of the preſbyterians, and ſpoke not a word which might betray him to be independent, either as to religion or policy. In ſhort, he had found means to perſuade general Fairfax, that his ſole aim was to promote the glory of God, and the welfare of religion and the kingdom. He had in the army a great number of officers who acted by his directions, ſo that when he did all, he ſeemed to do nothing. Among theſe officers were his ſon-in-law Ireton, Rainſborough, Fleetwood, Lambert, Harriſon, and ſeveral others, who took care to ſtrengthen the independent party, by means of many ſubaltern officers, who endeavoured to make proſelytes among the ſoldiers, and were ſo many emiſſaries in every regiment. Cromwell was member of parliament [n], and withal lieutenant-general of the army, notwithſtanding the ſelf-denying ordinance, from which he had been exempted. After the war was over, he conſtantly attended the houſe, and thereby might be informed of the project againſt the army, or rather againſt the independent party in general. He ſeemed to approve of the meaſures deſigned by the commons, namely, of forming an army for Ireland [o], and diſbanding the reſt of the forces. But at the ſame time, by means of his emiſſaries, he raiſed in the army a ſpirit of diſcontent and mutiny. This was the more eaſy, as the officers and ſoldiers perceived, they were going to be diſcarded, and as moſt were little able to return to their old profeſſions, after four or five years ſpent in war. There were in the army many officers, who before the wars had been only tradeſmen, and ſaw with regret they were going to be reduced to quit their employs which gave them authority, and reſume their former trades, to be mixed as before with the meaner ſort of people. Theſe men, as well as thoſe gained by the independents, were ready for any undertaking, not to be obliged to alter a courſe of life they had now led for ſome years. Cromwell therefore, and the officers of his party, improving this diſpoſition, diligently inſpired the army with diſcontent againſt the two houſes, wherein they ſucceeded but too well [p].

The firſt ſpark of this flame appeared in March 1647, at the time when the parliament was ſeriouſly thinking of executing the fore-mentioned project. The commons had notice, that ſome officers of the army had prepared a petition to be preſented to the general and communicated to the houſe. In this petition was deſcribed, the unhappy condition, moſt of the officers and ſoldiers would be in, when the army ſhould be diſbanded. The articles deſired, were: "Indemnity for actions as ſoldiers. Satisfaction for arrears. No preſſing for horſe or foot. Relief of widows and maimed ſoldiers. Pay till diſbanded." This petition flew from regiment to regiment, and there were officers very diligent to procure ſubſcriptions. Whereupon, the commons ſent an order to the general, to make ſtrict enquiry after the authors of the petition, and put a ſtop to the conferences held in the army to ſow diſcord and diviſion. The general anſwered, that in obedience to the order of the houſe, he had aſſembled the officers, and queſtioned them about the petition: that they had expreſſed a very deep ſenſe of their unhappineſs, in being miſunderſtood in their clear intentions, which, as they had proteſted, were no other than by way of petition to repreſent to him, their general, thoſe inconveniencies, which would neceſſarily befal moſt of the army after diſbanding; but withal had aſſured him, they would wholly acquieſce in whatſoever he ſhould judge reaſonable to offer, or the houſe to grant on their behalf. The general added, that the houſe might be better informed, he had ſent lieutenant-general Hammond, colonel Hammond, colonel Lilburn, lieutenant-colonel Pride, and lieutenant-colonel Grimes, who, he hoped, would give a full and candid account of the whole matter.

Accordingly, theſe officers were examined before the houſe; after which, the ſpeaker, in diſmiſſing them, told them what ſenſe the houſe had of the petition, and deſired their care for ſuppreſſing the ſame, or any other of the like nature for the future [q]. The ſame day, the houſe ordered the general to publiſh a declaration, at the head of every regiment, importing, that the petition tended to put the army into a mutiny, and obſtruct the relief of Ireland, and that the promoters thereof ſhould be proceeded againſt as enemies to the ſtate, and diſturbers of the public peace [r].

The commons could not do any thing more agreeable to thoſe, who had formed the project of ſowing diviſion between the army and the parliament. This declaration gave occaſion to the officers and ſoldiers to complain openly, "That they who had fought for the liberty of the ſubjects of England, were denied the liberty of the ſubject to petition, though it were to their general, and merely in things relating to them as ſoldiers, meddling neither with church nor ſtate-affairs, and withal, ſubmitting it to the general's judgment for approbation or correction, as he ſaw cauſe."

Mean while, the two houſes intending to execute their reſolution of ſending forces into Ireland in the manner they had projected, appointed a committee for that purpoſe, and gave them power to form the regiments, and commiſſion ſuch officers as they ſhould think fit. At the ſame time, they reſolved to encourage thoſe that voluntarily offered to ſerve in Ireland. and ordered the commiſſioners ſpeedily to execute their charge.

[n] For the town of Cambridge.

[o] The forces voted for that ſervice were ſeven regiments of foot, three thouſand horſe, and twelve hundred dragoons, and 40,000l. Whitelock, p. 217. About this time, colonel George Monk took the covenant, and engaging in the parliament's ſervice, was ſent into Ireland. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 227.

[p] The earl of Eſſex's death, which happened on the 14th of September 1646, made it the eaſier for Cromwell to carry on his deſigns. For doubtleſs, had he lived, he would have given ſome check to the fury that was going to prevail. The lord Clarendon ſays, that it was reported he was poiſoned: and that Cromwell and his party were wonderfully exalted with his death, tom. III. p. 33. On the 27th of November following, the earl's horſe and effigies were cut to pieces and defaced in Weſtminſter-abbey; and the like barbarous action was done to Camden's tomb there. Whitelock, p. 228.

[q] Whitelock obſerves upon this occaſion, that this way of petitioning by multitude of hands to the parliament, which was formerly promoted by ſome of both houſes, as a means to carry on their deſigns at that time, began now to be made uſe of, and returned upon them, to their great trouble and danger, p. 242.

[r] Rapin has confounded here two different things. What he ſays was publiſhed at the head of the regiments, was only a declaration and vote of both houſes of the 30th of March. But the declaration ſent to the general to be publiſhed to the regiments, was to require them to deſiſt from going on in that petition they were about to preſent to him. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 446, 447.

The commiſſioners repairing to Saffron-Walden, the general's head quarters, gave notice to the officers to aſſemble the next day. Then the earl of Warwick, head of the committee, made a ſpeech, exhorting them to accept of the terms offered by the two houſes. When he had done ſpeaking, colonel Lambert anſwered in the name of all the officers, and deſired to know what ſatisfaction ſhould be given them concerning four articles, namely, arrears, indemnity, maintenance in Ireland, and conduct? ſir John Clotworthy replied, that the parliament had taken care of all, except the point of indemnity, for which an ordinance would be ready in a few days. The officers demanded, what generals were to command them in Ireland? It was anſwered, Skippon and Maſſey were named for general and lieutenant general; but for other commanders the parliament had not yet come to any reſolution. Then the officers cried out with one voice, That if the command was given to Fairfax, Cromwell, and Skippon, they were ready to march. The commiſſioners ſeeing the officers inſiſted upon a thing not agreeable to the intentions of the parliament, deſired ſuch as would liſt in the ſervice of Ireland, to come to their lodgings in the town, where they would give them farther ſatisfaction; but there came very few. At the ſame time, the reſt prepared a declaration, which was preſented to the commiſſioners, wherein they ſaid, "They had reaſon to complain, that they had received no poſitive anſwer to their deſires: that however, thoſe who in their own perſons did not engage for Ireland, would be ready to promote the ſervice: that if the ſame conduct under which the army had been ſo proſperous in England, was continued, it would conduce much to their perſonal engagement in the ſervice of Ireland: that this was the general ſenſe of the officers of the army."

The general, who hitherto ſeemed very deſirous to ſerve the parliament, ordered the officers who had a mind to ſerve in Ireland, to draw out of their men as many as would engage in that ſervice. But the number was very ſmall, and the parliament was informed, there were officers who took great pains to diſſuade the ſoldiers from this ſervice, and cheriſh the diſcontent of the army[t].

[1647] At laſt, their boldneſs was ſuch, that ſome of the principal officers ſcrupled not to appear at the head of the mutineers in a declaration preſented to both houſes. They ſaid, "That the miſrepreſentations of their harmleſs intentions to the houſe, having occaſioned hard thoughts and expreſſions of the houſe's diſpleaſure againſt them, they humbly craved leave to offer ſome reaſons to clear their proceedings in thoſe paſſages, which they found moſt obvious to exceptions in their petition, whereby they hoped to make it evident, that the means they uſed, and the method they took, was, as they conceived, moſt orderly and inoffenſive; proceeded not in the leaſt from diſtemper, and aiming in no meaſure to put conditions on the parliament; and that from hence might be diſcovered, the corruptions of thoſe men's hearts, who have been the evil inſtruments of occaſioning the late declaration againſt them. And,

"1. For the liberty of petitioning, they hoped, the honourable houſe of commons would never deny it unto them, there being not any thing more eſſential to freedom; and particularly, ſince they had juſtified and commended it in their declaration of the 2d of November, 1642, in theſe words: 'It is the liberty and privilege of the people, to petition unto us for the eaſe and redreſs of their grievances and oppreſſions, and we are bound in duty to receive their petitions.

"2. They preſented not their petition to the houſe, but with the approbation, and by the mediation, of their general, and conſequently, that it could not be repreſented as ſeditious.

"3. The report of their forcing ſubſcriptions was not true. For the petition had taken its firſt riſe from amongſt the ſoldiers, and the officers had engaged but in the ſecond place to regulate the ſoldiers proceedings, and remove, as near as they could, all occaſion of diſtaſte.

"4. They were forced to deſire an act of indemnity for ſuch actions as they had committed during the exigency of the war, not warrantable by law, ſince they were liable to be indicted for them in time of peace.

"5. As to their deſiring the royal aſſent, they never intended thereby to leſſen the parliament's authority; but only uſed it as a provident caution for their future ſafety. And they obſerved, that the parliament itſelf had, by offering propoſitions, judged, the deſiring the king's aſſent convenient.

"6. As to the deſiring of their arrears, neceſſity enforced them thereto: that their wages had been hardly earned, and the deſire of them could not argue them guilty of the leaſt diſcontent, or intention of mutiny.

"7. For what concerned the relief of Ireland, they thought it hard, that thoſe who had voluntarily ſerved in the wars, and left their parents, trades, and livelihoods, and, without any compulſion, engaged of their own accords, ſhould, after all their free and unwearied labours, be forced and compelled to go out of the kingdom."

This declaration was ſigned by Thomas Hammond, lieutenant-general of the ordnance, ſeven colonels, ſeven lieutenant-colonels, ſix majors, and one hundred and thirty officers, captains, and ſubalterns.

The ſame day this declaration was preſented to the houſe, the commons voted, that the army ſhould be diſbanded, and the ſoldiers have ſix weeks pay when diſmiſſed.

Some days after, major-general Skippon, who was to command in Ireland, and being returned from Barnſtable had taken his ſeat in the houſe, notwithſtanding the ſelf-denying ordinance, which was no longer regarded, reported, that a letter was preſented to him the day before by ſome troopers, in the behalf of eight regiments of horſe, and produced the ſame, which was immediately ordered to be read. Theſe regiments complained of the many late ſcandals, and falſe ſuggeſtions, againſt the army, and their proceedings, and alleged the reaſons why they could not engage in the ſervice of Ireland, under the conduct of the intended generals. The troopers, Sexby, Allen, and Sheppard, who brought the letter, were called in and examined, concerning the meaning of ſome expreſſions in the petition; to which they replied, that the letter being a joint act of thoſe ſeveral regiments, they could not give a punctual anſwer, being only agents; but if they might have the queries in writing, they would carry them to the regiments, and return their anſwers.

Though the declaration of the officers was in itſelf very reaſonable, it looked however more like an inſolent accuſation againſt the parliament than an humble apology. This convinced the commons, that the evil was greater than was at firſt imagined; wherefore they paſſed ſeveral votes to give ſome ſatisfaction to the army, and to hinder the increaſe of their diſcontent. At the ſame time Skippon, Cromwell, Ireton, and Fleetwood, were ordered to go and acquaint the army with what the houſe intended to do for the troops, and that a conſiderable ſum was preparing for their pay, before they were diſbanded. Hitherto the commons ſeem not to have perceived the true aim of the army's complaints, but hoped to appeaſe them by ſome condeſcenſion.

The generals ſent by the parliament being come to the army, and calling the officers together, read to them the votes paſſed in their favour; after which, Skippon made a ſpeech, to engage them to ſerve under him in Ireland. The officers anſwered, as this affair concerned the ſoldiers, as well as the officers, it was neceſſary to inform them of it, in order to know their reſolution.

Mean while, the parliament ardently deſiring to diſband the army, after that which was to ſerve in Ireland was formed, ordered, that before they were diſbanded, a fortnight's pay ſhould be added to the ſix weeks, formerly voted, and that ſix weeks pay more ſhould be given to thoſe who would engage for the ſervice of Ireland.

The troopers and ſoldiers being informed of what the generals, ſent by the parliament, had reported to the officers, anſwered, that as the whole army was concerned, they deſired to diſcuſs the affair in a committee, choſen by themſelves, out of every company and troop, who ſhould report the deſires of each regiment to a committee of general officers, to be by them contracted into a method, and if general, communicated to both houſes, as the ſenſe of the army. It is eaſy to perceive in this anſwer, a ſecret direction of ſome of the leading male-contents, who intended by this means to be maſters of the ſoldiers reſolutions, and compoſe in the army, a ſort of parliament, in oppoſition to the two houſes. This demand, of which perhaps the conſequences were not by many foreſeen, being granted, the ſoldiers choſe two out of every company, who were called adjutators, or agitators, to debate upon the matters which were to be brought to the council of officers, called, the council of war, conſiſting of generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, and captains. Among the agitators there were few or none above the degree of an enſign. Theſe two councils were afterwards continued, to the great prejudice of the parliament, and great advantage of the heads of the independent party, who eaſily found means to admit only ſuch as were devoted to them or not of ſufficient ability to diſcover their deſigns.

Mean while, the two houſes perſiſted in their reſolution to diſband the army, excepting thoſe who would engage to ſerve in Ireland. To effect this the more eaſily, it was ordered, that their arrears ſhould be ſpeedily audited, and good ſecurity given them, for ſo much as ſhould not be paid off upon diſbanding, that none that had voluntarily ſerved in the wars, ſhould be preſſed for any ſervice beyond ſea: that an ordinance ſhould be drawn for providing for widows, maimed ſoldiers, and orphans. After that, the two houſes ſettled the manner of diſbanding the army, namely, that the regiments ſhould be diſbanded at different times and places, and that the money to pay them what was promiſed, ſhould be ſent to the ſeveral rendezvous. But the army openly complained of the intention to pay them but two months arrears upon diſbanding, when there was no leſs than fifty-ſix weeks due to them.

Shortly after, the general called a council of war at Bury, at which were preſent above two hundred officers, and communicated to them the votes of both houſes, adviſing them to a compliance with the order of parliament. But the officers anſwered, They did not think theſe votes ſatisfactory to the ſoldiers; 1. Becauſe eight weeks pay was not a conſiderable part of what was due to them. 2. Becauſe no viſible ſecurity was given for the arrears. 3. Becauſe nothing was done for their vindication, and they being declared enemies, and ſent home, might hereafter be proceeded againſt as enemies, unleſs the declaration were recalled.

At the ſame council a petition was produced and read, which had been that morning preſented to the general, in the name of the private ſoldiers of the army, complaining, "That it was intended to diſband them without redreſſing their grievances, and in a ſtrange, unheard-of manner, one regiment apart from another, which poſture could not but render them ſuſpicious to the kingdom. And therefore they deſired the general would be pleaſed to appoint a rendezvous for the army, and uſe his utmoſt endeavours, that they might not be diſbanded before their grievances were heard, and fully redreſſed, which if not done, they ſhould be neceſſitated, though unwillingly, to do things that might be prevented, by granting their juſt deſires."

The council of war having examined this petition, believed or feigned to believe, it was abſolutely neceſſary to take notice of it, for fear, if they ſaw all their deſires rejected, they ſhould have a rendezvous without their officers. It was therefore reſolved, that the quarters of the army ſhould be contracted, to prevent diſorders, and for the greater readineſs to ſuppreſs them. It was manifeſt, the deſign of the petition, and the council of war's reſolution, was, to break the parliament's meaſures. It had been reſolved to ſeparate the army, and diſband them at different times and places, in order to do it the more eaſily; and the army, on the contrary, had contracted their quarters, ſo that they could rendezvous in a very ſhort ſpace, without any poſſibility of being prevented by the parliament.

The general failed not to acquaint the two houſes with the reſult of what had paſſed in the council of war, intreating them to proceed with caution, that the army might not be incenſed, and a breach made, which could not but be very dangerous. He writ the ſame day to the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, that he was extremely uneaſy concerning the diſpoſition of the army, and heartily wiſhed ſome means could be found to appeaſe the diſtractions, which was not in his power: that he was forced to yield to many things to prevent worſe inconveniences.

Whereupon, the two houſes recalled the commiſſioners, who were now gone to diſband the army, and ſent for the money which had been lodged in ſeveral places for the payment of the ſoldiers. But three thouſand five hundred pounds carrying to London, was ſtopped by colonel Rainſborough's men at Woodſtock. It was very evident, the army was unwilling to be diſbanded; but the parliament not being in a condition to command obedience, were forced to ſtay till a more convenient ſeaſon, without relinquiſhing however their deſign. Their intention was to divide the army, under colour of the neceſſity of ſending forces into Ireland; and, the better to engage the ſoldiers to leave the army, it was voted, that a months pay ſhould be given to thoſe that would quit their regiments and ſerve in Ireland. They hoped by this means to form an army equal or ſuperior to that which refuſed to obey, wherein they were greatly miſtaken. Mean while, to give ſome ſatisfaction to the army, it was ordered by the commons, that the ſubordinate officers and ſoldiers ſhould have all their arrears, deducting for free quarters according to the uſual rules of the army. That the commiſſion-officers ſhould have one month's pay more added to the two months arrears formerly voted. Laſtly, that the declaration againſt thoſe that drew up the firſt petition ſhould be razed out of the journal of the houſe [u]. But all this was not capable of contenting the army, who were reſolved not to be ſatisfied. The directors of theſe proceedings had a mind to continue the army, in order to be able to oppoſe the preſbyterians, who were ſuperior in the parliament. So, the reaſons alleged by the army being only pretences, though every thing had been granted, others would have been deviſed to prevent diſbanding; and indeed, it will preſently appear, that leſt all their deſires ſhould be granted, they added new demands, which the parliament could not comply with.

It was eaſy to perceive, that every thing tended to a breach between the parliament and the army. The parliament accuſed the army of mutiny and ſedition [w], and the army pretended, that the parliament, under colour of ſending forces into Ireland, thought of forming a new army, to become maſters of the kingdom, when the old one ſhould be caſhiered, or to kindle a freſh war in caſe the troops refuſed to obey. But they were far from being upon an equality. The army had the ſword in their hands, and though ſome officers and ſoldiers had quitted their regiments for the ſervice of Ireland, their number was inconſiderable [x]: all the reſt remained united, and were ſupported by moſt of the generals, who being againſt the parliament, privately cheriſhed the diſcontent of the officers and ſoldiers. The parliament had no forces to compel the army to obedience, and therefore were terribly embarraſſed. They durſt not drive the army to extremities; and on the other hand, they plainly perceived, that the diſcord was fomented by the leaders of the independents, who ſought the deſtruction of the parliament, for fear the parliament ſhould deſtroy them, as indeed both houſes intended.

This therefore was a critical ſeaſon, the point being to know who ſhould be maſter, the parliament or the independent party. But theſe had the army on their ſide, and that alone balanced the power and authority of the parliament. They had ſo well laid their meaſures, by means of the agitators, that the army was become a ſort of republic, where the ſuffrages of the common ſoldiers were upon a level with thoſe of the generals; nay the ſoldiers did not think themſelves obliged to follow or to aſk the advice of their officers. Hence ſprung confuſion, which was ſuffered to prevail. Every thing was done in the name of the army, a looſe term which ſignified, ſometimes the council of war alone, ſometimes the council of agitators, now both councils together, and now, the agitators of ſome particular regiments. In this laſt ſenſe muſt be underſtood the enterpriſe performed, in the name of the army, by the agitators of ſome regiments of horſe, of carrying away the king by force from Holmby-houſe to Newmarket [y].

To execute this deſign, they choſe cornet Joyce, one of the agitators of his regiment, who, from a taylor before the war, was become an officer, and had ſignalized himſelf for his bravery. Joyce being put at the head of fifty horſe, marched directly to Holmby, and came there in the night, after the king was in bed. Having ſecured the avenues, he went up with two or three more to the king's chamber, and cauſed the door to be opened. The king getting up, aſked him what he meant. Joyce anſwered, he intended to carry him to the army, for they had received certain advice, there was a deſign to convey him away by force. The king aſked him, whether he had the general's orders? He replied, no, but that he was authoriſed by the army, and as he held a piſtol in his hand, ſufficiently intimated, it was by that he was chiefly empowered [z]. The parliament's commiſſioners who were at Holmby to take care of the king, would have oppoſed this violence: but the king's guard refuſing to make any reſiſtance, and the troops that were in the neighbouring villages to relieve the guard every day, would not come. At laſt, after many diſputes, all the king could obtain was to ſtay till the morning. That ſame night he writ a note, which he intruſted with the earl of Dumfermling, to acquaint the two houſes, hewas carried away from Holmby againſt his will, and that they ſhould not give any credit to what he might afterwards write whilſt under reſtraint. The next morning he went into the coach, and was conducted by Joyce, who carried him that night to colonel Montague's, and the next day to Newmarket.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the general having appointed a rendezvous of the army at New-market, for the 4th and 5th of June, the ſeveral regiments preſented a petition to him, complaining of the votes paſſed in parliament the 21ſt and 25th of May, as not being ſatisfactory for the following reaſons:

"1. That eight weeks arrear to be paid at diſbanding, was but a mean reward for all their labours, and a very ſlender ſupply to carry them to their homes, and ſet them up again in their former callings and conditions.

"2. That in the orders given for the ſtating of their accounts, they found no conſideration or regard had of their arrears incurred in the former army commanded by the earl of Eſſex, which to the moſt of them were much greater than thoſe under the new model.

"3. That three ſhillings a week was to be abated to foot ſoldiers for quarter, which was more than they ſhould have paid for themſelves, if they timely had their pay.

"4. That there was no proviſion or allowance made in relation to any quarters diſcharged by them.

"5. That, contrary to cuſtom, no trooper was capable of allowance for arrears, unleſs he delivered in his horſe and arms.

"6. That the viſible ſecurity for what arrears ſhould not be paid at diſbanding, appeared to them inſufficient.

"7. That the ordinance voted, to exempt from preſſing, for the ſervice of Ireland, ſuch as had ſerved as volunteers in the army, was defective; becauſe after their diſcharge, it was very difficult for them to obtain a teſtimonial of their paſt ſervices.

"8. That the ordinance for the maintenance of maimed ſoldiers, &c. had not yet paſſed in parliament.

"9. That the ordinance for indemnity ſeemed to make but ſlender proviſion for their ſafety.

"10. That no reparation had been made to thoſe officers of the army, that had been at ſeveral times ſent for to attend the parliament as delinquents, though they had been found innocent.

"11. That there had been yet nothing declared by the parliament, to clear them as to their right of petitioning.

(There was in this article heavy complaints againſt the parliament's arbitrary power.)

"12. That the declaration made againſt the army was yet ſtanding in force.

"13. That nothing had yet been done towards the diſcovery or cenſure of thoſe that had wronged the army, and abuſed the parliament, ſo as to procure the proceedings againſt them, with relation to their petition."

It is eaſy to perceive, theſe complaints were but mere pretences, or at leaſt, if the army had not reſolved to be ſatisfied upon no terms, theſe differences might poſſibly have been adjuſted. But this was only a preparative to what they had reſolved to do. The next day, June the 5th, the officers and ſoldiers ſubſcribed a paper, which they called a ſolemn engagement, whereby they conſented to diſband, when required by the parliament, but on condition, "That they ſhould firſt have ſuch ſatisfaction in relation to their grievances, and ſuch ſecurity as to their perſons, as ſhould be agreed unto by a council to conſiſt of thoſe general officers (who had concurred with the army) with two commiſſion officers, and two ſoldiers to be choſen for each regiment; and declared, that without ſuch ſatisfaction, and ſuch ſecurity they would not willingly diſband, nor ſuffer themſelves to be diſbanded or divided."

This engagement was ſeconded with petitions from the inhabitants of the counties of Eſſex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, intreating the general, not to ſuffer the army to be diſbanded till every thing relating to the government was ſettled.

June the 7th, both houſes received a letter from the general acquainting them, that the ſoldiers at Holmby had brought the king thence by conſent, having thought proper to ſecure his perſon, from an apprehenſion of forces gathering to fall upon them, and force him out of their hands. That as ſoon as he knew it, he ſent colonel Whaley's regiment to guard the king: after which, for prevention of danger, he had ſent two regiments more to re-inforce colonel Whaley. That Whaley had deſired the king and the commiſſioners, in his name, to return to Holmby, but that his majeſty was not willing to go back. That upon this, he had ſent ſir Hardreſs Waller, and colonel Lambert to deſire the commiſſioners to think of returning to Holmby, but that the commiſſioners refuſed to act in diſpoſing of the king. He affirmed moreover, that neither himſelf, nor the officers about him, nor the body of the army were concerned in removing the king, proteſting that it was his as well as the army's deſire, to ſtudy to ſettle a firm peace. That they had no intention to oppoſe preſbytery, or ſet up the independent-government, but to leave all to the wiſdom of the parliament, without advancing any particular party or intereſt.

It was a very ſtrange thing, that the king ſhould be removed from Holmby by fifty troopers, without any orders from the general or the officers about him, and without the conſent of the body of the army; and that the general officers ſhould ſuffer him to be in the center of the quarters of the army, without inquiring after thoſe who gave, or thoſe who executed, ſuch an order. This ſhewed, there was ſome myſtery in it, which it was not thought proper to diſcover to the parliament, and that Joyce knew he ſhould be protected, if called to an account. On the other hand, though the king had ſent word to both houſes, that he was unwillingly removed [a], it appears by the general's letter, that his majeſty conſented to it, and was unwilling to return to Holmby, when it was in his power. All this ſeems very myſterious, and I do not believe the public was ever fully informed of what paſſed before the removal of the king. What followed makes it conjectured, that ſome of the general officers believed it to be abſolutely neceſſary for their intereſt to have the king in their power, at a time when they thought there was reaſon to fear, the parliament would come to an agreement with him, and that they cauſed him to be taken away from Holmby by perſons without warrant, well knowing, they ſhould be powerful enough to hinder the affair from being ſtrictly examined. It may be, the king himſelf was privy to it, ſince he was unwilling to return to Holmby, and appeared, for ſome time, much more at eaſe in the hands of the army, than when he was in the parliament's power.

The commons ſeeing the army maſter of the king's perſon, and unwilling to diſband, reſolved at leaſt to ſhew the public by their votes, that the imputations laid to their charge by the army were groundleſs, and that they were not ſwayed by ſelf-intereſted motives. So, June the 10th, they confirmed the ſelf-denying ordinance, and "declared to be void all places held by members of parliament." They voted, "That the lands and eſtates of all members of the houſe ſhould be liable to the law for payment of their debts." They appointed a day to hear informations againſt members, and ordered that no member ſhould hereafter receive any reparation for damages, till the public debts were firſt ſatisfied.

Nevertheleſs the army began to march, and advanced to St. Albans within twenty miles of London. At the ſame time, the general ſent to both houſes the reſult of the late council of war at New-market, and intreated them to think of ſome way to ſatisfy the troops.

The approach of the army threw the parliament and city into great conſternation, and an ordinance was paſſed, to enable the committee of the militia of London to raiſe horſes. They ſeemed to intend to put themſelves in a poſture of defence againſt the army. Within a few hours after, the city received a letter ſigned by the general and all the other general officers, complaining, there were certain members of parliament who endeavoured to engage the kingdom in a new war, as having no other way to protect themſelves from the puniſhment they juſtly deſerved. Adding, that they deſired no alteration of the civil government, nor in the leaſt to hinder the ſettling of preſbyterianiſm, neither did they intend any evil to the city, if they appeared not to aſſiſt that wicked party, who would embroil them and the kingdom. That they were ready to remove at a farther diſtance, if they were aſſured, that a ſpeedy ſettlement of things was in hand. That if, after all, the city ſhould be ſeduced to riſe up againſt the army, ruin and deſtruction would enſue.

This letter was communicated to the parliament, who writ to the general, to deſire that the army might not come within twenty-five miles [b] of the city; but it was already advanced to St. Albans. The ſame day the commons ordered, that the ſum of ten thouſand pounds ſhould be paid to ſuch officers and ſoldiers as ſhould leave the army and engage in the ſervice of Ireland, with which the army was highly diſpleaſed, plainly perceiving, the parliament's deſign was to divide them.

The next day, upon a falſe rumour of the army's near approach to the city, the militia of London ordered all the trained-bands to be raiſed on pain of death. But preſently after the order was revoked. However ſoldiers were liſted by order of Parliament.

In this interval, the common-council of London ſent an anſwer to the general and officers, wherein they ſaid, the city intended no evil to the army, but only to defend the parliament and themſelves againſt any unlawful violence. That they did not take up arms with intent to hinder the obtaining of the army's juſt demands. That on the contrary, they had preſented their addreſſes to the patliament for the obtaining thereof; and only requeſted, they would demand no more than what ſhould be juſt and reaſonable.

The ſame day, the parliament ſent commiſſioners to the army [c], to know what were their deſires. The general anſwered, in letters to both houſes, that the army offered, for a month's pay, not to draw their quarters nearer London, without firſt giving notice of it to the parliament's commiſſioners.

Mean while, the army continued to render themſelves formidable, as well by their nearneſs, as by their demands which daily roſe higher. At firſt, they proteſted, they would not meddle in any thing not immediately relating to themſelves, and that their intention was to leave the care of the government to the wiſdom of the two houſes. But when they found, the parliament gave way, and wanted power or reſolution, they advanced one ſtep farther, and by a declaration preſented to both houſes, demanded:

"1. That the houſes might be purged of ſuch members, as for their delinquency, or for corruptions, or undue elections ought not to ſit there.

"2. That thoſe perſons who had appeared againſt the army, might ſpeedily be diſabled from doing the like; and for that purpoſe, might be made incapable of being the ſoldiers judges, when diſbanded.

"3. That ſome determinate period of time might be ſet for the continuance of that and future parliaments, beyond which none ſhall continue; that the members of the houſe might not have the temptation or advantage of an unlimited power to perpetuate injuſtice or oppreſſion, but might be in a capacity to taſte of ſubjection as well as rule.

"4. That parliaments might not be adjournable or diſſolvable, any other ways, than by their own conſent.

"5. That the right and freedom of the people to preſent petitions to the parliament might be cleared and vindicated.

6. That the large powers given to committees or deputy-lieutenants, might be taken away, or regulated.

"7. That the kingdom might be righted and publicly ſatisfied in point of accounts, for the ſums that had been levied and paid.

"8. That after public juſtice was firſt ſatisfied by ſome few examples on delinquents, a general act of oblivion ſhould be paſſed."

After theſe demands, the army proteſted, "That their deſign was not to overthrow preſbytery, and eſtabliſh the independent government. But they only deſired, that there might be ſome effectual courſe taken, that ſuch who upon conſcientious grounds differed from the eſtabliſhed forms, might not for that be debarred from the common rights, liberties, or benefits, belonging equally to all, while they lived ſoberly and inoffenſively towards others, and peaceably and faithfully towards the ſtate."

It was eaſy to perceive the army no longer contented themſelves with meddling in their own affairs, but wanted to have a ſhare in the civil government. There were in the houſe of commons very able men, who knew the deſigns of the independents, and would have baffled them, had they been ſupported with power. To this end it was, they had projected the forming, out of the old, a new army for Ireland, and to caſhier the reſt of the forces. This project tended directly to the ruin of the independent party. Accordingly, Cromwell and his aſſociates uſed all their endeavours to countermine the artifices of their enemies, by inſpiring the army with diſcontent, and cheriſhing it in the fore-mentioned manner. In ſhort, having tried the parliament, they thought themſelves ſtrong enough to ſtrike a bolder ſtroke, in uſing always the army's name, which they had moulded to their purpoſes. To this end, they cauſed it to be reſolved in a council of war, that the army ſhould prefer a charge againſt the ableſt and moſt powerful members of the commons, who in a manner governed and directed the houſe. Theſe were the men the independent party had chiefly to fear. This reſolution being taken, the army deputed ſome officers to carry, in their name, to the parliament, a charge againſt eleven members, namely, Holles, Stapleton, Lewis, Clotworthy, Waller, Maynard, Maſſey, Glyn, Long, Harley, and Nichols.

The general articles of the charge were:

"1. That the perſons above-named had, in an arbitrary and violent manner, infringed the rights and liberties of the nation, and endeavoured by indirect and corrupt practices to delay and obſtruct juſtice.

"2. That the army being, until the middle of March laſt, in an orderly condition, and ready either quietly to have diſbanded or elſe to have engaged in the ſervice of Ireland, thoſe members had endeavoured by falſe informations to beget miſunderſtandings and jealouſies in the parliament againſt the army.

"3. That whereas the parliament might have had out of the army an intire force for the reduction of Ireland, thoſe perſons had attempted to pull the army in pieces, and to put the kingdom to the trouble and expence of raiſing a new force for that ſervice.

"4. That they had diverted the forces engaged for the ſervice of Ireland, and endeavoured to apply them to carry on deſperate deſigns of their own in England; and had alſo raiſed new forces under pretence to guard the parliament, and privately liſted officers and ſoldiers, for embroiling the kingdom in a new and bloody war.

"5. That they had invited and encouraged divers reformado's, and other officers and ſoldiers, tumultuouſly to gather together at Weſtminſter to affright and aſſault the members of parliament."

The very next day, the army ſent propoſals to the commons wherein they deſired:

"That the perſons impeached might be forthwith ſuſpended from ſitting in the houſe.

"That there might be a month's pay immediately ſent to the army.

"That if the officers and ſoldiers of the army who had engaged for Ireland, or thoſe who had deſerted the army and come to London, and ſince then received more than a month's pay, there might be ſo much more money ſent down to the army.

"That during the debate and tranſaction betwixt the parliament and the army, about raiſing and liſting new forces, the parliament would not ſuffer any new forces to be raiſed within the kingdom."

Theſe demands extremely embarraſſed the parliament. They could not reject them without furniſhing the army with a pretence to march to London, where was nothing ready to oppoſe them, and by granting them, they gave them occaſion to make further demands. This embarraſſment was the greater, as ſeveral counties ſeconded the army, and pretended, it was abſolutely neceſſary to continue them, to ſtop the progreſs of the arbitrary power aſſumed by the parliament. We have already ſeen, that the counties of Eſſex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, had in ſome meaſure declared for the army. Buckinghamſhire and Hertfordſhire followed this example; and Glamorganſhire openly complained, by deputies ſent on purpoſe, that the people were oppreſſed by the parliament, and by the committees ſettled in the ſeveral counties [d].

Whereupon the two houſes thought proper to appeaſe the impending ſtorm, by giving ſatisfaction to the army, in order to remove all pretence of complaint; for it was eaſy to perceive that was what they wanted. It was therefore reſolved, that the order for liſting of forces, and the permiſſion given to the committee of the militia of London to augment the trained-bands ſhould be void: that the army ſhould have a month's pay, and the general be required to remove it forty miles from London. Some days after, a month's pay was alſo granted to the forces in the north, and to let the army ſee there was no deſign to diſband them, the parliament paſſed an ordinance for raiſing ſixty thouſand pounds a month for the maintenance of the army, and for the ſervice of Ireland [e]. Laſtly, the houſe of commons writ to the general, that they were ready to receive from him any particular charge againſt the eleven accuſed members.

This condeſcenſion might have produced peace between the parliament and the army, if peace had been what the army deſired. But, inſtead of being obliged to the parliament for this compliance, they were rather incenſed at it, as being ſenſible, the deſign of it was only to break their meaſures, by taking away all pretence of complaint. They would have been better pleaſed, that all their demands had been denied, in order to have an excuſe to do themſelves juſtice. They were afraid the parliament, by endeavouring to gain time, would privately take meaſures, the effects whereof would not appear perhaps till it ſhould be too late to prevent them. Wherefore, far from being contented, they preſented a remonſtrance to the parliament, whereby they ſufficiently diſcovered their diſinclination to an agreement. This remonſtrance contained the following complaints of the officers and ſoldiers:

"That they had yet received no anſwer or reſolution about the eleven accuſed members. This point they largely inſiſted upon, and pretended they could not expect they ſhould be called to an account, ſo long as they continued in ſuch power, both in the houſe, and in all the committees of the higheſt truſt, as they actually did.

"That the army was commanded to forty miles diſtance from London, and his majeſty's perſon demanded immediately to Richmond houſe [f], within eight miles of London, to put his majeſty within reach of thoſe men's power.

"That it was induſtriouſly publiſhed that his majeſty was kept a priſoner in the army, and barbarouſly and uncivilly uſed; but all ſuggeſtions of that ſort were moſt falſe.

"Laſtly, after many complaints of public and private grievances, they ſaid, that they ſhould be enforced, by the parliament's affected delays, to take extraordinary courſes to put things to a ſpeedy iſſue, unleſs by Thurſday night next they received aſſurance and ſecurity on the following articles:

"1. That the declaration inviting men to deſert the army, be recalled and annulled.

"2. That the army may be preſently paid up, equally to thoſe that have deſerted it.

"3. That his majeſty's coming to Richmond may be ſuſpended; and, in the mean time, no place may be appointed for his majeſty's reſidence any nearer to London than the parliament will allow the quarters of the army to be.

"4. That the members charged may be forthwith ſuſpended the houſe.

"5. That thoſe that have deſerted the army may be inſtantly diſcharged, and receive no more of their arrears till the army be firſt ſatisfied.

"6. That both parliament and city may be freed from thoſe multitudes of reformado's, and other ſoldiers, that flock together about London.

"7. That all liſtings, or raiſings of new forces, may be effectually ſuppreſſed.

"8. That the perplexed affairs of the kingdom, and thoſe concerning the army, may be put into ſome ſpeedy way of ſettling the compoſure [g].

It was viſible the army ſought a pretence to quarrel, and as it was their intereſt to break very ſoon, for fear ſecret meaſures might be taken againſt them, ſo it was the parliament's buſineſs to gain time. To that purpoſe, they empowered the commiſſioners in the army to treat with them upon all the points in diſpute.

Mean while, the commons voted, "That by the law no judgment can be given to ſuſpend the eleven members from ſitting in the houſe, upon the papers preſented from the army, before the particulars be produced, and proofs made." But an expedient was found to ſoften this refuſal, namely, that the parties accuſed ſhould, of their own accord, deſire leave to abſent themſelves from the houſe, which was granted, and the army remained ſatisfied [h].

About the ſame time, the army drawing a little nearer London, probably, with deſign to awe the parliament, the general writ to the lord-mayor and aldermen, that they had nothing to fear from the army, who had no ill intention againſt the city. And indeed, it was reſolved in a council of war, that there ſhould be no farther advance of the army than to Uxbridge.

It is certain, there were many in the city and parliament that wiſhed to ſee a breach between the two houſes and the army. Some, doubtleſs, imagined ſuch a breach would be very advantageous to the king, and that one or other of the two parties would join with him, and be directed by him. Nay, the king flattered himſelf with theſe hopes. The army ſhewed great regard for him, and ſome of the officers even hinted to him, they were labouring for his reſtoration. For this reaſon, the two houſes thought it very neceſſary to avoid a breach, which could not but produce many ill effects. Both houſes therefore voted, that they conſidered the army commanded by general Fairfax, as their army, and would make proviſion for their maintenance. It was farther ordered, that they ſhould have a month's pay, and no officer or ſoldier ſhould leave the army without licence from the general; that all reformado's ſhould remove from the city and the king reſide no nearer London than the army. Theſe votes being communicated to the army, they ſeemed ſo well pleaſed with them, that they reſolved to remove from London, to ſhew they intended to uſe no force upon the parliament, and the head-quarters were appointed at Wickham.

Whilſt the parliament was endeavouring to content the army, a plot was forming in London, to compel the two houſes to take other meaſures, and oppoſe the army [i]. The preſbyterians were not pleaſed to ſee the independents gain ſo much ground, and cenſured the parliament for thus meanly complying with the army. The magiſtrates of London came into the plot, as well as the moſt zealous preſbyterian members of parliament, who had not been able to hinder the late votes for preventing a breach with the army. The authors of the plot had ſent private agents into Scotland to deſire aſſiſtance. Nay, it was whiſpered in London, that Scotland was going to declare againſt the army.

The firſt ſtep taken by the conſpirators was to preſent to the parliament a petition from the common-council of London, wherein they expreſſed ſome ſuſpicion of their conduct. This was, doubtleſs, in order to have a pretence to complain more openly afterwards, and to begin to leſſen the people's prepoſſeſſion in favour of the parliament. In this petition, the city complained of the arbitrary power exerciſed by the parliament's committees, as well as of the ill management of the public money, and deſired:

"1. That preſent command be given, that no officer of war, or ſoldier, do enter London, under pretence of receiving their arrears.

"2. That ſuch officers and ſoldiers as are already paid, if their uſual habitation and employment have been within London, be enjoined forthwith to betake themſelves to their calling; and ſuch as have dwellings in the country be required to depart within two days after publication.

[d] It was ſtrange (ſays Whitelock) to ſee, how ſeveral counties, and the citizens of London, began to make all their application to the general and the army, omitting the parliament, and all looked upon the army in the chief place, and were afraid of doing any thing contrary to them. Mem. p. 254.

And having been bred in the Middle-Temple, and learned ſome grounds of the law of England, and being of a working and laborious brain and fancy, he ſet himſelf much upon theſe buſineſſes, and was therein encouraged and aſſiſted by lieutenant-general Cromwell, his father-in-law, and by colonel Lambert, who had likewiſe ſtudied in the inns of court, and was of a ſubtle working brain. Whitelock, p. 254.

[h] Denzil Holles, ſir Philip Stapleton, and Walter Long, went together in a ſhip to France, where Stapleton, that gallant Engliſh gentleman (ſays Whitelock) died within two or three days landing at Calais, as ſome ſuſpected of the plague. Others of the eleven members went into other parts, and ſome of them retired into their countries, and there lived privately: Mr. Holles continued in Bretagne till the reſtoration. "3. That all who have been in arms againſt the parliament, be enjoined upon pain of impriſonment, within twenty-four hours after publication, to repair to their ſeveral habitations.

"4. That ſuch commanders and ſoldiers as have come in from the army, and received their monies, may be otherwiſe diſpoſed of as the parliament ſhall think fit.

"5. That all perſons whatſoever that are poſſeſſed of any monies or goods belonging to the public, may be enjoined to bring the ſame, within one month after publication, into ſome public treaſury.

"6. That all revenues be managed under ſuch commiſſions, and by ſuch perſons, as, notwithſtanding any privilege of parliament, may be held to ſuch rules as are or ſhall be preſcribed therein.

"7. That the parliament would for the preſent lay aſide all buſineſſes of leſſer conſequence, and improve their time and utmoſt endeavour, that ſuch laws may be prepared for his majeſty's concurrence, as may ſettle the government of the church, ſecure the people from all unlawful and arbitrary power whatſoever in future, and reſtore his majeſty to his juſt rights and authority, according to the covenant.

"8. And, that the people may be the better ſecured to enjoy the intended effects of ſuch laws as ſhall be ſo made with the royal aſſent, that eſpecial care be taken, that all officers of ſtate, and other miniſters of juſtice, may be perſons of honour, of conſiderable intereſt, and of known integrity.

"9. That the parliament would pleaſe to provide for the carrying on of the affairs in Ireland.

"10. That by juſt and good means the correſpondence with Scotland may be maintained and preſerved.

"11. That the houſe of commons would pleaſe to give orders for a ſpeedy examination of all unlawful elections and returns of the members thereof.

"12. That ſome ſpeedy courſe may be taken for the deciding of all cauſes formerly determinable in the court of admiralty.

"13. That ſatisfaction being made by delinquents, an act of oblivion may be paſſed,"

To incenſe the Londoners againſt the army, it was rumoured, that they deſigned to declare for the king [k]. Nay, a pamphlet was diſperſed in London, entitled, 'Heads preſented by the army to the king's majeſty.' But the army diſowned it by a public declaration.

The parliament having impowered their commiſſioners [l] to treat with the army, they nominated on their part, Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, Rainſborough, Harriſon, ſir Hardreſs Waller, Rich, Lambert, Hammond, and major Rainſborough, all independents and heads of the party in the army. It appears by memoirs, inſerted in Ruſhworth's collections, that the army's commiſſioners would not begin to treat, before the parliament ſhould have granted ſome things they demanded, and really performed them. They complained, that the parliament ſeemed indeed by their votes to comply with the army's deſires, but delayed to put them in execution. The parliament's commiſſioners endeavoured on their ſide to avoid having theſe points conſidered as granted preliminaries, and inſiſted upon their making part of the negotiation.

This ſhews the parliament ſought to gain time, and ſeemed inclined to give the army ſatisfaction, only becauſe it could not be avoided. The commons were almoſt all preſbyterians, and conſequently were vexed to ſee themſelves obliged to ſtoop to the independents, who were maſters of the army. Among the preſbyterian members, there were not a few, who, being very warm, would have gladly hazarded a breach with the army, rather than be forced to receive law from them. But the reſt, being the majority, though no leſs enemies to the independents, thought it more adviſeable to have patience, and try to amuſe the army till ſome aid might be ſecured, rather than furniſh them with a pretence to march to London, and ruin at once the preſbyterian party and the parliament. Accordingly, theſe prevailing in both houſes, every thing ſeemed to tend to an agreement, which could not but be fatal to the preſbyterians: however, there was no way to avoid it. For this reaſon, the parliament forbid the reformado-officers to come into London for two months, and gave very ſtrict orders againſt liſting of ſoldiers, which was privately tranſacted in the city.

[k] Many of the chief in the army gave out, That the intentions of the officers and ſoldiers were, to eſtabliſh his majeſty in his juſt rights. Ludlow, tom. I. p. 195.

[l] They were the earl of Nottingham, lord Wharton, Skippon, ſir Henry Vane, jun. ſir Thomas Widdrington, colonel White, Robert Scawen, and Thomas Povey, eſquires. Ruſhworth, tom. VI. p. 605.

Mean while, the project of raiſing forces in London to oppoſe the army ſtill continued, though with the utmoſt ſecrecy, and the agents in Scotland cauſed much to be expected from the Scots, as being concerned to ſupport the preſbyterian party. But the authors of this project could hardly flatter themſelves that the aſſiſtance of Scotland could be ready in time, ſince the parliament and army were upon terms of accommodation. They found therefore, they were either to break off the accommodation, or reſolve to ſee all their hopes vaniſh, and ſuffer preſbyterianiſm to be trampled upon by the independents. To ſucceed in the deſign of preventing a peace between the parliament and army, they found no better way than to excite the people to force the parliament to alter their meaſures. They got therefore the apprentices and London-mob, to preſent petitions, that the preſbyterian government might be firmly eſtabliſhed: the inſolence of ſectaries curbed: the army paid off and diſbanded; and other things of the like nature deſtructive of the projected agreement.

On the other hand, the forces in the North, and the horſe quartered at Nottingham, publiſhed declarations of their adherence to the army commanded by general Fairfax.

About the ſame time, the parliament, at the army's requeſt, ordered the four regiments that came from the army, under pretence of engagement for Ireland, but remaining ſtill in the kingdom, to be diſbanded. They permitted likewiſe the eleven accuſed members to go beyond ſea for ſix months, inſinuating to them by this permiſſion, that they would do well to take that courſe of their own accord. But as, probably, they were deeply concerned in the plot formed at London, if not the authors, they thanked the houſe for this favour, without being in haſte to take the benefit of it [m].

Mean while, the army hearing ſomething more than ordinary was contriving in London, and that ſuccours from Scotland were talked of, ſent a petition to the parliament, with theſe farther demands: "That a declaration be publiſhed againſt the bringing in of any foreign forces: that the army be paid up equal with the deſerters thereof, and put into a conſtant courſe of pay: that the committee of the militia of London, that had been changed by ordinance of the 4th of May laſt, be reſtored, and the militia of the city ſpeedily returned into thoſe hands who formerly gave large teſtimonies of their fidelity to the parliament and kingdom." Whereupon the parliament declared, that whoſoever ſhould bring in foreign forces, without the conſent of both houſes, ſhould be deemed traitors. It was voted likewiſe, that the militia of London ſhould be reſtored to the old commiſſioners, and an ordinance was paſſed for that purpoſe. To underſtand this article, it muſt be obſerved, that in the beginning of May laſt, both houſes perceiving ſome motions in the army, thought proper to ſecure the militia of London, and put it into ſuch hands as they could confide in. To that end they paſſed an ordinance the 4th of May, for chuſing a new committee of the militia of London, by which means none were admitted into the committee, or any office of the militia, but preſbyterians, entirely devoted to the party. This change it was that both houſes repealed, at the army's requeſt, and reſtored the former commiſſioners.

The preſbyterian party, who had great credit in the city and poſſeſſed all the poſts, could not, without extreme regret, behold the parliament's condeſcenſion to the army, that is, to the independents. They ſaw that party daily increaſe, and in condition to give law to the parliament itſelf. For that reaſon, the rigid preſbyterians, ſeconded by the common-council of London, formed an engagement to aſſiſt one another, and oppoſe the army to the utmoſt of their power, upon a ſuppoſition, that the army intended to ſubvert what had been hitherto done to ſettle the peace of the kingdom. The engagement publicly ſubſcribed in London, was as follows:

A ſolemn engagement of the citizens, commanders, officers, and ſoldiers of the trained-bands, and auxiliaries, the young men, and apprentices of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, ſea-commanders, ſeamen, and watermen: together with divers others, the commanders, officers, and ſoldiers, within the lines of communication, and pariſhes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality.

Ruſhworth ſays, that the eleven members, finding that the army declared, the proceeding upon particular proofs to make good the charge, would probably take up much time, and hinder the ſettling of greater matters, petitioned the houſe that they might abſent themſelves for ſix months, to go about their particular affairs, or if they deſired it, beyond ſea. league and covenant, for reformation and defence of religion, the honour and happineſs of the kingdom, and the peace and ſafety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; all which we do eminently perceive to be endangered, and like to be deſtroyed: We do therefore, in purſuance of our ſaid covenant, oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and proteſtation, ſolemnly engage ourſelves, and vow unto God Almighty, that we will, to the utmoſt of our power, cordially endeavour, that his majeſty may ſpeedily come to his own houſes of parliament, with honour, ſafety and freedom, (and that without the nearer approach of the army) there to confirm ſuch things, as he has granted in his meſſage of the 12th of May laſt, in anſwer to the propoſitions of both kingdoms; and that by a perſonal treaty with his two houſes of parliament, and the commiſſioners of the kingdom of Scotland, ſuch things as are yet in difference, may be ſpeedily ſettled, and in a firm and laſting peace eſtabliſhed; for the effecting hereof, we do proteſt and re-oblige ourſelves, as in the preſence of God, the ſearcher of all hearts, with our lives and fortunes, to endeavour what in us lies, to preſerve and defend his majeſty's royal perſon and authority, the privileges of parliament, and liberty of the ſubject, in their full and conſtant freedom, the cities of London and Weſtminſter, lines of communication and pariſhes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality; and all others that ſhall adhere with us to the ſaid covenant, and oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman of London and Weſtminſter, and proteſtation: Nor ſhall we by any means admit, ſuffer, or endure, any neutrality, in this common cauſe of God, the king, and kingdom, as we do expect the bleſſing of God Almighty, whoſe help we crave, and wholly devolve ourſelves upon, in this our undertaking."

The two houſes had no ſooner advice of this engagement, but they publiſhed by beat of drum and ſound of trumpet, a prohibition to ſign it. On the other hand, the general loudly complained to the parliament's commiſſioners, and deſired them to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the agitations in London, which tended to rekindle the war. At the ſame time he ordered a ſtrict inquiry to be made in the army after all cavaliers who had borne arms for the king, or were ſuſpected to be of his party, with a command to diſmiſs them forthwith.

For two or three days there was a great commotion in London: aſſemblies were held, ſoldiers liſted, and orders given them to be ready upon the firſt notice. The common-council received two petitions, one from a great number of ſubſtantial citizens, the other from the young men and apprentices [n], to deſire, "That the militia might be continued, as ſettled by ordinance of the 4th of May." Whereupon the common-council repreſented to the commons in a petition, "That having taken notice of the pleaſure of both houſes for conſtituting, by ordinance dated the 23d of July, a new committee for the militia of the city of London, and for determining of a former ordinance for the ſame, dated the 4th of May laſt, they could not but call to mind, how far both houſes of parliament had formerly honoured the city, when they firſt eſtabliſhed the committee for the militia, to take the ſenſe of this court before they finally reſolved thereupon; which confidence the petitioners are not conſcious to themſelves to have forfeited. And next being ſenſible, what a general diſtemper this ſudden change hath already made, and is like to make, in the city, they could not but earneſtly pray, that the militia which was eſtabliſhed by ordinance of the 4th of May laſt, may be reſtored."

The parliament was not a little embarraſſed in the preſent juncture, conſidering the impoſſibility of contenting at the ſame time, the army and the city, whoſe deſires were diametrically oppoſite. It is certain, moſt of the members were preſbyterians, and conſequently ill-affected to the army. Had it been in their choice, they would have declared againſt and diſbanded the army according to their intention. But ſince the army's approach to the city, the wiſeſt, who were the majority, had thought proper to comply, not ſeeing how the army could be oppoſed, if they proceed to violence, as was very likely. But there was a good number of others who were for running all hazards rather than ſee the independents triumph. Mean while, theſe laſt privately cheriſhed the commotions in the city, imagining, the aſſiſtance they might receive from London, was ſufficient to reſiſt all attempts of the army. This was likewiſe the opinion of the common-council, the populace, and ſome general officers, as ſir William Waller, Pointz, and Maſſey, who were removed by the new model, and were then in London. The only point therefore was to induce the parliament to join with them, and take vigorous reſolutions againſt the army. But as there was no likelihood of prevailing by fair means, it was reſolved to uſe force.

To that end, July the 26th, a great number of young men and apprentices, came to Weſtminſter, and preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, deſiring,

1. That the ordinance of the 23d of July for change of the militia of London, be immediately repealed.

2. That the city may be vindicated againſt a late pretended declaration, that thoſe are traitors who ſhall act to get ſubſcriptions, and that it may be revoked.

3. That both houſes do preſently make an order, for calling in all abſent members, eſpecially the eleven late accuſed members, againſt whom there has been nothing proved to this day.

Theſe demands were ſuch, conſidering the preſent juncture, that it was no wonder much time was ſpent in debating by both houſes. But the people without, growing impatient, and perceiving theſe debates were intended only to amuſe them, made a great noiſe in the outer rooms. Some knocked at the door of the houſe; others threw in ſtones at the windows of the houſe of peers. In a word, they very plainly ſhewed, they would not ſuffer the two houſes to riſe, before they had received ſatisfaction. At laſt, both houſes ſeeing it would be in vain to reſiſt the multitude, who threatened to tear them in pieces, voted, "That the ordinance of the 23d of July, for ſettling the militia of London, and the declaration of the 24th of the ſame intent, be null and void." This done, the houſe of commons adjourned till next day. But the multitude conſtrained the ſpeaker and members to reſume their places, and defired them to vote, that the king ſhould come to London; which was done accordingly. On the morrow both houſes being met, adjourned to the 30th.

On the 28th, the common-council received a letter from the general, expreſſing his good affection and tender care of the city, but withal his great diſlike of the petition, and the means uſed to promote it. At the ſame time, many young men and others attended the common-council, declaring their readineſs to ſupport the juſt privileges of the city againſt all oppoſers. Whereupon a letter was ſent by a meſſenger to the general, and ſix commiſſioners appointed to follow the next morning. In the letter, "They declared their inclination to peace, intreating him, that the army might not advance, nor intermeddle with the rights and privileges of the city, conceiving that the ſtrengthening the city for the ſafety thereof, was no juſt cauſe to provoke the ſoldiers: and as for the petition, the parliament had already declared their ſenſe of it, and therefore it was needleſs for them to do it, and the rather for that it had never been formally preſented to them."

Mean while, the common-council having received intelligence that the army was advancing towards London, orders were given for the trained-bands to go to their works, and for all that could bear arms to appear the next morning at ſeveral places.

Both houſes meeting the 30th of July, the two ſpeakers did not appear, which obliged them to chuſe others in their room [o]. With the ſpeakers, a good number of members of both houſes were alſo departed from London, without any one's knowing whither. The abſence of theſe members, who were all friends to the army, rendered the contrary party ſo ſuperior, that the commons voted the ſame day, that the king ſhould come to London: that the militia of the city ſhould have full power to raiſe ſuch forces as they ſhould think fit, for the defence thereof: that they ſhould chuſe a commander in chief to be approved by the houſe, and ſuch commander to preſent other officers, to be approved by the militia. After that, the committee made choice of major-general Maſſey to command in chief, and ordered, that all reformado's and other officers ſhould the next day appear to be liſted in St. James's-fields, and the forces already liſted to be put into a regimental way.

The ſame day, the common-council received a letter from general Fairfax, dated the day before, wherein he ſpoke very ſharply of the tumult of the 26th, and of the violence upon the parliament. He ſaid, the guard ſent from the city, not only neglected their duty, but that divers of the common-council greatly encouraged the ſeditions. That they had not kept their word with the army, which, upon their aſſurance to ſecure the parliament from any attempt, had removed to that diſtance from the city. That he could not but look on them as accountable to the kingdom, for the preſent interruptions of the hopeful way of peace and ſettlement of the nation, if by their care and induſtry the chief actors in the late tumults were not detected and given up to juſtice.

On the other hand, the city publiſhed an apology by way of declaration or manifeſto, ſetting forth, "The army's ſurpriſing the king at Holmby, without its being known by what authority, and under what pretences; and their keeping his royal perſon ever ſince, notwithſtanding his ſurpriſal was diſowned by the general for himſelf and all the officers about him, and for the body of the army. That the privileges of parliament had been violated by the army's cauſing the eleven members to withdraw, and by interpoſing in the militia of London, which was ſubject to no other cogniſance but of the king and parliament." There were ſeveral other things in this manifeſto, which inſinuated, that the army's ill deſigns were but too evident. They concluded with proteſting, that "They ſincerely deſire a happy and ſpeedy peace by the ſettlement of true religion, by re-eſtabliſhing his majeſty's juſt rights, by upholding all lawful privileges of a free parliament, by maintaining the fundamental laws of the land, by reſtoring the ſubject to his juſt liberty, and by freeing this long-oppreſſed kingdom from all taxes, and the enforced free-quarters towards the maintenance of an army, which hath long had no viſible enemy to encounter."

Both houſes alſo writ to the general, that though he had given them no account of the motion of his army, yet they underſtood, he had ordered his forces to march towards London, on pretence of defending the houſes from the danger of tumults, upon which account they thought fit to let him know, that as they could not but have a deep ſenſe of the undue liberty which ſome apprentices and others had taken, to violate the freedom of parliament, ſo they doubted not, but the ſenſe of ſo great an offence would at laſt ſtrike thoſe that were acceſſary thereto with a deteſtation of any ſuch practices for the future: and that as the houſes could not imagine, theſe diſorders had the allowance of the city of London, ſo they had ſince received full ſatisfaction by the ſtrict orders publiſhed by the common-council for preventing and ſuppreſſing of tumults, and by their declaration, that they ſhould ſit with freedom, and ſecurity from any diſturbances for the future. And therefore they ſaw no cauſe to command the army to come to their aſſiſtance, but rather judged (by the diſtractions raiſed at the news thereof) that the army's approach was like to produce great miſchiefs, and caſt the whole kingdom into confuſion. That for prevention of theſe dangers, they had ſent him an expreſs order to withdraw his army, requiring him to give exact obedience thereto.

The ſame day the commons voted, that the eleven accuſed members ſhould be received into the houſe; accordingly moſt of them came and took their places on the morrow [p].

On the 31ſt, the two houſes publiſhed an ordinance, enabling the committee of the militia of London to puniſh ſuch as did not repair to their colours, and to chuſe a major-general, or any other officer for the forces raiſed or to be raiſed within the city of London; and Maſſey, Waller, and Pointz were employed in forming regiments and companies.

Though the parliament and city made great preparations, the army were under no apprehenſions. They knew, that two or three days were not ſufficient to diſcipline an army levied in haſte in the city, and enable it to withſtand twenty thouſand victorious troops, well ſupplied with arms, ammunition, and ordnance. They continued therefore their march to the general rendezvous at Hounſlow-heath, within twelve miles of London. Mean while, the general delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners, certain propoſals to be negotiated between the parliament and army, for ſettling the peace of the kingdom. At the ſame time, he put into their hands a declaration by the council of war, wherein the officers ſaid, Though the late violence done to the parliament rendered all proceedings in the way of treaty vain and hopeleſs, till the parliament ſhould be reſtored to a condition of freedom, yet they had thought good to make this public tender of propoſals to the conſideration of the kingdom, wherein all men might ſee the integrity of their intentions, and the bottom of their deſires. Theſe propoſals related intirely to the public without any mixture of the private views of the army.

Mean while, the two ſpeakers, and the reſt of the members of both houſes who had abſented themſelves, to the number of ſixty-ſix, came to the general, deſiring his protection, and ſaying, that as there was no free ſitting for them in the parliament, they had quitted the houſes for fear of being torn in pieces by the mob. Nothing could be more agreeable to the army than this requeſt, which authoriſed them, without their being forced to ſeek other pretences, to march to London to re-inſtate the members ſuppoſed to be driven from the parliament by the populace. From that time, they would no more own the two houſes for parliament, but paid to the ſpeakers and members who attended them, the ſame reſpect as they would have done to the parliament itſelf.

It was very ſtrange, that zealous preſbyterians, ſuch as were moſt of the abſented members, ſhould have recourſe to the army's protection, againſt the endeavours of their brethren in both houſes and the city, to prevent the independents from trampling upon preſbyterianiſm. The moſt probable reaſon of this proceeding, I think, is, that theſe members imagined, their brethren and the common-council of London were taking wrong meaſures, and would be infallibly oppreſſed by the army. It was therefore very natural for men in this belief, to endeavour to avoid being involved in the ruin their party was threatened with, and to chuſe rather to continue to diſſemble their ſentiments, as they had done for ſome time, than be expoſed in vain to inevitable, as they thought, calamities. To this may be added, that among theſe members there were ſome independents, who earneſtly laboured to perſuade the reſt to this courſe, as we are informed by Ludlow's memoirs, who was of this number and party. The lord Clarendon gives another reaſon, which ſeems not ſo natural. He pretends, theſe members believed, the army deſigned to reſtore the king to all his rights, and ſeeing there were not forces ſufficient to hinder it, they were willing to avoid the effects of his vengeance, by concurring with the army in his reſtoration. But, beſides that the event ſhewed, the independents had no ſuch intention, it is certain they had not hitherto expreſſed it, unleſs ſome civilities paid the king ſince he was in their hands, are to be conſidered as real proofs of this intention. Moreover, the army had juſt given a ſenſible proof, that their deſign was not to reſtore the king to all his rights, by the propoſals lately delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners, whereby the king's prerogatives were intirely ſubverted, as will hereafter appear.

However this be, the army improved the deſertion of theſe members to juſtify their advance towards London, and to ſhew that their aim was only to prevent a new war, which the members at Weſtminſter, and the common-council of London, had a mind to excite. To this purpoſe, they publiſhed a manifeſto, containing the reaſons of their marching to London; the ſubſtance whereof was to this effect:

"That the army was formerly led, by the grounds then declared, to advance towards the city of London; but having received from the parliament and city ſome hopes of ſatisfaction, they yielded a ſpeedy compliance to their deſires for their removal to a farther diſtance. And being in this ſecure way, and labouring after the ſudden ſettlement of the kingdom, they had even brought to perfection, particular propoſals to be ſent to the parliament, for a final concluſion of all their troubles; but the kingdom's enemies being moſt vigilant to fruſtrate thoſe good intentions of theirs, had endeavoured to caſt the kingdom into a new and bloody war: and for that end had procured the under-hand liſting of ſeveral reformado's, and others, and contrived a wicked and treaſonable combination; as it was ſufficiently manifeſted by a declaration paſſed thereupon by both houſes of parliament the 23d of July laſt, for the prevention of the diſturbances that were like to enſue thereupon; from which kind of diſorders the city had been well preſerved, during the ſpace of almoſt four years, whilſt the militia was in the hands of the old commiſſioners, whereby it appeared, there was cauſe for the army to intreat the parliament, that the militia might be returned into the hands it was in before.

"That thoſe old commiſſioners of the militia were not only perſons without all exception, but alſo men of whom the kingdom had above four years experience in the faithful diſcharge of their truſt, and that were always moſt deſirous of a peace. Yet, on a ſudden, this truſt, which they had ſo faithfully diſcharged ſo long, was taken out of their hands,

[p] It was likewiſe declared, That the ordinance of the 19th of July, which put under the command of ſir Thomas Fairfax all the land-forces, did not give him any power over the trained-bands, garriſons, &c. And this declaration was ordered to be printed and publiſhed in London, by ſound of trumpet. Whitelock, p. 262.

league and covenant, for reformation and defence of religion, the honour and happineſs of the kingdom, and the peace and ſafety of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; all which we do eminently perceive to be endangered, and like to be deſtroyed: We do therefore, in purſuance of our ſaid covenant, oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and proteſtation, ſolemnly engage ourſelves, and vow unto God Almighty, that we will, to the utmoſt of our power, cordially endeavour, that his majeſty may ſpeedily come to his own houſes of parliament, with honour, ſafety and freedom, (and that without the nearer approach of the army) there to confirm ſuch things, as he has granted in his meſſage of the 12th of May laſt, in anſwer to the propoſitions of both kingdoms; and that by a perſonal treaty with his two houſes of parliament, and the commiſſioners of the kingdom of Scotland, ſuch things as are yet in difference, may be ſpeedily ſettled, and in a firm and laſting peace eſtabliſhed; for the effecting hereof, we do proteſt and re-oblige ourſelves, as in the preſence of God, the ſearcher of all hearts, with our lives and fortunes, to endeavour what in us lies, to preſerve and defend his majeſty's royal perſon and authority, the privileges of parliament, and liberty of the ſubject, in their full and conſtant freedom, the cities of London and Weſtminſter, lines of communication and pariſhes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality; and all others that ſhall adhere with us to the ſaid covenant, and oath of allegiance, oath of every freeman of London and Weſtminſter, and proteſtation: Nor ſhall we by any means admit, ſuffer, or endure, any neutrality, in this common cauſe of God, the king, and kingdom, as we do expect the bleſſing of God Almighty, whoſe help we crave, and wholly devolve ourſelves upon, in this our undertaking."

The two houſes had no ſooner advice of this engagement, but they publiſhed by beat of drum and ſound of trumpet, a prohibition to ſign it. On the other hand, the general loudly complained to the parliament's commiſſioners, and deſired them to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the agitations in London, which tended to rekindle the war. At the ſame time he ordered a ſtrict inquiry to be made in the army after all cavaliers who had borne arms for the king, or were ſuſpected to be of his party, with a command to diſmiſs them forthwith.

Whereupon the common-council repreſented to the commons in a petition, "That having taken notice of the pleaſure of both houſes for conſtituting, by ordinance dated the 23d of July, a new committee for the militia of the city of London, and for determining of a former ordinance for the ſame, dated the 4th of May laſt, they could not but call to mind, how far both houſes of parliament had formerly honoured the city, when they firſt eſtabliſhed the committee for the militia, to take the ſenſe of this court before they finally reſolved thereupon; which confidence the petitioners are not conſcious to themſelves to have forfeited. With the ſpeakers, a good number of members of both houſes were alſo departed from London, without any one's knowing whither. The abſence of theſe members, who were all friends to the army, rendered the contrary party ſo ſuperior, that the commons voted the ſame day, that the king ſhould come to London: that the militia of the city ſhould have full power to raiſe ſuch forces as they ſhould think fit, for the defence thereof: that they ſhould chuſe a commander in chief to be approved by the houſe, and ſuch commander to preſent other officers, to be approved by the militia. After that, the committee made choice of major-general Maſſey to command in chief, and ordered, that all reformado's and other officers ſhould the next day appear to be liſted in St. James's-fields, and the forces already liſted to be put into a regimental way.

The ſame day, the common-council received a letter from general Fairfax, dated the day before, wherein he ſpoke very ſharply of the tumult of the 26th, and of the violence upon the parliament. He ſaid, the guard ſent from the city, not only neglected their duty, but that divers of the common-council greatly encouraged the ſeditions. That they had not kept their word with the army, which, upon their aſſurance to ſecure the parliament from any attempt, had removed to that diſtance from the city. That he could not but look on them as accountable to the kingdom, for the preſent interruptions of the hopeful way of peace and ſettlement of the nation, if by their care and induſtry the chief actors in the late tumults were not detected and given up to juſtice.

On the other hand, the city publiſhed an apology by way of declaration or manifeſto, ſetting forth, "The army's ſurpriſing the king at Holmby, without its being known by what authority, and under what pretences; and their keeping his royal perſon ever ſince, notwithſtanding his ſurpriſal was diſowned by the general for himſelf and all the officers about him, and for the body of the army. That the privileges of parliament had been violated by the army's cauſing the eleven members to withdraw, and by interpoſing in the militia of London, which was ſubject to no other cogniſance but of the king and parliament." There were ſeveral other things in this manifeſto, which inſinuated, that the army's ill deſigns were but too evident. They concluded with proteſting, that "They ſincerely deſire a happy and ſpeedy peace by the ſettlement of true religion, by re-eſtabliſhing his majeſty's juſt rights, by upholding all lawful privileges of a free parliament, by maintaining the fundamental laws of the land, by reſtoring the ſubject to his juſt liberty, and by freeing this long-oppreſſed kingdom from all taxes, and the enforced free-quarters towards the maintenance of an army, which hath long had no viſible enemy to encounter."

Both houſes alſo writ to the general, that though he had given them no account of the motion of his army, yet they underſtood, he had ordered his forces to march towards London, on pretence of defending the houſes from the danger of tumults, upon which account they thought fit to let him know, that as they could not but have a deep ſenſe of the undue liberty which ſome apprentices and others had taken, to violate the freedom of parliament, ſo they doubted not, but the ſenſe of ſo great an offence would at laſt ſtrike thoſe that were acceſſary thereto with a deteſtation of any ſuch practices for the future: and that as the houſes could not imagine, theſe diſorders had the allowance of the city of London, ſo they had ſince received full ſatisfaction by the ſtrict orders publiſhed by the common-council for preventing and ſuppreſſing of tumults, and by their declaration, that they ſhould ſit with freedom, and ſecurity from any diſturbances for the future. And therefore they ſaw no cauſe to command the army to come to their aſſiſtance, but rather judged (by the diſtractions raiſed at the news thereof) that the army's approach was like to produce great miſchiefs, and caſt the whole kingdom into confuſion. That for prevention of theſe dangers, they had ſent him an expreſs order to withdraw his army, requiring him to give exact obedience thereto.

The ſame day the commons voted, that the eleven accuſed members ſhould be received into the houſe; accordingly moſt of them came and took their places on the morrow [p].

On the 31ſt, the two houſes publiſhed an ordinance, enabling the committee of the militia of London to puniſh ſuch as did not repair to their colours, and to chuſe a major-general, or any other officer for the forces raiſed or to be raiſed within the city of London; and Maſſey, Waller, and Pointz were employed in forming regiments and companies.

Though the parliament and city made great preparations, the army were under no apprehenſions. They knew, that two or three days were not ſufficient to diſcipline an army levied in haſte in the city, and enable it to withſtand twenty thouſand victorious troops, well ſupplied with arms, ammunition, and ordnance. They continued therefore their march to the general rendezvous at Hounſlow-heath, within twelve miles of London. Mean while, the general delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners, certain propoſals to be negotiated between the parliament and army, for ſettling the peace of the kingdom. At the ſame time, he put into their hands a declaration by the council of war, wherein the officers ſaid, Though the late violence done to the parliament rendered all proceedings in the way of treaty vain and hopeleſs, till the parliament ſhould be reſtored to a condition of freedom, yet they had thought good to make this public tender of propoſals to the conſideration of the kingdom, wherein all men might ſee the integrity of their intentions, and the bottom of their deſires. Theſe propoſals related intirely to the public without any mixture of the private views of the army.

Mean while, the two ſpeakers, and the reſt of the members of both houſes who had abſented themſelves, to the number of ſixty-ſix, came to the general, deſiring his protection, and ſaying, that as there was no free ſitting for them in the parliament, they had quitted the houſes for fear of being torn in pieces by the mob. Nothing could be more agreeable to the army than this requeſt, which authoriſed them, without their being forced to ſeek other pretences, to march to London to re-inſtate the members ſuppoſed to be driven from the parliament by the populace. From that time, they would no more own the two houſes for parliament, but paid to the ſpeakers and members who attended them, the ſame reſpect as they would have done to the parliament itſelf.

It was very ſtrange, that zealous preſbyterians, ſuch as were moſt of the abſented members, ſhould have recourſe to the army's protection, againſt the endeavours of their brethren in both houſes and the city, to prevent the independents from trampling upon preſbyterianiſm. The moſt probable reaſon of this proceeding, I think, is, that theſe members imagined, their brethren and the common-council of London were taking wrong meaſures, and would be infallibly oppreſſed by the army. It was therefore very natural for men in this belief, to endeavour to avoid being involved in the ruin their party was threatened with, and to chuſe rather to continue to diſſemble their ſentiments, as they had done for ſome time, than be expoſed in vain to inevitable, as they thought, calamities. To this may be added, that among theſe members there were ſome independents, who earneſtly laboured to perſuade the reſt to this courſe, as we are informed by Ludlow's memoirs, who was of this number and party. The lord Clarendon gives another reaſon, which ſeems not ſo natural. He pretends, theſe members believed, the army deſigned to reſtore the king to all his rights, and ſeeing there were not forces ſufficient to hinder it, they were willing to avoid the effects of his vengeance, by concurring with the army in his reſtoration. But, beſides that the event ſhewed, the independents had no ſuch intention, it is certain they had not hitherto expreſſed it, unleſs ſome civilities paid the king ſince he was in their hands, are to be conſidered as real proofs of this intention. Moreover, the army had juſt given a ſenſible proof, that their deſign was not to reſtore the king to all his rights, by the propoſals lately delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners, whereby the king's prerogatives were intirely ſubverted, as will hereafter appear.

However this be, the army improved the deſertion of theſe members to juſtify their advance towards London, and to ſhew that their aim was only to prevent a new war, which the members at Weſtminſter, and the common-council of London, had a mind to excite. To this purpoſe, they publiſhed a manifeſto, containing the reaſons of their marching to London; the ſubſtance whereof was to this effect:

"That the army was formerly led, by the grounds then declared, to advance towards the city of London; but having received from the parliament and city ſome hopes of ſatisfaction, they yielded a ſpeedy compliance to their deſires for their removal to a farther diſtance. And being in this ſecure way, and labouring after the ſudden ſettlement of the kingdom, they had even brought to perfection, particular propoſals to be ſent to the parliament, for a final concluſion of all their troubles; but the kingdom's enemies being moſt vigilant to fruſtrate thoſe good intentions of theirs, had endeavoured to caſt the kingdom into a new and bloody war: and for that end had procured the under-hand liſting of ſeveral reformado's, and others, and contrived a wicked and treaſonable combination; as it was ſufficiently manifeſted by a declaration paſſed thereupon by both houſes of parliament the 23d of July laſt, for the prevention of the diſturbances that were like to enſue thereupon; from which kind of diſorders the city had been well preſerved, during the ſpace of almoſt four years, whilſt the militia was in the hands of the old commiſſioners, whereby it appeared, there was cauſe for the army to intreat the parliament, that the militia might be returned into the hands it was in before.

"That thoſe old commiſſioners of the militia were not only perſons without all exception, but alſo men of whom the kingdom had above four years experience in the faithful diſcharge of their truſt, and that were always moſt deſirous of a peace. Yet, on a ſudden, this truſt, which they had ſo faithfully diſcharged ſo long, was taken out of their hands, and put into the hands of others, ſome whereof had been very cool in the ſervice of the parliament; and this was preſſed, and in a manner forced upon the parliament, with the utmoſt importunity. Theſe things miniſtered great cauſe of ſuſpicion, that that alteration of the militia was in order to make the terms of the peace, and agreement with the king, more ſuitable to the private undertakings of ſome men, than to the public welfare of the whole kingdom. But this deſign diſcovered itſelf more clearly, in that at the ſame time that the alteration of the militia of London was ſet on foot, the ſame perſons with as much earneſtneſs preſſed for the diſbanding of the army, before any thing was ſettled for the ſecurity and liberty of the kingdom. At the ſame time, the common-council was new modellized, a lord-mayor choſen that might ſuit with the preſent deſign, and divers perſons were left out of the common-council and militia of eminent deſerts and fidelity, and others brought into their rooms, that had either teſtified an ill affection, or little affection to the parliament and their cauſe. That the honour of the parliament was continually trampled under foot, and their authority affronted by every rabble of women, apprentices, reformado's, and ſoldiers, till at length it was riſen to the height of monſtrous violence againſt the parliament, that they might ſet themſelves on work, and the kingdom on fire again. That at length, the deſign appeared open-faced, and though the militia was made the principal ground of the quarrel, yet the preſſing ſo much the king's coming to London to confirm the ſame, ſhewed that the militia was deſired but in order to that deſign, and to force the parliament to ſuch terms of peace as they pleaſed.

[p] It was likewiſe declared, That the ordinance of the 19th of July, which put under the command of ſir Thomas Fairfax all the land-forces, did not give him any power over the trained-bands, garriſons, &c. And this declaration was ordered to be printed and publiſhed in London, by ſound of trumpet. Whitelock, p. 262.

"That the intereſt of the common-council, in their change of the militia, was claimed as the birth-right of the city of London; but ſuch a claim could not juſtly be held up againſt both houſes of parliament: for then who ſhould be maſter of the parliament's freedom and reſolutions? and who ſhould be maſters of the birth-rights of the whole kingdom, when there ſhould be no army on foot?

"That the army diſcerning how intimate ſome of the new militia were with ſome of the eleven accuſed members, and how forward they were to comply and act with them in their endeavours to raiſe a new war, found it neceſſary to deſire, That the militia might be put into the hands wherein it was formerly, that the army being ſecured by that means from danger, might with the more confidence retire further from the city. Which, according to their deſire, being reſtored again into the hands of the old commiſſioners, ſeveral petitions were preſented to the common-council of the city of London, in the name of the apprentices and others, importing their deſires, that the militia of the city might continue in the hands of the former commiſſioners, according to the ordinance of the 4th of May laſt; whereupon the common-council of the city preſents their petitions to both houſes for changing the militia, wherein the houſe of lords refuſe to alter their reſolutions; the houſe of commons anſwered, they would take it into conſideration the next morning; notwithſtanding which, the city and kingdom could not be ignorant, with what rage and inſolency the tumult of apprentices the ſame day forced both houſes; they blocked up their doors, threatening them, if they granted not their deſires; and in this outrageous manner continued at the houſe eight hours together; after which, the houſe riſing, the ſpeaker, and many members going out, they forced them back again into the houſe. And during the time of that violence, Weſtminſter-hall, and the Palace-yard was filled with reformado's, and other ill-affected perſons deſigned to back them. After that, the houſes being adjourned, the apprentices printed and poſted a paper in ſeveral places of the city, requiring all their fellows to be early at the parliament the next morning, for that they intended to adjourn by ſeven of the clock, and that for a month. Thus the ſpeakers, with many of the members, were driven away from the parliament. All men therefore might judge of the juſtneſs of the cauſe the army had engaged themſelves in. And if after ſo much blood and treaſure ſpent, all that they were to hope for, and reſt in, was only what the king had granted in his meſſage of the 12th of May laſt, what muſt become of the kingdom? &c. [q].

"Laſtly, the army declared, that they would ſtand by all ſuch members of either houſe of parliament, as were forced to abſent themſelves from Weſtminſter, and uſe their utmoſt and ſpeedy endeavours, that they might with freedom and ſecurity ſit there again. They likewiſe declared againſt the choice of a new ſpeaker, and againſt all orders, votes, or reſolutions forced from the houſe on the 26th of July laſt, and ſuch as ſhould be paſſed till thoſe members were reſtored again: that they thought themſelves bound to bring to condign puniſhment the authors and fomentors of the violence done to the parliament, and expected that the people of London would deliver up to them the eleven members impeached. But if any in the city ſhould engage themſelves to protect thoſe members, and ſo put the kingdom again into a war, the blood muſt be laid to the account of ſuch perſons.

"And whereas ſome had poſſeſſed the minds of men, that they gaped only after the plunder of the great and wealthy city of London; they declared from their hearts, that they abhorred the thought thereof: but as they were informed, that the city of Weſtminſter, and the borough of Southwark, were brought into a hard condition, by claiming a right not to be ſubjected to a militia, without their own conſent, they promiſed to aſſiſt them for the obtaining of their juſt deſires and immunities.

"That when theſe things were duly ſettled, they ſhould be as ready to aſſure unto the king his juſt rights and authority, as any that pretended it never ſo much."

The next day, the army being drawn together on Hounſlow-heath [r], the common-council of London began to fear the danger to which the city would be expoſed, if the army ſhould force the lines, which was but too likely, and this apprehenſion cauſe them to take more moderate reſolutions [s]. So taking occaſion from the army's late declartions, they writ to the general, that underſtanding, by the declaration, that the army's intention was only to reſtore the abſent members to their places in the parliament, the city was ready to concur with them in their deſign. That accordingly, he ſhould find all ports and paſſages open, and for removing all miſunderſtanding, they had recalled their late declaration. The general anſwered, That he wiſhed all the forts on the weſt ſide of the city were delivered to him, and he was immediately obeyed. After that, he writ to the common-council, that the preſerving of the privileges of the parliament, and ſecuring the members from violence, had been the ſole cauſe of his near approach to their city.

The 6th of Auguſt, the general, preceded by ſome regiments of horſe, and attended by the two old ſpeakers, and the members who had abſented themſelves, came to Weſtminſter, and alighted at ſir Abraham William's houſe in New-palace-yard. He ſtaid there ſome time, whilſt the two ſpeakers [t], and the reſt of the members repaired to their reſpective houſes.

Preſently after, the houſe of peers paſſed an ordinance for making general Fairfax conſtable of the Tower, with power to name a deputy, to which the commons conſented. After that, the general was deſired to come to the parliament, where he received the thanks of both houſes. The ſame day, the parliament ordered, that the 12th ſhould be a day of thankſgiving to God. for reſtoring the members of both houſes to their juſt privileges, "without the effuſion of blood," and that a gratuity of a month's pay ſhould be given to the non-commiſſioned officers and ſoldiers for this great ſervice. The following days were ſpent in approving and ratifying what the army had done. But this was not all. The lords demanded two things, which the commons very much oppoſed. The firſt was, the making null all acts, done from the 26th of July to the 6th of Auguſt. The commons were ready to give their conſent, provided it was without declaring them illegal. This diſpute held till the 20th, when the commons paſſed at length the ordinance demanded by the peers, but with this reſtriction: "That no perſon ſhall be impeached or puniſhed, for his acting by, or upon, the ſaid votes, orders, or ordinances, unleſs he ſhall be found guilty of contriving or abetting the viſible force put upon the parliament, or of entering into, or promoting the late [q] This entirely deſtroys the reaſon of the members abſenting themſelves, alleged by the lord Clarendon. Rapin.

[r] At this rendezvous were preſent the earls of Northumberland, Saliſbury, Kent; the lords Grey of Werk, Howard, Wharton, Say and Mulgrave, and others; about fourteen lords; the ſpeaker, and about a hundred members of the houſe of commons. The army, conſiſting of twenty thouſand horſe and foot, being drawn up in battalia with reſerves, the general, accompanied with theſe lords and commoners, and other gentlemen, rode along, and took a view of the army, from regiment to regiment, who received them with great acclamations of the ſoldiers, crying, lords and commons, and a free parliament. The prince elector Palatine came alſo and viewed the army, being received by the general with great reſpect. Whitelock, p. 263. Ruſhworth, tom. VII. p. 750.

[s] When a ſcout came in, whilſt the city militia and common-council were ſitting and brought news, That the army made a halt, or other good intelligence, they cried, One and all. But if the ſcouts brought intelligence that the army advanced nearer to them, then they would cry as loud, Treat, treat, treat. At laſt, they agreed to ſend the general an humble letter. engagement, for the bringing the king to the city, upon the terms and conditions expreſſed in his majeſty's letters of the 12th of May laſt."

The ſecond thing deſired by the lords was, that it ſhould be declared, the parliament was not free from the 26th of July, to the 6th of Auguſt, and that the members who aſſembled at Weſtminſter, in the abſence of the ſpeakers, ſhould be expelled the parliament and puniſhed. This queſtion being debated a whole day in the houſe of commons, was carried in the negative, but by three voices [u]. The lords inſiſted upon this point merely out of compliance to the army, who, by a remonſtrance to the parliament, had demanded the ſame thing, declaring, they could not ſuffer ſuch members as ſate and voted during the abſence of the ſpeakers, to intrude themſelves into the parliament before they had given ſatisfaction to their reſpective houſes. Nevertheleſs, this affair was carried no farther. Only ſeven lords [w], with the lord-mayor, ſeveral aldermen, and ſome officers of the militia were accuſed of high-treaſon for being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July, which was called an intention to excite a new war.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed between the parliament and army, the king was not only very quiet, but even entertained great hopes from this diviſion, and flattered himſelf, that the army would declare for him. Their civility and complaiſance to him ſeemed to promiſe him a happier ſtate, than when in the hands of the parliament. Three of his chaplains [x] were allowed to come to him, and celebrate divine ſervice, after the manner of the church of England, and all his old ſervants and domeſtics had liberty to ſee and and ſpeak with him. Berkley, Aſhburnham, Capel, the marquis of Ormond himſelf, who had at laſt ſurrendered Dublin to the parliament, ſaw him as often as they pleaſed in public or private, and the two firſt were now in his ſervice. The Scotch commiſſioners reſiding at London, frequently viſited him, and expreſſed a great deſire to ſerve him. As they knew, that the independents were ſworn enemies of their nation, they began to perceive, it was their intereſt to join with the king againſt their common enemies. Mean while, the civilities ſhewn the king were but the effect of the policy of Cromwell and his aſſociates [y]. They were not ignorant how the parliament and city of London ſtood affected to them, and were perſuaded, that after all, the preſbyterians would chuſe rather to agree with the king, than ſee the independents triumph. To prevent this union it was, that they had cauſed the king to be removed from Holmby, without either the general-officers, or the body of the army appearing in it, to a place where his perſon was in their power. On the other hand, the king was extremely careſſed by them, and even put in hopes of a ſpeedy agreement with the army, as well to divert him from the thoughts of uniting with the parliament, as to deprive the preſbyterians of the hope of ſuch an union. In every declaration and remonſtrance of the army, there was always ſomething inſerted to expreſs their deſire, that the king might be reſtored to his juſt rights. But it was ever with this reſtriction, "When the affairs of the government ſhould be fully ſettled," that is, in the manner they deſired, and they knew it would then be eaſy to find occaſion to quarrel with the king, and retract what they ſeemed to promiſe him.

The king was deceived by this policy. As he ſaw himſelf courted by both parties, he imagined, they could not be without him, and that he ſhould quickly be able to incline the ſcale to which ſide he pleaſed. Nay, he fancied for ſome time, that the two parties would accept him for mediator. In this imagination he expreſſed a regard for both, and told them by turns, though very ſecretly, he would be guided by their counſels. Mean while, as he mortally hated the preſbyterians, he was much more deſirous to join with the army, if they would but have granted him tolerable conditions, as they made him expect. Nevertheleſs, he liſtned to the propoſals of the Scotch commiſſioners, to put himſelf under the protection of the preſbyterians and Scots, and thereby hoped to be ſafe, however the conteſts between the parliament and army might end. In the mean time, he ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed by Cromwell and Ireton, who on pretence they were ſuſpected by both houſes, ſeldom viſited him, but however, acquainted him with their intentions, by means of ſome officers, who could converſe more freely with him or his confidents. Though he was uſed very civilly, he was narrowly watched, and at the very time he thought himſelf arbiter of the two parties, was really a priſoner. Since his removal from Holmby, he had followed the motions of the army, and reſided ſometimes in a town, and ſometimes at a country houſe. According as the army thought fit. At laſt, when the army had their rendezvous on Hounſlow-heath, in order to march to London, he was conducted to Hampton-court [z].

The revolution, which happened within a few days, and which brought the parliament in ſubjection to the army, proved fatal to the king. He had quickly cauſe to perceive, Cromwell and Ireton had only amuſed him with vain hopes. The army was no ſooner maſter of the parliament and city, but the king ſaw himſelf not only neglected, but even treated more hardly than ever. The ſame reſpect was no longer paid him, and his guards would ſcarce ſuffer his ſervants to confer with him in private. In ſhort, he was left a long while at Hampton-court, without mention of any accommodation, whilſt his words, his actions, and the perſons that came to viſit him, were carefully watched. Nay, the Scotch commiſſioners were hindered from ſeeing him, of which they complained to no purpoſe. But before I proceed to ſpeak of the king and his circumſtances it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed in the army and parliament, whilſt the king was left at Hampton-court almoſt forgotten, though he ſerved ſometimes for pretence to ſeveral papers.

When the army reſolved to oppoſe the parliament's deſign to diſband them, they pretended, they would meddle only in their own affairs, without concerning themſelves with the government of church or ſtate. The demand of arrears was at firſt the only point whereon they founded their refuſal of being caſhiered. After that, finding it was not impoſſible to give them ſatisfaction upon that article, they demanded reparation for their honour, and a full vindication from the pretended crimes, on which the parliament had grounded their declaration againſt the authors of the firſt petition. Then they required, that the parliament ſhould ſolemnly declare, it was the privilege of the ſubject, and of the army in particular, to preſent petitions. After which they formed the councils of war, and agitators, who not content with deſiring things relating to the army, inſerted in their remonſtrances, ſundry articles concerning the government. Laſtly, the king was removed from Holmby by the authority, as it was pretended, of the army, though the general affirmed, that neither himſelf, nor the other general-officers, nor the body of the army, were privy to it; and by this ſame authority, how chimerical ſoever it appeared, was the king kept in the quarters of the army.

As ſoon as the army had the king in their power, they pretended to a right of ſettling the government of the kingdom with the parliament. They nominated commiſſioners to treat upon that ſubject, with thoſe of the parliament. In ſhort, juſt as they were preparing to march to London, the general delivered to the parliament's commiſſioners, propoſitions from the army, to ſettle the government, of which, not ſo much as one related to the particular concerns of the army. The propoſitions were theſe:

Articles propoſed by the army, to be treated on by the parliament's commiſſioners.

" XV. For the matter of compoſition, &c.

N. B. There are under this head ſix articles, which cannot be well underſtood, without knowing the particulars of an act wherein delinquents were placed under ſeveral heads or qualifications, and their compoſition ſettled accordingly. But the knowledge of that can be of no uſe at preſent.

" XVI. That there may be a general act of oblivion, &c.

" That ſuch of the king's party who ſhall appear to have expreſſed, or ſhall hereafter expreſs their good affections to the peace and welfare of the kingdom, and to hinder the embroiling of the ſame in a new war, may be freed and exempted from compoſitions, or to pay but one year's revenue, or a twentieth part.

" Next to the propoſals aforeſaid for the preſent ſettling of of a peace, the army desires, that no time may be lost by the parliament for dispatch of other things tending to the welfare, ease, and just satisfaction of the kingdom, and in special manner:

"I. That the liberty of the people to represent their grievances and desires by way of petition may be cleared and vindicated.

"II. That the common grievances of the people may be speedily considered of, and effectually redressed; and in particular,

"1. That the excise may be taken off from such commodities, whereon the poor people of the land do ordinarily live.

"2. That the oppressions and encroachments of forest-laws may be prevented for the future.

"3. All monopolies and restraints to the freedom of trade to be taken off.

"4. That a course may be taken to rectify the inequality of rates lying upon several counties.

"5. The present, unequal, troublesome, and contentious way of ministers maintenance by tithes to be considered of, and some remedy applied.

"6. That the rules and course of law, and the officers of it may be so reduced and reformed, as that all suits and questions of right may be more clear and certain in the issues, and not so tedious nor chargeable in the proceedings as now.

"7. That prisoners for debt may not, by embracing imprisonment, or any other ways, have advantage to defraud their creditors: and that such prisoners for debt, who have not wherewith to pay, may be freed from imprisonment.

"8. That none may be compelled to answer unto questions tending to the accusing of themselves, or their nearest relations in criminal causes; and no man's life to be taken away under two witnesses.

"9. That consideration may be had of all statutes, and the laws or customs of corporations, imposing any oaths so far as they may extend to the molestation or ensnaring of religious and peaceable people, merely for non-conformity in religion.

"III. That the large power given to committees or deputy-lieutenants, during the late times of war and distraction, may speedy be recalled and made void, and such powers of that nature as shall appear necessary to be continued, may be put into a regulated way, and left to as little arbitrarines as the nature and necessity of things will bear.

"IV. That the kingdom may be righted, and satisfied in point of accounts for the vast sums that have been levied.

"V. That provision may be made for payment of arrears to the army, and the rest of the soldiers of the kingdom: and in the next place for payment of the public debts and damages of the kingdom; and that to be performed, first, to such persons whose debts or damages are great, and their estates small, so as they are thereby reduced to a difficulty of subsistence: in order to all which (continue they) we shall speedily offer some further particulars, which we hope will be of good use towards public satisfaction."

These proposals shew, the army did not mean to leave to the parliament, the sole power of settling the government, though when they were delivered to the commissioners, they had not yet subjected the parliament and city, as they did some days after. How much more therefore should they think themselves intitled to have a share in this settlement, after they had both houses at command? Certainly, if the army, had really desired, that the government should be settled, according to their proposals, there could not be a fairer opportunity, and the parliament would neither have been able nor have dared to oppose it. But, on the contrary, it is very likely, the army's design, in delivering these proposals, was only to retard the settlement by raising difficulties, which would require time to be removed. For instance, the XIth article, which supposed the restoring of the bishops, and the XIIIth, which left every one free to take or not to take the covenant, were directly contrary to the pretensions of the presbyterians. It was not for the interest of the independents that the government should be settled in the manner they proposed: but it was for their advantage to dazzle the people, and make them believe, the army desired only the peace and safety of the public, though in effect nothing was farther from the thoughts of the leaders and managers. This evidently appears, in that afterwards they never troubled themselves to press the two houses to proceed to this settlement. On the other hand, the parliament was yet the same it had been for some time, that is, almost wholly presbyterian, and consequently enemy of the independents though obliged to shew the contrary. The earl of Manchester, speaker of the house of lords, was Cromwell's sworn enemy, though he had been the first to apply to the army for protection. The city of London was in the same disposition as the parliament, and, far from soliciting the settlement proposed by the army, they were very glad it should never be mentioned, in expectation that time would afford some opportunity to settle the government without the intervention of the soldiery. It is therefore no wonder, this affair should be neglected, when neither army, nor parliament, nor city, wished to see it accomplished. Some steps however were now and then taken to make the public believe it was intended. But Cromwell and the other heads of the independents were very far from being willing to leave it to the parliament for ten years, to manage the affairs of the kingdom as they pleased, to order the militia by sea and land, and raise what money they should think necessary. Much less would they have cared to let the people chuse every two years new representatives. All these things were only to throw dust in the people's eyes. The independents had a mind to be superior, as they were at length, and all their proceedings, though covered with the pretence of the public good, tended solely to that end. The design of the presbyterians, parliament, and city of London, was to ruin the independent-party, and the army their supporters. But as they were not sufficiently strong to effect it, their project was to join with the king and Scotland, provided they could prevail with his majesty to abolish episcopacy. This is what was secretly contriving at London and Edinburgh, whilst endeavours were used to amuse the army by affected delays on their demand of pay and arrears, whilst the city of London declined to make the necessary advances, in order to render the army odious, by obliging them to oppress the people for want of pay. The army was yet ignorant of the secret practices against them in London. They incessantly demanded their pay, and the parliament favourably received their demands. Nay, they passed votes to grant them their desires; but some difficulty always occurred to retard the performance, or if they were paid any money, it was but a small part of their arrears.

Three other affairs also employed the parliament and army for some time, and served for pretence to amuse. The first was, to settle what forces should be sent to Ireland; the second, how many troops were to be maintained in England; the third, to disband the supernumeraries.

Upon the first article, it was resolved to send into Ireland six thousand foot, four thousand horse, and five hundred dragoons; and that the parliament's commissioners should confer with the general concerning the sending these forces, and the officers that were to command them.

Upon the second, it was ordered, there should be maintained in England seven thousand two hundred horse, eighteen thousand foot, and one thousand dragoons. It was pretended, these forces were continued in England to relieve those in Ireland in case of need. But it is likely, the army would not bear to be considerably lessened.

Upon the third, it was resolved that all the supernumeraries should be paid and dismissed.

But these things were executed very slowly by reason of several unexpected affairs, of which it will be necessary to speak.

Since the army had thought themselves out of danger from the parliament and city, their respect to the king was so diminished, that it was easy for him to perceive, he had nothing to expect from them, and that Cromwell had only amused him, the better to accomplish his own designs. Besides the visible alteration in the behaviour of those who had the custody of him, he had many other proofs of ill designs against him. In the first place, the army had sent him privately some propositions for peace, much worse than those presented to him at Newcastle; but he had rejected them with indignation [a], which the army very much resented. Secondly, Cromwell had very sharply reproached Ashburnham, who was then the king's confident, that notwithstanding the army's regard for his majesty, he had secretly treated with the commissioners of Scotland to excite that kingdom against the army. This reproach inspired the king with the more dread, as it was true that he had privately treated with the Scotch commissioners, though he had concluded nothing with them, and could not conceive how Cromwell came to know it. He was therefore apprehenſive, the army would aſſaſſinate, or poiſon him, to free themſelves from the fear of his agreeing with the preſbyterians. On the other hand, major Huntington, who had been employed by Cromwell to amuſe the king with ſeveral private meſſages, finding at length he had been the inſtrument to deceive that unfortunate prince, warned him, that Cromwell was not ſincere, and would deſtroy him if he was not prevented. Shortly after he threw up his commiſſion, and would ſerve no longer in the army. Nay, he went farther; for after quitting the ſervice, he offered to diſcover to the parliament, Cromwell's ill practices, but they would not hearken to him [b]. At laſt, the king received private notice every day, by indirect and extraordinary ways, that his enemies had ill deſigns, and he ought to take care of himſelf [c].

All theſe things made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that he reſolved if poſſible, to eſcape out of the hands of the army. But it was not eaſy to determine where to retire. There was no ſafety for him in any part of the kingdom. The parliament and city of London were at the army's command, and though the preſbyterians had been able to protect him, all he could expect from them was, that they would not attempt upon his life. So, probably, his intention was to tranſport himſelf beyond the ſeas [d]. Aſhburnham was his only confident, for though he believed Berkley faithful, he had not ſo good an opinion of his diſcretion, as to truſt him with ſuch a ſecret. This reſolution being taken, the king withdrew very early to his chamber, feigning to be indiſpoſed, and, about one in the morning, went out by the back-ſtairs, and came with Aſhburnham and Legg to the garden gate, where Berkley waited with horſes [e]. They rid all night with great ſpeed, as well to eſcape all purſuers, as to get out of the quarters of the army, and in the morning, found themſelves in the New Foreſt in Hampſhire. Then the king aſked Aſhburnham, where the ſhip lay? Aſhburnham riding before, as it were to get information, returned in ſome little time without any news of the ſhip; at which the king ſeemed very uneaſy. Mean while, as it was not ſafe for him to ſtay in the high-ways, he reſolved to go to Titchfield, a ſeat of the earl of Southampton, where the earl's mother then lived with a ſmall family. There he conſulted with his three attendants, where he ſhould go. It is ſaid, Aſhburnham was the firſt to adviſe him to retire to the iſle of Wight, and put himſelf into the hands of colonel Hammond the governor, who was reckoned a man of honour. He muſt however have known, that Hammond was Cromwell's creature, by whoſe advice he had married a daughter of John Hampden, and who had lately procured him the government of the iſle of Wight. Notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, which ſhould have diverted Aſhburnham from giving ſuch advice, he ceaſed not to perſuade the king, who after ſome objections conſented to it, provided Hammond would faithfully promiſe not to deliver him up, though the parliament or army ſhould require him, but to give him his liberty to ſhift for himſelf, if he was not able to defend him. Purſuant to this reſolution, Aſhburnham and Berkley repaired to the iſle of Wight, to talk with the governor, who ſeemed very much ſurpriſed [f] when they told him, the king was eſcaped from Hampton-court, and was willing to truſt his perſon in his hands, upon the fore-mentioned terms. His anſwer was, he would do the king all the ſervice that lay in his power; but as he was an inferior officer, he could not promiſe to diſobey his ſuperiors in what they ſhould pleaſe to command him. After ſome fruitleſs endeavours to obtain a promiſe from him, he aſked where the king was? They told him, he was not very far off, and at laſt, after ſome time ſpent in debate, it was agreed, he ſhould go with them to the king. So they all three went together to Titchfield, and, at their arrival, Hammond ſtayed below, and Aſhburnham went up to the king's chamber, to acquaint him that Hammond was in the houſe, but had not made any promiſe. Whereupon the king cried out, "O Jack, thou haſt undone me!" With which Aſhburnham falling into a great paſſion of weeping, offered to go down and kill Hammond, but the king would not conſent to it. In ſhort, the king ſending for Hammond, endeavoured to perſuade him to promiſe not to deliver him up, but Hammond ſtill perſiſted in his firſt anſwer. Then the king, not knowing where to go elſe, and conſidering there was now perhaps no poſſible way to get from him, as he had the command of the country, and could call in what help he pleaſed, reſolved to go with him to the iſle of Wight. He was conducted to Cariſbrook-caſtle, where Hammond received him with his attendants, with all demonſtrations of reſpect [g].

When a man conſiders all the circumſtances of the king's flight, he can ſcarce forbear thinking, he was betrayed on this occaſion. His deſign was to go beyond ſea, ſince he aſked where the ſhip lay, but there was no ſhip ready; which was ſo great an overſight, that Aſhburnham can hardly be thought to commit it through negligence or imprudence. Aſhburnham is not ſatisfied with propoſing to the king to truſt himſelf with Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, who, according to major Huntington's information, had reſolved to deſtroy him, but even puts him under the neceſſity of confiding in him, though he refuſed to promiſe him protection. And yet, the lord Clarendon ſays very poſitively, he does not believe the king was betrayed by Aſhburnham, nor did his majeſty ever entertain the leaſt jealouſy of it. All therefore that can be ſaid in favour of this confident of the king, is what the lord Clarendon hints, I mean, that he was outwitted by Cromwell, who by ſome one of his emiſſaries perſuaded him, it ſhould prove for his majeſty's benefit, and his buſineſs be the ſooner done, that he ſhould withdraw to the iſle of Wight. If this were ſo, Aſhburnham, probably, thinking himſelf more able than the king, had a mind to ſerve him, whether he would or no, and not to be forced to anſwer the king's objections, believed to do him a ſervice in concealing the ſecret, and putting him under an abſolute neceſſity to take a courſe, which, in his opinion, was not the moſt proper. In that caſe, if it be not treachery, it is at leaſt the greateſt preſumption and raſhneſs a ſubject can poſſibly be guilty of to his prince. It is not eaſy to gueſs the reaſons that could induce Aſhburnham to imagine the king would be ſafe in the iſle of Wight. It is to be preſumed, he was deceived himſelf, and his eaſineſs abuſed, to cauſe him to credit general promiſes, which ſignified nothing, and of which he durſt not afterwards complain. Suppoſing no treachery in what he did, probably, his eaſineſs to be deceived, procured him afterwards a very favourable and much lower than uſual compoſition, which greatly contributed to increaſe the ſuſpicions already conceived of him.

The parliament was informed of the king's eſcape by a letter from Cromwell, who gave the firſt notice of it, but without ſaying where the king was, though in all appearance he knew very well. He alſo ſent a letter, which the king had left upon the table in his room, directed to both houſes. He ſaid in this letter,

"That liberty being in all times the aim and deſire of all men, he had endeavoured to obtain his. He called God to witneſs, with what patience he had endured a tedious reſtraint, among men who changed their principles with their condition; who were not aſhamed openly to intend the deſtruction of the nobility, by taking away their negative voice, and with whom the levellers doctrine was rather countenanced than puniſhed: That he thought he was bound, as well by natural as political obligation, to ſeek his ſafety, by retiring himſelf for ſome time from the public view, both of his friends and enemies; but ſhould earneſtly and unceſſantly endeavour the ſettling of a ſafe and well-grounded peace wherever he was. Finally, he deſired to be heard with freedom, honour, and ſafety, and then he would inſtantly break through his cloud of retirement, and ſhew himſelf ready to be pater patriæ."

The parliament at firſt believed, the king was come to conceal himſelf in London, till he ſhould find an opportunity to eſcape out of the kingdom. They even gave orders to ſearch after, and ſtop his perſon. But this uncertainty did not laſt long. On the 15th of November, the earl of Manchester, ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, received a letter from colonel Hammond, informing him, that the king, from an apprehenſion of his life being in danger at Hampton-court, was come into the iſle of Wight, to put himſelf under his protection.

The king, as may be obſerved, ſpeaks in his letter of the principles of the levellers, which I think incumbent upon me to explain. There had been for ſome time a new faction in the army, called "levellers," that is, men who declared, That all degrees of perſons ſhould be levelled, and an equality eſtabliſhed both in titles and eſtates, throughout the kingdom[h]." This was a doctrine, much like that of Wat Tyler's followers in the reign of Richard II. This faction was grown ſo ſtrong, that they began to make the general officers, and particularly Cromwell, very uneaſy, who feared the new party would ſubvert all his projects, if they were ſuffered to increaſe, though probably this ſpirit was raiſed by himſelf. They conſiſted of private ſoldiers and agitators, whom I have already deſcribed. During the conteſts between the army and parliament, the generals had put no reſtraint upon theſe men. They had allowed them to form a ſeparate council, by means of their agitators, and the opinions of this council were received as being thoſe of the army, becauſe they were agreeable to the ſentiments of the general officers. But as ſoon as the parliament was ſubdued, the general officers believed it proper to ſuppreſs theſe councils, and ſend the agitators to their reſpective regiments. This was more eaſily enjoined than executed. The ſoldiers refuſed to obey, and continued their aſſemblies and conferences, in ſpite of their officers, and the general's orders. Hence, probably, they acquired the name of levellers, becauſe they pretended to have as much right as the officers and generals to ſettle the government; a principle tending to level all ranks and degrees, and conſequently to breed confuſion in the kingdom. The aſſemblies of the levellers produced ſundry petitions; firſt, from the agitators of four regiments of horſe, and afterwards of ſeven regiments of foot joining with them, wherein they made propoſals for ſettling the government according to their humour, ſo that the general officers were not a little embarraſſed. They were afraid the army would divide, at a time when their whole ſtrength depended upon their union. For this reaſon, they at firſt bore in ſome meaſure with the levellers; which only increaſed the evil. At laſt, the inſolence of theſe men being grown to a monſtrous height, Cromwell undertook with the hazard of his life, to free the army and parliament from them. To that end, having notice that the levellers were to meet at a certain place, he came unexpectedly, attended with a choſen guard, and aſking ſome queſtions of thoſe whom he obſerved moſt active, and receiving inſolent anſwers, knocked down two or three with his own hand, and, briſkly charging the reſt, ſo diſperſed them, that he took as many as he pleaſed, whereof he hanged ſome on the ſpot, and ſent others to London. By two or three ſuch notable encounters, he totally ſubdued that party, which began to grow very dangerous, and reduced the army to entire obedience. But this was not yet effected, when the king made his eſcape from Hampton-court, and therefore he mentions the levellers in his letter, as a party ſubſiſting[i].

When the king writ this letter to both houſes, he hoped to be quickly out of the power of the army and parliament, and aſſuredly expected no anſwer, ſince he intended to keep himſelf concealed. Beſides, this letter required no anſwer, as he did nothing more than expreſs his deſire of peace. But finding himſelf ſtill, contrary to his expectation, in the hands of the army and parliament, he conceived his eſcape from Hampton-conrt might be prejudicial to him, and interpreted as a deſign to hide himſelf, only to avoid anſwering the propoſitions for peace, which the parliament had prepared. For this reaſon, he reſolved to ſend the following meſſage to both houſes.

CHARLES REX,

"HIS majeſty is confident, that before this time, his two houſes of parliament have received the meſſage which he left behind him at Hampton-court, the eleventh of this month, by which they will have underſtood the reaſons which enforced him to go from thence; as likewiſe his conſtant endeavours for the ſettling of a ſafe and well-grounded peace, whereſoever he ſhould be; and being now in a place where he conceives himſelf to be at much more freedom and ſecurity than formerly, he thinks it neceſſary, not only for making good his own profeſſions, but alſo for the ſpeedy procuring of a peace, in theſe languiſhing and diſtreſſed kingdoms, at this time to offer ſuch grounds to his two houſes for that effect, which upon due examination of all intereſt, may beſt conduce thereunto.

"And becauſe religion is the beſt and chiefeſt foundation of peace, his majeſty will begin with that particular.

"That for the aboliſhing of archbiſhops, biſhops, &c. his majeſty clearly profeſſeth, that he cannot give his conſent thereunto, both in relation as he is a chriſtian and a king; for the firſt he avows, that he is ſatisfied in his judgment, that this order was placed in the church by the apoſtles themſelves, and ever ſince their time hath continued in all chriſtian churches throughout the world, until this laſt century of years; and in this church, in all times of change and reformation, it hath been upheld by the wiſdom of his anceſtors, as the great preſerver of doctrine, diſcipline, and order, in the ſervice of God. As a king at his coronation, he hath not only taken a ſolemn oath to maintain this order, but his majeſty and his predeceſſors, in their confirmations of the great charter, have inſeparably woven the right of the church, into the liberty of the ſubjects; and yet he is willing it be provided, that the particular biſhops perform the ſeveral duties of their callings, both by their perſonal reſidence, and frequent preaching in their perſonal exerciſe, no act of juriſdiction or ordination, without the conſent of their preſbyters, and will conſent, that their powers, in all things, be ſo limited, that they be not grievous to the tender conſciences of others. He ſees no reaſon why he alone, and thoſe of his judgment, ſhould be preſſed to a violation of theirs: nor can his majeſty conſent to the alienation of church-lands; becauſe it cannot be denied to be a ſin of the higheſt ſacrilege; as alſo that it ſubverts the intentions of ſo many pious donors, who have laid a heavy curſe upon all ſuch prophane violations, which his majeſty is very unwilling to undergo: and beſides the matter of conſequence, his majeſty believes it to be a prejudice to the public good, many of his ſubjects having the benefit of renewing leaſes, at much eaſier rates, than if thoſe poſſeſſions were in the hands of private men, not omitting the diſcouragement it will be to all learning and induſtry, when ſuch eminent rewards ſhall be taken away; which now lie open to the children of the meaneſt perſons. Yet his majeſty conſidering the great preſent diſtempers, concerning church diſcipline, and that the preſbyterian government is now in practice, his majeſty, to eſchew confuſion as much as may be, and for the ſatisfaction of his two houſes, is content, that the ſaid government be legally permitted to ſtand in the ſame condition it now is, for three years; provided that his majeſty, and thoſe of his judgment, or any other, who cannot in conſcience ſubmit thereunto, be not obliged to comply with the preſbyterian government, but have free practice of our own profeſſion, without receiving any prejudice thereby; and that free conſultation and debate be had with the divines of Weſtminſter, twenty of his majeſty's nomination being added unto them; whereby it may be determined by his majeſty and the two houſes, how the church government, after the ſaid time ſhall be ſettled, or ſooner, if differences may be agreed, as is moſt agreeable to the word of God, with full liberty to all thoſe who ſhall differ upon conſcientious grounds from that ſettlement; always provided, that nothing aforeſaid be underſtood to tolerate thoſe of the popiſh profeſſion, nor exempt any popiſh recuſants from the penalties of the laws; or to tolerate the public profeſſion of atheiſm or blaſphemy, contrary to the doctrine of the apoſtles, Nicene, and Athanaſian Creed, they having been received by, and had in reverence of all the chriſtian churches, and more particularly by this of England, ever ſince the reformation.

"Next, the militia being that right which is inſeparably and undoubtedly inherent to the crown by the laws of this nation, and that which former parliaments, as likewiſe this have acknowledged ſo to be, his majeſty cannot ſo much wrong that truſt, which the laws of God, and this land hath annexed to the crown, for the protection and ſecurity of his people, as to diveſt himſelf and ſucceſſors of the power of the ſword; yet to give an infallible evidence of his deſire to ſecure the performance of ſuch agreements as ſhall be made in order to a peace, his majeſty will conſent to an act of parliament, that the whole power of the militia, both by ſea and land, for, and during his whole reign, ſhall be ordered and diſpoſed by the two houſes of parliament, or by ſuch perſons as they ſhall appoint, with powers limited for ſuppreſſing of forces within this kingdom, to the diſturbance of the public peace, and againſt foreign invaſion; and that they ſhall have power, during his ſaid reign, to raiſe monies for the purpoſe aforeſaid; and that neither his majeſty that now is, or any other, by any authority, derived only from him, ſhall execute any of the ſaid powers, during his majeſty's ſaid reign, but ſuch as ſhall act by the conſent and approbation of the two houſes of parliament: nevertheleſs his majeſty intends, that all patents, commiſſions, and other acts concerning the militia, be made and acted as formerly; and that after his majeſty's reign, all the power of the militia ſhall return entirely to the crown, as was in the times of queen Elizabeth and king James of bleſſed memory.

"After this head of the militia, the conſideration of the arrears due to the army is not improper to follow; for the payment whereof, and the eaſe of his people, his majeſty is willing to concur in any thing that can be done without the violation of his conſcience and honour.

"Wherefore if his two houſes ſhall conſent to remit unto him ſuch benefit out of ſequeſtrations from Michaelmas laſt, and out of compoſitions that ſhall be made before the concluding of the peace, and the arrears of ſuch as have been already made, the aſſiſtance of the clergy, and the arrears of ſuch rents of his own revenue as his two houſes ſhall not have received before the concluding of the peace, his majeſty will undertake within the ſpace of eighteen months, the payment of four hundred thouſand pounds for the ſatisfaction of the army; and if thoſe means ſhall not be ſufficient, his majeſty intends to give way for the ſale of foreſt-lands for that purpoſe.

"This being the public debt, which in his majeſty's judgment is firſt to be ſatisfied; and for other public debts already contracted upon church-lands, or any other engagements, his majeſty will give his conſent to ſuch act or acts for raiſing of monies for payment thereof, as both houſes hereafter ſhall agree upon, ſo as they be equally laid; whereby his people, already too heavily burthened by theſe late diſtempers, may have no more preſſures upon them than this abſolute neceſſity requires.

"And for the further ſecuring all fears, his majeſty will conſent, that an act of parliament be paſſed for the diſpoſing of the great offices of ſtate, and naming of privy-counſellors for the whole term of his reign, by the two houſes of parliament, their patents and commiſſions being taken from his majeſty, and after to return to the crown, as is expreſſed in the articles of the militia. For the court of wards and liveries, his majeſty very well knows the conſequence of taking that away, by turning of all tenures into common ſocage, as well in point of revenue to the crown, as in the protection of many of his ſubjects, being infants: nevertheleſs, if the continuance thereof ſeem grievous to his ſubjects, rather than he will fail on his part in giving ſatisfaction, he will conſent to an act for taking it away, ſo as a full recompence be ſettled upon his majeſty and his ſucceſſors in perpetuity [k]; and that the arrears now due be reſerved unto him towards the payment of the arrears of the army.

"And that the memory of theſe late diſtractions may be wholly wiped away, his majeſty will conſent to an act of parliament for the ſuppreſſing and making null of all oaths, declarations, and proclamations againſt both or either houſe of parliament, and of all indictments and other proceedings againſt any perſons for adhering unto them. And his majeſty propoſeth, as the beſt expedient to take away all ſeeds of future difference, that there be an act of oblivion to extend to all his ſubjects.

"As for Ireland, the ceſſation therein is long ſince determined; but for the future, and all other things being fully agreed, his majeſty will give full ſatisfaction to his houſes concerning that kingdom.

"And although his majeſty cannot conſent in honour and juſtice to void all his own grants and acts paſſed under his great-ſeal ſince the 22d of May 1642, or to the confirming of all the grants and acts paſſed under that made by the two houſes, yet his majeſty is confident, that upon the peruſal of particulars, he ſhall give ſatisfaction to his two houſes to what may be reaſonably deſired in that particular.

"And now his majeſty conceives, that by theſe his offers, which he is ready to make good upon the ſettlement of a peace, he hath clearly manifeſted his intentions to give full ſecurity and ſatisfaction to all intereſts, for what can juſtly be deſired in order to the future happineſs of his people, and for the perfecting theſe conceſſions, as alſo for ſuch other things as may be propoſed by the two houſes; and for ſuch juſt and reaſonable demands as his majeſty ſhall find neceſſary to propoſe on his part, he earneſtly deſires a perſonal treaty at London with his two houſes, in honour, freedom, and ſafety; it being in his judgment, the moſt proper, and indeed only means to a firm and ſettled peace, and impoſſible without it to reconcile former, or avoid future miſunderſtandings.

"All theſe being by treaty perfected, his majeſty believes his two houſes will think it reaſonable, that the propoſals of the army concerning the ſucceſſion of parliaments, and their due election ſhould be taken into conſideration.

"As for what concerns the kingdom of Scotland, his majeſty will very readily apply himſelf to give all reaſonable ſatisfaction; when the deſires of the two houſes of parliament on their behalf, or of the commiſſioners of that kingdom, or of both joined together, ſhall be made known unto him."

The parliament took no notice of theſe offers. Beſides that they ſaw only part of their former demands, they were always upon their guard with reſpect to the king's propoſals, wherein it was but too uſual to find ambiguous expreſſions, reſtrictions, and conditions expreſſed or implied, which made it impoſſible to build ſecurely upon ſuch foundations. We have ſeen ſeveral inſtances in the king's papers, ſince the beginning of his reign; and in this here, where he carries his offers farther than ever, it was eaſy to perceive the ſame method; for he was very artful, as well as his father, in the choice of his expreſſions. Nay, it ſeems that in offering to yield the power of the militia, during his whole reign, an expreſſion often repeated in theſe propoſals, he had ſome ſecret intention, as to reſign the crown to the prince his ſon. Otherwiſe, I do not ſee why he affected to ſubſtitute the term of his reign, inſtead of that of his life, or of twenty years, as was demanded by the parliament. At leaſt it is certain, if his offer had been accepted, as expreſſed in his words, he might, by reſigning the crown, have put the prince of Wales, by the treaty itſelf, in full poſſeſſion of the militia, and nomination to the great offices. But this is only a conjecture, though very probable. Be this as it will, the two houſes had long ſince refuſed to treat but upon their own propoſitions. Neither would they allow of his explications, ſo apprehenſive were they of his ſubtleties, which would have engaged them in diſcuſſions where they would have always had the ſame thing to fear. Such was the diſtruſt the king's character had bred, which made a reconciliation between him and the parliament ever impracticable. It muſt however be confeſſed, that on this occaſion, there were other reaſons which hindered the two houſes from regarding the king's offers. The principal was, they were under the dominion of the army, or rather the independents, who were not for peace upon any terms whatever.

During the king's ſtay at Hampton-court, the Scotch commiſſioners, as I obſerved, had treated with him, and put him in hopes that the Scots would join with his party and the Engliſh preſbyterians, to deliver him from the independents. But they required a thing which he could not reſolve, namely, the change of epiſcopal government in the church of England into preſbyterian. This ſingle point had prolonged the negotiation, and hindered the concluſion of the treaty. Cromwell had ſome intimation of it, and probably for that reaſon uſed all his induſtry to cauſe the king to retire to the iſle of Wight, where the Scotch commiſſioners could not have the ſame acceſs to him.

When the king went from Hampton-court, the propoſals the two houſes were to ſend him, were all ready. But the Scotch commiſſioners deferred from day to day to approve them, on pretence the intereſts of Scotland were not ſufficiently ſpecified, expecting to agree with the king, before they ſhould be preſented. This diſpute between the parliament and Scotch commiſſioners ſtill ſubſiſted, when ſuddenly the houſe of lords acquainted the commons at a conference, that having more maturely conſidered the king's laſt meſſage, they were of opinion to admit him to a perſonal treaty, on condition he would give his aſſent to four preliminary propoſitions to be paſſed into acts before the reſt ſhould be treated on.

1. An act for ſettling the militia of the kingdom.

2. An act for calling in all declarations, oaths, and proclamations, againſt the parliament, and thoſe who adhered to them.

3. An act, that thoſe lords who were made after the great-ſeal was carried to Oxford, may be made uncapable of ſitting in the houſe of peers.

[k] The houſe of commons conſented to allow him 20,000l. a year, as a recompence for it. Ruſhworth, tom. VII. p. 851.

4. An act for empowering the two houſes of parliament to adjourn as they ſhall think fit.

The next day [l], the commons gave their conſent to theſe propoſitions, and ordered, that the four bills ſhould be drawn, and diſpatched to his majeſty, after which a perſonal treaty with him ſhould be entered into. All this was done with ſo great expedition, that it was not poſſible for the independents to prevent what they were not prepared againſt. The Scotch commiſſioners, who had formed other projects, tried in vain to hinder the effect of this reſolution. The parliament wiſhed for peace, thereby to break the meaſures of the independents. The 6th of December, the king ſent a freſh meſſage to both houſes, earneſtly preſſing for a perſonal treaty, as being the beſt means for ſettling a peace.

The 14th of the ſame month, the commons, after paſſing the four bills, and approving the inſtructions for thoſe that were to preſent them, named a committee to carry them to the king.

Then they anſwered the complaints of the Scotch commiſſioners, that the four bills were not communicated to them. They ſaid, it was contrary to the rights and privileges of parliament, to communicate bills to any perſon whatever, before they had received the royal aſſent, and that there was nothing in the treaty between the two kingdoms to the contrary: that they deſired the Scotch commiſſioners to prepare ſuch propoſitions as they ſhould judge neceſſary for the kingdom of Scotland, that the committee might depart on the 20th.

That day, the Scotch commiſſioners preſented to both houſes a large declaration, complaining in very high language, that the parliament of England violated the covenant, in labouring for peace without the concurrence of Scotland. They inſiſted upon a perſonal treaty between the king, both houſes, and themſelves, that peace might be ſettled with mutual conſent; and declared, as they could not agree to the ſending of the four bills to his majeſty for his aſſent, before any treaty upon the reſt of the propoſitions, ſo they were unſatisfied with the matter of theſe new propoſals lately communicated to them; and deſired, that there might be a perſonal treaty with the king, upon ſuch propoſitions as ſhould be agreed upon, with advice and conſent of both kingdoms.

This declaration gave great offence to both houſes. Their reply to it was anſwerable in terms to the language uſed by the Scots; and it was ordered, that the printer of the declaration ſhould be committed to priſon.

In ſhort, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Scotch commiſſioners, the four bills were preſented to the king the 24th of December. The next day, the Scotch commiſſioners came to the iſle of Wight, and delivered to the king a declaration of their diſſent to the propoſitions they had lately ſeen, and the four bills brought to his majeſty. After that they had a conference with the king, wherein ſome things paſſed, which long remained ſecret, and which it will be neceſſary to relate, becauſe on them turned the events mentioned hereafter.

Since the king had been in the power of the army, the Scots feared, he would unite with them. They knew they were mortally hated by the independents, and conſequently, this union could not but be very prejudicial to Scotland. The army's ſucceſs againſt the parliament and city of London increaſed their fear very much, and put them upon ſeeking means to prevent, as they thought, the impending danger. They found no properer means than to join with the king, provided he could be perſuaded to approve of the covenant, and aboliſh epiſcopacy in England. In their frequent conferences with him at Hampton-court, they intimated, that when he was delivered to the parliament, it was not with the advice of all Scotland, but only by the marquis of Argyle's credit, who tyrannized over the kingdom: that all the Scots were diſpleaſed with it, and ready to atone for the fault, by aſſiſting him with all their power to recover his juſt rights. But they added, that to engage the Scots to employ their forces to this end, his majeſty was to give them ſatisfaction concerning the covenant, and the abolition of epiſcopacy in England, for, otherwiſe, he could not expect the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh preſbyterians, which was abſolutely neceſſary. In a word, they made him hope, that the Scots would enter England with a ſtrong army, which, by the junction of the king's party, and Engliſh preſbyterians, would become ſo ſuperior to the army of the independents, that he might almoſt be aſſured, nothing would be capable to oppoſe his reſtoration.

Theſe overtures were the more agreeable to the king, as the duke of Hamilton, after his freedom from impriſonment by the army, had declared to the king's friends, he was ready to do his majeſty all the ſervice that lay in his power. On the other hand, the marquis of Ormond had informed the king of his project to return into Ireland, join with the lord Inchiquin, whom he had privately gained, with ſome of the heads of the rebels, and make war upon the parliament, affirming, that France had promiſed to ſupply him with all neceſſaries. It was very probable, that the union between the king's party, the Engliſh preſbyterians, and the Scots, added to a diverſion in Ireland, would very much embarraſs the independents, and diſable them to withſtand ſo great a force. But to execute this project, the king was to approve of the covenant, and conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy, which he could never reſolve. Theſe were the two ſtumbling-blocks, which hindered him from concluding a treaty with the Scotch commiſſioners, before his flight from Hampton-court. He would never grant theſe two points, and in expectation that by his ſteadineſs he ſhould induce the Scots to deſiſt from their deſires, quitted Hampton-court, without any agreement with them. When therefore he ſo earneſtly preſſed for a perſonal treaty at London, with honour, freedom, and ſafety, it was in order to treat more commodiouſly with the Scotch commiſſioners, and conſult with his friends, what could be expected as well from his own, as the preſbyterian party; and doubtleſs, in caſe he concluded a treaty with them, his deſign was to prolong the negotiation with the two houſes, till the Scotch army had entered England, and his old and new friends laid all their meaſures [m]. It was very likely, this league would find the army ſo much employment, that they would not be able to ſubdue, a ſecond time, the parliament and city of London. Accordingly, this was the end the Scotch commiſſioners propoſed to themſelves, in their objections to the propoſitions, and in their demand of a perſonal treaty with the king, upon ſuch propoſals as ſhould be agreed upon by both kingdoms, being well aſſured, it would be eaſy for them to prolong the time, till every thing ſhould be ready.

The method the two houſes took to procure the king's conſent to the four bills, amongſt which was that of the militia, before they admitted him to a perſonal treaty, convinced him, they had no deſign to relax upon any of the principal articles. He conſidered, that after paſſing theſe four bills, he ſhould ſtill be forced to treat on propoſitions much like thoſe preſented to him at Newcaſtle: that, after all, what both houſes called treating, was, according to their ideas, conſenting to their demands, and upon the leaſt refuſal to grant what ſhould be propoſed to him, he ſhould be, perhaps, more cloſely confined, when he had paſſed one of the moſt important points in diſpute: that then, he ſhould not be able to treat with the Scots, and by paſſing the four bills, ſhould loſe the preſent opportunity, which might never offer again. Theſe conſiderations determined him to agree with the Scotch commiſſioners, at a ſecond conference with them the 25th of December. As there was no time to loſe, the parliament's commiſſioners having orders to ſtay but four days in the iſle of Wight, the Scotch commiſſioners had brought with them a treaty ready drawn, agreeable to the propoſitions they had made the king at Hampton-court. This treaty was ſigned by the king and the Scotch commiſſioners the next day, December the 26th, the king having had but few hours to reſolve. Here follows the ſubſtance of the treaty, which the lord Clarendon ſays was read but by very few, and which he repreſents as the moſt unjuſt treaty that could be impoſed upon the king. This obliges me to make remarks on ſome of the articles.

"IN the preface, the king acknowledged, that the intentions of thoſe who had entered into the covenant, were real for the preſervation of his majeſty's perſon and authority, according to their allegiance, and no ways to diminiſh his juſt power and greatneſs. He promiſed, as ſoon as he could, with freedom, honour, and ſafety, to be preſent in a free parliament, to confirm the ſaid league and covenant by act of parliament in both kingdoms, for the ſecurity of all who had taken or ſhould take it." With this proviſo however,

[l] Rapin by miſtake, ſays three days after. See Ruſhworth and Whitelock.

[m] This conjecture is confirmed by his majeſty's letter to the earl of Lanerick, dated at Cariſbrook, November 19, 1647, wherein he ſays, "That his meſſage from thence to both houſes will, he believes, have divers interpretations, and be diſliked by the Scotch commiſſioners, but the end of it was to procure a perſonal treaty. This he thought neceſſary to tell him, that he might aſſure his fellow commiſſioners, that change of place had not altered his mind, from what it was when he ſaw him laſt." Mem. of the duke of Hamilton, p. 325.

"That none who was unwilling ſhould be conſtrained to take it. (1.)

Remark (1.) If it is conſidered that the Scots joined their forces with thoſe of England, only in defence of the covenant, which had been ſolemnly ſworn to in both kingdoms, it will not be thought ſtrange, the Scotch commiſſioners ſhould require this promiſe of the king. Without this, there would have been no poſſibility to engage the Scots to employ their forces to reſtore the king to his rights, and how hard ſoever this condition might appear to him, it was abſolutely neceſſary to produce the effect which he expected from his union with Scotland.

"His majeſty engaged to confirm by act of parliament in England, preſbyterian-government; the directory for worſhip; and the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter for three years; ſo that his majeſty and his houſhold ſhould not be hindered from uſing that form of divine ſervice he had formerly practiſed (2): and that during theſe three years there ſhould be a conſultation with the aſſembly of divines, to which twenty of the king's nomination ſhould be added, and ſome from the church of Scotland; and thereupon it ſhould be determined by his majeſty, and the two houſes of parliament, what form of government ſhould be eſtabliſhed after the expiration of thoſe years, as ſhould be moſt agreeable to the word of God.

Rem. (2.) The Scotch commiſſioners were not ſo ſtupid as to imagine, the Scots with their forces alone ſhould be able to reſtore the king. They depended chiefly upon the aid of the Engliſh preſbyterians. But how was it poſſible for them to rely on their aid, if nothing were ſtipulated for them? Nay, it is aſtoniſhing they ſhould be ſatisfied with an eſtabliſhment which was to laſt but three years, conſidering how they themſelves and the Engliſh preſbyterians, whoſe aſſiſtance was abſolutely neceſſary, ſtood affected. The king himſelf did not think, doubtleſs, he was forced upon this point, ſince he had offered the ſame thing to both houſes in his meſſage of the 10th of December.

"That an effectual courſe may be taken by act of parliament, and all other ways needful or expedient, for the ſuppreſſing the opinions and practices of Anti-trinitarians, Arians, Socinians, Anti-ſcripturaliſts, Anabaptiſts, Antonomians, Arminians, Familyſts, Browniſts, Separatiſts, Independents, Libertines, and Seekers, and generally, for the ſuppreſſing of all blaſphemy, hereſy, ſchiſm, and all ſuch ſcandalous doctrines and practices, as are contrary to the light of nature, and to the principles of chriſtianity, whether concerning faith, worſhip, or converſation, or the power of godlineſs, or which may be deſtructive to order and government, or to the peace of the church and kingdom. (3.)

Rem. (3.) All theſe ſects mentioned in this article were no leſs enemies to the preſbyterians than to the church of England. Theſe three laſt articles being exactly what the king had offered in his meſſage of the 16th of November, it cannot be ſaid that he granted them through ſurpriſe or force.

"The king promiſed, that in the next ſeſſion of parliament, after the kingdom of Scotland ſhould declare for his majeſty, in purſuance of this agreement, he ſhould in perſon, or by commiſſion, confirm the league and covenant in that kingdom; and concerning all the acts paſſed in the laſt parliament of that kingdom; his majeſty declared, that he ſhould then likewiſe be content to give aſſurance by act of parliament, that neither he nor his ſucceſſors ſhould quarrel, call in queſtion, or command the contrary of any of them, nor queſtion any for giving obedience to the ſame."

After theſe articles concerning religion, there was a long recital of "The agreement the parliament of England had made, when the Scots army returned to Scotland, that the army under Fairfax ſhould be diſbanded; and of that army's ſubmitting thereunto; of their taking the king from Holmby, and keeping him priſoner till he fled from them to the Iſle of Wight; and ſince that time, both his majeſty, and the commiſſioners for the kingdom of Scotland, had very earneſtly deſired, that the king might come to London in ſafety, honour and freedom, for a perſonal treaty with the two houſes, and the commiſſioners of the parliament of Scotland, which, they ſaid, had been granted, but that the army had, in a violent manner, forced away divers members of the parliament from the diſcharge of their truſt, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the city of London, and all the ſtrengths and garriſons of the kingdom: and that by the ſtrength and influence of that army, and their adherents, propoſitions, and bills had been ſent to the king without the advice and conſent of the kingdom of Scotland, contrary to the treaties which are between the two kingdoms, and deſtructive to religion, his majeſty's rights, the privilege of parliament, and liberty of the ſubject; from which propoſitions and bills the Scotch commiſſioners had diſſented, and proteſted againſt, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland."

After this preamble and recital, they ſaid, "That foraſmuch as his majeſty is willing to give ſatisfaction concerning the ſettling of religion, and other matters in difference, as is expreſſed in this agreement, the kingdom of Scotland doth oblige, and engage itſelf, firſt, in a peaceable way and manner to endeavour, that the king may come to London in ſafety, honour, and freedom, for a perſonal treaty with the houſes of parliament, and the commiſſioners of Scotland, upon ſuch propoſitions as ſhould be mutually agreed on between the two kingdoms, and ſuch propoſitions as his majeſty ſhould think fit to make; and for this end, all armies ſhould be diſbanded; and in caſe that this ſhould not be granted, that declarations ſhould be emitted by the kingdom of Scotland, in purſuance of this agreement, againſt the unjuſt proceedings of the two houſes of parliament, towards his majeſty, and the kingdom of Scotland; in which they would aſſert the right that belonged to the crown, in the power of the militia, the great ſeal, beſtowing of honours, and offices of truſt, choice of the privy-counſellors, and the right of the king's negative voice in parliament: and that the queen's majeſty, the prince, and the reſt of the royal iſſue, ought to remain where his majeſty ſhall think fit, in either of his kingdoms, with ſafety, honour, and freedom: that upon the iſſuing out of this declaration, an army ſhould be ſent out of Scotland into England, for the preſervation and eſtabliſhment of religion, for defence of his majeſty's perſon and authority, and reſtoring him to his government, to the juſt rights of the crown, and the full revenues; for the defence of the privilege of parliament, and liberty of the ſubject; for making a firm union between the kingdoms under his majeſty and his poſterity, and ſettling a laſting peace. In purſuance whereof, the kingdom of Scotland was to endeavour, that there might be a free and full parliament in England, and that his majeſty may be with them in honour, ſafety, and freedom; and that a ſpeedy period be ſet to the preſent parliament. And they undertook, that the army which they would raiſe, ſhould be upon its march, before the meſſage and declaration ſhould be delivered to the houſes." It was farther agreed on, that all ſuch in the kingdoms of England and Ireland, as would join with the kingdom of Scotland, in purſuance of this agreement, ſhould be protected by his majeſty in their perſons and eſtates; and that all his ſubjects in England or Ireland, who would join with him, in purſuance of this agreement, might come to the Scotiſh army and join with them, or elſe put themſelves into other bodies in England or Wales, for proſecution of the ſame ends, as the king's majeſty ſhould judge moſt convenient, and ſuch commanders or generals of the Engliſh nation, as his majeſty ſhall think fit: and that all ſuch ſhould be protected by the kingdom of Scotland and their army, in their perſons and eſtates; and where any injury or wrong is done unto them, they would be careful to ſee them fully repaired, as far as it ſhould be in their power to do; and likewiſe when any injury or wrong is done to thoſe who join with the kingdom of Scotland, his majeſty ſhould be careful of their full reparation. (4.)"

Rem. (4.) When the five laſt articles are conſidered, it plainly appears, what great advantages the king received by his condeſcenſion to eſtabliſh preſbyterianiſm in England for three years. But ſome mens prejudice againſt preſbyterianiſm, makes them think, the king paid very dear for the advantages he expected to reap from his union with Scotland.

They obliged his majeſty to promiſe, "That neither himſelf, or any by his authority or knowledge, ſhould make or admit any ceſſation, pacification, or agreement whatſoever for peace, nor of any treaty, propoſitions, bills, or any other ways for that end, with the houſes of parliament, or any army or party in England or Ireland, without the advice and conſent of the kingdom of Scotland; and reciprocally, that neither the kingdom of Scotland, nor any, having their authority, ſhould make or admit of any of theſe, any manner of way, with any whatſoever, without his majeſty's advice and conſent: and that upon the ſettlement of a peace, there ſhould be an act of oblivion to be agreed upon by his majeſty, and both his parliaments, of both his kingdoms: that his majeſty, the prince, or both, ſhould come into Scotland, upon the invitation of that kingdom, and their declaration, that they ſhould be in honour, freedom and ſafety, when poſſibly they could come with ſafety and conveniences; and that the king ſhould contribute his utmoſt endeavour, both both at home and abroad, for aſſiſting the kingdom of Scotland, for carrying on this war both by ſea and land, and all other ſupplies by monies, arms, and ammunition, and all other things requiſite, as alſo for guarding the coaſt of Scotland with ſhips, and protecting all their merchants, in the free exerciſe of their trade and commerce with other nations: and likewiſe, that his majeſty was willing, and did authoriſe the Scotiſh army, to poſſeſs themſelves of Berwick, Carliſle, Newcaſtle upon Tyne, with the caſtle of Tinmouth, and the town of Hartlepool: thoſe places to be their retreat, and magazines; and that, when the peace of the kingdom ſhould be ſettled, the kingdom of Scotland ſhould remove all their forces, and deliver back again thoſe towns and caſtles.

"The king promiſed alſo, and undertook to pay the arrears of the brotherly aſſiſtance, and likewiſe the two hundred thouſand pounds, which remained ſtill due upon the laſt treaty, for return of the Scotiſh army, when they had delivered up the king. (5.)

Rem. (5.) If the four hundred thouſand pounds promiſed to the Scotiſh army, when they quitted England, be conſidered as the price of the ſale of the king's perſon, nothing could be harder than to oblige the king to the payment of that ſum. But if it was really due to the Scots for their arrears, the king approving of the covenant of both kingdoms, by the firſt article of this treaty, the Scots could urge that he was bound to ſee them paid the expence they had been at in maintaining the covenant.

And alſo, "That payment ſhould be made to the kingdom of Scotland, for the charge and expence of their army in this future war, with due recompence for the loſſes they ſhould ſuſtain therein; and that due ſatisfaction, according to the treaty on that behalf betwixt the two kingdoms, ſhould be made to the Scotiſh army in Ireland, out of the lands of this kingdom, or otherwiſe: and that the king, according to the intention of his father, ſhould endeavour a complete union of the two kingdoms, ſo as they may be one under his majeſty, and all his poſterity; or if that cannot ſpeedily be effected, that all liberties and privileges concerning commerce, traffic, manufactures, peculiar to the ſubjects of either nation, ſhall be common to the ſubjects of both kingdoms without diſtinction; and that there be a communication, and mutual capacity of all other liberties of the ſubjects in the two kingdoms. (6.)

Rem. (6.) If the king could not, by his own authority, unite the two kingdoms, without the concurrence of the two parliaments, neither could he, without the ſame concurrence, make the privileges of both kingdoms common. So, probably, this article was put into the treaty only to dazzle the people of Scotland.

"That a competent number of ſhips ſhould be yearly aſſigned, and appointed out of his majeſty's navy, which ſhould attend the coaſt of Scotland for a guard, and freedom of trade of that notion; and that his majeſty ſhould declare, that his ſucceſſors, as well as himſelf, are obliged to the performance of the articles and conditions of this agreement; but that his majeſty ſhall not be obliged to the performance of the aforeſaid articles, until the kingdom of Scotland ſhould declare for him, in purſuance of this agreement; and that the whole articles and conditions aforeſaid, ſhall be finiſhed, perfected, and performed, before the return of the Scotiſh army; and that when they return into Scotland, at the ſame time, ſimul & ſemel, all armies ſhould be diſbanded in England." The king engaged himſelf alſo, "To employ thoſe of the Scotiſh nation, equally with the Engliſh, in all foreign employments and negotiations; and that a third part of all the offices and places about the king, queen, and prince, ſhould be conferred upon perſons of that nation: and that the king and prince or one of them, will frequently reſide in Scotland, that the ſubjects of that kingdom may be known to them."

The king's conſent by this treaty to the eſtabiſhment of the preſbyterian-government in England for three years, lying heavy upon his mind, he prevailed with the commiſſioners, that it ſhould be inſerted under the ſame treaty, "That his majeſty did declare, that by the clauſe of confirming preſbyterian-government by act of parliament, he is neither obliged to deſire the ſettling of preſbyterian-government, nor to preſent any bills to that effect; and that he likewiſe underſtands, that no perſon whatſoever ſhall ſuffer in his eſtate, nor undergo any corporal puniſhment, for not ſubmitting to preſbyterian-government; his majeſty underſtanding, that this indemnity ſhould not extend to thoſe who are mentioned in the articles againſt toleration."

To this the Scotch commiſſioners ſubſcribed their hands, as witneſſes only, as they ſaid, and not as aſſentors."

The lord Clarendon, in his hiſtory of the civils wars of England, exclaims againſt the injuſtice of this treaty, in the following words:

"No man who reads this treaty (which very few men have ever done) can wonder, that ſuch an engagement met with the fate that attended it; which contained ſo many monſtrous conceſſions, that, except the whole kingdom of England had been likewiſe impriſoned in Cariſbrook caſtle with the king, it could not be imagined, that it was poſſible to be performed."

I own, whatever eſteem I may have for that illuſtrious hiſtorian, this bare aſſeveration, without any explication, is not ſatisfactory to me. After having examined every clauſe of the treaty, I meet with none, that to me appear monſtrous. It is true, the article of ſettling the preſbyterian-government in England for three years, might ſeem ſo to the earl of Clarendon, and thoſe who are of his opinion. The reader is to judge, whether this monſtroſity, if I may venture to uſe that term, is to be aſcribed to the thing itſelf, or to the hiſtorian's prepoſſeſſion [n].

The king having concluded this treaty with the Scotch commiſſioners, delivered his anſwer to the commiſſioners of the parliament, to this effect:

"That his majeſty had always thought it a matter of great difficulty, to comply in ſuch a manner with all engaged intereſts, that a firm and laſting peace might enſue; in which opinion he was now confirmed, ſince the commiſſioners for Scotland did ſolemnly proteſt againſt the ſeveral bills, and propoſitions, which the two houſes of parliament had preſented to him for his aſſent; ſo that it was not poſſible for him to give ſuch an anſwer as might be the foundation of a hopeful peace. That beſides, the four bills as they were offered to him did not only diveſt him of all ſovereignty, and leave him without any poſſibility of recovering it to him or his ſucceſſors, but opened a door for all intolerable oppreſſions upon his ſubjects, he granting ſuch an arbitrary and unlimited power to the two houſes. That neither the deſire of being freed from that tedious and irkſome condition of life, which he had ſo long ſuffered, nor the apprehenſion of any thing that might befal him, ſhould ever prevail with him to conſent to any one act, till the conditions of the whole peace ſhould be concluded; and then that he would be ready to give all juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, in all particulars; and for the adjuſting of all this, he knew no way but a perſonal treaty (and therefore very earneſtly deſired the two houſes to conſent to it) to be either at London, or any other place they would rather chooſe."

The king not doubting but his anſwer would diſpleaſe the two houſes, would have given it ſealed to the commiſſioners, becauſe whilſt the parliament ſhould take it into conſideration, he intended to make his eſcape, having already taken ſome meaſures for that purpoſe. But the commiſſioners [o] would not receive it in that manner, ſaying, "They were not to be looked upon as common meſſengers, and to carry back an anſwer they had not ſeen." The king fearing, their return without his anſwer would be attended with the worſt of conſequences, gave it to them open; after which they inſtantly departed. They were no ſooner gone, than governor Hammond, by ſir Thomas Fairfax's order, cauſed all the king's ſervants to be put out of the caſtle, who till then had been permitted to be with him, and confined him ſo cloſely, that no man had liberty to go to him without expreſs leave [p].

It was not in vain that the governor took theſe precautions, ſince, immediately after, one captain Burley an inhabitant of

He ſaid, "By authority of both houſes, and that he ſuppoſed his majeſty was not ignorant of the cauſe of his doing thus." The king profeſſed the contrary, and the governor replied, "That he plainly ſaw, his majeſty was acted by other councils than ſtood with the good of the kingdom." the iſland, who had been firſt a ſea-officer, and afterwards general of the ordnance in one of the king's armies, endeavoured to excite the people to reſcue the king from his captivity [q]. But he laid his meaſures ſo ill, that inſtead of executing his deſign he was apprehended, and afterwards condemned, and hanged, drawn, and quartered. Probably, the king depended upon this officer for his eſcape.

[1647-8] The king's anſwer being read in the houſe of commons, ſeveral members ſpoke againſt the king with great warmth. Cromwell among others ſaid,

"That the king was a man of great parts, and great underſtanding, but that he was ſo great a diſſembler, and ſo falſe a man, that he was not to be truſted. That whilſt he profeſſed with all ſolemnity that he referred himſelf wholly to the parliament, and depended only upon their wiſdom and counſel for the ſettlement and compoſing the diſtractions of the kingdom, he had at the ſame time ſecret treaties with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, how he might embroil the nation in a new war, and deſtroy the parliament. He concluded, that they might no farther trouble themſelves with ſending meſſages to him, or farther propoſitions, but that they might enter upon thoſe counſels which were neceſſary towards the ſettlement of the kingdom, without having farther recourſe to the king." This advice being ſtrongly ſeconded by ſome other members, it was at length reſolved, after a long debate from morning till late at night [r], that no more addreſſes ſhould be made to, or meſſages received from, the king [s], and that a declaration ſhould be publiſhed to ſatisfy the kingdom of the reaſon of it. This declaration was prepared in a very ſhort time [t]. It contained all the reproaches caſt upon the king in 1641, in the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, and whatever had been complained of ſince that time, not without a direct inſinuation that the king, when prince of Wales, had conſpired with the duke of Buckingham againſt his father's life. They charged him with having openly betrayed the intereſts of the proteſtant religion, by lending his ſhips to the king of France, who employed them againſt Rochel. When this declaration came to be debated, it met with much oppoſition even in the houſe of commons. But the contrary party to the king did what is daily practiſed in the parliament: they ſuffered the oppoſers of the declaration to talk as much as they pleaſed, and then called for the queſtion, which was carried by a plurality of voices; after which the declaration was ſent to the houſe of peers, where it paſſed without any difficulty.

The Scotch commiſſioners before they returned home, communicated their deſigns to the king's party, the marquis of Ormond, and ſome leading preſbyterians, and early preparations were made for accompliſhing the project which was forming in favour of the king. The project was as follows.

The Scots were to ſend an army into England to act againſt the independents, and deliver the king: the marquis of Ormond was to return into Ireland, where the lord Inchiquin who commanded the parliament's forces in Munſter, had promiſed to declare for the king, and ſeveral heads of the rebels who were diſpleaſed with the tyrannical proceedings of the pope's nuncio, had engaged to join the marquis with a ſtrong body of their troops. At the ſame time, the king's friends in England were to riſe in ſeveral counties. The generals and officers, diſcarded by the new model, had promiſed to aſſemble what forces they could, to countenance the deſign. The nobility, gentry, and burghers being diſſatisfied that the army ſhould govern the parliament, and all offices be conferred on perſons of their party, it was not doubted but the inſurrections in ſeveral parts, would be ſupported and encouraged. On the other hand, ſir Marmaduke Langdale, and ſir Philip Muſgrave, who had great intereſt in Yorkſhire and Cumberland, engaged to ſeize Berwick and Carliſle. The preſbyterian party being ſtill very numerous in the parliament and city, were preparing openly to oppoſe the army, as ſoon as they ſhould ſee it employed in ſo many different places. Had all theſe projects been well managed, and executed at the ſame time, very probably, Cromwell, with all his art, would have been extremely embarraſſed. But of all thoſe who ſhould have acted at the ſame time, ſome were too haſty, others too ſlow, and by that means, the army cruſhed them with eaſe one after another. But before I relate how theſe ſeveral projects were attempted to be executed, I think it abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the intereſts and views of the different parties, otherwiſe it would be very difficult to underſtand what will be ſaid hereafter.

The independents deſigned to be maſters of the kingdom, as they were already of the parliament and city of London. But as they found, it would not be eaſy to ſucceed in this undertaking, by the ſame means they had employed to ſubdue the city and parliament, their aim was to make uſe of the parliament and govern in their name. It was therefore their intereſt, that the power they had acquired over the parliament ſhould not be too viſible, for fear of cauſing both houſes to loſe their authority, which they meant to make uſe of. For this reaſon they were very careful to manage the two houſes, knowing, that whilſt the army ſubſiſted, they would have a regard for them, for fear of incenſing them. And in caſe they ſhould think of taking too much liberty, they knew how to reduce them to a greater compliance. Though they had diſſembled their ſentiments with reſpect to the king, after his removal from Holmby, they were his mortal enemies, and bent to oppoſe, with all their power, his reſtoration on any conditions whatever, becauſe they conſidered it as entirely deſtructive of their party. Oliver Cromwell, who privately directed their affairs, had found means, as I ſaid, to keep his poſt in the army, and his ſeat in parliament, though he had been the chief promoter of the ſelf-denying ordinance, whereby the reſt of the members were excluded from all offices military and civil. Moreover, ſince the concluſion of the war, he had brought into the houſe many more of his faction, beſides thoſe who had been there from the beginning of the parliament. Hence the independent party was grown very conſiderable in the houſe of commons, as well by their number as by the junction of ſeveral other members, who through fear, or want of judgement, ſuffered themſelves to be led by the independents, on ſome occaſions where their artifices were not eaſy to be diſcovered. But their principal ſtrength was the ſupport of the army, of which they were ſecure on occaſion. So, when any leading independent ſpoke with warmth in the houſe, he ſeldom met with oppoſition, becauſe he was conſidered as the mouth of the army.

But what was the end the independents propoſed? The event ſhewed, their principles were inconſiſtent with monarchy, with epiſcopacy, and with preſbyterian-government, and that their aim was to eſtabliſh a commonwealth in the ſtate, and aboliſh eccleſiaſtical authority in the church. Nothing was more oppoſite to this deſign than the hierarchy, eſpecially, as it was known by experience to have ſupported the monarchy, not only in its juſt rights, but alſo in its moſt exorbitant pretenſions. Preſbyterianiſm, as eſtabliſhed in Scotland, and as intended to be eſtabliſhed in England, was no leſs contrary to their deſigns. They pretended it was inconſiſtent with the civil government, and to admit it would be to admit a ſort of commonwealth in the church which would aſpire to an independency on the ſtate, and beſides, the preſbyterian clergy were as much againſt toleration as the epiſcopal. This they proved by the example of Scotland, where under colour of religion and godlineſs, the general aſſemblies of the kirk pretended to intermeddle in all important affairs of the ſtate, and not only to reſiſt the civil authority, but to be bound to it in conſcience on certain occaſions. Beſides, if the biſhops had perſecuted thoſe who refuſed to conform to the church of England, the preſbyterians, ſince they were ſuperior, exerciſed no leſs tyranny upon thoſe who would not ſubmit to their government. Thus the principles of the epiſcopalians and preſbyterians being directly contrary to thoſe of the independents, theſe were equally enemies to both, and equally laboured their ruin. To execute their deſigns, they had at firſt joined with the preſbyterians, on pretence of eſtabliſhing preſbyterianiſm, but in reality to deſtroy the king. And when it was out of the king's power to hurt them, they laboured to deſtroy the ſame preſbyterianiſm, for the eſtabliſhment of which, they had ſhewn more zeal than the preſbyterians themſelves.

Such were the views of the independents: as for Cromwell's in particular, it cannot be ſaid when he began to form the project of his advancement. He had ſpent the two firſt years of this parliament in the houſe of commons as member for the town of Cambridge, without being very remarkable. Though he was above forty years old before he exerciſed the profeſſion of arms, he ſuddenly grew ſo expert, and ſhewed ſuch undaunted courage in all the actions where he was preſent, that he was ſoon made lieutenant-general of the army, commanded by ſir Thomas Fairfax. It can hardly be doubted, that ſince the battle of Naſeby, where he acquired freſh laurels, he had begun to think of raiſing himſelf higher. But I dare not affirm, he then thought of what he afterwards accompliſhed. I ſhould rather believe, he had only ſome general views, and was led by the events and ſituation of affairs to form more ambitious projects[u].

I come now to the preſbyterians. The war was ended to the king's diſadvantage: but he was ſtill alive though a priſoner, and had ſeveral children. It was the general ſenſe of the nation, or at leaſt of thoſe who were not blinded by a ſpirit of party, that the king ſhould be reſtored, but upon ſuch terms however as ſhould hinder the conſtitution of the government from being liable to the ſame danger as before this parliament. It can't be doubted, this was the ſentiment of all honeſt Engliſhmen, when it is conſidered, that even thoſe who had nothing leſs in view than the king's reeſtabliſhmeut, did however publicly declare, they deſired it, for fear the contrary opinion ſhould deprive them of the people's favour, which was abſolutely neceſſary for them. This appears in all the papers publiſhed ſince the beginning of the war and the king's impriſonment. And indeed, nothing was more juſt and reaſonable. The nation's intereſt did not require that royalty ſhould be aboliſhed, or the king reduced ſo low as to be diſabled to execute the laws and protect his ſubjects. But the intereſt of the independents required the firſt of theſe two things, and that of the preſbyterians, the ſecond. Herein conſiſted the difficulty of the king's reſtoration. He was very willing to conſent, that the ordering of the militia, and the nomination to the great offices, ſhould be left to both houſes of parliament for ſome time. This was ſufficient for the intereſt of the nation in general, ſince the people would have been freed from their fears, with reſpect to the government for the future. If the preſbyterians had only intended the good of the public, they would doubtleſs, have been ſatisfied with the king's offers. But they had another intereſt, no leſs dear to them, and which diſtinguiſhed their party from the reſt of the nation, namely, the abolition of epiſcopal government, which was their greateſt concern. Nay, very likely, if they had applied themſelves at firſt to procure the good of the nation, by endeavouring to humble the regal power, it was only to effect the more eaſily their ſecret deſigns, to change the government of the church. At the juncture I am ſpeaking of, they had not altered their projects. They knew how zealous the king was for epiſcopal government, and how averſe to the preſbyterian. They could not therefore, without running the hazard of loſing the fruit of their labours, leave their pretenſions undecided, and their affairs in ſuch a ſtate, that it ſhould be in the king's power to demoliſh what they had raiſed, and the king refuſed to give them any aſſurance in that reſpect. On the contrary, he plainly intimated, it was with reluctance that he granted them any thing, and even for a very ſhort time. Beſides, they had no confidence in his promiſes.

But on the other hand, they had other enemies who were no leſs formidable. Theſe were the independents, who had great advantages over them: 1. They had the king's perſon in their power. 2. They were ſupported by the army now at the gates of London. 3. The army directed, in great meaſure, the determinations of the parliament. Thus, the preſbyterians were extremely embarraſſed, ſince, whichſoever of the two parties, the royal or the independent, prevailed, their ruin was inevitable. Mean while, as the danger from the independents was the moſt imminent, as ſoon as they were informed of the reſolution taken by the Scots to ſend an army to the king's relief, they thought fit to ſuſpend their quarrel with the king, and join their endeavours with thoſe of the Scots, to deliver him from the independents. Not that they intended to reſtore him without terms: nothing was farther from their thought. But they hoped, with the aſſiſtance of the Scots and the royal party, to deſtroy the independents and army, and that then the parliament would be perfectly free. In that caſe they flattered themſelves that their party would be ſufficiently powerful in both houſes, to require of the king ſuch conditions as they ſhould think proper for their deſigns. That is to ſay, they pretended to free the king from the captivity in which he was held by the independents, by means of his own friends, to put him under another, which would have been no leſs grievous to him; in a word, to put him into the power of a parliament by which he had always been oppoſed. Chimerical project, if ever there was one! It muſt be obſerved, the preſbyterians no longer prevailing in the parliament, ſince the 6th of Auguſt, their principal ſtrength lay in the aſſiſtance they could expect from the city, and the generals, officers and ſoldiers, who were caſhiered by the new model, and very ready to act againſt thoſe who had robbed them of the fruit of their labours.

The Scots had the ſame intereſts and views with regard to the king. They knew, the king conſidered the favours he had granted them, as extorted at a time when he could not deny them without great inconveniences. On the other hand, they had not confidence enough in him, to believe he would be punctual to his promiſes, in caſe he remounted the throne of England with all his prerogatives. It was their intereſt therefore to hinder the king from becoming too powerful in England, and this had induced them to aſſiſt the parliament. But as for the independents, Scotland does not ſeem to have been ſo much concerned to oppoſe the ſuperiority they had acquired in England. Indeed, it would have been more advantageous to Scotland, if there had been no independent-party in England, if the Preſbyterian had prevailed, and if the covenant had been ſtrictly obſerved. But ſince affairs had taken another courſe, and the independents had gained the advantage, it does not appear what miſchief could thence accrue to the Scots, ſince they were no leſs ſecured from the king's power, whilſt he was in the hands of the independents than when he was in thoſe of the preſbyterians. The reſolutions of the Scots to aſſiſt the king can be aſcribed but to one, or perhaps all, of theſe cauſes: 1. To the fear of an union between the king and independents; but this fear was groundleſs, the principles of the two parties being diametrically oppoſite: 2. To the deſire of being revenged on their ſworn enemies, the independents, who had often mortified the Scotch commiſſioners: 3. To their extreme deſire of firmly eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian government in the church of England: 4. and laſtly, To their hopes of preſerving, by means of this new war, the advantages procured them by the covenant. The queſtion is to know, whether theſe three laſt cauſes were ſufficient to engage them indiſpenſably to undertake a war againſt England? I ſay againſt England, for they could not doubt that the parliament, directed as it was by the army, would conſider their entrance into the kingdom as an invaſion.

On the other hand, the royaliſts, though overthrown, being ſtill very numerous, there was great danger, that tho' the Scots, by their union with them, ſhould deſtroy the independent party and their ſupporters the army, this advantage would turn more to the benefit of the king than of the preſbyterians. At leaſt, it cannot be denied, that by uniting with the royaliſts, they would, though contrary to their intention, enable them to hold up their heads, and by their own ſucceſſes give new ſtrength to their antient enemies. Theſe were reflections which occurred to many in Scotland, where the intended new war was far from being univerſally liked. The king's party appeared very active, which was a ſign their hopes were not confined to the freeing of the king from the independents, in order to put him into the hands of the Preſbyterians. The commiſſioners had ſigned the treaty of the Iſle of Wight, without being authorized by the parliament of Scotland; and the execution of that treaty, on the part of the Scots, was entirely founded upon the hopes the commiſſioners had given the king, of cauſing it to be ratified. But they had ventured to impart it only to a few friends, and ſome leading preſbyterians of England, knowing it contained not the whole of what the preſbyterians deſired. It may therefore be affirmed, the new war, for which preparations were making in Scotland, was rather the work of ſome particular perſons than of the nation in general, as will plainly appear in the ſequel

The deſign of the royaliſts was not, as I ſaid, to deliver the king out of the hands of the independents in order to leave him at the mercy of the preſbyterians. They knew, that when the parliament ſhould be entirely free, the king's condition would not be much better. And therefore, in jointly labouring with the preſbyterians and Scots, their aim was to reſtore the king to his former ſtate, without ſubjecting him to the terms already propoſed. Indeed there were among them ſome who would not have ſcrupled to conſent to a toleration of the preſbyterian religion, rather than nazard the king's reſtoration. Nay, ſome there were who, had they been conſulted, would have adviſed the king to ſubmit to a change introduced againſt his conſent. Though they were perſuaded that epiſcopal was more perfect than preſbyterian government, they did not think the difference between them material enough, to hinder the ſincere union of the two parties, which they conſidered as the ſole means of reſtoring the king to his rights. And this was what ſome had propoſed to the king, before he withdrew to the Scotch army. The queen and the court of France were of this opinion: but the king was not. He was ſo poſſeſſed with the neceſſity of epiſcopacy, that nothing could move him. Unfortunately for him, he had none about him but men, who, like him, believed epiſcopacy ſo eſſential to religion, that without biſhops neither the ordination of miniſters, nor conſequently the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, could be valid. It muſt not therefore be thought ſtrange, that the king had great ſcruples upon this point, ſince, according to his principles, he could not conſider the preſbyterians as members of the chriſtian-church. For how could they be chriſtians, if their baptiſm was invalid? It cannot be denied, this was the opinion of the court and of many church-of-England men. If therefore the royaliſts had fully known the contents of the Iſle of Wight treaty, very likely, their zeal for the king's ſervice would have cooled. It has been remembered, how much it diſpleaſed the earl of Clarendon. It is very eaſy to conceive, that men of ſuch ſentiments did not mean to labour for the intereſt of the preſbyterians. What therefore could be expected from the union of the royaliſts with the preſbyterians and Scots, ſince they all acted with different or rather oppoſite views, and, though their common deſign had ſucceeded, they muſt have therefore diſunited, and begun a new war?

[u] Some authors relate, that Cromwell privately ſtipulated with the king, if his majeſty cloſed with the army's propoſals, Cromwell ſhould be made earl of Eſſex, knight of the garter, firſt captain of the guards, and even advanced to the degree of vicar-general, as the lord Cromwell was, under Henry VIII. But the king, who would do nothing without the advice of his queen, writ her word, "That though he aſſented to the army's propoſals, it by aſſenting to them he could procure peace, it would be eaſier then to take off Cromwell, than now he was the head that governed the army." This letter was intercepted by Cromwell, who thereupon reſolved to ruin the king. R. Cooke, p. 323. Life of Cromwell, p. 71.

As to the king's particular views, they can only be conjectured. He was like a man that is drowning, and catches at whatever he thinks able to ſave him, or at leaſt retard his fate. His accepting the ſervice of the Scots and preſbyterians of England, was not becauſe he expected much from their condeſcenſion. He had too often experienced their injuſtice to him, to imagine they would ſeriouſly think of reſtoring him, without impoſing upon him intolerable terms. But as neceſſity obliged them to offer him their aſſiſtance, ſo neceſsity forced him to accept it, if not in expectation of obtaining his deſires, at leaſt in hopes of delaying his ruin as long as poſsible. For he was told, and by one that was preſent, that in a council of officers at Windſor, it was moved to take away his life. He hoped, very likely, by the aid of the Scotch and Engliſh preſbyterians, ſo to ſtrengthen his own party, that they would be in condition to act alone, when once the independent army was diſperſed, and by that means he might be freed and enabled to make a peace upon more tolerable terms than thoſe hitherto offered. Thus by a ſtrange blindneſs, the king pretended to uſe the Scots and preſbyterians to recover his rights, and theſe pretended to make the king and his party ſubſervient to their own deſigns. The king might have another view in ſetting the preſbyterians and independents at variance, namely, that the weakeſt party would join with him without terms, rather than ſee their enemies triumph.

The parliament conſiſted of preſbyterians and independents, and, notwithſtanding the efforts of Cromwell and his party, the preſbyterians were ſtill the majority. But this party was conſiderably weakened by the abſence of eleven of their chief members driven from the houſe of commons by the army. From that time, the ſame vigour as formerly, no more appeared in that houſe, becauſe it was not directed as before the excluſion of theſe members. Beſides, this example deterred the boldeſt preſbyterians. So, the independents were maſters; and though the parliament was preſbyterian as to number, they acted however like independents, becauſe they could not do otherwiſe. As the army was near London, Cromwell had opportunity to be conſtantly in the houſe, where his preſence alone made the balance incline to which ſide he pleaſed, in the debates where his party was concerned. The lords were under no leſs conſtraint than the commons, nor leſs expoſed to the violence of the army, which had cauſed ſeven peers to be impeached by the commons of high-treaſon, under colour of their being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July. The tranſactions therefore of both houſes, from the 6th of Auguſt 1647, and till June 1648, are to be conſidered as directed by the army, that is, by the leading independents. It may be imagined, the preſbyterian members were extremely troubled to be forced, notwithſtanding their majority in both houſes, to do things manifeſtly tending to the deſtruction of their party. But there was no remedy but patience, till time ſhould afford ſome opportunity to free themſelves from this ſlavery. This opportunity was of courſe to offer itſelf the next ſpring. Though the Scotch commiſſioners had not thought proper to impart to the leading preſbyterians the particulars of their treaty with the king, they had however intimated to them, that they were going to endeavour to raiſe an army in Scotland, to free England from the yoke of the independents, and that the king's party was to join with them, or at leaſt favour their progreſs, by inſurrections in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. So the preſbyterian members impatiently expected the happy time, when the army would be indiſpenſably obliged to remove from London, to oppoſe ſo many enemies, particularly in the north. They reſolved therefore to be ready to act in the parliament at ſo favourable a juncture, and in the mean while to give no offence, for fear of being prevented by the army, who carefully watched all their proceedings. This diſſimulation was neceſſary, becauſe otherwiſe they ran the riſk of being ruined to no purpoſe, and of diſabling themſelves to ſupport their friends on occaſion.

It remains to ſpeak of the city of London, which was no leſs concerned in what paſſed, than the reſt of the kingdom, and could be of great ſervice to the party they eſpouſed. In this great city were men of all ſects and parties; but in general, it was preſbyterian, and the common-council was of the ſame party. The army had done what lay in their power to leſſen the number of their adverſaries in that council, by cauſing the lord-mayor, ſome aldermen, and ſeveral common-council-men, to be accuſed and impriſoned, for the tumult of the 26th of July: but however, the preſbyterian party was ſtill ſuperior in number. In expectation of the opportunity to declare openly againſt the army and the independents, the preſbyterian party ſo managed, that great difficulties conſtantly occurred, when it was propoſed to advance money for the army. The city itſelf was very much in arrears, with reſpect to the ſums laid upon them for the payment of the troops. They did not want excuſes to delay theſe arrears: but the true reaſon was, they thereby obliged the army to take free quarters, which made the people wiſh to be rid of them. The expectation of the revolutions, which the entrance of the Scots into the kingdom might produce, cauſed the magiſtrates of London to continue the ſame conduct, being ready to do, on all occaſions, whatever was in their power to be revenged of the army.

I ſhould willingly add ſomething concerning the character of the lord Fairfax[w], general of the army, and the ends he might propoſe to himſelf; but own, I have met with little information. He was preſbyterian, and yet ſuffered himſelf to be guided by Cromwell, the head of the independents. What can be ſaid in his favour, is, that he kept the command of the army to avoid a greater miſchief, for fear, if he reſigned his commiſſion, it ſhould be given to Cromwell, as it would certainly have been.

I thought it neceſſary, before I proceed to the great revolution in 1648, to ſhew the views and intereſts of the principal actors, believing this digreſſion would conduce very much to the underſtanding of what will hereafter be ſaid.

Since the two houſes had reſolved to preſent no more addreſſes to the king, nor receive any meſſages from him, there ſeemed to be a ſtrict union between the parliament and army. The council of war had conſented, that all the ſupernumerary forces, not upon the preſent eſtabliſhment, ſhould be diſbanded. The parliament, on their part, gave the army ſufficient ſecurity for their arrears, and publiſhed a declaration, containing the reaſons why the army ought to be continued, though the war was over. In ſhort, the army deſiſted from their pretenſion, to meddle with affairs of ſtate, and left the parliament free to ſettle the government as they ſhould think fit. Thus the vote for no more addreſſes ſeemed to produce ſuch an union between the parliament and army, that they appeared to have the ſame views and intereſts, though hitherto they had been jealous of each other. This clearly ſhews what were the deſigns of the army, with regard to the king. As for the parliament, though the independent members were devoted to the army, it is certain the reſt, who were the majority, only diſſembled their ſentiments. Mean while, the independents, who met with no more oppoſition in the two houſes, being willing to be ſtill more aſſured of the parliament, cauſed it to be ordered, that the general ſhould be deſired to take care and guard the parliament. Purſuant to this requeſt, the general ſent a regiment of foot to Whitehall, and another of horſe to the Meuſe, where the king's ſtables ſtood. This was to hinder the Londoners from thinking again of uſing violence to the two houſes.

Though the Scotch commiſſioners departed not from London till the 24th of January, they had however, by their letters, promoted their affairs, as ſoon as their treaty with the king was ſigned, ſo that it was now reſolved at Edinburgh, the committee of eſtates ſhould meet the 6th of February, and the parliament the 10th of March. This reſolution was taken, notwithſtanding the marquis of Argyle's oppoſition, who, though preſbyterian as to religion, was of the ſame principles with the independents as to the government of the ſtate, and had contracted a faſt friendſhip with Cromwell and Vane. But, though he ruled in great meaſure the rigid preſbyterians, that is, thoſe who would not depart from one ſingle point of the covenant, the combination was ſo ſtrong, that it was not only reſolved to call a parliament, but that alſo the elections of the members were agreeable for the moſt part to the wiſhes of thoſe who were for levying an army. The parliament of England, or rather the independent party, by whom the two houſes were directed, doubted not that the aim of thoſe who had procured this reſolution, was to ſupport the preſbyterians of England who were upon the brink of ruin. Wherefore they reſolved to ſend commiſſioners to Scotland[x], as well to endeavour to content the Scots, as to obſerve what ſhould paſs in the parliament, and try to ſtrengthen the party of thoſe who were againſt war[y].

[1648] At the opening of the parliament of Scotland, ſtudied ſpeeches were made by ſeveral of the members, to excite the people againſt the Engliſh. They repreſented, that the army of England kept the king in captivity, and the parliament in ſuch ſubjection, that nothing was done but what the army pleaſed. That contrary to the tenor of the covenant between the two nations, the parliament had refuſed to debate with the Scotch commiſſioners the propoſitions ſent to the king for peace, and rejected their proteſtation, as if Scotland had no intereſt in the king: that they had in reality depoſed the king by diveſting him of all his prerogatives, by voting he ſhould be no more addreſſed, and by hindering the Scots from having acceſs to his perſon, though he was as much king of Scotland, as king of England: that it was a manifeſt breach of the rights of the Scots, and of the covenant between the two kingdoms, and that Scotland ought to reſent this affront, or reſolve to become ſubject to England: that for theſe reaſons, their advice was, that ſpeedy means might be deviſed to ſend an army into England, which ſhould no ſooner enter that kingdom, but all the Engliſh, except the army, would join with them, and by that means the parliament being reſtored to freedom, would re-unite with Scotland, and the covenant be punctually obſerved.

The parliament thought not proper to take this important motion ſo ſpeedily into conſideration. But to facilitate the execution of what had been reſolved before their meeting, a committee of twenty-four members were appointed, with power to provide for the ſafety of the kingdom, in caſe it ſhould be in danger. For this reaſon, they were called the 'committee of danger,' in which care was taken, that the number of thoſe who were for war, ſhould be ſuperior to thoſe of the contrary party, and to make duke Hamilton preſident.

This committee having examined the ſtate of the kingdom, found it to be in danger, and that it was neceſſary to raiſe an army of forty thouſand men, to put it in a poſture of defence. It was not poſſible for the marquis of Argyle, who was of the committee, to prevent that reſolution. But he found means to actuate the commiſſioners of the general aſſembly of the kirk, who ſome days after preſented to the parliament certain demands, proper to prolong the affair. The parliament anſwered theſe demands, and the commiſſioners replied. As this affair will be better underſtood, by comparing the demands, anſwers, and replies, I think it neceſſary not to divide them. This will be of uſe, as it diſcovers the obſtacles which occurred in Scotland, to the raiſing of the army that was to act in England. Herein alſo will appear, what authority the general aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland aſſumed to themſelves, ſince their commiſſioners thought they had a right to oppoſe the parliament to their face.

" 1. Demand. That the grounds and cauſes of undertaking a war may be cleared to be ſo juſt, as that all who are well-affected, may be ſatisfied in the lawfulneſs and the neceſſity of the engagement, and that nothing be acted in reference to a war, before the lawfulneſs of the war, and the ſtate of the queſtion, be agreed upon.

Answer. The eſtates declare, That the grounds and cauſes of undertaking of war, ſhall be cleared to be ſo juſt, as that all who are well-affected may be ſatisfied in the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of the engagement.

" Reply. They conceive, that notwithſtanding any thing expreſſed in their lordſhip's anſwer, there may be an acting in reference to war, before the lawfulneſs of the war and the ſtate of the queſtion be agreed upon, which is the very thing they deſire to be avoided.

" 2. Demand. That as the breaches of the covenant, by the prevalent party of the ſectaries in England are evident, ſo we deſire and hope, that, according to the treaty, it may be condeſcended upon, and declared by the parliament, what are thoſe breaches which they take to be a ground of war, and that reparation thereof may be ſought.

Anſwer. They think it fit that the breaches of the covenant and treaties be preſented; and the ſeeking of reparation, and the beſt time and manner thereof, conſidered.

" Reply. They neither find any breach of peace between the kingdoms, which may be a ground of war, nor any poſitive reſolution of parliament to ſeek reparation.

" 3. Demand. That there may be no ſuch quarrel or ground of the war, as may break the union between the two kingdoms, or may diſcourage or diſoblige the preſbyterian-party in England, who continue firm in adhering to the league and covenant.

Anſwer. They declare, that this kingdom will be ſo far from making any war againſt the kingdom of England, that any engagement they ſhall enter into, ſhall be for ſtrengthening the union between theſe two kingdoms, and for encouraging the preſbyterians, and well-affected in England.

" Reply. Inſtead of that clauſe of the deſire, The preſbyterian-party in England, who continue firm in adhering to the league and covenant; change of expreſſion in the anſwer is, the preſbyterians, and well-affected in England, which may intimate, that there are ſome well-affected in England, which are not of the preſbyterian-party, nor do adhere to the league and covenant.

" 4. Demand. That if the popiſh, prelatical, or malignant party ſhall again riſe in arms, this nation and their armies may be ſo far from joining or aſſociating with them, that on the contrary, they may oppoſe them, and endeavour to ſuppreſs them, as enemies to this cauſe and government upon the one hand, as well as ſectaries on the other.

Anſwer. They agree to the ſubſtance and matter thereof; and remit to thoſe who are to be upon the conference for ſtating the queſtion to explain the ſame.

" Reply. For not joining with the popiſh, prelatical, or malignant party, we cannot conceive wherein it needs explanation, unleſs there may be now more favourable and friendly intentions towards malignants than formerly.

" 5. Demand. Seeing your lordſhips undertakings ſhould be in the firſt place for religion; we deſire, that his majeſty's late conceſſions and offers concerning religion (as they have been by the church, ſo may be by the parliament) declared unſatisfactory; whereby your lordſhips may give further evidence of the reality of your intentions for the good and ſafety of religion.

Anſwer. They declare, that upon the agreement on the whole matter and ſtate of the queſtion, they will declare his majeſty's conceſſions concerning religion, not to be ſatisfactory.

" Reply. His Majeſty's conceſſions being ſo prejudicial to the cauſe and covenant, they deſire the parliament to declare againſt them both poſitively, without any condition, and preſently without delay.

" 6. Demand. That your lordſhips may be pleaſed not to fix and ſettle upon any ſuch ſtate of the queſtion, as doth not contain ſecurity and aſſurance to be had from his majeſty, by his ſolemn oath, under his hand and ſeal, that he ſhall. for himſelf and his ſucceſſors, conſent and agree to acts of parliaments, enjoining the league and covenant, and fully eſtabliſhing preſbyterial-government, directory of worſhip, and confeſſion of faith, in all his majeſty's dominions; and that his majeſty ſhall never make any oppoſition to any of theſe, or endeavour any change thereof; and that this ſecurity be had from his majeſty before his reſtitution to the exerciſe of his royal power; which we deſire for no other end, but becauſe we cannot ſee how religion (which has been, and we truſt ſhall be, the principal end of all the undertakings of this nation) can be otherwiſe ſecured; but that without this ſecurity it ſhall be left in very great hazard."

Anſwer. 'That ſince religion hath been, and they truſt ever ſhall be, the principal end of all their undertakings; ſo they will be careful, that the preſent queſtion to be ſtated ſhall contain ſecurity and aſſurance from his majeſty, by his ſolemn oath under his hand and ſeal, that he ſhall for himſelf, and for his ſucceſſors, give his royal conſent to paſs acts of parliament, enjoining the league and covenant, eſtabliſhed by preſbyterial-government, the directory of worſhip, and confeſſion of faith, in all his majeſty's dominions; and that his majeſty ſhall never make oppoſition to any of theſe, or endeavour any change thereof.'

Reply. "As there is much ſaid in the firſt part, for ſecurity of religion to be had from his majeſty; ſo that clauſe, viz. That this ſecurity be had from his majeſty, before his reſtitution to the exerciſe of his royal power is laid aſide, and they are left unſatisfied in that which is the main of that deſire."

7. Demand. "That the ſame end in ſecuring religion which is profeſſed to be the principal cauſe of engagement, and for ſecuring all other ends of the covenant, ſuch perſons only may be entruſted by your lordſhips to be of your committees and armies, as have given conſtant proof of their integrity and faithfulneſs in this cauſe, and againſt whom there is no juſt exception or jealouſy, that ſo we may the more confidently encourage our flocks and congregations to follow the cauſe of God in their hands, and not to doubt of the fidelity of thoſe, who ſhall be entruſted by your lordſhips."

Anſwer. 'That they will be careful that none ſhall be employed in the command of their armies, nor in their committees, but ſuch as are of known integrity and affection to the cauſe, and againſt whom there is no juſt cauſe of exception.

Reply. "Concerning ſuch as are to be entruſted in armies and committees, doth admit of ſome of the qualifications expreſſed in the deſire, viz. Such as have given conſtant proof of their integrity and faithfulneſs in this cauſe, and againſt whom there was no juſt cauſe of jealouſy, that ſo we may the more confidently encourage our flocks to follow the cauſe of God in their hands, and not doubt of their fidelity.

"8. Demand. That there be no engagement without a ſolemn oath, wherein the church may have the ſame intereſt which they had in the ſolemn league and covenant, the cauſe being the ſame."

Anſwer. 'They declare, that to the grounds of their engagements and undertaking an oath ſhall be ſubjoined, wherein both in the framing of it, and otherwiſe, the church ſhall have their due intereſt. And the eſtates of parliament deſire the commiſſioners of the church to appoint ſome of their number, to meet with ſuch of the committee of parliament of twenty-four, as ſhall be appointed by the ſame committee, for the conference and ſtating of the queſtion, for agreeing upon the grounds of an engagement, and drawing up ſuch a ſtate of a queſtion, as may unite this nation in an unanimous undertaking of ſuch duties as are requiſite for the reformation and defence of religion, the ſafety, honour, and happineſs of the king and his poſterity, and the good of this kingdom.'

"Reply. Inſtead of that clear expreſſion uſed, namely, That the kirk may have the ſame intereſt in any oath for a new engagement which they had in the ſolemn league and covenant, they find this doubtful and uncertain expreſſion, That both in the framing the oath and otherwiſe, the kirk ſhall have their due intereſts.

"And upon theſe and the like conſiderations, they conceive that their deſires, unto which they ſtill adhere as juſt and neceſſary, are not ſatisfied by their lordſhips anſwer."

The oppoſition of the kirk commiſſioners was not the only ſtorm the reſolution of levying an army drew upon the committee of danger. Eighteen lords and forty other members of parliament entered a ſolemn proteſt againſt this vote, affirming, the committee had exceeded their power, which they did not in any manner conſent to give them. There were moreover two other difficulties to ſurmount, before the parliament could poſitively order the levying an army. The firſt related to the general, who was to have the command. Naturally this poſt belonged to general Leſly now lord Newark, who had commanded the laſt army, and of whom there was no occaſion to complain. But he was not fit for their purpoſe who were for a war. That party's ſcheme was to make duke Hamilton general, becauſe he had privately declared for the king, and it was conceived he would be more proper than Leſly, to unite the royal party in England with the army of Scotland. This difficulty was at length removed, Leſly being artfully prevailed with to quit his pretenſion, under colour of age and infirmities. Which done, duke Hamilton had no other rival [z].

The ſecond difficulty was much more conſiderable. Before the Scotch commiſſioners left London, they had intimated to ſeveral officers, and others of the king's party, that when the Scotch army ſhould enter England, they ſhould be welcome to the Scots, and with them make but one body and party, for the deliverance of the king out of the hands of the independents. They had given the ſame aſſurances to Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and Sir Philip Muſgrave, and by that induced them to promiſe to ſeize Berwick and Carliſle. Upon theſe hopes a great number of royaliſts repaired to Edinburgh, to join with the Scots, or be employed in their army. Moreover, a troop of horſe commanded by captain Wogan, which was to have been diſbanded, had retired into Scotland, to join the forces of that kingdom; and this troop, by the junction of ſeveral horſe deſerters, was become four hundred ſtrong. Duke Hamilton had put Langdale and Muſgrave in hopes, that when the Scotch army ſhould be in England, there would be no more ſaid of the covenant, and the royaliſts might join with them and make but one body. But it was not in the power of thoſe who made theſe promiſes to perform them. The marquis of Argyle, and the rigid preſbyterians ſtrongly repreſented, both in public and private, "That under colour of acting againſt the independents in England, the royaliſts, that is, the mortal enemies of Scotland and of all preſbyterians, were going to be effectually reſtored. That this was the deſign of thoſe who were ſo eager for a war, might eaſily be perceived, both by the activity of ſuch Scots as had never heartily adhered to the covenant, and by the extraordinary concourſe of royaliſts into Scotland. That even men were ſent for to Edinburgh, who were moſt attached to the king's party, and moſt inveterate againſt the covenant, ſuch as Langdale, Muſgrave, Glemham, Fleming, and others, who daily conferred with their friends, whereof the parliament of England had complained to no purpoſe. That the junction with the king's party conſiſting of papiſts, epiſcopalians, and other diſaffected perſons, was a more manifeſt breach of the covenant, than what the Engliſh were charged with. That, in ſhort, by theſe proceedings the covenant, which was the baſis and foundation of the union betwixt the two nations, would be deſtroyed, whilſt it was pretended to raiſe an army to ſupport it, and even whilſt there was no other pretence to carry the war into England." Theſe repreſentations joined to the endeavours of the parliament of England's commiſſioners, who ſpared neither ſolicitations nor money to ſecond them, made ſuch impreſſion on the people, that the parliament could not help ordering, that thoſe who had not taken, or ſhould refuſe to take, the covenant, ſhould not be received into the army, or joined with it at their entrance into England. After this declaration, it ſeemed to be out of duke Hamilton's power to perform what he had promiſed the royaliſts. But he found means to evade in ſome meaſure this order when he came into England, as will hereafter appear.

Theſe and other obſtacles, daily raiſed by the marquis of Argyle and the rigid clergy, were the reaſon the parliament could not be ſo ſpeedy as the authors of the project had expected. As the people of Scotland were ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favour of the covenant and union with the Engliſh preſbyterians, the parliament was obliged to publiſh a declaration to ſatisfy them upon that head. But the contrary party pretended there was no ſincerity in a declaration full of ambiguous expreſſions, which diſcovered the ill deſigns of thoſe who were for a war. So, though the party who had cauſed the raiſing of forces to be ordered, was ſuperior in the parliament, no ſoldiers could be levied till the middle of May, and the army was not ready till the beginning of July, though the Scotch commiſſioners had aſſured it ſhould be in condition to act by the beginning of May. Moreover this army, which was to conſiſt of forty thouſand men, was not above half that number, even after the junction of the Engliſh troops.

[z] Burnet ſays, he was much againſt accepting that employment. Mem. p. 338.

But before I ſpeak of the ſucceſs of theſe mighty preparations, it will be proper to ſee what paſſed in Engiand.

Wales was the place where the firſt ſcene was opened. In that country were three colonels, namely, Langhorn, Powel, and Poyer, who had faithfully ſerved the parliament during the war, but unhappily found themſelves by the new eſtabliſhment, in the number of the ſupernumaries who were to be diſbanded, with which they were extremely diſſatisfied. Having communicated their diſcontents to each other, they reſolved all three to declare for the king, as ſoon as the Scotch army ſhould enter the kingdom. Langhorn even ſent a confident to Paris, to acquaint the queen and prince of Wales with this deſign, deſiring a commiſſion, with ſupplies of money and ammunition. The commiſſion was readily granted, but the circumſtances of the queen and prince, allowed them not to ſend the deſired ſupplies. Though theſe three officers had reſolved not to declare before the Scots had entered England, they were however obliged to it ſooner. Poyer, being governor and mayor of Pembroke in South-Wales, ſaw colonel Fleming unexpectedly arrive with the general's commiſſion to take the government of the caſtle. As this alteration could not but break the meaſures of the three colonels, Poyer refuſed to obey, under colour it was unreaſonable to deprive him of his government, without paying him his arrears[a]. The parliament was inflamed when they heard of this diſobedience, and declared Poyer a traytor, if he did not deliver the caſtle within four and twenty hours after the firſt ſummons. Poyer contemned this ordinance, and even defeated Fleming, to whom ſome troops had been ſent to put him in poſſeſſion of Pembroke-caſtle. As the particulars of this affair are not abſolutely neceſſary, I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying, that it became of greater conſequence than the parliament had imagined. Not only Langhorn and Powell joined with Poyer, but all South-Wales declared for the king, whilſt the lord Byron was labouring to draw North-Wales and the parts about Cheſter into a revolt.

During theſe tranſactions in Wales, there were commotions in Kent no leſs dangerous to the army. The king had always many friends in that county, but the neighbourhood of London and the army kept them in awe. Mean time, ſome gentlemen of the country having early information of the deſign of the Scots, took care to ſow the ſeeds of revolt, in hopes of producing fruit in due ſeaſon. The diſpoſition of the people of Kent began to ſhow itſelf in a great riot at Canterbury, the 25th of December 1647, about keeping of Chriſtmas-day. The multitude wounded and abuſed the mayor and others of the magiſtrates, and at laſt the cry was, 'For God, king Charles, and Kent.' The tumult being appeaſed, and ſome of the mutineers apprehended, the parliament had a mind to puniſh them with death. But they found ſo many obſtacles, that it was May before they ſent down a commiſſion to try them. The grand jury refuſed to find the bill, to the great aſtoniſhment of the commiſſioners. There were at that time commotions forming in the county, in which the grand jury were doubtleſs concerned, and that was the reaſon of their not finding the bill againſt their accomplices.

Though the directors of the affairs for the king had reſolved to delay the Kentiſh inſurrection till the army was marched againſt the Scots, it was not in their power to defer it ſo long. Roger L'Eſtrange, a Norfolkman[b], being in Kent, at the houſe of Mr. Hales, a young gentleman who was heir to a great eſtate, perſuaded him to undertake ſomething in favour of the king, and to ſound the gentry and people of the country that frequented his houſe. Matters were ſo ordered in the county, that about the middle of May, the people roſe, took up arms, and owned Hales for their general, in which they committed two very great errors. The firſt, in putting themſelves under the conduct of an unexperienced young man without authority. The ſecond, in riſing before the army was removed to ſome diſtance from London. As the general knew, the Scotch army was not yet ready, he detached Cromwell with part of his forces to reduce the Welſh to obedience, and then to march againſt the Scots at their entrance into England. For himſelf, he remained near London, as well to be ready to march againſt the Kentiſhmen, as to prevent the like inſurrection in London, which the army dreaded of all things. Beſides that he had no inclination, as it afterwards appeared, to act againſt the Scots.

The number of the male-contents in Kent being greatly increaſed, they were headed by George Goring earl of Norwich, and Sir William Waller, and, in expectation that London would not fail to declare for them, advanced towards Black-Heath. Then Fairfax ſpeedily paſſed the Thames with his army over London-bridge, to give them battle. The Londoners being too wiſe to declare at ſuch a juncture, the revolters thought fit to retire, ſome to Rocheſter, and others to Maidſtone. General Fairfax attacked theſe laſt ſo vigorouſly, that he carried the town by ſtorm, ſlew many of them, and took a great number of priſoners. At the firſt news of the defeat, thoſe at Rocheſter quitted the city, and poſted themſelves on Black-Heath, hoping ſtill that London would ſend them aſſiſtance, or receive them into the city. Theſe two refuges failing, and hearing moreover, that a detachment of the army was approaching, they took to flight, and were diſperſed; however, a great many were made priſoners. The earl of Norwich found means to paſs the Thames at Greenwich in boats, with five or ſix hundred men, and join his friends in Eſſex, who were upon the point of paſſing into Kent, if Fairfax had not been ſo diligent.

The county of Eſſex was in the ſame diſpoſition as Kent. There had been for ſome time in that county men, who were earneſtly labouring to excite the people againſt the army, and only waited an opportunity to appear openly, as ſoon as the army ſhould march to the north, not queſtioning but the approach of the Scots would oblige them to it. Of this number was ſir Charles Lucas, lieutenant-colonel Farr, ſir Bernard Gaſcoign; and at the ſame time, the lord Capel, one of the managers of the inſurrections, was labouring the ſame thing in Hertfordſhire. Though the Kentiſh inſurrection had been unſucceſsful, the Eſſex royaliſts were not diſcouraged. They ſtill hoped, either that London would declare for the king, or the Scotch army make ſo great progreſs, that the army of England would not be able to withſtand ſo many attacks from all quarters. For there was ſcarce a county, but what was to have ſome inſurrection, thoſe eſpecially, where the king's party prevailed during the war. So the parliament having ſent a general pardon into Eſſex, for ſuch as ſhould lay down their arms, moſt refuſed it by the inſtances of ſir Charles Lucas who was the moſt active royaliſt in thoſe parts.

The general remained in Kent no longer than was neceſſary to raiſe the ſiege of Dover, undertaken by Waller, and quiet the country, to which he granted very advantageous terms, conſidering their preſent circumſtances. This done, he repaſſed the Thames and marched into Eſſex[c], where the number of the revolters was increaſed by the junction of the troops brought out of Hertfordſhire by the lord Capel. Nevertheleſs, as they found themſelves unable to keep the field before a victorious as well as a ſtronger army, they reſolved to retire to Colcheſter. This was an open unfortified town: but they ſpeedily caſt up ſuch works before the avenues, that they did not fear being ſtormed. Here they reſolved to defend themſelves, and wait the event of affairs in the other counties, and particularly in the north.

The principal men who were in Colcheſter, were the earl of Norwich[d], the lord Capel, ſir George Leſlie, ſir William Compton, ſir Charles Lucas, ſir Barnard Gaſcoign, lieutenant colonel Farr, and ſeveral other good officers, with a garriſon of three thouſand men, all bent to ſell their lives dearly. This furniſhed the general with a reaſon, or perhaps a pretence, not to attack the town in form, but to block it up, and reduce the beſieged by famine. I ſay, this might be a pretence: for it ſeems, in ſuch a juncture, when all the kingdom was in a flame, and the Scotch army expected every moment, it was not proper for the general to be employed in a blockade, which would probably laſt ſome time, whilſt he left the reſt of the kingdom defenceleſs, and was in great danger from the city of London. But as he might have good reaſons to run no hazard, it is not my buſineſs to cenſure his conduct. All that can be ſaid is, that his whole proceedings ſhewed his unwillingneſs to fight with the Scots, though he always acted vigorouſly againſt the king's friends. May I venture to make one conjecture? Fairfax was a zealous preſbyterian, but hitherto had ſuffered himſelf to be guided, or rather deceived, by Cromwell. Perhaps having diſcovered the artfices and ill-deſigns of this friend, he would not have been ſorry to ſee Cromwell defeated, in expectation that if he were ſlain, or loſt his reputation, it would be eaſier to make peace, which he found to be impracticable ſo long as Cromwell could oppoſe it. According to this ſuppoſition, the blockade of Colcheſter enabled the general to wait, without any hazard, the event of the war preparing in the north. However this be, he applied himſelf to the blockade, which began the 10th of June, and laſted till Auguſt [e].

The revolted Kentiſhmen, as I ſaid, had twice advanced towards London, in hopes the city would declare for them. This hope was not altogether groundleſs. Beſides that the city was known to be very much diſpleaſed with the army, the common people had, in the beginning of April, ſhewn their readineſs for any undertaking. Some perſons playing and ſporting on a Sunday in Moorfields in contempt of the ordinance of parliament, the conſtables of that quarter would have diſperſed them: but it was not in their power. The obſtinacy of the mob went ſo far, that a party of the trained-bands were forced to be ſent for. But before the party arrived, the number of the rioters was grown ſo great, that they fell upon and diſperſed the trained-bands, wounding and killing ſeveral. This ſucceſs ſo inflamed the tumult, that the mob came from all quarters to join with the mutineers. Some ſeized Newgate and Ludgate; others went to the lord-mayor's houſe, who ſeeing them coming, ran away to the Tower, whilſt others made towards Whitehall, but were repulſed by the regiment of horſe poſted in the Meuſe for a guard to the parliament. In the night the tumult ſtill increaſed; the cry was every where, 'For God and king Charles.' The general, who was then in London, with only the two regiments at Whitehall and the Meuſe, immediately called a council, where it was debated, whether they ſhould ſtay for more forces, or attack the mutineers with theſe two regiments. The laſt was judged the moſt adviſeable, whilſt the ſeditious were yet acting with great confuſion, and had no leader to conduct them. They were therefore vigorouſly attacked when they leaſt expected it, and thought themſelves maſters of the city, and though they made an obſtinate defence, were at length diſperſed. The parliament having received the circumſtances of this commotion, believed it to have been very dangerous, and ordered public thanks to be given to God in all the churches of London for its being happily appeaſed. When I ſay the parliament, I mean the parliament ſtill directed by the independents, who dreaded nothing ſo much as to ſee London declare againſt the army. But as the army was not yet removed, the magiſtrates were too wiſe to declare ſo unſeaſonably.

I have already mentioned two of the projects againſt the army; the inſurrection in Wales, which kept Cromwell employed till the beginning of July; and that of Kent, which by too great a precipitation, miſcarried; and laſtly, of the tumult in London, which probably had been raiſed by ſome raſh and inconſiderate royaliſts, who knew nothing of the projects that were formed. I muſt now ſpeak of ſome others which were executed about the ſame time, that is, whilſt preparations were making in Scotland to ſend an army into England, and which were attended with no better ſucceſs.

The firſt was the duke of York's eſcape, the king's ſecond ſon, from St. James's palace, where he was under the earl of Northumberland's cuſtody, and his retreat into Holland, to his ſiſter the princeſs of Orange. Thus to have his two eldeſt ſons out of the power of his enemies was no ſmall advantage and ſatisfaction to the king [f].

Some days after, Langdale poſſeſſed himſelf of Berwick, and Muſgrave of Carliſle. The parliament had received ſome intelligence of the deſign to ſurprize theſe places, and might have prevented it by putting garriſons there. But as, by the late treaty with Scotland, they were to be left to the care of the inhabitants, the two houſes were unwilling by ſeizing them to give the Scots ſo juſt an occaſion to complain, at a time when they wanted pretences to ſend an army into England. They contented themſelves therefore with ordering the mayors, to take care and provide againſt a ſurprize, which however they either could not, or would not prevent.

As ſoon as Langdale was maſter of Berwick, all the royaliſts in Yorkſhire, Cumberland, and Weſtmoreland came and joined them. By this means he quickly formed a body of three thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, which enabled him to go in queſt of general Lambert, who commanded in thoſe parts for the parliament. But he received very expreſs orders from Edinburgh not to engage in any action, what advantage ſoever he might thence expect, but to retire about Carliſle till the arrival of the Scotch army, which he obeyed. The reaſon of this order was, that as the rigid preſbyterians of Scotland were extremely jealous of the royal party, the directors of affairs were apprehenſive, that the progreſs made in England for the king, would obſtruct the levying an army in Scotland. And indeed, it was publicly ſaid, the army was intended for the king's rather than for the ſervice of the Engliſh preſbyterians.

The loſs of Berwick and Carliſle was followed ſoon after with another, which ſeemingly ſhould have embroiled the affairs of the independents. I mean the revolt of part of the fleet about the end of May. The parliament having ordered eight men of war to guard the ſeas during the ſummer, theſe ſhips lay in the Downs to take in proviſions, which was done but ſlowly, becauſe there was not much to be feared from the ſea. While this part of the fleet lay in the Downs, ſome Kentiſh gentlemen, the king's friends, frequently came on board [g]. Whether they found in the ſailors an inclination to mutiny, or raiſed it themſelves by converſing with them, it happened ſhortly after, that the ſervice was not performed in the fleet with the ſame ſubmiſſion as before. The ſailors took the liberty to contradict their officers and obey them no farther than they pleaſed. The officers perceiving this great alteration, acquainted the parliament with it, and immediately vice-admiral Rainſborough, who was to command that ſquadron, was ordered to repair to the fleet, and inquire into the cauſes of this diſobedience. Rainſborough, being naturally very ſevere, began to make ſtrict inquiſition on board the admiral's ſhip; upon which the men all roſe againſt him, and ſeizing on him, put him with ſome more of the officers into the boat, and ſent them on ſhore. This was no ſooner known to the reſt of the ſhips, but they followed their example, and uſed ſuch officers as they did not like, in the ſame manner. As the fleet was not yet well victualled, they were obliged to ſtay ſome days longer in the Downs, during which the royaliſts ſupplied them with neceſſaries in the beſt manner they could. After that they ſailed for Holland, and came to an anchor at the Brill, in order to put themſelves under the command of the duke of York, who was deſigned by the king to be lord high-admiral, as ſoon as he ſhould be of fit age for that poſt.

The duke of York repairing to the fleet, then at Helvoet-Sluys, was received with great acclamations. He declared the lord Willoughby of Parham, his vice-admiral [h], and appointed ſome other officers in the ſeveral ſhips, the ſailors having kept very few above the rank of a boatſwain or mate [i]. As ſoon as the prince of Wales, who was at Paris with the queen his mother, heard of this revolt, he reſolved to command the fleet himſelf, and employ it to the beſt advantage. But want of money detained him longer than he wiſhed, cardinal Mazarin, not being very forward to ſupply him, no more than the earl of Ormond, who waited in vain at Paris, for the performance of his promiſes concerning Ireland. The news that the duke his brother was preparing to ſail with the fleet, made him repeat his endeavours to procure money upon loan, and ſucceeding at laſt, came to Calais, and from thence by ſea to Helvoet-Sluys. He was received by the fleet with all the reſpect and joy that could be deſired, and having provided what was wanting, by the prince of Orange's aſſiſtance, ſent back the duke of York to the Hague, it not being proper to venture both at one time. His deſign was to ſeize Yarmouth, whether to go from thence and head the Scotch army, when it ſhould be in England, or to ſecure an entrance into the kingdom, when there ſhould be occaſion. In ſailing to Yarmouth, he took a ſhip of London, bound for Rotterdam, laden with cloth by the company of merchant-adventurers. It was ſaid this ſhip was worth forty thouſand pounds. He ordered the goods to be ſealed up, and continued his courſe. But he ſucceeded not at Yarmouth as he expected, the town refuſing to admit him, though great part of the inhabitants were for the king. Wherefore he reſolved to enter the Thames, as well to intercept all outward and homeward-bound ſhips, as to ſupport the king's party, and that of the preſbyterians in the parliament and city; for he was not ignorant of the projects that were formed. Beſides, the queen his mother had enjoined him to court the preſbyterians, conceiving it was only by their means, that the king could be reſtored. For this reaſon alſo, he afterwards releaſed the cloth ſhip for twelve thouſand pounds.

Whilſt the prince lay in the Thames, where he ſeized ſome other merchant-ſhips, the earl of Warwick, being well aſſured of the fidelity of the reſt of the ſhips at Portſmouth, and elſewhere, aſſembled a fleet, and anchored in ſight of the prince; ſo that in all appearance the two fleets would not part without an engagement. But though the prince ſeemed inclined to it, he was adviſed to avoid it if poſſible, and not without reaſon. His ſhips were fewer, and much ſmaller than the earl of Warwick's; beſides, the earl expected others from Portſmouth every moment, which arriving the next day, rendered him very ſuperior. So the prince ſailed back to Holland, and ſecured his fleet at Helvoet-Sluys. The earl of Warwick followed him, and appeared before that port, but to no manner of purpoſe.

Thus ended the prince of Wales's expedition with the ſhips revolted from the parliament. The money he received for the prizes he had taken, was not ſufficient to pay his fleet, and provide it with neceſſaries, ſo that it procured him more trouble than advantage. Before I leave this ſubject, it will not be improper, briefly to explain ſome circumſtances in the lord Clarendon's hiſtory.

Whilſt the two fleets lay in ſight, and ſeemed to prepare for battle, the prince ſent Harry Seymour to the earl of Warwick, with a letter to invite him to return to his allegiance. The earl anſwered, that he adviſed his highneſs to put himſelf into the hands of the parliament. Notwithſtanding this diſcouraging anſwer, the prince ſent Mr. Crofts to the earl, who had married his aunt, imagining, he durſt not venture to diſcover his ſentiments to Seymour. But Crofts returned with much the ſame anſwer. Hence it appears, the prince thought he had ſome room to rely on the earl of Warwick, as the lord Clarendon inſinuates, and the ground of his hope, which was properly the effect only of his, or rather of the whole royal party's prepoſſeſſion, was briefly this. The Scotch commiſſioners, as I ſaid, did not acquaint the leading preſbyterians with the particulars of their treaty with the king in the iſle of Wight. They only told them, an army would be raiſed in Scotland to deliver the king out of the hands of the independents, and that it was neceſſary the royaliſts and preſbyterians ſhould ſecond theſe endeavours, by acting jointly or ſeparately. This propoſal being accepted, the royaliſts and preſbyterians prepared, as I have ſaid, to countenance the deſigns of the Scots by inſurrections in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. Matters ſtanding thus, Henry Rich earl of Holland, who had acted an ill part in the late war, had a mind, on this occaſion, to reconcile himſelf to the king, by labouring his reſtoration. To that end, he received a commiſſion from the prince of Wales, impowering him to raiſe forces for the king's ſervice, and his brother the earl of Warwick promiſed to aſſiſt him in his deſigns. This is what the prince knew, and what made him believe the earl of Warwick was in the ſame diſpoſition with his brother. But there was a wide difference between the views of the royaliſts, and thoſe of the preſbyterians. Theſe, of whom the earl of Warwick was one of the heads, did not pretend to reſtore the king without terms, but only to free him out of the hands of the independents, to make conditions with him afterwards, which they called ſettling the peace of the kingdom. But the prince, and the king's whole party would not underſtand this difference, and prepoſterouſly imagined, that all who had promiſed to act againſt the independents, had thereby engaged to ſerve the king without terms. Herein lay the miſtake. It is therefore evident, the earl of Warwick, who acted upon preſbyterian views, could not believe it his intereſt to deliver the fleet to the prince, ſince, notwithſtanding the preſent occaſion which induced the preſbyterians to be in a readineſs to act againſt the army, they ſtill conſidered the royal party as their real enemies.

In the beginning of June, the king's friends found means to ſurprize Pontefract caſtle in Yorkſhire, and put a garriſon there. Shortly after Scarborough caſtle revolted from the parliament, and declared for the king.

The Scotch army being at length upon the point of entering England, general Fairfax being ſtill employed in the blockade of Colcheſter, and Cromwell in the ſiege of Pembroke, and as there were but two regiments in London, Henry Rich, earl of Holland, thought he could not have a fairer opportunity to execute his deſign in favour of the king. This deſign was ſo far from being a ſecret, that it was become the common talk of the city. It was known beforehand, what day the earl of Holland was to depart, and the parliament did not ſeem to regard it. It was not for want of information; but the ſcene of affairs was much altered ſince the army's removal from London. The independents prevailed no more in the parliament, and the preſbyterians began to hold up their heads. For this reaſon, the independents did not think proper, at ſuch a juncture, to take any ſteps that might induce the city of London to declare openly. On the other hand, the preſbyterian members were far from endeavouring to prevent the earl of Holland's deſign, which they conſidered as flowing from the general combination for the delivery of the king out of the hands of the enemy. So, the earl publicly departed from London, with about one hundred horſe, and came to Kingſton upon Thames, where George Villiers the young duke of Buckingham, the lord Francis Villiers his brother, Henry Mordaunt earl of Peterborough, and the family of the earl of Northampton, met him with ſome troops[k]. As ſoon as they were joined, they ſent a letter to the lord-mayor, and common-council of London, declaring their intention was to join the forces of Surry, Suſſex, and Middleſex, to releaſe his majeſty's perſon, to bring him with honour to his parliament, and to ſettle peace in the kingdom: and deſired their aſſiſtance no farther than their deſigns were really for the good and happineſs of the king, parliament, and kingdom, 'according to the covenant.' Theſe laſt words, according to the covenant, ſeemed neceſſary, becauſe they knew the preſbyterians wiſhed for nothing ſo much as the confirmation of the covenant. But the magiſtrates of London thought not fit to chuſe for leaders, the earl of Holland, who was in no great repute, or the duke of Buckingham, an unexperienced youth, who had only the king's ſervice in view, without any regard to the public, or the covenant; or in ſhort, any of theſe lords, whoſe principles were by no means agreeable to thoſe of the preſbyterians. So, without anſwering the letter, they ſent it to the parliament, who immediately voted the lords that had ſigned it to be traitors, and their eſtates to be ſequeſtered.

The ſame day the letter was writ, colonel Leveſey, with ſome companies of the two regiments that were quartered in Weſtminſter, met theſe lords near Kingſton, and entirely routed them. But, Leveſey's foot which was left behind, not being yet arrived, and the lords having ſent theirs to Kingſton, to ſecure their retreat, the horſe only, on both ſides, were engaged. Leveſey briſkly purſued them to Kingſton, where the foot ſtood their ground, and hindered the enemy's horſe from entering the town. That ſame night they quitted Kingſton, and retired to St. Alban's, with about four hundred men.

Mean while, general Fairfax hearing of this inſurrection, ſent from the blockade of Colcheſter, colonel Scroop with a regiment of horſe, to the aſſiſtance of the parliament's troops. Scroop coming to Hertford, was informed, that the lords who had been defeated at Kingſton, were at St. Neot's in a negligent manner. Upon this intelligence, he marched thither in the night, and ſurprized them in that little town, killing ſome of their men, taking above a hundred priſoners, and diſperſing the reſt. The lord Francis Villiers was ſlain[l]. His brother the duke of Buckingham found means to eſcape, and the earl of Holland was taken, conducted to London, and afterwards ſent priſoner to Warwick-caſtle. Thus ended this ill-concerted enterprize, managed by perſons of no experience or ſkill in the art of war.

At laſt, duke Hamilton entered England at the head of the Scotch army, the 9th of July. The eleventh of the ſame month, Pembroke-caſtle ſurrendered to Cromwell, who immediately diſpatched a body of horſe to reinforce the army in the north, commanded by major-general Lambert. He departed himſelf three days after, with the reſt of his forces which were already very much fatigued by their late ſiege, and of which the greateſt part wanted ſhoes and ſtockings, though they undertook a long march, which pobably would be followed with a battle. Theſe difficulties diſcouraged not Cromwell. He purſued his march with all poſſible diligence, and yet could not join Lambert till the middle of Auguſt. We muſt now ſee what duke Hamilton was doing, whilſt Cromwell was marching towards him.

The deſign of thoſe who had prevailed for the raiſing an army in Scotland, ſeemed to be to aſſiſt the Engliſh preſbyterians, to free the parliament from the yoke of the independents, and to deliver the king out of the hands of the army. Theſe at leaſt were the moſt plauſible things that were urged to induce the parliament of Scotland to conſent to this extraordinary expedition. But it may very juſtly be doubted, whether this was the deſign of all the leaders of the party, Some, among whom were duke Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerick, probably, ſought only to reſtore the king without terms, or at leaſt without any other condition than what he had himſelf offered, namely, his promiſe to obſerve the ancient laws. They did not much concern themſelves about maintaining the eſtabliſhment of preſbyterianiſm in England, or the covenant between the two nations. Others, as the earls of Loudon and Lauderdale, who had been commiſſioners in England, really intended to ſerve the king, but upon theſe two conditions, that the preſbyterian-government ſhould be eſtabliſhed in the church of England, and the covenant punctually obſerved. As they thought, they had taken ſufficient care of theſe two points by the Iſle of Wight treaty, they little regarded the other conditions required of the king by the parliament of England, concerning the militia, nomination to the great offices, &c. But very likely, their deſign was to deceive one another. Theſe meant to make uſe of the king's party to procure the execution of the Iſle of Wight treaty, and the king's party, feigning to agree to what the others deſired, intended to make uſe of them to enable the king not to be forced to receive any terms. The duke of Hamilton's conduct after his entrance into England, ſeems to me a very ſtrong evidence, that he deſigned not to act in favour of the preſbyterians. If he had ſuch an intention, he ſhould not, it ſeems, have loſt, as he did, forty days in the northern counties, but have marched directly to London. Lambert would not have been able to hinder his march, being much weaker than he. Cromwell was yet employed in Wales, and Fairfax in the blockade of Colcheſter. Probably, if, without loſing time, he had marched to London, he would have arrived before Cromwell and Lambert could have joined their forces; and if Fairfax had quitted the blockade of Colcheſter, in order to throw himſelf into London, very likely, the inhabitants would have ſhut their gates againſt him, ſince they would have been ſupported by the army of Scotland. At leaſt, in caſe Fairfax had riſen from before Colcheſter, that town, the whole county of Eſſex, and doubtleſs, Suffolk and Norfolk, would have joined with the Scots. In a word, if the Scotch army had marched towards the center of the kingdom, there would, doubtleſs, have been in many places, inſurrections, which would have greatly diſtreſſed the army of the independents; and if duke Hamilton could have reached London, certainly the city and parliament would have openly declared againſt the army, and expelled out of both houſes, the independent members. It will hereafter appear, theſe are not bare conjectures, conſidering what paſſed in the city and parliament, whilſt it was expected, the Scotch army would take the courſe I have been ſpeaking of.

But duke Hamilton had doubtleſs other views, ſince he ſtaid above a month in the north, without any neceſſity. The lord Clarendon conjectures, the duke's intention was, to afford time to the Engliſh army to defeat thoſe forces which were up in ſeveral parts of the kingdom for the king, that they might not be ſo united as to obſtruct the preſbyterians deſign. But, whatever regard I may have for that noble hiſtorian, I cannot be of his opinion, for two reaſons which ſeem to me very ſtrong. The firſt is, that duke Hamilton was not a zealous preſbyterian. On the contrary, though he had taken the covenant, he was epiſcopal in his heart, as he had ſufficiently diſcovered whilſt he could do it without danger. The ſecond is, that he was the man who had moſt courted and drawn into Scotland the royaliſts, whilſt the voting of an army was in queſtion. I ſhould rather think, he had a quite contrary aim to what the lord Clarendon imputes to him; that inſtead of deſigning to countenance the preſbyterian party, he rather feared to render them too powerful, by approaching London, knowing, when the king ſhould be in the hands of the preſbyterians, his condition would not be much happier. Very likely, his long ſtay in the north, was only to give the king's friends in thoſe parts opportunity to join Langdale's forces, and thereby render the king's party ſuperior.

However this be, not to dwell too long upon conjectures, as ſoon as duke Hamilton entered England, he marched to Carliſle, from whence he drew out the Engliſh, placed there by Muſgrave, and put in a Scotch garriſon. Some days after, Langdale joined him with about four thouſand Engliſh foot, and ſeven or eight hundred horſe [m]. But theſe troops remained ſeparate, and in the marches, Langdale was always a day before the Scotch army. This was to evade in ſome meaſure the order of the parliament of Scotland, that the Engliſh who ſhould refuſe to take the covenant, ſhould not be received into the army, nor act in conjunction with the Scots. Nevertheleſs the Engliſh and Scots made but one army, under the command of duke Hamilton, from whom Langdale received orders. Lambert, who was poſted near the place where the two armies joined, or at leaſt approached each other, retired in ſuch diſorder, that probably he would have been defeated, had he been purſued, but duke Hamilton did not think fit to improve that advantage. He continued ſome days at Carliſle, after which he marched to Kendal in Weſtmoreland, where he reſted again, till finding not wherewithall to ſubſiſt his army, he was forced, as it were, to proceed to Lancaſhire with part of his army, leaving the reſt at Kendal. At length, he advanced to Preſton, where he halted, the reaſon whereof is not known, unleſs it was to ſtay for Monroe, who was coming with three thouſand men out of Ireland.

Mean while, Cromwell having reached Yorkſhire, Lambert inſtantly joined him, and they marched together directly to Preſton, where duke Hamilton lay. Langdale who made the van of the duke's army with his Engliſh troops, ſent him notice that Cromwell was approaching with a reſolution to give him battle, and conſequently it was neceſſary to keep his army together. But the duke regarded not this intelligence, believing it to be only ſome detachment of Cromwell's army. In ſhort, Langdale was attacked by the enemies horſe, who drove him to Preſton, where he brought with him ſome priſoners, who affirmed that Cromwell's whole army was near. Whereupon the duke ſent him back to his troops, promiſing to ſend him aſſiſtance, but diſappointed him. So Langdale being attacked, was forced to maintain a very unequal fight, which laſted however five or ſix hours; but at laſt he was entirely routed. Immediately after, Cromwell's horſe marched directly to Preſton, where all was in ſuch confuſion that nothing was thought of but flight. The duke himſelf thought proper to retire by the bridge, which he in vain endeavoured to guard, after paſſing it. The following letter was ſent by Cromwell to the parliament, the 20th of Auguſt, containing a particular account of what paſſed between the two armies, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of Auguſt.

" AFTER the conjunction of that party which I brought with me out of Wales with the northern forces about Knareſborough and Wetherby, hearing that the enemy was advanced with their army to Lancaſhire, we came the 6th inſtant to Hodder-bridge over Ribble, where we had a council of war; and upon advertiſement the enemy intended ſouthward, and ſince confirmed, that they reſolved for London itſelf, and information that the Iriſh forces under Monroe, lately come out of Ireland, which conſiſted of twelve hundred horſe, and fifteen hundred foot, were on their march towards Lancaſhire to join with them, it was thought, to engage the enemy to fight was our buſineſs; and accordingly marching over the bridge that night, quartered the whole army in the fields. Next morning we marched towards Preſton, having intelligence that the enemy was drawing together thereabouts from all his out quarters; we drew out a forlorn of about two hundred horſe, and four hundred foot; theſe gallantly engaged the enemy's ſcouts and out-guards, until we had opportunity to bring up our whole army. So ſoon as our foot and horſe came up, we reſolved that night to engage them if we could; and therefore advancing with our forlorns, and putting the reſt of the army into as good a poſture as the ground would bear, (which was totally inconvenient for our horſe, being all incloſure and miry ground) we preſſed upon them through a lane, and forced them from their ground, after four hours diſpute, until we came to the town; into which four troops of my regiment firſt entered; and being well ſeconded by colonel Harriſon's regiment, charged the enemy in the town, and cleared the ſtreets. At laſt the enemy was put into diſorder, many men ſlain, and many priſoners taken; the duke with moſt of the Scots horſe and foot retreated over the bridge; where after a very ſhort diſpute betwixt the Lancaſhire regiments (part of my lord general's and them being at puſh of pike) they were beaten from the bridge, and our horſe and foot followed them, killed many, and took divers priſoners; and we poſſeſſed the bridge over Derwent, and a few houſes there, the enemy being drawn up within muſquet ſhot of us, where we lay that night, we not being able to attempt further upon the enemy, the night preventing us. In this poſture did the enemy and we lie moſt part of that night; upon entering the town, many of of the enemy's horſe fled towards Lancaſter, in the chaſe of whom we had divers of our horſe, who purſued them near ten miles, and had execution of them, and took about five hundred horſe, and many priſoners: we poſſeſſed in the fight very much of the enemy's ammunition; I believe they loſt four or five thouſand arms; the number of the ſlain we judge to be about a thouſand, the priſoners we took near about four thouſand.

"In the night they marched away, ſeven or eight thouſand foot, and about four thouſand horſe; we followed them with about three thouſand foot, and about two thouſand five hundred horſe and dragoons; and in this proſecution that worthy gentleman colonel Thornhaugh, preſſing too boldly, was ſlain, being run into the body, thigh, and head, by the enemies lancers: our horſe ſtill proſecuted the enemy, killing and taking divers all the way; but by that time our army was come up, they recovered Wigan before we could attempt any thing upon them. We lay that night in the field cloſe by the enemy, lying very dirty and weary, where we had ſome ſkirmiſhing, &c. We took major-general Van Druſke, colonel Hurrey, and lieutenant-colonel Ennis.

"The next morning the enemy marched towards Warrington, made a ſtand at a paſs near Winwick; we held them in ſome diſpute until our army was come up, they maintaining the paſs with great reſolution for many hours; but our men, by the bleſſing of God, charged very home upon them, beat them from their ſtanding, where we killed about a thouſand of them, and took (as we believe) about two thouſand priſoners, and proſecuted them home to Warrington-town, where they poſſeſſed the bridge. As ſoon as we came thither, I received a meſſage from lieutenant-general Bailey, deſiring ſome capitulation; to which I yielded, and gave him theſe terms: That he ſhould ſurrender himſelf and all his officers and ſoldiers priſoners of war, with all his arms, ammunition, and horſes, upon quarter for life; which accordingly is done. Here are took about four thouſand compleat arms, and as many priſoners: and thus you have their infantry ruined.

"The duke is marched with his remaining horſe (which are about three thouſand) towards Nantwich, where the gentlemen of the county have taken about five hundred of them; the country will ſcarce ſuffer any of them to paſs, but bring in and kill divers as they light upon them. I have ſent poſt to my lord Grey and Sir Edward Rhodes, to gather all together with ſpeed for their proſecution: Monroe is about Cumberland, with the horſe that ran away, and his Iriſh horſe and foot; but I have left a conſiderable ſtrength, I hope, to make reſiſtance till we can come up to them.

"Thus you have the narrative of the particulars of the ſucceſs. I could hardly tell how to ſay leſs, there being ſo much of God; and I was not willing to ſay more, leſt there ſhould ſeem to be any thing of man; only give me leave to add one word, ſhewing the diſparity of the forces of both ſides; that ſo you may ſee, and all the world acknowledge, the great hand of God in this buſineſs: The Scots army could not be leſs than twelve thouſand foot well armed, and five thouſand horſe; Langdale not leſs than two thouſand five hundred foot, and fifteen hundred horſe; in all twenty-one thouſand: in ours, in all, about eight thouſand ſix hundred, and by computation about two thouſand of the enemy ſlain, betwixt eight and nine thouſand priſoners, beſides what are lurking in hedges and private places, which the country daily bring in, or deſtroy."

To finiſh, in a few words, the relation of the unfortunate end of duke Hamilton and his army, I ſhall add, to what is ſaid in Cromwell's letter, that the duke retiring to Nantwich, and finding himſelf purſued by Lambert with a ſtrong party of horſe, marched to Utoxeter in Staffordſhire, where Lambert was almoſt as ſoon as he, and where the Scots made not the leaſt ſhow of reſiſtance. In a word, the duke was taken with all the officers about him; and of the whole army, the horſe only eſcaped, who went and joined Monroe in Cumberland. To this came the great effort of Scotland in favour of the king. I ſay in favour of the king, for it is certain, moſt of the authors of the enterpriſe intended the king's reſtoration, though they covered their deſign with other pretences.

The defeat of the Scotch army was followed, within few days, by the taking of Colcheſter, the blockade whereof had laſted above two months. The beſieged having been forced to ſurrender at diſcretion, the general called a council of war, where it was determined, that Sir George Liſle, Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir Bernard Gaſcoigne[n] ſhould be ſhot to death. The two firſt were executed, but the general hearing, Sir Bernard was a Florentine, ſaved his life, for fear the Grand Duke ſhould revenge his death on the Engliſh gentlemen, who frequently travelled into his dominions[o].

The prince of Wales was at the Hague, when the news of duke Hamilton's defeat arrived there. On the morrow, John Maitland earl of Lauderdale waited on him with a letter from the parliament of Scotland, inviting him to come into their country, and head their army in England. But the news he had received the day before being confirmed, he did not think fit to hazard his perſon to no purpoſe, though the earl of Lauderdale preſſed him extremely to depart. So the earl was obliged to return all alone.

After the recital of the effects of the ſeveral commotions raiſed by the king's friends in the laſt ſeven or eight months, it will be neceſſary, before we proceed, to ſpeak of what paſſed the mean while in the parliament and city.

Since the two houſes had voted no more addreſſes to the king, there was a perfect union between the parliament and the army. The army no more pretended to meddle in ſtate affairs. They conſented that the ſupernumerary troops, that is, ſuch as were not upon the late eſtabliſhment, ſhould be diſbanded by companies, as money was raiſed to pay them. They promiſed to retire to the towns and garriſons as ſoon as the parliament ſhould ſettle the neceſſary funds for their regular pay. This condeſcenſion or rather ſubmiſſion to the parliament, proceeded from the independents power in both houſes, no reſolution being taken but by their direction, or at leaſt that was contrary to their views. On the other hand, though the preſbyterians were not ſorry, there were inſurrections in the kingdom capable of keeping the army employed, and obliging them to remove from London, they were in danger however that the king's party would grow too powerful before the Scotch army ſhould enter England. Upon this army it was that they founded their hope of becoming once more maſters of the parliament and kingdom. But they perceived, that before the arrival of the aſſiſtance expected from Scotland, it was not their intereſt to ſecond the endeavours of the royaliſts, whoſe views were very oppoſite to theirs, for fear of enabling them to renew the war by their own ſtrength. On the other hand, they would have acted very imprudently, if they had openly declared againſt the army whilſt it was about London: without having ſufficient force to reſiſt it. The aſſiſtance of Scotland could only enable them to hold up their heads. For which reaſon the votes of both houſes were always unanimous to condemn the inſurrections in Wales, Kent, Eſſex, as well as thoſe of the earl of Holland and the duke of Buckingham. This was alſo the reaſon, that the independents met with no obſtacle in cauſing the eleven members accuſed by the army to be declared incapable of ſerving in parliament, and the lord-mayor, aldermen of London, and the ſeven peers to be proſecuted with the utmoſt rigour for being concerned in the tumult of the 26th of July. Theſe were the reſolutions of a parliament yet governed and directed by the independents. But when once Cromwell was engaged in Wales with part of the army, Fairfax employed at the blockade of Colcheſter, and when the ſurpriſal of Berwick and Carliſle had made it neceſſary to ſend ſome regiments into the North, the face of affairs began to change. The independent members found themſelves obliged, in their turn, to diſſemble, and conſent to things which they would doubtleſs have oppoſed, had the army been near to ſupport them.

The 27th of April, before the army removed from London, upon information, true or falſe, brought to the parliament[p], that ſome officers had plotted to diſarm, and then plunder the city, the common-council preſented a petition

[n] Or rather Guaſconi, for that was the name of this Florentine, whom the Engliſh called Gaſcoigne. Rapin.

[o] The other Priſoners taken at Colcheſter were, George Goring earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, Henry Haſtings lord Louborough, Sr William Compton, Sir Ab. Shipman, Sir John Watts, Sir Lodovick Dyer, Sir Henry Appleton, Sir Dennard Strutt, Sir Hugh Oriley, Sir Richard Mauliverer, ten colonels, eight lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, thirty captains, gentlemen ſixty-five, lieutenants ſeventy-two, enſigns and cornets ſixty-nine, ſerjeants an hundred and eighty-three, private ſoldiers three thouſand ſixty-ſeven. They held out ſo long, that all the dogs and cats, and moſt of the horſes were eaten. The women and children being at the lord Goring's door, Aug. 20, crying out for bread, he told them 'They muſt eat their children, if they wanted." Whereupon the women reviling him, threatened to pull out his eyes. The town was preſerved from plunder, upon paying ten thouſand pounds. Ruſhworth, Tom. VII. p. 1232—1256. Whitelock, p. 324.

[p] One John Everard made an affidavit before the common-council, that being in bed in an inn at Windſor, he heard ſome officers talking of diſarming the city, and then make them advance a million of money, or plunder them. Whereupon the common-council informed the houſe of the ſame in their petition. Ruſhworth, Tom. VII. p. 1070—1073.

to the houſe of commons, deſiring, that the chains of the city, which had been lately pulled down, might be ſet up again: the army moved to a farther diſtance from London: and major-general Skippon appointed to command within the lines of communication, and the weekly bills of mortality. It is evident the common-council had a mind to have it in their power to act when the Scotch army ſhould enter England. For they could not imagine the Scots had other thoughts than to ſupport the preſbyterian party. The houſe granted two of their requeſts, and took time to conſider of the removal of the army.

The next day the houſe of commons having taken into conſideration the affair of ſettling the government, voted:

"1. That the government of the kingdom ſhould be ſtill by king, lords, and commons.

"2. That the ground-work for this government ſhould be the propoſitions laſt preſented to the king at Hampton-court.

"3. That any member of the houſe ſhould have leave to ſpeak freely to any votes, ordinances, or declarations, concerning the king, &c."

Theſe votes were directly contrary to the deſigns of the independents, who meant to aboliſh regal power, and eſtabliſh a common-wealth. But as their intention was yet a ſecret, or at leaſt they had not declared it, they did not think proper to diſcover it too openly, by oppoſing theſe votes.

Some days after, ſundry of the inhabitants of London preſented a petition to the common-council, praying, that the lord-mayor and ſheriffs of London might be part of the committee for the militia of the city, and that the reſt of the committee might be choſen by the common-council.

Upon this, the lord-mayor and common-council preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, ſhowing,

"That the general having by letter informed the houſe of commons of his deſigns to remove the two regiments that were at Weſtminſter, they conceived, that there was an expectation, the parliament ſhould be guarded by the forces of the city, which they were ready to do, provided they were put into a capacity to perform the ſame, by ſettling the militia of London, and being authoriſed ſo to do.

"That the lord-mayor and common-council might, by ordinance of parliament, be authoriſed to nominate and preſent to both houſes of parliament a committee for the militia of the ſaid city; whereby commanders and ſoldiers might be the better united and encouraged to perform their duties, for the ſafety and preſervation of the parliament and city.

"That the command of the Tower of London might be put into the hand of ſuch a perſon as ſhould be nominated and preſented to both houſes of parliament by the lord-mayor and common council.

"That the ſoldiers there remaining might be removed."

All this was granted againſt the intereſts of the independents, who, for a few months before, had ordered the contrary, becauſe they knew the Londoners were not for them. Thus the city endeavoured by degrees, under divers pretences, to put themſelves in a condition to act, when the ſeaſon was ripe.

It appears alſo by a declaration of the houſe of commons of the 5th of May, how much the preſbyterians began to be ſuperior in the parliament. This declaration ran: 'That the houſe is reſolved to preſerve and maintain the ſolemn league and covenant, and the treaties between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland: and that they will be ready to join with the kingdom of Scotland in the propoſitions agreed upon by the two kingdoms, and preſented to his majeſty at Hampton-court.' This was as a toothing to unite themſelves with the Scots, as ſoon as they ſhould enter the kingdom. Probably, the commons believed them to be more ready than they were, and moreover, were yet ignorant, that the aim of thoſe who had promoted the raiſing of an army in Scotland, was rather to ſerve the king, than ſupport the preſbyterian-party in England. But they ſoon perceived, the royaliſts intended not to maintain the parliament's intereſt. If the cavaliers, for ſo the king's party were called, had behaved with a little more policy, and leſs paſſion and heat, they might have done the king ſignal ſervice. But they ſo openly ſhowed, that their deſign was to reſtore the king without terms, that they obliged the preſbyterians to be upon their guard, and even to oppoſe them, inſtead of acting jointly with them, as the cavaliers expected. This paſſion, or, if you pleaſe, extreme zeal for the king's ſervice, was always the diſtinguiſhing character of that party, and often baffled their deſigns. Some of this party, inhabitants of the county of Surry, could not contain themſelves ſo long as would have been requiſite for the king's intereſt. They aſſembled in great numbers, horſe and foot, and came to Weſtminſter, where they preſented a petition to the lords, and another to the commons, worded in ſuch high and ſtrong terms, that they ſeemed to believe themſelves ſupported by the whole kingdom. They demanded:

"That the king might be reſtored to his due honour, and juſt rights, according to the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy: that he might be forthwith eſtabliſhed in his throne, according to the ſplendour of his anceſtors: that he might for the preſent come to Weſtminſter with honour and ſafety, to treat perſonally for compoſing differences: that the free-born ſubjects of England might be governed by the known laws and ſtatutes in force in the kingdom: that the war beginning might be prevented; and that the ordinances for preventing free quarter, might be duly executed, and ſpeed made in diſbanding all armies, having their arrears due paid them."

Nothing could be more unſeaſonable than this petition in ſuch a juncture, when the buſineſs was to foment the diviſion between the preſbyterians and independents, whereas the petition tended to unite them againſt the royaliſts. The lords anſwered, 'They were now upon the conſideration of the ſettling of the kingdom, and doubted not to ſatisfy all.' Whilſt the commons were debating on the petition, ſome of the Surry-men[q] quarrelled with the parliament's guard, diſarmed two or three of the ſoldiers, and killed one. Whereupon, to hinder them from carrying their violence any farther, more horſe and foot were ſent for from the Meuſe and Whitehall, who ſlew and wounded ſeveral, before they could be diſperſed.

This attempt, and an information brought to the houſe of commons, that ſoldiers were privately liſting in London, and a plot contriving by the royal party to ruin both parliament and city, preſbyterians and independents, cauſed the parliament and city to enter into a ſtrict union together. It was equally their intereſt to guard againſt the royaliſts, who hated the city no leſs than the parliament and army, and to take meaſures to hinder the execution of the cavaliers deſigns. Thus the impetuous zeal of the cavaliers was extremely injurious to the king; whereas had it been well managed, it might have procured him great advantages. If they could have reſolved to conceal their ſentiments, and ſuffer the preſbyterians to believe, that their ſole deſign was to deliver the king out of the hands of the independents, and to act againſt the army, they would have, doubtleſs, conſiderably ſtrengthened their party; and the preſbyterians, inſtead of hurting, would have aſſiſted them. This was, probably, duke Hamilton's project, and theirs, who laboured to procure him the command of the Scotch army. But the raſh and impetuous zeal of ſome particular perſons, to whom it was not thought proper to impart the ſecret, cauſed the preſbyterians to be as much upon their guard againſt the cavaliers, as againſt the independents. So, in all the inſurrections in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, whilſt the Scotch army was expected, the preſbyterians were wholly unconcerned, except in Kent, where ſome general officers and reformados were willing to engage. But after that diſappointment, they lay ſtill in expectation of the Scots, on whoſe aſſiſtance they relied very much, though, as I before obſerved, without any foundation.

Mean while, the preſbyterians were greatly embarraſſed. The Scotch army was not yet come, and they were in no leſs danger from the king's ſucceſſes, than from the army's. They could therefore join with neither of the parties, without labouring their own ruin. The deſigns of all three were ſo oppoſite, that, whichſoever ſhould prevail, the other two would be infallibly ruined. The preſbyterians therefore reſolved at length to take advantage of the army's abſence, of the number of their voices in the parliament, and of the aſſiſtance of the city, to conclude a peace with the king. But in order to this peace, it was neceſſary the king ſhould conſent to three conditions, without which they could not reſolve to be reconciled to him. The firſt was, 'That the militia of the kingdom ſhould, for ſuch a number of years, be put into the hands of both houſes.' This point having been the immediate cauſe, or at leaſt the pretence of the war, q They were almoſt drunk, and had been animated, as they came through Weſtminſter-hall, by ſome of the royaliſts. The quarrel began, by ſome of the countrymens aſking the guards, Why they ſtood there to guard a company of rogues? meaning the parliament. Whitelock, p. 306. Sir T. Herbert ſays, The ſoldiers firſt affronted the petitioners, becauſe they required that the army ſhould be diſbanded. Mem. p. 51.

they could not depart fram it, without evidently ſhowing, the war had been undertaken without an abſolute neceſſity, which would have rendered them odious to the whole kingdom. For to what purpoſe had ſo much blood been ſpilt, and ſo much treaſure conſumed, if a peace could be make without that ſecurity? Beſides, in neglecting this article, they would, as I may ſay, have put themſelves in the king's mercy, whom they had mortally offended. The ſecond condition was, 'That the preſbyterian government ſhould be eſtabliſhed by authority of king and parliament.' This condition was no lefs neceſſary. It was one of the ſtrongeſt motives of their undetaking and continuing the war, wherein they had been crowned with ſucceſs, the advantages of which they were not diſpoſed to relinquiſh. What would they have gained by the war, if by a peace they were to be liable again to the juriſdiction of the biſhops and epiſcopal clergy, their mortal enemies? The third condition was, 'That the king ſhould call in all his proclamations and declarations againſt the two houſes.' The neceſſity of this condition is evident, for the king having declared the members of both houſes rebels, they could not treat with him as ſuch, without renouncing all their rights and pretenſions.

The reſolution of treating with the king being taken by the leading preſbyterians, the queſtion was, to put it in execution. General Fairfax departing from Windſor the 22d of May, to march into the North, though within a few days he was forced to take the Kentiſh route, the next day the common-council of London preſented a petition to both houſes of parliament, wherein they ſaid:

"That they thankfully acknowledged the favour of the houſe, in granting their deſires concerning the Tower, and militia of London; and in communicating to them ſeveral votes of both houſes of parliament, wherein it was reſolved not to alter the fundamental government of the kingdom, by king, lords, and commons; to preſerve inviolably the ſolemn league and covenant, and the treaties between the kingdom of England and Scotland; and to be ready to join with the kingdom of Scotland, in the propoſitions agreed upon by both kingdoms. They further deſired, that the aldermen, the recorder, and the reſt of their fellow-citizens, then in the Tower, might be diſcharged and reſtored; and that in proſecution of their ſaid votes, they would be pleaſed to improve all good opportunities in perfecting the ſpeedy ſettlement of the peace of both kingdoms."

This petition was the firſt ſtep taken by the city of London, to give the parliament occaſion to endeavour a peace. The members, as I ſaid, were for the moſt part preſbyterians, and yet the independents prevailed, becauſe they were ſupported by the army. So, from the 6th of Auguſt 1647, to the end of May 1648, the parliament muſt be conſidered as independent, becauſe the votes were directed by that party. But after the army's removal from London, the presbyterians had exerted themſelves, and, no longer fearing the army, paſſed ſuch votes as were moſt agreeable to their intereſt. From that time, therefore, the parliament is not to be conſidered as independent, but rather as preſbyterian. This remark is abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the reaſon of the difference between the proceedings of the parliament of which we are going to ſpeak, and thoſe from the 6th of Auguſt the laſt year.

The petition above-mentioned being read in both houſes, they ordered the recorder, and all the other priſoners, to be releaſed, except the three aldermen, who had been impeached in form, but who, nevertheleſs, were alſo diſcharged after ſome days. They farther ordered, that the ſoldiers poſted in the Tower to reinforce the garriſon, ſhould return to their regiments.

On the morrow, the commons voted, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the independent members, That, after his majeſty's aſſent to the three bills, which ſhould be offered to him, a treaty ſhould be had with him upon the reſt of the propoſitions preſented to him at Hampton-court. Theſe three bills were for ſettling the militia, the presbyterian government, and recalling all his declarations againſt the two houſes. Theſe bills were ready the 30th of May, and ſent to the lords for their coucurrence. The ſame day, the general having drawn out the troops that were in the Tower, at Whitehall, and the Meuſe, to employ them in his expedition againſt the Kentiſh-men, the houſe empowered the militia of London to ſend guards to the parliament, from time to time, as occaſion ſhould require.

The presbyterians were very much at eaſe, ſince they were no longer checked by the army. But they ſtill wanted one thing, of which they reſolved to take care. Whilſt the two houſes were governed by the independents, the Scots thought to have cauſe to complain, and, on that pretence, they were levying an army to march into England. For this reaſon, the parliament, now become presbyterian, believed it neceſſary to remove all occaſion of complaint, by giving them ſatisfaction, and to ſhow, they meant to proceed in a different manner from what they had done, whilſt checked by the independents. They now declared, they intended to maintain the covenant, and the treaties between the two kingdoms; and to convince the Scots, the houſe of commons voted, That the three bills to be preſented to his majeſty, ſhould be communicated to the parliament of Scotland for their approbation. It is eaſy to perceive, that the aim of the two houſes was to ſecure the aſſiſtance of Scotland, and indeed it ſeems to have been Scotland's intereſt to unite with the parliament of England, ſince it was become presbyterian. But, as I obſerved, thoſe by whom the parliament of Scotland was then managed, ſought not ſo much the good of the kingdom, as the king's advantage; but of this the parliament of England was yet ignorant, or perhaps would hardly believe it. There was moreover, in the foremention reſolution, one great inconvenience, namely, loſs of time. It was the presbyterians intereſt to haſten the treaty with the king, whilſt the event of what was preparing, was yet doubtful. But, on the contrary, delay was advantageous to the independents, who, as will hereafter appear, failed not to uſe that method to break their enemies meaſures.

The next day the commons ordered that the eleven members of their houſe, and the ſeven peers accuſed by the army, ſhould be fully diſcharged, and Glyn[r] member for Weſtminſter, who had been expelled, was received into the houſe.

As the two houſes perceived, that the ſeveral inſurrections in the kingdom were wholly in favour of the king, they prohibited, on pain of death, to take up arms without their authority, They imagined to have no farther occaſion for ſuch friends to defend them againſt the independents. Mean while, as they had no army to protect their adherents againſt the attempts of the cavaliers, it was moved to raiſe forces, and oblige the officers to take the covenant. But after ſome debates, this laſt point was ordered to be laid aſide for the preſent. It was alſo propoſed to remove the king to Windſor. But nothing was determined. Probably, the houſe knew not how to compel Hammond, in caſe he refuſed to deliver the king.

Though the vote to preſent the three bills to the king paſſed the 2d of June, it was the 26th before the two houſes appointed a committee to debate upon the manner and place of treaty with the king, and their report was made the 30th. In the mean time, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, preſented a petition to the two houſes, deſiring, "That a perſonal treaty might be obtained betwixt his majeſty and both houſes, in the city of London, or ſome other convenient place.

"That the Scots might be invited to the treaty. That, ſo according to the duty of their allegiance, proteſtation, ſolemn league and covenant, his majeſty's royal perſon, honour, and eſtate, might be preſerved, the power and privilege of parliament maintained, the juſt rights and liberties of the ſubjects reſtored, religion, and government of the church in purity eſtabliſhed, all differences might be the better compoſed, and a firm and laſting peace concluded, &c."

To this it was anſwered by both houſes, that they were now employed in conſiderations of peace, and doubted not but what they had done, and ſhould do therein, would be ſatisfactory to the city of London, and all others that deſired to ſee the troubles of the kingdom ended in a ſafe and juſt peace.

The report of the committee appointed to conſider of a perſonal treaty with the king, was:

"1. That the vote of the 3d of January, 1647, forbidding any addreſſes to be made to, or received from, his majeſty, ſhould be made null.

"2. That the three propoſitions ſent into the kingdom of Scotland, and to be preſented to his majeſty before a perſonal treaty be had, ſhould not be inſiſted upon.

"3. That his majeſty be removed to ſome of his houſes within ten miles of London."

The ſame day, the lords acquainted the commons, that they approved of the propoſitions reported by the committee, [r] Recorder of London. He was diſcharged the 23d of May, upon the petition preſented that day by the common-council.

and defired their concurrence. But the commons were not ſo expeditious as the lords. They could not reſolve to begin a negotiation with the king, without being firſt ſecure of the three conditions which were to be the foundation of the peace. I have already mentioned the reaſons. Mean while both houſes continuing in their reſpective opinions, it was almoſt a month before the diſpute was ended.

The lords urged, at a conference, that the three bills ſhould not be inſiſted on. 1. That there may be no delay in the thing, a ſpeedy perſonal treaty being ſo much defired and petitioned for. 2. Becauſe it is the deſire of the parliament of Scotland. 3. The agreement upon the treaty will be the more authentic. 4. It is probable, the king, having no army in being, will condeſcend to that which at Uxbridge and Oxford he refuſed. 5. It is not the way of treaty to confirm any particular, before all is agreed, eſpecially thoſe of moſt concernment, and which will be chiefly inſiſted upon.

The commons anſwered, 'That the diſaffected party in or near London is ſo great, that if the king grants not the militia before he comes, there will be no ſafety for the parliament, nor is the treaty like to proceed; for many will endeavour to bring in the king without any agreement, and even with deſtruction to the parliament. 2. If the preſbyterian government be not decreed, all things will grow into confuſion in the churches, and the preſent miniſters be great ſufferers. 3. If the declarations be not recalled, the parliament is not in capacity to treat, having been declared rebels and traytors, and no parliament, but a pretended one, which was never done by any of the kings of England. And whereas it may be objected, theſe things need debate; it is anſwered, the king is not ignorant of the full demand of theſe particulars, they having been over and over preſented to him; and to the two firſt he hath declared a willingneſs; nor yet is he obliged to paſs them as bills, unleſs all other things are agreed upon; and if no agreement (he being at liberty) a new war is like to enſue.'

To theſe reaſons the lords replied, 'That they could not imagine, nor was it probable, that the party about London, who had petitioned for a treaty, would put it on to the diſadvantage of the parliament. 2. They did not apprehend any prejudice to the parliament's party during the treaty. 3. His majeſty had declared, he would conſent to all together; and not to any before all was agreed. And that in caſe there were no agreement, they were in ſtate as before.'

The commons being by no means ſatisfied with theſe reaſons, anſwered[s], "There was no doubt but thoſe in the parts about London, would put forward the treaty, to the diſadvantage of the parliament and kingdom; being ſuch who had not only petitioned the re-eſtabliſhment of the king without conditions, but had taken up arms, and were now in arms for no leſs (as they ſay at Colcheſter) than to cudgel the parliament into a treaty. 2. For his majeſty's ſaying, he would not paſs any before all were agreed; it ſeems not; for he pretends to be willing to paſs theſe only upon conditions, or in any way, as that DE FACTO, he will; and DE JURE, the power ſhall be declared in him; which were, for the parliament to part with that, which will be their irreparable loſs and deſtruction. And beſides, as to ſecurity, what appears, unleſs the grant of theſe propoſitions? For it is ſuppoſed, the treaty will be in or near London. And what is ſaid, How his majeſty ſhall be? Who ſhall be with him? How the diſaffected ſhall be ordered? Moreover if this be not, why may not things ſettled by law be revived? Epiſcopacy again ſet on foot? All the miniſters turned out for ſcandal, re-enter? Others of honeſt life put to ſeek their livings? How then, in caſe no accord be made, can it be thought that the parliament will be in ſtate as before?"

This diſpute held till the 28th of July, the independent members heartily joining with the preſbyterians in whatever could retard or obſtruct the treaty. But it was not upon this point only that they endeavoured to ſpend the time to no purpoſe.

Whilſt the conteſt between the two houſes ſtill laſted, the city of London having preſented a petition, declaring, they did concur with the deſire of a perſonal treaty contained in another petition of the military officers, it was ordered, that a committee of parliament, and another of the common-council, ſhould meet together, and examine the affair. In the frequent conferences between theſe committees, the independents uſed ſeveral artifices to prolong matters. The preſbyterians concurred with them in the ſame deſign; for, as I ſaid, they were againſt treating with the king before he had conſented to the three bills. The committee of parliament put ſeveral queſtions to the committee of the common-council, which theſe were not prepared to anſwer; and, as they had no inſtructions about them, they were forced to deſire time to conſult thoſe by whom they were appointed. By that means the conferences were multiplied without any thing done; for no ſooner was one demand anſwered, but another was made, and ſo the time paſſed in vain.

At laſt the common-council, perceiving theſe queſtions were deſigned only to amuſe them, ordered it to be declared to the committee of parliament, that it was the deſire of the city, that a treaty ſhould be entered into with all expedition. They ordered likewiſe, that the engagement laſt year, to guard the king and parliament againſt all force, which had brought the army to London, ſhould be ſubſcribed by all the inhabitants, either by calling them together, or by carrying it from houſe to houſe to be ſigned. They were not contented with this; for they ſo managed, that the watermen and others preſented alſo petitions, that the perſonal treaty might be haſtened. In ſhort, they plainly ſhowed, what they could not obtain by fair means, they would have by force. Whereupon, major general Skippon was privately ordered by the commons to liſt ſoldiers in the city, and be ready to guard the parliament in caſe of any violence. The common-council complained of theſe levies which were making in the city, without the privity of the committee of militia. But the houſe approved of them, under colour the city was in danger from the cavaliers. Nay, they imparted to the common-council, certain intercepted letters, in one of which was incloſed a declaration from the prince of Wales. Another was writ from London to one at Edinburgh, intimating that the king's party was very powerful in London: that there was no danger from any but Skippon, who was raiſing troops; but however they were nothing in compariſon of thoſe who were ſecretly liſted for the king. That it ſhould be ſo ordered, that Skippon ſhould ſoon be deprived of his poſt, and expelled the city.

It is certain, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, the royaliſts conceived great hopes. Nay, many cavaliers ſcrupled not to paſs for preſbyterians, and mixed with them, to ſtrengthen the party of thoſe who intended to force the parliament to a peace. Hence aroſe the conteſt between the commons and the city of London. Among the preſbyterians many were apprehenſive, that by a too long delay, the opportunity of treating advantageouſly with the king would be loſt. They flattered themſelves, that in ſuch a juncture, the king would refuſe nothing of what ſhould be deſired, and they did not ſee the neceſſity of loſing time in requiring things beforehand, which in their opinion could not but be granted in a treaty. This opinion, entertained by the lords and common-council of London, was ſolely founded in a falſe imagination, that the king could not but think himſelf loſt, if the Scotch army ſhould once enter England, and conſequently would grant every thing, in ſo deſperate a caſe; wherein they were much miſtaken, as we have ſeen. But the commons ſtill inſiſted upon the three bills, as abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of the kingdom. Whilſt the preſbyterians thus differed among themſelves, the time paſſed away without any effectual endeavours for a peace. The blockade of Colcheſter was juſt at an end: Cromwell was upon the point of finiſhing the ſiege of Pembroke-caſtle, and going to join Lambert; and Fairfax, after the taking of Colcheſter, was about to come once more and awe the parliament. Beſides, the king's party was daily increaſing in the North, where Langdale, whoſe forces were now above four thouſand, was preparing to join duke Hamilton.

The affairs of England were then in a terrible confuſion. The wiſeſt and moſt experienced could not form any probable conjecture of what was to happen, each of the parties having almoſt equal reaſon both to hope and to fear.

Indeed, the independents were no longer maſters in the parliament, but were however ſufficiently numerous to obſtruct, by ſundry artifices, or at leaſt to retard the peace, or prolong the negotiation. Moreover they were ſupported by three armies, which, though remote from London, inſpired their enemies with terror. Nevertheleſs they ſaw, it was intended to take advantage of the abſence of theſe armies to conclude a peace with the king, which could not but ruin them, if made before their forces were rejoined. They knew themſelves to be equally hated by the Scots, the preſbyterians, and the royaliſts. They were therefore in danger that theſe three parties would unite againſt them, as indeed it was projected, and then the independents would have been too weak to reſiſt ſo many enemies at once. It was therefore their intereſt to hinder that union as much as poſſible, till the events of the war which was going to re-kindle, ſhould unravel the affairs of the kingdom. They confided much in Cromwell's valour and capacity, and impatiently expected, that the end of the ſiege he had undertaken, would enable him to join Lambert in the north, and oppoſe the Scots, who were ready to enter England.

The preſbyterians had no army at all. Their whole reliance was on the city of London: but their leaders were extremely troubled to ſee the magiſtrates purſuing wrong methods, whether by the artifices of the cavaliers, or by a too earneſt deſire of peace. They hoped however, the king, in his preſent circumſtances, would immediately grant their demands, in order to free himſelf out of the hands of the independents, and unite the whole kingdom againſt them. But they built upon no ſolid foundation. Had there been a treaty at the time I am ſpeaking of, the king, who knew the Scotch army was not deſigned againſt him, would have granted at moſt but what he was obliged to by his treaty with the Scotch commiſſioners, which would not have been ſufficient to content the preſbyterians, as the ſequel will ſhow.

As for the royaliſts, the leading men being informed of duke Hamilton's intentions, they muſt have entertained great hopes. They flattered themſelves, that the Scots and preſbyterians would equally aſſiſt in delivering the king from captivity, and that when he ſhould be free, and the independent party ſubdued, he would be able to withſtand the preſbyterians and renew the war, in caſe unreaſonable terms were inſiſted upon. They ſaw however with great concern their deſigns ruined in Kent, in Eſſex, and by the ill ſucceſs of the earl of Holland's and duke of Buckingham's attempt. Certainly they were in an ill ſituation, between the preſbyterians and the independents, what hopes ſoever they had entertained of deceiving the preſbyterians, and engaging them to ſerve the king, under colour of acting againſt the independents. Their whole refuge therefore lay in the progreſs to be made by duke Hamilton and Langdale, and in the expectation of inducing the city to force the parliament to conclude a haſty peace to the king's advantage.

At laſt the ſo long expected army of Scotland entered England, as hath been ſaid, about the beginning of July. When the raiſing it was reſolved, it was deſigned againſt the parliament of England, then under the direction of the army and independents. But when the Scots came into England, the face of affairs was changed and the parliament not only become preſbyterian, but had taken ſeveral ſteps to ſhow, they intended to preſerve an union and good correſpondence between the two kingdoms. Mean while, though the committee of the parliament of Scotland was not ignorant of what paſſed in England, they had not given new inſtructions to duke Hamilton, or expreſſed any deſire to join with the parliament, now freed from the dominion of the army. Thus duke Hamilton entered England as enemy to the parliament, ſince there was no alteration in his orders. He pretended, indeed, a deſign to maintain the covenant. But the parliament had alſo declared, they had the ſame intention. What then could hinder the duke from making ſome advances to the parliament, to demonſtrate, he was ſent into England to promote that deſign? At leaſt, when he entered a foreign kingdom with an army, he ſhould, one would think, have publiſhed a manifeſto to declare the intentions of his maſters. But he only writ to major-general Lambert, "That the committee of the eſtates of parliament had commanded him to enter England with an army, for maintaining the covenant, ſettling religion, delivering the king from his baſe impriſonment, freeing the parliament from the conſtraints put upon them, diſbanding the armies, whereby the ſubjects might be free from the intolerable taxes and quarter which they had ſo long groaned under, and for procuring a ſolemn peace and firm union betwixt the kingdoms under his majeſty's government." But if what paſſed before be conſidered, it will be eaſy to perceive, this army was deſigned to reſtore the king without conditions, or at leaſt upon terms very different from thoſe that were pretended to be laid on him. Though I have touched upon this ſubject in ſeveral places, I believe it will not be amiſs briefly to ſum up the reaſons, which invincibly prove that the Scotch army was ſolely intended for the king's ſervice.

1. The Scotch commiſſioners had treated with the king without being authorized by their parliament. They had treated for the affairs of England without receiving any power from the Engliſh.

2. They had engaged to endeavour to reſtore the king to the throne of England, without any other condition than the confirmation of the preſbyterian-government for only three years. As for the covenant, they had indeed obliged the king to promiſe, he would confirm it, for the ſecurity of thoſe who had taken it; that is, that they might not be proſecuted on that account: but with full liberty to every one not to ſubſcribe it. They had engaged to maintain the rights of the king and crown with reſpect to the militia, the great-ſeal, nomination to offices, choice of privy-counſellors, negative voice in the parliament. Moreover, they had concealed the contents of the treaty from the leading preſbyterians, and at the ſame time communicated them to the king's principal friends.

3. Theſe ſame commiſſioners had engaged Sir Marmaduke Langdale and Sir Philip Muſgrave to raiſe forces for the king and ſeize Berwick and Carliſle.

4. Theſe two gentlemen had repaired to Edinburgh where they had often conferred with duke Hamilton and others of the king's party, and when the commiſſioners of England complained of their being ſuffered at Edinburgh, they were only concealed, and the conferences with them continued.

5. Duke Hamilton, before his departure from London, had declared, he would do the king ſignal ſervice, and this duke was placed at the head of the army.

6. The ſame duke had entered into an engagement with Langdale, that as ſoon as the Scotch army was in England, there ſhould be no more mention of the covenant, and all the king's friends ſhould be received into the army without diſtinction. It is true, he was afterwards reſtrained by a decree of the parliament of Scotland. But he found means to evade it, by cauſing Langdale to march one day before him, as if Langdale had not acted by his orders. But the contrary plainly appeared, when he was defeated by Cromwell.

7. The parliament of Scotland was called by the credit of duke Hamilton and the commiſſioners who had treated with the king, and the members were elected by the cabals of the ſame party.

8. When the levying an army came to be debated in the parliament, it was ſtrongly oppoſed, as well by ſeveral lords, as by the general-aſſembly of the kirk. It was ſolidly proved, that at leaſt the grounds of the war ought to be declared before it was reſolved. Proteſtations were alſo made againſt it; but they were evaded, of which there can be no other reaſon given, but that the army was deſigned for the king's ſervice, though it was not thought proper to declare it.

9. Finally, when the duke had entered England, he took not the leaſt ſtep to intimate he was come to ſupport the preſbyterian-party. Inſtead of marching directly to London, whilſt Cromwell was at a diſtance, though he might be ſure the parliament and city were very deſirous to join him, he ſpent above a month in the northern counties without any neceſſity. This conduct therefore ſhows, his deſign was not to aſſiſt the preſbyterians, though he intended to act againſt the independents.

What has been ſaid clearly proves, the Scotch army came into England with deſign to reſtore the king without terms, under colour of delivering him from the independents. It is no wonder, that the parliament, where the king had few friends, ſhould declare this army enemies of the kingdom, as ſoon as their entrance was known. Nevertheleſs, as the preſbyterians were yet perſuaded, the Scots were come to ſupport them, it was with great ſtruggle that this declaration paſſed the houſe of commons. Ninety preſbyterian members oppoſed it to the utmoſt of their power, ſo far were they from imagining, the Scots had taken up arms for the king's intereſt. But it was not long before they were undeceived.

The 28th of July the commons agreed at laſt, that the king ſhould be treated with upon the Hampton-court propoſitions, without being obliged to ſign the three bills before-mentioned. In all likelihood the preſbyterians were at length ſenſible, that by deferring the treaty, they were labouring for the independents, who ſought only to waſte the time, till Cromwell, who was in the midſt of his march, ſhould have joined Lambert. But it was not poſſible to advance ſo far as would have been neceſſary to finiſh or even begin the treaty, before the revolution cauſed by duke Hamilton's defeat. The formalities which muſt be obſerved in a parliament, ſeveral unexpected affairs, the arrival of the prince of Wales before Yarmouth, and afterwards in the Thames, afforded the independent members frequent occaſions to prolong the treaty. On all theſe occaſions, they affected to make tedious ſpeeches, which waſted many days ſitting. When they ſaw it was not in their power to ſet aſide the treaty, or oblige the houſe to inſiſt upon the three bills, they feigned to conſent freely to the negotiation: but withal, perpetually found means to delay it. In a word, to know what were the fruits of theſe artifices, it need only be conſidered, that the commons firſt reſolution to treat with the king was on the 24th of May; but they did not deſiſt from the three bills till the 28th of July; that it was the 18th of September before the negotiation began, and conſequently the affair held four months, without reckoning the time ſpent in the treaty. So, before the conferences began Cromwell had defeated duke Hamilton, and was marching, into Scotland to hinder the Scots from returning to diſturb England. On the other hand, general Fairfax having taken Colcheſter, was poſted with his army within twenty miles of London to awe the parliament. It is therefore certain, when the negotiation began, affairs were far from being in the ſame eſtate as when the treaty was reſolved. The good ſucceſs of the army made the preſbyterians more timorous, and the independents more bold. But on the other ſide, the king, loſing all hopes of aſſiſtance both from the Scots and the royaliſts, found himſelf indiſpenſably obliged to yield in a treaty what he would never have granted, if the face of his affairs had not been changed. Theſe are conſiderations which I thought requiſite, before I proceeded to what paſſed the five laſt months of the year 1648.

Since the commons had conſented to treat with the king, without obliging him to ſign the three bills, five days more had paſſed before the manner, place, and time of the treaty could be ſettled [t]. The king required that all perſons might have acceſs to him as when at Hampton-court: that the Scots ſhould be invited to aſſiſt at the treaty, and appointed the town of Newport in the Iſle of Wight for the place of conference. The commiſſioners who had been ſent to him, having reported his deſires to the houſes, the lords, who were willing to diſpatch the affair, two days after paſſed the following votes:

"1. That the votes of both houſes of parliament, againſt no farther addreſſes and applications to his majeſty, be recalled.

"2. That ſuch perſons as his majeſty ſhall ſend for, as of neceſſary uſe to him in the treaty, be admitted to wait on him: and that his majeſty be in the ſame ſtate of freedom, as he was laſt in at Hampton-court.

"3. That ſuch ſervants as his majeſty ſhall appoint, be ſent to wait on him.

"4. That the place for the treaty be in Newport, in the Iſle of Wight.

"5. That the Scots be invited to treat with his majeſty.

"6. That his majeſty be admitted to invite them.

"7. That the inſtructions given from both houſes of parliament, to colonel Hammond governor of the Iſle of Wight, be recalled.

"8. That five lords and ten commoners be choſen commiſſioners, to treat with the king.

"9. That it be referred to the committee of lords and commons for peace, to prepare all things in readineſs for the ſpeeding of the treaty."

Theſe votes being ſent to the commons, they did not think proper to paſs them without ſome amendments.

"The firſt was admitted.

"As to the ſecond, the commons ordered, That his majeſty ſhould be deſired to ſend to the houſes the names of ſuch perſons as he ſhould conceive to be of neceſſary uſe about him during the treaty; they not being perſons excepted againſt by both houſes of parliament from pardon, or that were then under reſtraint, or in actual wars againſt the parliament by ſea or land; or in ſuch numbers, as might draw any juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion; and that his majeſty ſhould be in the ſame freedom, honour, and ſafety, as he was in when he was at Hampton-court.

"Upon the third, they concurred in the vote for his majeſty's attendants, provided they were ſuch as were not in any of the former qualifications.

"The fourth was approved of.

"As to the fifth and ſixth, the queſtion, Whether the Scots ſhould be invited by the parliament, to ſend commiſſioners to treat with his majeſty upon the propoſitions preſented to him at Hampton court, it was carried in the negative. But it was ordered however, That if the king ſhould think fit to ſend for any of the Scotiſh nation, to adviſe with him concerning the affairs of the kingdom of Scotland only, the houſes would give him a ſafe-conduct.

"Concerning the ſeventh, it was reſolved, That before the recalling of colonel Hammond's inſtructions, they ſhould ſend again to his majeſty, to let him know, how far they had proceeded, as to a treaty, and to have his majeſty's approbation.

"The eighth and ninth were admitted without any difficulty."

The next day the commons ordered new inſtructions to colonel Hammond, viz.

"That the king be removed to Newport, and be in the ſame condition and freedom there, as he was at Hampton-court.

"That no perſon in the firſt exception out of mercy, nor under reſtraints of the parliament, nor of late actually in arms againſt the parliament, be admitted to the king.

"That no perſon that hath been in arms againſt the parliament, &c. or of whom there is juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion, be admitted into any fort or tower in the Iſle of Wight.

"That no perſon of any foreign nation be admitted to come into the ſame iſle, without leave of the parliament.

"If the kingdom of Scotland ſend any to treat with his majeſty, they ſhall have a paſs from both houſes, and be admitted.

"That his majeſty paſs his royal word, not to go out of the iſland during the treaty, or twenty-eight days after, without the advice of both houſes of parliament."

The next day, advice was brought of duke Hamilton's defeat. The independents thence hoped, they ſhould hinder the concluſion of the treaty [u], and the preſbyterians, that the king would grant every thing, ſince he had loſt the aſſiſtance he depended upon, and was without any reſource. Thus, this event, though of the greateſt importance, cauſed no alteration in the diſpoſition of the parties to treat. A few days after they received alſo news of the taking of Colcheſter.

The king having ſent a liſt of the perſons he deſired to have about him, the parliament excepted againſt three, namely, Aſhburnham, Legg, and Dowcet, who were then in cuſtody.

It was not only upon this point, but ſeveral others, where difficulties occurred, that they were forced to ſend expreſſes to the king. It ſuffices to ſay, that the parliament's commiſſioners departed not from London for Newport, till the 13th of September, and the conferences began not till the 18th. It was agreed, they ſhould continue forty days only.

Whilſt preparations were making for the treaty, the prince of Wales, who lay in the Downs with his fleet, ſent a letter to the houſe of peers, wherein he took notice of the progreſs made as to a perſonal treaty, and farther expreſſed his deſire,

"1. That the treaty ſhould be in ſuch place and manner, as might conſiſt with the honour, freedom, and ſafety of his majeſty his father; ſo that the agreement might not be blemiſhed with any face of reſtraint. 2. That the treaty might be between the king, and his two kingdoms of England and Scotland. 3. That during the treaty, there ſhould be a general ceſſation of arms. 4. That a moderate ſubſiſtance, during the treaty, might be agreed upon, for all armies and forces then on foot, and particularly the Scots army in England. 4. That a courſe might be taken to content him, and his ſhips in the Downs, with money and proviſion."

It does not appear, the lords took any notice of this letter, and the rather, as the prince made no mention, that it ſhould be communicated to the commons.

The ſame day the lords received the letter, a petition was preſented to both houſes from the common-council of London, deſiring,

"1. That the king's majeſty might be free from reſtraint.

"2. Invited to a treaty.

"3. That all acts of hoſtility by ſea and land, might, by

" 4. That the government of the church might be ſettled according to the covenant.

" 5. That diſtreſſed Ireland might be relieved.

" 6. The people of England, by diſbanding all armies, eaſed; the liberty of the ſubjects reſtored; the laws of the land eſtabliſhed.

" 7. The members of both houſes enjoined to attend the houſe for the ſervice of the kingdom.

" 8. That the ſelf-denying ordinance might be effectually obſerved. And

" 9. Speedy conſideration had of the condition of ſuch merchants, whoſe ſhips and goods were ſtayed by thoſe with the prince; and that ſome expedient might be thought of, for diſcharge of all ſhips, that trade be not deſtroyed."

The reformado-officers preſented the ſame day a petition of the like import; praying moreover, that all officers and ſoldiers (without exception) might be paid their arrears.

The commons returned in anſwer to the common-council of London, that it was their intention to treat with the king, that they had acquainted his majeſty with it, and that there was no room to queſtion but that the king was in the ſame diſpoſition. Then they communicated to the council the votes that were paſſed in the houſe on that occaſion.

All this paſſed before the defeat of the Scotch army. But after the news of that great event, and the taking of Colcheſter, the independents in and about London, who had been quiet ſince the removal of the army and before any deciſion, began to hold up their heads. The 11th of September, two days before the departure of the commiſſioners for the Iſle of Wight, they preſented a petition to the parliament, ſubſcribed by ſeveral thouſands, openly complaining of the commons proceedings, which, they ſaid, flowed from the corruption of moſt of the members. They alſo gave them the reaſons why they firſt aſſiſted them in this war with their perſons and purſes, and let them know, they expected other ways from them than a treaty with the king, and particularly,

" 1. That they would make good the ſupremacy of the people from all pretenees of negative voices either in the king or lords.

" 2. That they would have made laws for election of repreſentatives yearly, and of courſe, without writ or ſummons.

" 3. That their time of ſitting exceed not forty or fifty days at the moſt, and to have fixed an expreſs time for the ending of this preſent parliament.

" 4. That they would have exempted matters of religion and God's worſhip from the compulſive or reſtrictive power of any authority.

" 5. That none be forced or preſſed to ſerve in war.

" 6. That they would have made both kings, queens, princes, dukes, earls, lords, and all perſons, alike liable to every law of the land.

" 7. That all commoners be freed from the juriſdiction of the lords in all caſes; and to have taken care, that all trials be only of twelve ſworn men; and no conviction but upon two or more ſufficient known witneſſes.

" 8. That none be examined againſt themſelves, nor be puniſhed for doing of that, againſt which no law hath been provided.

" 9. That the proceedings in law be abbreviated, mitigated, and made certain, the charge thereof in all particulars.

" 10. That all trading and merchandizing be made free from all monopolizing and engroſſing, by companies or otherwiſe.

" 11. That the exciſe and all kind of taxes, except ſubſidies, be taken off.

" 12. That they would have laid open all late incloſures of fens, and other commons, or have encloſed them only or chiefly to the benefit of the poor.

" 13. That they would have conſidered the many thouſands that are ruined by perpetual impriſonment for debt, and provided to their enlargement.

" 14. Have ordered ſome effectual courſe to keep people from begging and beggary, in ſo fruitful a nation, as through God's bleſſing this is.

" 15. That they would have proportioned puniſhments more equal to offences, that ſo mens lives and eſtates might not be forfeited upon trivial and ſlight occaſions.

" 16. Have removed the tedious burthen of tithes, ſatisfying all impropriators, and providing a more equal way of maintenance for our poor miniſters.

" 17. Have raiſed a ſtock of money out of confiſcated eſtates, for payment of thoſe who contributed voluntarily above their abilities, before thoſe that diſburſed out of their ſuperfluities.

" 18. Bound themſelves and all future parliaments from aboliſhing property, levelling mens eſtates, or making all things common.

" 19. That they would have declared, what the duty or buſineſs of the kingly office is, and what not; and aſcertained the revenue paſt increaſe or diminution; that ſo there might never be more quarrels about the ſame.

" 20. That they would have rectified the election of public officers for the city of London, of every particular company therein; reſtoring the commonalty thereof to their juſt rights, moſt unjuſtly with-held from them, to the producing and maintaining corrupt intereſt, oppoſite to common freedom, and exceedingly prejudicial to the trade and manufactures of this nation.

" 21. That they would have made full and ample reparations to all perſons that had been oppreſſed, by ſentences in high-commiſſion, ſtar-chamber, and council-board; or by any kind of monopolizers or projectors, and that out of the eſtates of thoſe that were authors, actors, or promoters of ſo intolerable miſchiefs, and that without much attendance.

" 22. That they would have aboliſhed all committees, and have conveyed all buſineſſes into the true method of the uſual trials of the commonwealth.

" 23. That they would not have followed the example of former tyrannous and ſuperſtitious parliaments, in making orders, ordinances, or laws, or in appointing puniſhments concerning opinions, or things ſupernatural, ſtiling ſome blaſphemies, others hereſies.

" 24. That they would have declared what the buſineſs of the lords is, and aſcertain their condition, not derogating from the liberties of other men; that ſo there might be an end of ſtriving about the ſame.

" 25. That they would have done juſtice upon the capital authors and promoters of the former or late wars.

" 26. That they would have provided conſtant pay for the army, and given rules to all judges, and all other public officers throughout the land, for their indemnity; and for the ſaving harmleſs all that have any ways aſſiſted them.

" 27. That they would have laid to heart the abundance of innocent blood that hath been ſpilt, and the infinite ſpoil and havock that hath been made of peaceable, harmleſs people, by expreſs commiſſion from the king: and ſeriouſly to have conſidered, whether the juſtice of God be likely to be ſatisfied, or his yet continuing wrath appeaſed by an act of oblivion."

Tho' the petitioners did not call themſelves independents, the principles of that party were but too viſible in theſe articles to doubt from what quarter they came.

The ſame day the maſters and commanders of ſhips preſented the like petition, complaining of the tyranny of the parliament.

The parliament thought not proper to anſwer theſe petitions [w], though two days after, the firſt preſented another to deſire an anſwer to every part of their petition. It was no proper juncture to provoke the independents, by ſuch an anſwer as this petition deſerved.

Before I enter upon the particulars of the treaty at Newport, it is abſolutely neceſſary to relate what paſſed in the North of England and in Scotland.

Monroe who was leading from Scotland three or four thouſand men [x] to duke Hamilton, had entered a good way into England, when the Scotch army was vanquiſhed and diſperſed. After the victory, Cromwell, without loſing time in purſuing the reſt of the army which was not in condition to do any miſchief, left Lambert with ſome troops to finiſh their deſtruction, and immediately marched in queſt of Monroe. The Engliſh that were with this Scotch general uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade him to give Cromwell battle; but it was not poſſible to prevail with him. He choſe rather to retire northward, and always kept at ſo great diſtance, that there was no overtaking him. Nevertheleſs Cromwell continued his march, and hearing that Lambert had intirely deſtroyed the Scotch army, ſent him orders to march to Carliſle, where Muſgrave ſtill continued with ſome troops, and after clearing thoſe parts, to come and join him

[w] The houſe returned anſwer to the independents petition to this effect; "That the houſe gave them thanks for their great pains and care of the public good of the kingdom, and would ſpeedily take their deſires into conſideration." Ruſhworth, Tom. VII. p. 1258.

[x] He had, in the beginning of September, above ſeven thouſand men, Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh, under his command. Idem, p. 1250.

They

in order to enter Scotland together. When Cromwell came near Berwick, he writ to the committee of eſtates to require them to call home Monroe, and deliver Berwick and Carliſle, otherwiſe they were to expect a war. A few days after he purſued his march towards Scotland, having left ſome regiments to block up Berwick.

Duke Hamilton's defeat and Cromwell's threats intirely changed the face of affairs in Scotland. The marquis of Argyle, who had not been able to prevent the raiſing of an army, and had been forced to ſubmit to the oppoſite party, became ſuperior again, and was ſupported by all who were againſt the war. The committee of eſtates daily loſt their authority, and were ſeconded only by Monroe, who was at length returned into Scotland. So, the marquis of Argyle being aſſured of the approbation of moſt of the people, levied three or four thouſand men to oppoſe Monroe, whom the earl of Lanerick had joined, with ſome new-raiſed troops. They had ſecured Sterling-bridge, which hindered the marquis of Argyle from making any progreſs, though his forces had been more numerous. But Cromwell broke all their meaſures by not ſtaying at Berwick, but marching directly to Edinburgh. He thereby forced the committee of eſtates to fly from thence and diſperſe, for fear of being incloſed between the Engliſh and the marquis of Argyle's forces. Then the earl of Lanerick and Monroe, being unable to continue the war, came to an agreement upon the following terms:

"1. That both the armies ſhould be diſbanded.

"2. That a parliament ſhould be called to ſit before the 20th of January.

"3. That the ſettling of religion be referred to the determination of the general-aſſembly, and all civil queſtions to the determination of parliament.

"4. That a new committee of eſtates be appointed, to conſiſt only of ſuch members as proteſted in parliament againſt the late engagement: and in caſe any of the forces under Monroe ſhould continue in arms, that then the ſaid committee ſhould raiſe forces to ſuppreſs the ſame.

"5. That none who had been acceſſary to the late engagement, ſhould be challenged to take away their lives and eſtates, &c. provided they did declare under their hand-writing, to the lord-chancellor, or preſident of the committee of eſtates, that they accepted of, and ſubmitted to, the preſent engagement.

"6. That all perſons taken in war, ſince the ſecond of Auguſt, be releaſed."

The face of affairs being thus changed, and the king's party diſperſed, Cromwell repaired to Edinburgh, where he was received with great reſpect. He obtained the reſtitution of Berwick and Carliſle, and having concerted proper meaſures with the marquis of Argyle, returned triumphantly into England. He left Lambert, however, in Scotland, with three or four regiments, at the requeſt of the Scots, who believed they ſhould want them, to awe thoſe who might deſire to raiſe new commotions.

Whilſt Cromwell was in queſt of Monroe in Scotland, and three days before general Fairfax came to St. Albans, the conferences for peace began at Newport[y]. Though the two houſes had deſiſted from the condition, that the king ſhould ſign the three bills before the treaty, they had not relinquiſhed the thing itſelf. The very firſt day, the commiſſioners preſented to the king, the draughts of the three bills. By the firſt, the preſbyterian-government was eſtabliſhed for ever in the church of England, epiſcopacy aboliſhed, with the whole hierarchy, and the ſale of biſhops lands appointed. By the ſecond, the king left the power of the militia for thirty years in the hands of both houſes. By the third, all the king's proclamations and declarations againſt the parliament, or their adherents, were recalled. The laſt of theſe bills began with theſe words, 'Whereas the parliament have been neceſſitated to make and proſecute a war in their juſt and lawful defence,' &c. The king ſcrupled not to agree to the ſubſtance of the bill, but objected againſt the preamble, which charged him indirectly with having made war upon the parliament, and deſired it might be omitted, to which the commiſſioners would never conſent, becauſe they were, by their inſtructions, not to depart from a tittle of what was contained in the three bills. This diſpute held ſeven days, and it was the 25th of September, before the king conſented at laſt to paſs the bill, with the preamble. But it was on condition, that nothing ſhould be binding, unleſs the whole were agreed on, and the treaty ſigned. This article being thus diſpatched, they proceeded to the reſt, on which were great debates, and particularly concerning religion. As the king ſaw the commiſſioners would not, or could not yield any thing, he hoped to ſhorten the negotiation, by ſhowing the two houſes, how far he could comply with regard to the moſt important articles. He ſent therefore a meſſage to explain his intentions, and make them the following offers.

Concerning religion. "His majeſty will conſent, that the calling and ſitting of the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter be confirmed for three years by act of parliament, and confirms for three years the directory, and the form of church-government, to be uſed for the churches of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales; provided that his majeſty, and thoſe of his judgment, or any other, who cannot in conſcience ſubmit thereunto, be not in the mean time obliged to comply with the ſame; and that a free conſultation and debate, be had with the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter in the mean time, twenty of his majeſty's nomination being added to them, whereby it may be determined by his majeſty, and his two houſes of parliament, how the ſaid church-government, and form of public worſhip, after the ſaid time, and how religion may be ſettled, and the articles determined, and care taken for the eaſe of tender conſciences."

Concerning the biſhops lands and revenue. "His majeſty will conſent to an act or acts of parliament, whereby legal eſtates for lives, or for years, not exceeding ninety-nine, ſhall be made for thoſe lands, towards the ſatisfaction of the purchaſers, and to others to whom they are engaged, whereby they may receive ſatisfaction; provided that the property and inheritance of thoſe lands, may ſtill remain to the church, and the reſt that ſhall be reſerved to be for their maintenance.

3. His majeſty will give his royal aſſent for the better obſervation of the lord's-day, for ſuppreſſing of innovations in churches and chapels, in and about the worſhip of God, and for the beter advancing of the preaching of God's holy word in all parts of this kingdom; and to an act againſt enjoying pluralities of benefices by ſpiritual perſons, and non-reſidency; for regulating and reforming both univerſities, and the colleges of Weſtminſter, Wincheſter and Eaton; for the better diſcovery, and ſpeedy conviction of popiſh recuſants, for the education of the children of papiſts, by proteſtants, in the proteſtant religion, for levying penalties againſt papiſts: to an act to prevent the practices of papiſts againſt the ſtate, and for putting the laws in execution, and for a ſtricter courſe to prevent hearing, and ſaying of maſs.

4. As to the covenant, his majeſty is not yet therein ſatisfied, that he can ſign or ſwear it, or conſent to impoſe it on the conſciences of others; nor doth conceive it proper, or uſeful, at this time, to be inſiſted on[z].

5. Touching the militia, his majeſty will conſent to an act of parliament, to be in the parliament's hand for ten years.

6. Touching Ireland, after advice with his two houſes, he will leave it to their determination, and give his conſent accordingly.

7. Touching public debts, his majeſty will give his conſent to ſuch an act, for raiſing of moneys by general and equal taxations.

8. He propoſeth, that he may have liberty forthwith to come to Weſtminſter, and be reſtored to a condition of freedom and ſafety, a thing which he ſhall never deny to any of his ſubjects, and to the poſſeſſion of his lands and revenues; and that an act of oblivion and indemnity may paſs, to extend to all perſons, for all matters relating to the late differences, which being agreed by his two houſes of parliament, his majeſty will be ready to make theſe his conceſſions binding, by giving them the force of laws by his royal aſſent[a]."

If theſe offers concerning religion are conſidered, with reſpect to the king's private opinion, they may be ſaid to be great condeſcenſions, perhaps greater than his conſcience allowed, ſince it was his real belief, there was no true church without biſhops. But if theſe offers are conſidered, with regard to the preſbyterians and independents, of whom the parliament conſiſted, they will be found to be by no means ſatisfactory. They were only a ſort of interim, which tended to make them loſe the preſent opportunity to aboliſh epiſcopacy intirely.

[y] They were held in Sir William Hodges's houſe. Ruſhworth. Tom. VII. p. 1259.——The commiſſioners were five lords, viz. the earls of Pembroke, Saliſbury, Middleſex, Northumberland, and the lord Say; and ten commoners, viz. Denzil Holles, lord Wenman, Mr. Pierrepoint, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, Mr. Brown, Mr. Crew, recorder Glyn, Sir John Potts, and Mr. Bulkley. Whitelock, p. 334.

[z] This was to avoid incenſing the independents, who were intirely againſt ſubmitting to the covenant. Rapin.

[a] More than this (ſays Whitelock) could not be obtained of the king, though moſt earneſtly begged by ſome of the commiſſioners (great perſons) with tears, and on their knees; particularly as to the propoſition touching religion. Whitelock, p. 340.

They

I cannot forbear making another remark on this occaſion. The king artfully endeavoured, ſo to order that his own propoſitions ſhould be treated upon, which the parliament had ever refuſed, ſo apprehenſive were they of the uſual ambiguities and reſtrictions in the king's papers, and of which there is even here a freſh inſtance, in the firſt article concerning religion. But he was diſappointed now, as well as before. The parliament without taking notice of his offers[b], ordered the commiſſioners to proceed ſolely according to their inſtructions.

Whereupon the king delivered a paper to the commiſſioners, containing the reaſons why he could not conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy, which, he ſaid, he conceived to be of apoſtolical inſtitution. That as to the ſale of church-lands, he affirmed it to be real ſacrilege, beſides, that at his coronation, he had ſworn to maintain the rights of the clergy. All theſe reaſons, with many more that might have been added, ſignified nothing to the commiſſioners, who had no power to relax on any point. All they could do, was to ſend them to the parliament, and expect their orders. But, this delayed the concluſion of the treaty, and conſumed the time which the king and parliament ought equally to have improved.

Some days after, the king being deſirous to gain the good-will of both-houſes, and ſome conceſſion in favour of epiſcopacy, which was the principal, and, as I may ſay, the only point that hindered the concluſion of the treaty, declared to the commiſſioners, "that he conſented for the ſettling the militia by ſea and land, in the parliament's hands for twenty years, and for confirming for three years by act of parliament, the form of church-government, and directory for worſhip preſented to him. But he added, that he was not ſatisfied in his conſcience, or could be content to the utter aboliſhing of epiſcopacy; the ſubſtance whereof he conceived to conſiſt in the power of ordination and juriſdiction, as they were exerciſed by the apoſtles themſelves and others, by authority derived from them, ſuperior to preſbyters and deacons in the primitive times. His reſolution being to comply with his two houſes, for the alteration and regulating of his preſent hierarchy and government, ſo as epiſcopacy reduced to the primitive uſage, might be ſettled and continued in the church of England, and if his two houſes ſhould ſo adviſe, his majeſty would be content to leſſen the extent, and multiply the number of the dioceſes.

"As to the exception that his majeſty hadnot expreſſed his conſent for ſettling of biſhops lands upon truſtees, and for the ſale of thoſe lands; it was true he had not, to alienate the inheritance of thoſe lands; and herein he believed he had the concurrent opinions of many divines, that in other points differed much among themſelves: but his former anſwer containing a large offer of ſatisfaction to all thoſe that had purchaſed or diſburſed monies upon thoſe lands, he hoped that anſwer would be ſatisfactory to his two houſes.

"For the calling and ſitting of the aſſembly of divines, his majeſty would aſſent as was deſired.

"That his majeſty will confirm the public uſe of the directory in all churches and chapels, as was deſired in the propoſition, and would conſent to a repeal of ſo much of all ſtatutes, as only concerned the book of common-prayer, and alſo the taking the ſame away out of all churches and chapels, provided thats the uſe thereof might be continued in his majeſty's chapel for himſelf and his houſehold: and that the ſame ſhould be confirmed by act of parliament for three years, provided only that a conſultation in the mean time be had with the aſſembly of divines in ſuch a manner, and for the purpoſes as were in his former anſwer expreſſed.

"Touching the articles of religion, his majeſty profeſſed, he had not had time ſince they were delivered unto him, to look into them with that deliberation which was requiſite, before he bound himſelf up and his ſubjects in matter of faith and doctrine; and therefore deſired, that part of the propoſition might be reſpited by his two houſes. But he would conſent to an act for better obſervation of the lord's-day; as alſo to prevent the ſaying of maſs.

"Laſtly, concerning the covenant, and the ordinance concerning the ſame, his majeſty's anſwer was, that he not being ſatisfied to take it or impoſe it on others, he conceived his two houſes would not inſiſt upon it at that time, and the rather, becauſe the ends thereof would be obtained by the agreement if happily concluded."

Some days after the two houſes received advice from their commiſſioners, that the king had fully conſented to the propoſitions concerning Ireland.

By a letter which came the 17th of October, they heard, the king had agreed to the propoſitions concerning the public debts, and for taking away all honours and titles conferred ſince the 20th of May 1642.

By another of the 18th, that concerning delinquents, his majeſty offered,

"That all perſons who had any hand in the plotting, deſigning, or aſſiſting the rebellion in Ireland, ſhould expect no pardon, as was expreſſed in the firſt branch of the propoſition. As to all the reſt of the propoſitions his majeſty could not conſent thereunto, as was propoſed, otherwiſe than in the following manner; viz. As for all other perſons compriſed in the ſaid firſt branch, his majeſty, for ſatisfaction of his two houſes, would give away, that they might moderately compound for their eſtates, and deſired that they might be admitted to the ſame; and for removing of diſtruſt and interruptions of the public ſettlements, his majeſty would conſent as followeth: That ſuch of them as the two houſes of parliament would inſiſt on, ſhould not be admitted to his councils, and be reſtrained from coming to court, at ſuch diſtance as both houſes ſhould think fit, and ſhould not have any office and employment in the common-wealth, without the conſent of both houſes of parliament; or ſhould abſent themſelves out of the kingdom for ſome time, if both houſes of parliament ſhould think fit. That all other perſons in that propoſition ſhould ſubmit to a moderate compoſition, and for the ſpace of three years ſhould not ſit, or ſerve as members, or aſſiſt in either houſe of parliament, without conſent of both houſes."

The time fixed for the continuance of the treaty being almoſt expired, and nothing ſettled on the article of epiſcopacy, which was properly the only point on which difficulties occurred, the two houſes found an expedient to prolong the negotiation a week, by ordering that the Sundays and Faſt-days ſhould not be accounted part of the forty days allowed for the conferences.

The 21ſt of October the king ſent a freſh meſſage to both houſes concerning epiſcopacy. Cromwell was on the road to join the army, and it was to be feared, if the treaty was not concluded before his arrival, he would raiſe invincible obſtacles to it. The king ſufficiently knew him, to believe there was no good to be expected from him. He believed therefore, that to haſten the concluſion of the treaty, to which the affair of epiſcopacy was the grand obſtacle, he ought to make ſome farther conceſſions on that point. Wherefore he acquainted the two houſes, by a meſſage:

"1. That he conſented to the aboliſhing of archbiſhops, chancellors, deans, and chapters, &c. and the whole hierarchy, except biſhops.

"2. That for three years no other but preſbyterian-government ſhould be uſed, and the exereiſe of epiſcopal government ſhould be wholly ſuſpended during that time.

"Whereas epiſcopal juriſdiction, if no other had been agreed upon in the mean time, might have riſen up after the three years, he now expreſſed his conſent, that none ſhould be exerciſed after that time other than ordination, which was reſtrained to the counſel and aſſiſtance of preſbyters, but ſuch, and in ſuch manner, as ſhould be agreed by him and of his two houſes; whereby until ſuch agreement, or if it were not otherwiſe agreed, epiſcopal juriſdiction was wholly laid aſide."

His majeſty alſo that day conſented to the following propoſitions:

"To that for nomination of the great officers of the kingdom, to be by both houſes during the term of ten years.

"To thoſe concerning the city of London, and the great ſeal.

"To that concerning the court of Wards, &c. a recompence being aſſured to his majeſty of one hundred thouſand pounds per annum to him, his heirs and ſucceſſors in lieu of the court of wards."

The commiſſioners acquainting the king that his anſwer concerning epiſcopacy would not be ſatisfactory to the two houſes, and earneſtly preſſing him to give them a fuller, he told them in writing, he could not abſolutely relinquiſh epiſcopacy. He repeated his offers on that head, adding only, that if in the ſpace of three years he was convinced, that the function of biſhops was not agreeable to the word of God, or that Chriſt commanded any other government, he would moſt chearfully embrace it: but till he was ſo convinced, he believed himſelf bound in conſcience to maintain epiſcopacy.

The commons ſpent four or five days in debates upon the king's offers and anſwers, and voted them unſatisfactory, as to the point of epiſcopacy, the lords concurring with them.

The ſame was voted concerning the king's anſwer about taking the covenant and aboliſhing popery, for that he de-

in order to enter Scotland together. When Cromwell came near Berwick, he writ to the committee of eſtates to require them to call home Monroe, and deliver Berwick and Carliſle, otherwiſe they were to expect a war. A few days after he purſued his march towards Scotland, having left ſome regiments to block up Berwick.

Duke Hamilton's defeat and Cromwell's threats intirely changed the face of affairs in Scotland. The marquis of Argyle, who had not been able to prevent the raiſing of an army, and had been forced to ſubmit to the oppoſite party, became ſuperior again, and was ſupported by all who were againſt the war. The committee of eſtates daily loſt their authority, and were ſeconded only by Monroe, who was at length returned into Scotland. So, the marquis of Argyle being aſſured of the approbation of moſt of the people, levied three or four thouſand men to oppoſe Monroe, whom the earl of Lanerick had joined, with ſome new-raiſed troops. They had ſecured Sterling-bridge, which hindered the marquis of Argyle from making any progreſs, though his forces had been more numerous. But Cromwell broke all their meaſures by not ſtaying at Berwick, but marching directly to Edinburgh. He thereby forced the committee of eſtates to fly from thence and diſperſe, for fear of being incloſed between the Engliſh and the marquis of Argyle's forces. Then the earl of Lanerick and Monroe, being unable to continue the war, came to an agreement upon the following terms:

"1. That both the armies ſhould be diſbanded.

"2. That a parliament ſhould be called to ſit before the 20th of January.

"3. That the ſettling of religion be referred to the determination of the general-aſſembly, and all civil queſtions to the determination of parliament.

"4. That a new committee of eſtates be appointed, to conſiſt only of ſuch members as proteſted in parliament againſt the late engagement: and in caſe any of the forces under Monroe ſhould continue in arms, that then the ſaid committee ſhould raiſe forces to ſuppreſs the ſame.

"5. That none who had been acceſſary to the late engagement, ſhould be challenged to take away their lives and eſtates, &c. provided they did declare under their handwriting, to the lord-chancellor, or preſident of the committee of eſtates, that they accepted of, and ſubmitted to, the preſent engagement.

"6. That all perſons taken in war, ſince the ſecond of Auguſt, be releaſed."

The face of affairs being thus changed, and the king's party diſperſed, Cromwell repaired to Edinburgh, where he was received with great reſpect. He obtained the reſtitution of Berwick and Carliſle, and having concerted proper meaſures with the marquis of Argyle, returned triumphantly into England. He left Lambert, however, in Scotland, with three or four regiments, at the requeſt of the Scots, who believed they ſhould want them, to awe thoſe who might deſire to raiſe new commotions.

Whilſt Cromwell was in queſt of Monroe in Scotland, and three days before general Fairfax came to St. Albans, the conferences for peace began at Newport[y]. Though the two houſes had deſiſted from the condition, that the king ſhould ſign the three bills before the treaty, they had not relinquiſhed the thing itſelf. The very firſt day, the commiſſioners preſented to the king, the draughts of the three bills. By the firſt, the preſbyterian-government was eſtabliſhed for ever in the church of England, epiſcopacy aboliſhed, with the whole hierarchy, and the ſale of biſhops lands appointed. By the ſecond, the king left the power of the militia for thirty years in the hands of both houſes. By the third, all the king's proclamations and declarations againſt the parliament, or their adherents, were recalled. The laſt of theſe bills began with theſe words, 'Whereas the parliament have been neceſſitated to make and proſecute a war in their juſt and lawful defence,' &c. The king ſcrupled not to agree to the ſubſtance of the bill, but objected againſt the preamble, which charged him indirectly with having made war upon the parliament, and deſired it might be omitted, to which the commiſſioners would never conſent, becauſe they were, by their inſtructions, not to depart from a tittle of what was contained in the three bills. This diſpute held ſeven days, and it was the 25th of September, before the king conſented at laſt to paſs the bill, with the preamble. But it was on condition, that nothing ſhould be binding, unleſs the whole were agreed on, and the treaty ſigned. This article being thus diſpatched, they proceeded to the reſt, on which were great debates, and particularly concerning religion. As the king ſaw the commiſſioners would not, or could not yield any thing, he hoped to ſhorten the negotiation, by ſhowing the two houſes, how far he could comply with regard to the moſt important articles. He ſent therefore a meſſage to explain his intentions, and make them the following offers.

Concerning religion. "His majeſty will conſent, that the calling and ſitting of the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter be confirmed for three years by act of parliament, and confirms for three years the directory, and the form of church-government, to be uſed for the churches of England and Ireland, and dominion of Wales; provided that his majeſty, and thoſe of his judgment, or any other, who cannot in conſcience ſubmit thereunto, be not in the mean time obliged to comply with the ſame; and that a free conſultation and debate, be had with the aſſembly of divines at Weſtminſter in the mean time, twenty of his majeſty's nomination being added to them, whereby it may be determined by his majeſty, and his two houſes of parliament, how the ſaid church-government, and form of public worſhip, after the ſaid time, and how religion may be ſettled, and the articles determined, and care taken for the eaſe of tender conſciences."

Concerning the biſhops lands and revenue. "His majeſty will conſent to an act or acts of parliament, whereby legal eſtates for lives, or for years, not exceeding ninety-nine, ſhall be made for thoſe lands, towards the ſatisfaction of the purchaſers, and to others to whom they are engaged, whereby they may receive ſatisfaction; provided that the property and inheritance of thoſe lands, may ſtill remain to the church, and the reſt that ſhall be reſerved to be for their maintenance.

3. His majeſty will give his royal aſſent for the better obſervation of the lord's-day, for ſuppreſſing of innovations in churches and chapels, in and about the worſhip of God, and for the beter advancing of the preaching of God's holy word in all parts of this kingdom; and to an act againſt enjoying pluralities of benefices by ſpiritual perſons, and non-reſidency; for regulating and reforming both univerſities, and the colleges of Weſtminſter, Wincheſter and Eaton; for the better diſcovery, and ſpeedy conviction of popiſh recuſants, for the education of the children of papiſts, by proteſtants, in the proteſtant religion, for levying penalties againſt papiſts: to an act to prevent the practices of papiſts againſt the ſtate, and for putting the laws in execution, and for a ſtricter courſe to prevent hearing, and ſaying of maſs.

4. As to the covenant, his majeſty is not yet therein ſatisfied, that he can ſign or ſwear it, or conſent to impoſe it on the conſciences of others; nor doth conceive it proper, or uſeful, at this time, to be inſiſted on[z].

5. Touching the militia, his majeſty will conſent to an act of parliament, to be in the parliament's hand for ten years.

6. Touching Ireland, after advice with his two houſes, he will leave it to their determination, and give his conſent accordingly.

7. Touching public debts, his majeſty will give his conſent to ſuch an act, for raiſing of moneys by general and equal taxations.

8. He propoſeth, that he may have liberty forthwith to come to Weſtminſter, and be reſtored to a condition of freedom and ſafety, a thing which he ſhall never deny to any of his ſubjects, and to the poſſeſſion of his lands and revenues; and that an act of oblivion and indemnity may paſs, to extend to all perſons, for all matters relating to the late differences, which being agreed by his two houſes of parliament, his majeſty will be ready to make theſe his conceſſions binding, by giving them the force of laws by his royal aſſent[a]."

If theſe offers concerning religion are conſidered, with reſpect to the king's private opinion, they may be ſaid to be great condeſcenſions, perhaps greater than his conſcience allowed, ſince it was his real belief, there was no true church without biſhops. But if theſe offers are conſidered, with regard to the preſbyterians and independents, of whom the parliament conſiſted, they will be found to be by no means ſatisfactory. They were only a ſort of interim, which tended to make them loſe the preſent opportunity to aboliſh epiſcopacy intirely.

His majeſty alſo that day conſented to the following propoſitions:

"To thoſe concerning the city of London, and the great ſeal.

"To that concerning the court of Wards, &c. a recompence being aſſured to his majeſty of one hundred thouſand pounds per annum to him, his heirs and ſucceſſors in lieu of the court of wards."

The commiſſioners acquainting the king that his anſwer concerning epiſcopacy would not be ſatisfactory to the two houſes, and earneſtly preſſing him to give them a fuller, he told them in writing, he could not abſolutely relinquiſh epiſcopacy. He repeated his offers on that head, adding only, that if in the ſpace of three years he was convinced, that the function of biſhops was not agreeable to the word of God, or that Chriſt commanded any other government, he would moſt chearfully embrace it: but till he was ſo convinced, he believed himſelf bound in conſcience to maintain epiſcopacy.

The commons ſpent four or five days in debates upon the king's offers and anſwers, and voted them unſatisfactory, as to the point of epiſcopacy, the lords concurring with them.

The ſame was voted concerning the king's anſwer about taking the covenant and aboliſhing popery, for that he defired to have it tolerated in the queen's chapel and family. The houſes were likewiſe diſſatisfied with the anſwers about alienating biſhop-lands, and ſale of deans and chapters, and concerning delinquents. Thus, the peace ſeemed more remote than ever, eſpecially, as the lords concurred with the commons in the alienation of church-lands.

As the time limited for the conferences was about to expire, theſe reſolutions were ſpeedily ſent to the commiſſioners with orders to demand the king's final and poſitive anſwer, and by a ſpecial meſſage the commons alſo deſired of the king, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to declare expreſly againſt the Iriſh rebellion, and the ceſſation concluded with the rebels, and forbid the junction of the marquis of Ormond's forces with the Iriſh papiſts to make war upon the proteſtants. But as there remained only three days, which was not a ſufficient time to receive the king's anſwer, the lords prevailed with the commons to prolong the treaty a fortnight, and the rather, as the king had deſired to confer with Dr. Uſher archbiſhop of Armagh, and the biſhops of Worceſter and Rocheſter, upon the affairs of the church. But as much was not to be expected from this delay, the commiſſioners were allowed to return to the parliament, leaving three of their number to receive the king's final anſwer[c]. Twelve of the commiſſioners coming to London, reported to the parliament the king's final anſwer, which had been delivered to them the 9th of November, and was to this effect:

"That his conceſſions had been miſapprehended, and that he did not intend to make any more new biſhops during the term of three years.

"That whereas it might be objected, That in the end of three years the power of ordination ſhould be practiſed in the old manner as formerly, that is, the biſhops ſhould be at liberty to call what preſbyters they would to aſſiſt in ordaining, but were not bound to their counſel or conſent, his majeſty did now intend and conſent, that biſhops ſhould not receive any into holy orders without the conſent of a limited number of preſbyters to be choſen in ſuch manner as ſhould be agreed on by his majeſty and his two houſes for that purpoſe.

"That his majeſty did not intend, that after the end of three years no certain way ſhould be ſettled concerning eccleſiaſtical government, for that his majeſty did purpoſe, during the three years, to have a conſultation with the aſſembly of divines, twenty being added of his nomination, which if his two houſes ſhould reſolve to entertain, it could not be well doubted, but upon the debate, ſuch a government would be agreed on by his majeſty and his two houſes, as ſhould be beſt for the peace of the church, and moſt proper to prevent thoſe diſtractions which his two houſes apprehended might enſue.

"As to that part of the propoſition concerning the book of common-prayer; for the ſatisfaction of his two houſes, that he would not inſiſt upon any proviſion for continuance of the ſame in his majeſty's chapel for himſelf and his houſhold: nevertheleſs his majeſty declared, that he intended to uſe ſome other ſet form of divine ſervice.

"As to their requeſt, that an act be paſſed for a ſtricter courſe to prevent the ſaying and hearing of maſs in the court, or any part of the kingdom, or in Ireland, his majeſty would conſent thereunto.

"As to all other particulars mentioned in the parliament's paper, he referred himſelf to his former anſwers.

"Concluding, that ſince he had by his conceſſions brought all differences concerning the church into ſo narrow a compaſs, that the chief viſible obſtruction was, that wherein really in conſcience he was not ſatisfied, he hoped his two houſes would not put farther preſſures of ſo tender a nature upon him."

All this was not capable to induce the commons to deſiſt from the leaſt of their pretenſions. They voted, that his majeſty's anſwers concerning the church, form of prayer, hearing and ſaying maſs, were unſatisfactory; and ordered the three commiſſioners attending the king to inform him of their votes, and preſs him for a final anſwer.

As the parliament had not hitherto taken any notice of the king's propoſitions or deſires, the houſe of commons at length took them into conſideration, and paſſed the following votes:

"1. That his majeſty's coming to London ſhall be with freedom, ſafety, and honour, ſo ſoon as the conceſſions of the treaty are concluded and agreed.

"2. That his majeſty ſhould have his lands and revenues, what is legally his, made good to him, according to the laws of the kingdom.

"3. What his majeſty ſhall paſs away of his legal rights, he ſhall have allowance in compenſation thereof.

"4. That an act of oblivion be preſented to his majeſty, to be paſſed with ſuch limitations as ſhall be agreed on by both houſes of parliament."

It is certain, there never was any difficulty either about the king's return, or the reſtitution of his revenues, or the abolition of the court of wards, inſtead of which he was to have an hundred thouſand pounds a year. Theſe three articles were conſidered as a natural conſequence of the concluſion of the treaty. But as to the act of oblivion, the king and parliament did not agree. The parliament inſiſted upon excepting from pardon ſuch a number of delinquents, that is, of thoſe who had ſerved the king, and were conſidered as the authors of the troubles. They intended to confiſcate their eſtates, and baniſh them the realm. In ſhort, after long debates, the number of excepted perſons were reduced to ſeven, about whom the two houſes did not agree[d]. Nay, as to thoſe that were to be included in the pardon, the parliament pretended to inflict a pecuniary puniſhment on them, and had ranked them under ſeveral claſſes, according to which, ſome were to forfeit one half of their eſtates, others a third, others a fourth, and had aſſigned the money thence ariſing towards the payment of the public debts. The king, on the contrary, pretended, that all without exception ſhould have the benefit of the act of oblivion. He conſented only that ſome of thoſe whom the parliament termed delinquents, that is, his faithful ſervants, ſhould be liable to a moderate compoſition, a general expreſſion, on which there would have been many diſputes, had it come to be diſcuſſed. However, this article, which was conſiderable, was not yet ſettled, but it was not impoſſible to find expedients to ſatisfy the king and the parliament, if the difficulties concerning religion had not hindered the concluſion of the treaty, upon which I cannot forbear making two remarks.

The firſt is, that if the commons inſiſted ſo long upon the ſigning the three bills, it was becauſe they knew how inflexible the king was in the point of epiſcopacy, and deſpaired of concluding a treaty with him, unleſs he previouſly granted this article, upon which they were no leſs inflexible than he, as plainly appeared in the conferences. This was the principal point, without which perhaps there would have been no war, and from which the preſbyterians could not depart without loſing the fruit of their labours and ſucceſſes againſt the king.

My ſecond obſervation is, that the rigid epiſcopalians had room to ſee in theſe conferences, what prejudice their former exceſſive ſeverity againſt preſbyterianiſm now brought them, ſince it was not poſſible to find any other way to content the preſbyterians than the abolition of epiſcopacy. The preſbyterians, knowing by long experience the king's ill-intentions towards them, thought they could not truſt to conceſſions extorted from him by neceſſity, and were not to be ſatisfied ſo long as the name of biſhop ſubſiſted. They were apprehenſive, and perhaps very juſtly, that the function of biſhops, though reduced almoſt to nothing by the king's offers, would be a foundation on which the king intended to raiſe the ſuperſtructure of the hierarchy, or a toothing, which ſhowed that he meant not to leave the building in its preſent condition. The example of what had happened in Scotland farther confirmed their jealouſies and fears. In that kingdom, all the epiſcopal functions had been aboliſhed. The biſhops had retained only the bare name, with ſome temporal privileges, entirely diveſted of authority or juriſdiction. But even this had ſufficed to give king James occaſion to reſtore them to all the rights they had enjoyed before the reformation. Charles I. might intend to do the ſame thing in England; and the preſbyterians but too well remembered, that, at the very time he granted the Scots the extirpation of epiſcopacy, he wrote to the Scotch biſhops that it was only through compulſion, and till he ſhould have opportunity to reſtore the church to her former ſplendor. Without this prejudice of the preſbyterians, without this want of confidence, of which the king may be ſaid to be himſelf the cauſe, it is certain his offers with regard to epiſcopacy might have ſerved for foundation to a peace, as the parliament acknowledged when it was too late. Mean while, the two houſes, not deſpairing entirely to bring the king to their terms, continued the treaty a week longer.

Whilſt both houſes were employed in the affairs of the treaty, the officers of the army, whoſe head-quartes were then at Windſor, met in a council of war, to endeavour to obſtruct the peace. They knew what had paſſed at Newport, and that the concluſion of the treaty depended but on a ſingle point, which they did not queſtion, the king would at laſt grant. Wherefore they reſolved to hinder the concluſion by force. Cromwell was not yet come to the army, but remained about Pontefract, to order the ſiege of that place, which had been ſurpriſed by the king's party, and the garriſon whereof kept the whole country in awe, and committed great violences. Colonel Rainſborough had been detached from the army, to command at the ſiege; but had been ſurpriſed in a neighbouring town by a party of the garriſon, who had killed him, not having been able to carry him off[e]. Cromwell had ever loved and eſteemed him, and therefore earneſtly wiſhed to revenge his death, beſides, that he was importuned by the committee of Yorkſhire, to employ the forces he was leading from Scotland, for the reduction of that place. This had detained him ſome time in thoſe parts. But, as he wanted not all his troops for the ſiege, becauſe he had there already a detachment of the army, he ſent part of his forces before, to join general Fairfax. This reinforcement being arrived, the army believed themſelves able to execute what had been reſolved. To that purpoſe, the 18th of November, which would have been the laſt day of the Newport conferences, if the parliament had not continued them a week longer, colonel Ewers, attended with ſome officers, preſented to the commons from the army, a remonſtrance, which plainly diſcovered the intentions of the independent party. The ſubſtance of the army's deſires was to this effect;

" 1. That the king be brought to juſtice, as the capital cauſe of all the evils in the kingdom, and of ſo much blood being ſhed.

" 2. That a timely and peremptory day be ſet for the prince of Wales, and duke of York, to come in and ſurrender themſelves; if not, that they be declared incapable of government, or any right in England, and ſtand exiled for ever as traitors; and if they render themſelves by the time, then the prince to be proceeded againſt or remitted, as he ſhall give ſatisfaction, and the duke the like, and that the revenue of the crown be ſequeſtered. Alſo the 10,000l. to be added, be diſpoſed to public uſe.

" 3. That public juſtice may be done upon ſome capital cauſers or actors in the war.

" 4. That the reſt, upon ſubmiſſion, may have mercy for their lives,

" 5. That the ſoldiers have their arrears.

" 6. That public debts be paid, chiefly to thoſe who voluntarily laid out their eſtates, and ventured their lives, and this to be done by fines of delinquents, and the eſtates of thoſe excluded from pardon.

" 7. After public juſtice thus done, then that a reaſonable certain period be put to this parliament.

" 8. That there be a certain ſucceſſion of future parliaments, annual or biennial, with ſecure proviſion, (1.) For the certainty of meeting. (2.) For equal diſtribution of elections, to render the commons houſe an equal repreſentative. (3.) For certainty of the people's meeting, and that none who have engaged in the late war, or ſhall engage againſt the right of parliament and kingdom, or adhere to the enemies thereof, be capable of electing, or being elected, during ſome years, nor thoſe who ſhall not join with them, but oppoſe this ſettlement. (4.) For clearing the power of this repreſentative, it be declared to have the ſupreme power, as to the governing and preſervation of the whole, as to the people of England, and to altering, repealing, or aboliſhing of laws, the making war or peace, the higheſt or final judgment in all civil things; and all miniſters or officers of ſtate ſhall be accountable to them, bound and concluded thereby: provided, firſt, They may not cenſure or queſtion any man after the end of this parliament, for any thing ſaid or done in reference to the late war. Secondly, They may not render up, give or take away any right, liberty, or ſafety, contained in this ſettlement or agreement: That there be a liberty of entering diſſents in the ſaid repreſentative; in caſe of corruption in theſe higheſt truſts, the people may know who are free, and who guilty, that ſo they may not truſt ſuch for the future, but with further penalty to any for their future judgment there.

" 9. That no king be hereafter admitted, but upon election of, and as upon truſt from the people, by ſuch their repreſentative, not without firſt diſclaiming and diſavowing all pretence to a negative voice againſt the determination of the ſaid repreſentative, or commons in parliament, and that to be done in ſuch form more clear than heretofore in the coronation-oath.

" Theſe matters of a general ſettlement are propounded to be done by this parliament, and to be further eſtabliſhed by a general contract or agreement of the people, with ſubſcriptions thereunto; alſo that it be provided, that none be capable of benefit by this agreement, who ſhall not conſent and ſubſcribe thereunto, nor any king be admitted to the crown, or other perſon to any other office or place of public truſt, without expreſs accord and ſubſcription to the ſame."

The parliament returned no anſwer to this remonſtrance, as well as to ſome others of the like nature, preſented to them during the treaty. I have already mentioned that of the 11th of September, from thouſands of the inhabitants in and about London, and that of the maſters and commanders of ſhips. The 30th of the ſame month they received another, in the name of many thouſands of the county of Oxon. The 10th of October, a petition was preſented to the commons, ſigned by the Newcaſtle-men, deſiring that ſpeedy juſtice might be executed upon the greateſt delinquents. The ſame day, the inhabitants of Yorkſhire petitioned for the ſame thing, ſaying, 'His majeſty had conſeſt himſelf, and his party, to be guilty of the blood that had been ſhed.' The 30th of the ſame month, the officers of Ingoldſby's regiment, garriſoned at Oxford, preſented a petition to the general, deſiring, " That immediate care be taken, that juſtice be done upon the principal invaders of their liberties, namely, the king and his party, and ſufficient caution given to future kings, for preventing the inſlaving the people hereafter. Adding, that being apprehenſive the iſſue of the treaty now in hand, could neither be juſt nor ſafe, they prayed his excellency to re-eſtabliſh a general council of the army, to conſider of ſome effectual remedies to this evil, either by repreſenting the ſame to the houſe of commons, as the petitioners of London, or by ſome other way." On the other hand, whilſt Cromwell was at Pontefract, every regiment of his army preſented petitions to him, demanding juſtice upon the king; which were all ſent to the general[f]. Hence it appears, that the army's remonſtrance was an effect of the plots laid by the independents, who, in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, infuſed theſe violent reſolutions into the people and officers, to hinder the concluſion of a treaty which could not but ruin their party. Very likely, the preſbyterians fully perceived the deſigns of the independents, and theſe petitions were but too apt to convince them of the ſame. But they hoped to amuſe them till the treaty was ended, not doubting the king would at laſt conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy. As for the other articles, which were not yet ſettled, probably, they would have choſen rather to yield them to the king, than retard the concluſion of the treaty, which to them was ſo neceſſary. Affairs being in this ſituation, it was not proper ſtill more to provoke the independents, by anſwers which would not have pleaſed them. On the other ſide, they could not think of agreeing with the king, without obtaining the abolition of epiſcopacy, not thinking themſelves ſafe ſo long as the very name of biſhop ſubſiſted. In ſhort, it was not proper to attempt a reſiſtance of the army by force. In all appearance, their preparations would but have haſtened the execution of the army's reſolutions, whereas it was their intereſt to amuſe them only for ſome days. All their hopes therefore were grounded upon the king's compliance, which they hardly queſtioned, conſidering the manifeſt danger to which his obſtinacy would expoſe him. For it is not likely, he was ignorant of the petitions preſented againſt him, or was not ſoon informed of the army's remonſtrance, ſince every one had free acceſs to him.

Three days after the parliament had received a remonſtrance, letters came from the commiſſioners at Newport, with his majeſty's anſwer concerning the marquis of Ormond, and the biſhop's lands; namely, that he could not give any orders to the marquis before the treaty was ſigned, but then would do as both houſes deſired; and if the marquis refuſed to obey, would take ſuch meaſures againſt him as ſhould be

The colonel roſe and opened his door to them (expecting ſuch a letter that morning) and preſently the three Pontefract ſoldiers fell upon him, ſhot him in the neck, another ſhot him through the heart, with other wounds, and left him dead, eſcaping without any alarm given. ſatisfactory to the two houſes. That as to the biſhops lands, he perſiſted in his former offers. This anſwer afforded no great hopes of a ſpeedy accommodation. However, as it was delivered the 16th of the month, two days before the preſenting of the army's remonſtrance, it was hoped the next news from Newport would be more ſatisfactory. But on the 25th the parliament was informed, by letters from the commiſſioners, that the king had poſitively refuſed to add any thing to his former anſwers.[g]

This was not all. They were acquainted at the ſame time, that the general had required colonel Hammond to attend him at the head-quarters, and ſent colonel Ewers to take the command of his majeſty in the Iſle of Wight, who kept the king under very ſtrict cuſtody. Thus the precautions taken by the parliament, to hinder the king from coming to treat in perſon at London, for fear he ſhould meet with too many friends, were the cauſe that they could not be maſter of his perſon, when it would have been moſt neceſſary. Two days after, the commons received a letter from colonel Hammond, with the general's order to him to repair to the army, and reſign his command to colonel Ewers. Whereupon the commons voted, that colonel Hammond ſhould be required to ſtay in the Iſle of Wight, and the general be acquainted with this vote. But Hammond was now gone to the army, and had reſigned the cuſtody of the king to colonel Ewers. Notwithſtanding all this, the parliament ſeems not to have deſpaired of agreeing with the king, ſince the commons deferred the conſideration of the army's remonſtrance, till the 1ſt of December, in order to be better able to anſwer it when they ſhould know the king's final reſolution. The ſame day the general received petitions from the forces in the north, and in Wales, agreeable to the army's remonſtrance.

After the general had thus made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon, without the privity of the two houſes, it was not very likely he ſhould be diſpoſed to receive their orders. Nevertheleſs, the commons told him, in a letter from their ſpeaker, That his orders to colonel Ewers were contrary to their reſolutions, and colonel Hammond's inſtructions, and that it was the pleaſure of the houſe, he ſhould recal his orders, and ſuffer colonel Hammond to attend his charge in the Iſle of Wight. But the general and council of war took no notice of this order.

The next day, the king, by command of the general, was removed by lieutenant-colonel Cobbet to Hurſt-caſtle in Hampſhire, ſituated on a narrow piece of land, running into the ſea, over-againſt the Iſle of Wight, and the parliament was not informed of it till three days after[h].

Mean while, the army was not idle, being reſolved to run all hazards to prevent the concluſion of the treaty. The ſame day, November the 30th, they publiſhed a declaration or manifeſto, wherein they clearly diſcovered their deſigns, and which was to this effect:

"That the army being full of ſad apprehenſions concerning the danger and evil of the treaty with the king, and of any accommodarion with him, or reſtitution of him thereupon, they did, by a remonſtrance, make their application thereby to the houſe of commons. That they took this courſe out of an earneſt deſire, that thoſe matters of higheſt concernment to the public intereſt of the nation might be purſued and provided for, if poſſible, by thoſe whoſe proper work and truſt it was: but to their grief they found, that inſtead of any ſatisfaction, or reaſonable anſwer thereunto, they were wholly rejected, without any conſideration of them. For they were laid aſide till the monday following, by which time the treaty, as then ſuppoſed, would have been concluded; but that failing, and two days more being added to the treaty, the conſideration of their remonſtrance in the day appointed was waved and laid aſide; the treaty in the mean while, going on in the former way and terms, and like to be concluded the very next day. The army therefore having received no anſwer to their former propoſals, they could not but remain confident, that the prevailing part of thoſe to whom they did apply, had as it were their eyes wilfully ſhut, and ears ſtopt, againſt any thing of light or reaſon offered to them, ſo as not to diſcern the dangers wherewith the kingdom was threatened.

"The army then ſeeing nothing left, to which the parliament's engaging and perſiſting in ſuch ways, could rationally be attributed, leſs than a treacherous or corrupt neglect of, and apoſtacy from, the public truſt repoſed in them, they thought fit to appeal to the common judgments of indifferent and uncorrupted men, and to the more righteous judgment of God above all."

After juſtifying this extraordinary appeal in the beſt manner they could, they admoniſhed ſuch members as were upright, and had a juſt ſenſe of thoſe things, to proteſt againſt the reſolutions of the houſe, and withdraw, promiſing to look upon them as perſons that had the chief truſt of the kingdom remaining in them, and to adhere to them, and be guided by them, till the introducing of a more formal power, in a juſt repreſentative, were ſpeedily endeavoured. Then they declared, that they were ready to lay down their arms, if their remonſtrance were anſwered; but that the little notice taken of their propoſitions, made them ſenſible there was nothing to be hoped. And therefore the caſe being ſo extraordinary, and the danger ſo preſſing, they were drawing up with their army to London, there to follow providence, as God ſhould clear their way.

The firſt of December, the general writ to the city, to inform them of the army's advance towards London, on account of the parliament's contempt of their remonſtrance: that rhey had no thought of plunder, or other wrong to the city, or ſo much as troubling the inhabitants with quartering any ſoldiers: but that, for prevention of all violence, he deſired forty thouſand pounds might be provided by the next day[i]. The houſe of commons agreed, that the city ſhould ſend this ſum to the army, and acquainted the general, that it was the houſe's pleaſure he ſhould not remove nearer London.

The ſecond of this month, the houſe took the king's offers into conſideration, but without coming to any concluſion. Whilſt they were debating, the general, with ſeveral regiments, came and took up their quarters at Whitehall, St. James's, the Meuſe, and other places in the ſkirts of the city, which he judged convenient for his deſigns.

The 3d, being Sunday, the parliament did not ſit. But on the 4th, the commons reſumed the debate of the king's conceſſions, which was interrupted by the news of the king's removal to Hurſt caſtle. Whereupon they voted immediately, that the carrying the king priſoner to Hurſt caſtle, was without the advice and conſent of the houſe. After that, they debated again the king's offers, and ſat all the day and night, till five o'clock in the morning. At laſt, it was propoſed, whether the queſtion ſhould be put, and carried by a hundred and forty, againſt an hundred and four. Then the main queſtion being put, it was voted, that 'his majeſty's conceſſions to the propoſitions of parliament upon the treaty, were ſufficient grounds for ſettling the peace of the kingdom. But I csnnot think it was unanimouſly, as the lord Clarendon affirms[k]. What has been juſt ſeen ſeems to ſhew rather, there were many members not content with this reſolution.

Immediately after, the houſe appointed a committee to confer with the general, for the better procuring a good correſpondence between the parliament and the army; and then adjourned to Wedneſday. The ſame day, ſeveral other regiments came and quartered in the ſuburbs of London; and the general cauſed a proclamation to be made, requiring all delinquents, who had not perfected their compoſitions, to depart ten miles from London for a month, on pain of being proceeded againſt as priſoners of war.

Wedneſday, the 6th of December, the general ſent two regiments to Weſtminſter, and the city trained-bands were diſcharged, who had been ſet there ſome months ſince, for guards to the parliament. After the ſoldiers were drawn up in the court of requeſts, on the ſtairs, and in the lobby before the houſe, when the members offered to go in, colonel Pride, having a paper of names in his hand, ſeized upon one and forty, and ſent them into the court of wards, where they were kept under guard. The houſe having notice thereof, ſent their ſerjeant at arms to acquaint theſe members, that they ſhould forthwith attend the ſervice of the houſe. But the officer of the guard anſwered, he had order to ſecure them, which order he was to obey before any other command[l].

Not long after colonel Whaley, with other officers, preſented to the houſe a paper intitled, Propoſals and deſires of the army in vindication of their conduct, the ſubſtance whereof was to this effect.

" 1. Whereas ſeveral members of your houſe[m], were in the year 1647, impeached by yourſelves for treaſon, or for high crimes and miſdemeanors, in relation to the treaſonable engagement in the city of London; the violence then done upon the parliament, the levying of a new war, and other evils, in maintainance and proſecution thereof; and upon clear proofs againſt them, were by your cenſure expelled the houſe, and diſabled from farther truſt therein, and upon new writs iſſued out, new members were choſen and returned in ſome of their rooms; and yet by the prevalence of their faction, when in the laſt ſummer's wars, divers faithful members were engaged abroad upon neceſſary public ſervice, and others through malignant tumults and diſturbances could not ſafely attend the houſe, the ſame perſons wete afterwards re-admitted to ſit in the houſe, and vote as formerly, without any trial or ſatisfaction in the things whereof they were accuſed.

" 2. Whereas by the confederacy of major-general Brown, now ſheriff of London, with the ſaid impeached members and others, the Scots were invited and drawn in to invade this kingdom the laſt ſummer, inſomuch as when upon their actual invaſion the houſe proceeded to declare them enemies, and thoſe that adhered to them, traitors; yet the ſaid confederators, and other treacherous members, to the number of ninety and odd, as upon the diviſion of the houſe appeared, did by their counſels and votes endeavour to hinder the houſe from declaring againſt their confederate invaders: we deſire, that the ſaid major-general Brown may be alſo ſecured and brought to judgment, and that the reſt of the ninety and odd perſons diſſenting againſt the ſaid vote, may be excluded the houſe.

" 3. Whereas in a continued ſeries of your proceeding for many months together, we have ſeen the prevalence of the ſame treacherous, corrupt, and divided counſels, through factions and private intereſts, oppoſing or obſtructing juſtice in all kinds, diverting your counſels from any thing of public good, hindering any proceedings to any ſuch ſettlement, as would conſiſt with ſecurity to the public intereſt, or put a real end to the troubles, burdens, or hazards of the kingdom, and precipitating into treacherous and deſtructive compliances and conjunctions with the acknowledged enemies thereof, as in the votes of no more addreſſes to the king, &c. the juſtneſs and neceſſity whereof you had once ſo cleared to the world; alſo in the votes for entertaining or ſeeking after all that perſonal treaty: and laſtly, in the votes declaring the king's paſt conceſſions to be a ground for the houſe to proceed upon for the ſettlement of the peace of the kingdom, notwithſtanding the viſible inſufficiency and defects of them in things eſſentially concerning the public intereſt and liberties of the kingdom, as thoſe propounded in our late remonſtrance are, and in other matters both religious and civil. We therefore moſt earneſtly deſire, that all ſuch faithful members who are innocent in theſe things, would immediately, by proteſtation and public declaration, acquit themſelves from any guilt of, or concurrence in the ſeveral votes or councils here before particularly mentioned, as corrupt or deſtructive, that the kingdom may know who they are that have kept their truſt, and diſtinguiſh themſelves from the reſt that have thus falſified the ſame; and that all ſuch as cannot or ſhall not ſo acquit themſelves particularly, may be immediately excluded or ſuſpended the houſe, and not re-admitted until they have given clear ſatisfaction therein, to the judgment of thoſe who now ſo acquit themſelves, and the grounds of ſuch ſatisfaction be publiſhed to the kingdom.

" 4. Thus, ſuch as by faithfulneſs have retained their truſt, being ſet in a condition to purſue and perform the ſame, without ſuch interruptions, diverſions, and depravations of counſels as formerly: we ſhall deſire, and hope you will ſpeedily and vigorouſly proceed to take order for the execution of juſtice, to ſet a ſhort period to your own power, to provide for a ſpeedy ſucceſſion of equal repreſentatives, according to our late remonſtrance, wherein differences in the kingdom may be ended, and we and others may comfortably acquieſce; as for our parts, we hereby engage and aſſure you we ſhall."

It would be needleſs to make any remarks and obſervations upon this paper, the injuſtice and violence whereof are ſo very obvious. But it was neceſſary to inform the reader of the contents for the following reaſon. There are hiſtorians whoſe partiality has cauſed them either to omit, or but juſt mention it, without relating the ſubſtance, for fear of convincing their readers, that the preſbyterians were not concerned in what was afterwards tranſacted, and that the independents were the true and ſole authors thereof.

December the 7th, the commons as they were repairing to their houſe, found the door within and without guarded by ſoldiers, who hindered many from going in[n]. The lord Clarendon ſays, near one hundred were denied entrance. This makes me think that ninety mentioned in the remonſtrance were of this number. So from this day, the houſe of commons is to be conſidered as conſiſting entirely of independents. Very likely from that day, very few or no preſbyterian-members were admitted any more. However, the ſtate of the houſe was once more changed by this new revolution. The preſbyterians had been ſuperior from the beginning of the war, to the 6th of Auguſt 1647. The independents had prevailed from that day, till about the end of the year 1648, when the army was forced to remove from London, after which the preſbyterians were maſters again. At laſt, on the 6th and 7th of December this ſame year, the independents entirely expelled the preſbyterians, or at leaſt diſabled them from ſupporting their party. This muſt be carefully remembered, if we deſire to have a clear idea of the hiſtory.

The ſame day, December the 7th, Cromwell, who came to London the night before[o], ſat in the houſe, and received thanks for his great ſervices.

Though the general had promiſed the city not to quarter the ſoldiers upon the inhabitants, as this promiſe was only conditional, in caſe the ſum demanded were paid, and as the city had not furniſhed the money, he ordered two regiments into the city, and on the morrow a third; after which, he took away twenty thouſand pounds from Weavers-hall, aſſuring the treaſurer he ſhould be reimburſed out of the aſſeſſments of the city due to the army.

About the ſame time was preſented to the general, a plan, intitled, 'A new repreſentative, or an agreement of the people,' for ſettling the government[p]. This plan was wholly founded upon independent principles, and agreeable to the army's remonſtrance, except that it was more large on each article. This agreement was propounded as a rule for future government, and to be ſubſcribed throughout the kingdom. But as this plan was not executed, though it was drawn with great pains by the council of war, and even ſeemed to be approved by the parliament, I do not think it neceſſary to inſert it[q].

The ſecluded members having publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the violence put upon them, both houſes declared the proteſtations to be falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious, and tending to deſtroy the fundamental government of the kingdom, and ordered, that all perſons who had any hand in framing or publiſhing it, ſhould be incapable to bear any office, or to ſit as members of either houſe. They further ordained, that all abſent members, upon their coming to the houſe, ſhould diſclaim their being concerned in, or giving conſent to the contriving or publiſhing the proteſtation.

After that, both houſes paſſed an ordinance, that no perſons who had been delinquents, or aſſiſted the king againſt the parliament in the firſt or ſecond wars, or been aiding in bringing in the Scots army, or ſubſcribed to the treaſonable engagements in 1647, for a perſonal treaty, or abetted the late tumults within the cities of London and Weſtminſter, or the counties of Eſſex, Kent, Middleſex, or Surry, ſhould be elected, or give their voice for electing the lord-mayor, aldermen, common-councilmen, or any other officers. But within a few days, a committee of the common-council acquainted the houſe, that the city was ſo generally concerned in the engagement for a perſonal treaty, that there would not be a ſufficient number of perſons to ſupply the neceſſary offices of the city, if that ſtriction in the late ordinance ſhould ſtand.

The 20th of December, the general ordered fifteen or ſixteen of the members ſecured by the army to be releaſed, with liberty to reſume their places in the houſe if they pleaſed.

We have juſt ſeen how much the face of affairs was altered, by the great turn on the 6th and 7th of December. The commons were now all independents, openly ſupported by the army, and their deſign was to deſtroy equally, king, monarchy, epiſcopacy, and preſbytery. As for the houſe of lords, who had uſed their endeavour, though in vain, to haſten the peace, they ſaw themſelves, ſince this revolution, obliged to follow the ſtream, which was too rapid to be oppoſed. There were in the houſe but few peers, moſt of them indeed preſbyterians, but too weak, in their preſent ſituation, to aſſert their negative voice, and the reſt of their privileges. Whilſt the king was able to protect ſuch as applied to him, the lords retained ſome authority, becauſe they were not without a reſource, in caſe they were diſregarded by the commons. But after the battle of Naſeby it was not the ſame. The commons aſſumed ſuch a ſuperiority, that the lords had no other way to ſupport themſelves, but by approving, or feigning to approve, whatever was done by the other houſe, for fear of producing a breach which muſt have been fatal to them, ſince they would not have known what to do. If they were forced to behave in this manner, whilſt their own party prevailed in the lower-houſe, it is no wonder, they did not dare to ſwerve from this policy, when the independents had gained the advantage. To what purpoſe would it have been to reſiſt the torrents? we ſhall ſee preſently, their firſt oppoſition to a material point irrecoverably ruined them. They therefore who blame them for a too great compliance with the tranſactions ſince the 6th of December 1648, ought to remember, that this is not an occaſion, where we are to reaſon upon the general ideas of the conſtitution of the parliament, but rather upon the particular idea of the ſituation the parliament was in at that time.

Since the independents were maſters of the parliament, petitions againſt the king multiplied ſo faſt, that ſcarce a day paſſed without ſome one being preſented to the commons, eſpecially from the garriſons, which were part of the army. Lambert being returned from Scotland, the regiments under his command failed not to preſent a petition agreeable to the remonſtrance of the army. Somerſetſhire, where the king had formerly many adherents, diſtinguiſhed itſelf on this occaſion above all the reſt, by preſenting a petition, deſiring that ſpeedy and effectual juſtice might be executed upon the chief delinquents, that is, upon the king. The commons were ſo pleaſed with ſuch a petition from a whole county, to encourage the reſt to preſent the like, the petitioners were called in and received the thanks of the houſe, and the petition with the order of thanks were forthwith printed and publiſhed. It does not however appear that the other counties followed this example. Only Norfolk, a few days after, deſired by a petition, that the king himſelf might be brought to impartial juſtice.

At length, the 23d of December, the houſe of commons having reſolved, purſuant to the deſires of the army, to bring the chief delinquents to a trial, and intending to begin with the king, appointed a committee of thirty-eight to draw up a charge, and for that purpoſe to receive all informations and examinations of witneſſes for the matters of fact againſt him.

The ſame day, the fleet under the command of the earl of Warwick ſent a declaration to the general, that they concurred with the army in their remonſtrance. This did not much redound to the earl of Warwick's honour, who having been one of the preſbyterian-leaders, was the firſt that quitted his party to join with the independents.

The reſolution to try the king being taken, (a reſolution projected by ſeveral officers of the army, when he firſt retired to the Iſle of Wight) colonel Harriſon was commanded to remove him from Hurſt-caſtle to Windſor. All the time the king was in the Iſle of Wight, he kept a private correſpondence with the lord Newburgh. Since his being at Hurſt, that lord had found means to acquaint him, he was to be removed to Windſor, and as his houſe was in the road, ſent him word, to endeavour to dine with him, and complain of the going of his horſe, promiſing to ſupply him with one of the fleeteſt in England, by means of which he might attempt to eſcape. Accordingly, the king complained all the morning, that his horſe was very uneaſy, and ſo artfully managed, that he was conducted to dine with the lord Newburgh. But when his majeſty came there, he was quickly told, that the horſe ſo much depended upon, was the day before lamed with a kick. This ſtratagem failing, the king was conveyed to Windſor, where he was kept till the 19th of January 1648-9, when he was carried to St. James's.

He was no ſooner at Windſor, than the council of war ordered all the uſual ceremonies to the king to be laid aſide, as ſerving him upon the knee, and the like, and moſt of his domeſtics to be diſmiſſed. For though the council of war had no right to take then upon them, yet they daily incroached upon the privileges of the parliament, which acted entirely by their orders.

I have before ſpoken of the repreſentation of the common-council of London, concerning the election of the lord-mayor, and other officers of the city. The houſe of commons having heard the report of the committee appointed for that purpoſe, ordered, that their former ordinance ſhould be punctually executed, not regarding, that the magiſtrates of London ſhould be choſen out of the ableſt and moſt ſubſtantial citizens, provided they were of the reigning party. They further ordered, that freemen, for the future, ſhould not be obliged to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy.

The ſame day, being the 28th of December, the committee appointed to conſider of drawing up a charge againſt the king, reported an ordinance for attainting him of high-treaſon, and for trying him by ſuch commiſſioners as ſhould be named in the ordinance, which being read the firſt time, was ordered to be read again the next morning. But as the houſe knew, the ordinance would be approved at the third reading, they paſſed an act for erecting a high court of juſtice, with power to try the king. The preface to which extraordinary act was as follows:

"Whereas it is notorious, That Charles Stuart, the now king of England, not content with thoſe many encroachments which his predeceſſors had made upon the people in their rights and freedoms, hath had a wicked deſign, totally to ſubvert the ancient and fundamental laws and liberties of this nation, and in their ſtead to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; and that beſides all other evil ways and means to bring this deſign to paſs, he hath proſecuted it with fire and ſword, levied and maintained a cruel war in the land againſt the parliament and kingdom, whereby the country hath been miſerably waſted, the public treaſure exhauſted, trade decayed, thouſands of people murdered, and infinite other miſchiefs committed; for all which high and treaſonable offences, the ſaid Charles Stuart might long ſince juſtly have been brought to exemplary and condign puniſhment: whereas alſo the parliament, well hoping, that the reſtraint and impriſonment of his perſon, after it had pleaſed God to deliver him into their hands, would have quieted the diſtempers of the kingdom, did forbear to proceed judicially againſt him; but found by ſad experience, that ſuch their remiſſneſs ſerved only to encourage him and his complices in the continuance of their evil practice, and in raiſing of new commotions, rebellions and invaſions. For prevention therefore of the like or greater inconveniencies, and to the end no chief officer or magiſtrate whatſoever may hereafter preſume, traiterouſly and maliciouſly to imagine or contrive, the enſlaving or deſtroying of the Engliſh nation, and to expect impunity for ſo doing: be it ordained and enacted, by the commons in parliament, and it is hereby ordained and enacted by the authority thereof, That Thomas lord Fairfax, Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, eſquires, Sir Hardreſs Waller, knight, Philip Skippon, (and a hundred and forty-five others) ſhall be, and are hereby appointed and required to be commiſſioners and judges for the hearing, trying, and adjudging of the ſaid Charles Stuart, &c[s]."

[1648-9.] The ordinance for trial of the king paſſed in the houſe of commons the ſecond of January, and was ſent up the ſame day to the lords for their concurrence. Since the ſixth of December, the upper houſe had conſiſted only of nine peers, the reſt having abſented themſelves, that they might not be obliged to countenance the outrageous proceedings of the commons. But upon notice that the ordinance would that day be ſent up to the lords, there came more peers than uſual, as the earls of Northumberland, Mancheſter, Rutland, the lords North, Rochford, Maynard, Dacres, in all ſixteen, and the lord Denbigh ſpeaker. The ordinance being read, was unanimouſly rejected. However, to gain time, it poſible, the lords agreed to acquaint the commons, that they would ſend anſwer by meſſengers of their own; and at the ſame time adjourned for ten days. This artifice was fruitleſs. The commons having ordered the journal of the houſe of lords to be examined, and finding the ordinance was rejected, voted, "That all members of the houſe of commons, and others, appointed to act in any ordinance wherein the lords were joined, ſhall be empowered to ſit, act, and execute, in the ſaid ſeveral committees, of themſelves, notwithſtanding the houſe of peers join not with them." And therefore they ordered the names of ſix lords, who had been appointed for judges, to be left out of the commiſſion, and others to be nominated in their room. Among theſe laſt was ſerjeant Bradſhaw, who was afterwards choſen preſident of the high court of juſtice. Then, the houſe voted:

Their

"1. That the people under God, are the original of all juſt power.

"2. That the commons of England aſſembled in parliament, being choſen by, and repreſenting the people, have the ſupreme authority of this nation.

"3. That whatever is enacted and declared law by the commons of England, aſſembled in parliament, hath the force of law, and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the conſent and concurrence of the king, and houſe of peers, be not had thereunto[t]."

Theſe principles, though directly contrary to the true conſtitution of the Engliſh government, were however very agreeable to thoſe of the independents, whoſe intention was to turn the monarchy into a republic.

The ordinance for trial of the king, with the amendments that were forced to be made for want of the lords concurrence paſſed the houſe of commons the 6th of January.

The following days to the 20th, were employed in preparations for the trial, the like whereof had never yet been ſeen in the world. I intend not to ſwell the hiſtory with the circumſtances of this famous trial. They are to be found in a little book, entitled, 'A true account of the trial of Charles Stewart, &c.' publiſhed at London in 1650, and tranſlated into French, wherein nothing is omitted. I imagine I ſhall do the reader no injury, to refer him to this book, which is not ſcarce, and which will inform him of all particulars[u]. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with briefly obſerving, what I think moſt material in the affair.

I. The high-court of juſtice obſerved the ſame rules in trying the king, as in judging a common malefactor, there being no precedent of ſuch a trial.

II. The principal article of the accuſation was, that the king had levied war againſt the parliament, which was undeniable. The ſieges and battles were evident proofs of it. But this ought not to have been the principal point. It ſhould have been proved, that he was the beginner and author of the war. For it is manifeſt, if the war had been only defenſive on his part, he was not to be blamed. And yet, in the charge, he was ſuppoſed to have put the parliament under a neceſſity of defending themſelves, and this point, which was the chief, not only was not proved, but even not attempted to be ſo. The depoſitions of the witneſſes tended not to ſhow, that the king had forced the parliament to take up arms, but only that he had been ſeen ſword in hand againſt the parliament, and giving orders to levy war. The queſtion, which of the two, the king or the parliament, had begun the war, ought to have been fully cleared. But though it had been ſo to the king's diſadvantage, who does not know, that the beginner of a war is not always the aggreſſor? This was a point of great diſcuſſion, and which impartial judges would have found difficult to decide. For if what has been ſaid in the hiſtory of this reign be remembered, it will be obſerved, that though it is evident the king governed in an arbitrary manner for ſome years, the ground of the war he undertook, was not in maintenance of this arbitrary power. He had fully conſented to the annulling of his uſurpations. But the grouud of the war, on his part, was the defence of the power the king enjoys by the laws of the land. On the parliament's ſide, the ground of the war was, That in a ſuppoſition, the king could not be truſted any more, they would have diveſted him of the power his legal prerogatives afforded him to return to his former courſes, and govern for the future as he had governed before. The king was unwilling to be curbed, and the parliament would ſet bounds to his power. This was the true ground of the war. It was not therefore eaſy to determine who was the firſt author of it. The king refuſed to give other ſecurity for the future than his word; and the parliament pretended to have very ſtrong reaſons to ſuſpect the word of a prince, who had ſo often broke it. To determine on which ſide juſtice and reaſon lay, the king's heart muſt have been dived into, to know whether he was ſincere, or intended to deceive the parliament. On the other hand, it was neceſſary to know, whether the directors of the parliament had not ſome other end than the public good, and whether private intereſts were not concealed under that pretence. But all theſe things could be known only to God. And yet, the parliament, being judge and party, ſuppoſed, without alleging any proof, that the king was the aggreſſor and ſole author of the war.

III. There are frequent inſtances in hiſtory of kings aſſaſſinated by their ſubjects, in conſequence either of the public hatred, or of private revenge, or of the intereſt of ſome faction. The Engliſh hiſtory furniſhes, even ſince the conqueſt, examples of two kings ſolemnly depoſed and impriſoned. But till Charles I. it no where appears, that any king was ever tried for his life, before his own ſubjects as judges. I ſhall ſay nothing here of other ſovereigns, who are poſſeſſed of a greater authority over their ſubjects than the kings of England; for there may be a wide difference between ſovereigns in that reſpect. But confining myſelf wholly to the kingdom of England, and ſuppoſing the conſtitution of the government ſuch as it was from the conqueſt to Charles I. I ſhall briefly ſet forth what has been ſaid for and againſt ſo extraordinary a trial. In the firſt place, it is demanded, On what law, natural or poſitive, was founded the right aſſumed by the parliament of England to try the king? The moſt plauſible anſwer in vindication of the parliament's proceedings, is as follows.

According to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, the king is no leſs bound than the ſubject, to obſerve the laws to which himſelf or predeceſſors aſſented, which is the principal clauſe of the coronation-oath. If this obligation be equal on both ſides, there muſt be therefore equally means to cauſe them to diſcharge it, in caſe they come to neglect it. As for the ſubject, there is no manner of difficulty. The penalties againſt offenders are univerſally known, and the courts of juſtice are appointed to inflict them. It is true, the laws have ordained no penalty upon the kings who diſcharge not their duty, as well out of reſpect to the regal dignity, as becauſe it cannot be ſuppoſed, that the king, to whom the execution of the laws is committed, ſhould be the firſt to break them, and betray the truſt lodged in him by the people. He is nevertheleſs bound to obſerve them himſelf, and cauſe them to be obſerved by the ſubject. This is a principle generally acknowledged. But what is this obligation, if the obſervance of the laws depends ſolely on his will, and there be no juſt means to compel him to obſerve them, or puniſh them when he breaks them? Will it not be an empty ſound without any meaning? And will not the Engliſh government be as arbitrary as that of any other country in the world? Since, therefore, the laws have not decreed any penalty againſt a king that ſhould neglect his duty, or the manner to conſtrain him to diſcharge it; and as, nevertheleſs, he is bound by the ſame laws to procure the obſervance thereof, and to obſerve them himſelf, the nation's repreſentative in parliament is of courſe to call him to an account, ſince it is not poſſible to imagine any other way. Suppoſing the king has violated the moſt fundamental laws of the realm, ſhall foreigners be applied to, for to bring him to juſtice? Can it be ſuppoſed, contrary to experience, that the king is under an impoſſibility of breaking the fundamental laws of the kingdom, of endeavouring to ſubvert them, and of eſtabliſhing an arbitrary government? Will it be maintained, that he may do it with impunity? But if he is aſſured of impunity, what difference is there between the Engliſh government and the moſt deſpotic, ſince its preſervation will ſolely depend on the king's probity and will? If he runs no hazard in trying to alter the conſtitution after ten attempts, he will try again, even till

[t] Theſe votes, ſays Ruſhworth, being reported to the houſe, the houſe put them one after another to the queſtion, and there was not one negative voice to any one of them. Tom. VII. p. 1383.—At this Time Mr. Elſynge deſired to be diſmiſſed from being clerk of the parliament, becauſe (ſays Whitelock of his own knowledge) he would have no hand in the buſineſs of the king. He was a juſt and honeſt man, and a moſt excellent clerk. Mem. p. 364.——Jan. 6. This he ſucceeds. As to the objection, That leſs violent means than war may be uſed to oblige the king to the obſervance of the laws, and leſs unjuſt and extraordinary, than the taking away his life, to puniſh him for the breach of them; it is anſwered, This is true, and the parliament had accordingly tried to ſecure the government by other methods, as by demanding of the king that the power of the militia might be lodged in both houſes. If the king had agreed to it, the realm would have been in peace, and the people's jealouſies have ceaſed. But he had taken up arms to prevent the parliament's uſing theſe means, a clear evidence that his deſign was to maintain himſelf in a condition to alter the government when he ſhould have opportunity. This unjuſt war had been the occaſion of infinite miſchiefs, of the death of thouſands of his ſubjects, and the ruin of the reſt; and if he was brought to a trial, it was not ſo much to puniſh him for violating the laws, as for preferring the unjuſt and violent way of arms, before the expedients offered him to prevent his breaking them for the future.

The advocates for the king ſay, 1. Though the kings of England have not ſo much authority in their realm as ſome other kings, it does not follow, that they may be put upon a level with ſubjects, and made equally accountable for their actions.

2. The principle laid down for foundation, that there is an equal obligation upon the king and ſubjects to obſerve the law, is falſe, and conſequently the whole reaſoning founded thereon, of no force. For, private perſons being entruſted only with their own conduct, nothing can exempt them from the obſervance of the laws. But the king being entruſted with the government of the ſtate, and the execution of the laws, he has conſequently power to qualify them on certain occaſions, otherwiſe this truſt would be to no purpoſe. The laws could not foreſee every thing, and there are occaſions where it is abſolutely neceſſary for the public good to act contrary to them, or at leaſt to ſuſpend the obſervance of them, and therefore the obligation of the king and the ſubject is not equal.

3. Suppoſing the king had violated ſome of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and levied war againſt the parliament after the moſt unjuſt manner, it did not follow that he might be puniſhed with death, by reaſon he has neither ſuperior nor equal in the kingdom, and he could have none but ſubjects for his judges. Beſides, he was the fountain of juſtice, and it was abſurd to make him liable to juſtice, from whom it flows and derives its whole authority.

4. According to this ſuppoſition, the chance of war having put him in the power of his enemies, he might have been detained in priſon, and prevented from doing miſchief, till he was prevailed with to grant all the ſecurities required. But there was a wide difference between impriſonment and death: as the firſt could be conſidered as a reaſonable and neceſſary precaution, and the other as a puniſhment ſubjects were not impowered to inflict on their ſovereign, as indeed the like had never been heard of.

5. But the ſuppoſition that the king had violated the laws, and levied unjuſt war againſt his parliament, was very far from being well-grounded. In the firſt place, as to the laws, if the king, miſled by evil counſels, had, on ſome occaſions, carried his power too far, when the parliament made him ſenſible of the ill-conſequences of his conduct, he had chearfully and willingly renounced the exorbitant power which he believed himſelf before to be juſtly intitled to. He had, without delay, conſented to all the acts preſented to him on that ſubject, and agreed that his moſt intimate counſellors ſhould be brought to juſtice. The parliament had accepted this reparation, without expreſſing the leaſt deſire of cauſing him to ſuffer for his paſt faults. After that, it was abſurd to allege theſe ſame faults, ſo amply repaired, as a motive of the juſtice pretended to be executed upon him.

6. As for the war he had levied againſt his parliament, it was wrongfully aſſerted, and without the leaſt proof, that the king had raiſed and begun it on purpoſe to avoid giving his people ſecurity. And under colour of deſiring ſecurity for the future, a deſire wholly founded upon mere ſuſpicions and bare poſſibilities that the king might abuſe his power, it was pretended to ſtrip him of all his prerogatives, in a word, of the regal authority, and leave him only a ſhadow of royalty. Thus, ſuppoſing it true that the king had begun the war, which was by no means evinced, it would alſo be true, that the parliament had excited it, by attempting, under a vain pretence of peace and concord, to reduce the king to the moſt melancholy ſtate a ſovereign can poſſibly be in.

7. The juſtice, pretended to be executed upon the king, was founded intirely on two ſuppoſitions, ſupported with no proof. The firſt, that the king had undertaken the war, only to free himſelf from giving ſecurity. The ſecond, that there was reaſon to fear he would employ the power that ſhould be left him, in altering the conſtitution. All reaſonable perſons were therefore left to judge, whether there was juſtice in trampling upon all laws divine and human, and inflicting upon their ſovereign a capital puniſhment on two ſuch raſh ſuppoſitions.

8. As for the plunder, ruin, murder, and other miſchiefs occaſioned by the war, before they could be charged to the king's account, it ought at leaſt to have been well proved that he was the author of the war. But if this point were fully examined, it would doubtleſs be found, that the complainers themſelves could alone be charged with it.

9. The king was proceeded againſt for intending to change the government, and make it arbitrary and tyrannical. But every Engliſhman was convinced, that the government had never been more deſpotic, more tyrannical, and more arbitrary than ſince the meeting of this parliament. There was ſcarce a law but what had been violated. The two houſes had, for ſeveral years, uſurped the ſupreme authority contrary to the known laws. And lately the commons had voted, that all power was lodged in them, without the concurrence of king and peers, a maxim unknown to the Engliſh from the foundatſon of the monarchy.

10. The commons in eſtabliſhing, by a bare vote, that it belonged to them alone to try the king, had plainly declared, they owned neither ſuperior nor equal, which was really introducing an arbitrary government.

11. Laſtly, till 1643. the parliament had only ſuſpected the king's intentions to alter the government, but after the parliament had aſſumed the direction, the government was really and truly changed. The king was moreover ſuſpected of deſigning to alter the eſtabliſhed religion: but the parliament had indeed changed it, and reduced it to a deplorable confuſion, and the project of this unfortunate change had been the true cauſe of the war, and of all the ſubſequent calamities.

IV. The fourth circumſtance I intend to obſerve, is, that the king was brought three times before the high court of juſtice, and as often called upon to anſwer the charge entered againſt him, which was read in his hearing. But he conſtantly refuſed to own the authority of the court, and of thoſe who erected it. On the other hand, the court would never hear his reaſons for declining their juriſdiction. They always took for granted, that the authority by which the court was eſtabliſhed, was ſufficient; which was the very thing the king would have combated, but was never ſuffered. At laſt, ſeeing he could not prevail to be heard on that ſubject, he left his reaſons in writing to this effect:

"That no earthly power could juſtly call him (who was their king) in queſtion as a delinquent.

"That there were no proceedings juſt againſt any man but what were warranted, either by God's laws, or the municipal laws of the country where he lives. As for the proceedings againſt him, they could not be warranted by God's laws. For on the contrary, it is there ſaid, 'where the word of a king is, there is power; and who may ſay unto them, what doſt thou? Eccleſ. viii. 4. Then for the law of the land, no impeachment can lie againſt the king, they all going in his name: and one of their maxims is, 'That the king can do no wrong.' Beſides, the law upon which they grounded their proceedings, muſt either be old or new: if old, they ought to ſhew it; if new, they ſhould tell what authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of the land, had made it, and when.

"How the houſe of commons could erect a court of judicature, which was never one itſelf, he left to God and the world to judge.

"And it was full as ſtrange, that they ſhould pretend to make laws without king, or lords houſe, to any that had heard ſpeak of the laws of England. And admitting, that the people of England's commiſſion could grant their pretended power, he ſaw nothing they could ſhew for that: for certainly they never aſked the queſtion of the tenth man in the kingdom.

"That having concluded, as much as in him lay, a treaty at Newport, and expecting the houſe's agreement thereunto, he was ſuddenly ſurpriſed and hurried from thence as a priſoner; that the higher houſe, for any thing he could ſee, was totally excluded; and for the houſe of commons it was too well known, that the major part of them were detained or deterred from ſitting: ſo as if he had no other, this would have been a ſufficient reaſon for him to proteſt againſt the lawfulneſs of their pretended court.

"That the arms he took up, were only to defend the fundamental laws of the kingdom, againſt thoſe who had ſuppoſed his power had totally changed the ancient government [w]."

V. Of all the witneſſes, as I ſaid, examined againſt the king [x], there was not one which proved the king to be author of the war. But among the depoſitions, there were two which muſt not paſs unobſerved, ſuppoſing they were neither forged nor altered. The firſt ſhews, the king was much leſs incenſed againſt the independents than againſt the preſbyterians, though afterwards he had but too much cauſe to perceive, that the principles of the former, were more deſtructive to him, than thoſe of the latter. The ſecond ſeems to prove, that the king did not act with ſincerity, even in the treaty of Newport.

Richard Price a ſcrivener of London depoſed, that the committee of ſafety being informed, that the king was privately negotiating with the independents, ſent the deponent to Oxford, under colour of carrying propoſals to the king, from the independents: that he was introduced to the king by the earl of Briſtol, and received orders to ſay to the leading independents, from his majeſty, that if they would take his part againſt the parliament, he would grant them whatever freedom they deſired.

The ſecond depoſition was of Henry Gooche of Grey's-Inn, who ſaid: "That on the 30th of September laſt, having acceſs to, and diſcourſe with, the king at Newport, he told him, that ſince his majeſty had juſtified the parliament's taking up arms, by conſenting to the preface of the bill, he did not queſtion, but moſt of the preſbyterian-party, both ſoldiers and others, would ſtick cloſe to him." To which the king anſwered, "That he would have all his old friends know, that though for the preſent he was contented to give the parliament leave to call their own war what they pleaſed, yet that he neither did then, nor ever ſhould decline the juſtice of his own cauſe." Moreover, upon the deponent's ſaying, "That his buſineſs was much retarded through want of commiſſions." The king made anſwer, "That being upon a treaty he would not diſhonour himſelf, but if the deponent would go over to the prince his ſon, (who had full authority from him,) he, or any for him, ſhould receive whatever commiſſions ſhould be deſired." That, beſides, he expreſſed much joy, that his good ſubjects would engage themſelves for his reſtoration.

The king refuſing to anſwer before the high-court of juſtice, his refuſal was taken, according to the laws of England, for a confeſſion, and ſentence of death was paſſed upon him the 27th of January [y]. A little before his ſentence was pronounced, he earneſtly deſired to be heard before the two houſes, ſaying, he had ſomething of great importance to offer them. But his deſire was rejected. It is generally believed, he intended to propoſe to the parliament, that he would abdicate the crown in favour of his eldeſt ſon.

The ſentence was executed the 30th of January 1648-9, on a ſcaffold erected in the ſtreet at the windows of the Banquetting-houſe at Whitehall [z]. The king ſuffered death with great conſtancy, and without ſhewing the leaſt ſigns of weakneſs or amazement. His body, after having been for ſome days expoſed to view, in one of the rooms at Whitehall, was carried to Windſor, and buried without any pomp in St. George's chapel [a].

It is no eaſy thing to give a juſt character of Charles I. amidſt the exceſſive commendations beſtowed on him by ſome, and the calumnies wherewith others have endeavoured to blacken his reputation, If the parties born in his reign had died with him, we might find in the hiſtories of that time, compoſed after the troubles were over, an impartiality which might help to form a true judgment of this prince's character. But the ſame parties continuing in the following reigns, with a mutual animoſity, it may be ſaid, there is not an impartial Engliſh hiſtorian upon this ſubject. Some had no other view than to vindicate the king, and others, whoſe aim was to juſtify the parliament, could not do it without loading the king, and rendering him odious. We muſt therefore proceed with the utmoſt caution when we are in ſearch of this prince's character, for fear of being miſled, and drawn into error by the different repreſentations given their readers by the hiſtorians. Notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, I ſhall briefly ſpeak my thoughts, free from all party-paſſion and prejudice.

I do not find, the commendations beſtowed on Charles I. with regard to ſobriety, temperance, and chaſtity, were ever conteſted. All agree likewiſe, that he was a good huſband, a good father, and a good maſter. But ſome accuſe him, and perhaps not unjuſtly, of ſuffering his queen to have too great an influence over him, and too large a ſhare in ſtate affairs [b]. The kingdom being proteſtant, and the queen a very zealous catholic, her power, which ſhe greatly abuſed in cauſing the moſt important offices to be conferred on papiſts, muſt have been looked upon with a jealous eye. This was the chief ground of the opinion ſpread about the kingdom, that the court intended to reſtore the catholic religion in England.

"He was ſo great a lover of juſtice, that no temptation could diſpoſe him to a wrongful action, except it was ſo diſguiſed to him, that he believed it to be juſt." Theſe are the lord Clarendon's own words, which may be very true, if applied to the concerns of particular perſons. But beſides the juſtice which a king ought to adminiſter impartially to private perſons, there is another kind of juſtice due from him, to all his people in general. With reſpect to this laſt, it may juſtly be doubted, that the lord Clarendon's encomium is inconſiſtent with the project of altering the conſtitution, and aſſuming a power, which certainly was illegal. May, I do not believe, that this was one of the things diſguiſed to him, and I ſhould rather think, it was by him, that his miniſters and courtiers framed their conduct, and adapted their notions to his, in order to make their court, and advance their fortune.

Never was king perhaps ſo punctual and regular in his devotions both public and private. This was of ſome uſe to him, to repel the charge of his not being well-affected to the proteſtant religion, and he knew how to improve it on occaſion.

He abhorred all debauchery, and could not endure an obſcene or prophane word. His court was very different from his father's, where oaths, prophane jeſts, and obſcene diſcourſe were but too much in vogue. It is hard to conceive, how the duke of Buckingham, who was uſed to king James's ways, could accommodate himſelf to the gravity and ſeverity of Charles I. or how king Charles could adapt himſelf to the duke of Buckingham's manners.

James I. was laviſh, and his ſon Charles inclined towards avarice. But this failing may be excuſed by the conſidera-

[a] After the king's head was ſtruck off at one blow, his body was put in a coffin, covered with black velvet, and removed to his lodging-room in Whitehall. Being imbalmed, it was delivered the 7th of February to four of his ſervants, Herbert, Mildmay, Preſton, and Joyner, who had been appointed to wait upon him during his impriſonment, and by them, that ſame day, removed to Windſor, where came, by permiſſion, the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton and Lindſey, with Dr. Juxon biſhop of London. Colonel Whitcot, the governor, not permitting the biſhop to ſay the burial-office, according to the liturgy, the body was ſilently interred on February 9, in a vault about the middle of the choir, over againſt the eleventh ſtall on the ſovereign's ſide, near Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour, with this inſcription in capital letters, on a fillet of lead, KING CHARLES, 1648. The whole funeral charges came but to 229l. 5s. Herbert's Mem.

tion, that he never abounded with money, from the beginning to the end of his reign.

His enemies would repreſent him as a cruel and bloody prince; but as they have not been able to reproach him with any particular action denoting ſuch a diſpoſition, it is eaſy to perceive, this charge is founded on the ſuppoſition of his having been author of a war wherein ſo much blood was ſpilt.

Sincerity, as appears in his hiſtory, was not his favourite virtue. He made frequent uſe of mental reſervations, concealed in ambiguous terms and general expreſſions, of which he reſerved the explication at a proper time and place. For this reaſon, the parliament could never confide in his promiſes, wherein there was always either ſome ambiguous term, or ſome reſtriction that rendered them uſeleſs. This may be ſaid to be one of the principal cauſes of his ruin, becauſe giving thereby occaſion of diſtruſt, it was not poſſible to find any expedient for a peace with the parliament. He was thought to act with ſo little ſincerity in his engagements, that it was believed there was no dependence on his word. The parliament could not even reſolve to debate on the king's propoſitions, ſo convinced were they of his ability to hide his real intentions under ambiguous expreſſions. But they ſent their own propoſitions to the king, with the liberty only of ſaying content, or not content, ſo apprehenſive were they of his explications. But as I may be accuſed of loading the king too much upon the point of ſincerity, I think it incumbent on me, to juſtify what I have ſaid, by an unexceptionable evidence. I mean the earl of Clarendon.

'A law enacted by violence and force, (ſays that illuſtrious hiſtorian) is not rightfully enacted, was one of thoſe poſitions of Ariſtotle, which hath never ſince been contradicted, and was an advantage, that being well managed, and ſtoutly inſiſted upon, would, in ſpite of all their machinations have brought his majeſty's enemies to a temper of being treated with. But I have ſome cauſe to believe, that even this argument which was unanſwerable for the rejecting the bill (for taking away the biſhops votes) was applied for the confirming it; and an opinion, that the violence and force uſed in procuring it, rendered it abſolutely invalid and void, made the confirmation of it leſs conſidered, as not being of ſtrength to make that act good, which was in itſelf null. And I doubt this logic had an influence upon other acts of no leſs moment than theſe.'

Let the reader judge after this, if we may boaſt of king Charles's ſincerity, ſince even in paſſing acts of parliament, which is the moſt authentic and ſolemn promiſe a king of England can make, he gave his aſſent, merely in an opinion, that they were void in themſelves, and conſequently he was not bound by this engagement. I paſs over in ſilence the manifeſt breach of the petition of right, perhaps upon the ſame principle, and of his many aſſurances to his parliament of his intention to maintain their privileges, which he violated within a few days, becauſe theſe things have been ſufficiently ſpoken of in the hiſtory of his reign.

Some accuſe him of an inclination for the Roman catholic religion; nay, there are who carry this charge ſo far as to ſay, he intended to reſtore it in England. Theſe imputations are groundleſs. But it cannot be denied, that he gave occaſion for them by his conduct, though contrary to his intention. During the firſt fifteen years of his reign, the Roman catholics were not only ſcreened from the rigour of the law, but even encouraged and countenanced to ſuch a degree, that he made them privy-counſellors, ſecretaries of ſtate and lord-lieutenants of counties. Two things induced him to this condeſcenſion. The firſt, the queen's importunities, who was extremely zealous for her religion. The ſecond, his project to render himſelf abſolute, for the execution of which, he believed the aſſiſtance of the catholics, as well Engliſh as foreigners, to be neceſſary. But I will not affirm, that the queen, and ſome of the miniſtry had not formed, with regard to religion, more extenſive projects, which they did not think proper to impart to the king. The aſſiſtance of the catholics, whom the king had managed for another occaſion, became neceſſary for his own defence, after his breach with the parliament. How unwilling ſoever he ſeemed to receive any aid from the papiſts, it is certain, many were entertained in his ſervice, and that he was privately aſſiſted by the catholics on ſundry important occaſions.

Though it cannot be proved that he excited the Iriſh rebellion, it may however be affirmed, it was not againſt him that the Iriſh took up arms, ſince they never had leſs cauſe to complain than in this and the late reign. Beſides, the papiſts, both Iriſh and Engliſh, always looked upon this prince as their protector, and were ever ready to aſſiſt him. Had he ſucceeded in his deſigns, very likely, the condition of the catholics in England and Ireland, would have been much more happy, and the penal laws in great meaſure repealed. But it does not follow, that the king himſelf had any inclination to popery, or intended to eſtabliſh the Romiſh religion. In ſhort, that he was a ſincere member of the church of England, can hardly be doubted, ſince he affirmed it on the ſcaffold, at a time when it could be of no ſervice to him to diſſemble his belief.

Many people give him the ſirname of martyr, pretending, he ſuffered death in maintenance of the truth of the proteſtant religion againſt the preſbyterians and independents, and call the day of his death, which is ſolemnized yearly on the 30th of January, the day of his martyrdom. But in the firſt place, there was too great a complication of cauſes which brought him to this tragical end, to aſcribe his death ſolely to religion. 2. Though it were true that religion was the ſole cauſe of his death, it would not be univerſally agreed that he died for defending the truth of the proteſtant religion, ſince, among proteſtants, the Engliſh alone, or rather a great part of the Engliſh, hold epiſcopacy to be a doctrine of faith. 3. Though dying for epiſcopacy were really martyrdom, the king in his laſt propoſals at Newport, agreed to reduce epiſcopacy to a very ſmall matter. 4. Had he been condemned by the preſbyterians, he might in ſome manner be ſaid to ſuffer for epiſcopacy. But it is evident the preſbyterians had no ſhare in this ſentence, nor ever thought of bringing him to a trial. The independents were the men that condemned and executed him, and ſurely, it was not on any religious account, but to turn the monarchy into a republic. 5. If the ſcrivener's evidence be true, king Charles cannot be ſaid to ſuffer death for ſupporting religion againſt the independents, ſince, according to the depoſition, he offered to grant them all the freedom they ſhould deſire, if they would but take his part. However this be, the church of England having recovered, in the reign of Charles II. the advantage ſhe had loſt in that of Charles I. appointed the day of his death to be kept every year with faſting and humiliation, which has cauſed ſome to give him the glorious title of martyr.

To conclude, Charles I. was endued with many virtues and noble qualities. There is even room to believe, that his failings flowed intirely from his deſign to enſlave England, and if, on ſome occaſions, he followed not exactly the rules of ſincerity, it was only the more eaſily to execute what he had undertaken. Without this unfortunate project, he might be reckoned one of the moſt accompliſhed princes that ever has been on the Engliſh throne[c]. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Strafford, archbiſhop Laud, and the queen herſelf uſed to a very different government from that of England, were the perſons that ruined this unhappy prince, whom they ſo paſſionately deſired to raiſe higher than his predeceſſors. But who can forbear making a very natural reflection on this ſubject? I mean, upon the puniſhment of thoſe evil counſellors, and of the king himſelf. The duke of Buckingham loſt his life by the hands of an aſſaſſin; Laud, Stafford, and the king himſelf died on the Scaffold, and the queen ſpent the reſidue of her days in a melancholy widowhood, being even ſlighted by her neareſt relations. She lived however long enough to ſee the prince her ſon's reſtoration, but found not in him, all the ſatisfaction ſhe expected, which doubtleſs was the cauſe of her return to France, where ſhe died in the year 1669.

[c] D. Wellwood mentions theſe particulars, in his character of king Charles, not taken notice of by Rapin. "He was a prince of a comely preſence, of a ſweet, grave, but melancholy aſpect. His face was regular, handſome, and well complexioned; his body ſtrong, healthy, and well-made; and though of a low ſtature, was capable to endure the greateſt fatigues. He had a good taſte of learning, and a more than ordinary ſkill in the liberal arts, eſpecially painting, ſculpture, architecture, and medals; he acquired the nobleſt collection of any prince in his time, and more than all the kings of England before him. He ſpoke ſeveral languages very well, and with a ſingular good grace; though now and then, when he was warm in diſcourſe, he was inclinable to ſtammer. He writ a tolerable hand for a king, but his ſenſe was ſtrong, and his ſtile laconic." Mem. p. 68, &c.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

The Hiſtory of the INTER-REGNUM, from the Death of CHARLES I, to the Reſtoration of CHARLES II.

BOOK XXII.

The Hiſtory of the Inter-regnum is divided into Three principal Parts. The Firſt contains what paſſed, whilſt ENGLAND was reduced to a DEMOCRACY. The Second, what happened during the Protectorates of OLIVER and RICHARD CROMWELL. The Third, what paſſed from the Deprivation of RICHARD CROMWELL, to the Reſtoration of CHARLES II.

PART I.

The Commonwealth of ENGLAND.

[1649.] TO underſtand the revolutions in England after the death of Charles I. we are neceſſarily to remember ſome material things which have already appeared in the foregoing reign, and of which it will not be amiſs to make here a ſhort recapitulation.

Firſt, The parliament now ſitting conſiſted properly but of a houſe of commons, who refuſed to acknowledge the negative voice of the peers. This they had manifeſtly ſhewed in erecting a court of juſtice to try the king without the concurrence of the lords, whoſe conſent was voted unneceſſary.

Secondly, This houſe of commons was compoſed of a ſmall number of members, all independents, anabaptiſts, or other ſectaries. All the preſbyterian members who ſat in the houſe the 6th of December were expelled by the army; and the abſent, whoſe principles agreed not with thoſe of the independents, durſt not reſume their places. If ever there was an uſurpation, it was this mutilated parliament's government, founded only in violence, and wholly ſupported by the army. For though the houſe of commons pretended to repreſent the people of England, it is very certain, the nation afforded but few perſons, who were pleaſed to ſee the ſovereign power lodged in the hands of ſuch repreſentatives.

Thirdly, The independents, of whom this houſe was chiefly compoſed, were diſtinguiſhed by two principles, one relating to the civil, the other to the eccleſiaſtical government. By the firſt, they aſſerted, that the republican government was not only the moſt perfect, but alſo abſolutely neceſſary for England, after ſo many oppreſſions from her kings, who had changed the government into a real tyranny. With regard to religion, though they called themſelves proteſtants, their principle was, that every particular church was independent, and might be governed as the members thought proper. Their notions concerning the vocation of the miniſters of the goſpel, were alſo very ſingular, as they believed that, without any other call, every man was free to diſcharge the office of miniſter, and uſe the talents given him by God. The other ſectaries, who had joined the independents becauſe they found in that party a full toleration, were united with them in the firſt of theſe principles, and had declared for a republican government. But with reſpect to religion, there were between them ſome differences, which the independents regarded the leſs, as they wanted to increaſe their adherents, and beſides, believed that in matters of religion, toleration was abſolutely neceſſary.

Fourthly, There was ſtill in the army a remnant of levellers, who ſtill adhered to their principles, and were always ready for any attempt to recover their credit. It is true, Cromwell, after having himſelf raiſed this faction, had in ſome meaſure diſperſed, but not entirely deſtroyed it. An able leader would have made it as formidable as ever.

Fifthly, It was with the utmoſt concern that the preſbyterians ſaw the independents in poſſeſſion of ſovereign power. By that all their meaſures were broken: their progreſs for eight years became fruitleſs, and the ſtorm they had raiſed againſt the king, returned upon their own heads, or at leaſt, it was apparent, they had all this while been labouring for others without any thing done for themſelves. For indeed the independents were equally enemies to preſbyterian and epiſcopal government. As to civil government, it is certain, the preſbyterians were not averſe to royalty in general. If they had undertaken to limit its power, it was not from a belief that the thing was evil in itſelf, as eſtabliſhed by the laws of England, but becauſe the two laſt kings had uſed their power to deſtroy preſbyterianiſm. So, whatever they had done againſt king Charles I. was not pointed ſo much againſt his dignity as his perſon, becauſe they conſidered him as their enemy, and deſpaired of eſtabliſhing a preſbyterian government in the church, ſo long as he had power to prevent it. Very likely however many of them would have complied with a republican government, notwithſtanding the tenour of the covenant, had that government not been in the hands of the independents, who were by no means inclined to ſupport preſbyterianiſm, and whoſe principles upon toleration were entirely rejected by the preſbyterians. And therefore an union between the preſbyterians and independents was morally impoſſible.

Sixthly, The royaliſts, equally enemies of both, could unite with neither of the parties, conſidering the oppoſition there was between their principles. The independents were for a common-wealth, to which the royaliſts could not conſent. On the other hand, the preſbyterians were for maintaining their government in the church, and moſt of the royaliſts could hardly believe, the preſbyterian churches, as they had no biſhops, to be true chriſtian churches. Thus the royaliſts, though perſecuted by both parties, were far from joining with either. On the contrary, they conceived ſome hopes, that the diviſion among their enemies would, one day, give them a good opportunity to reſtore the monarchy to its former ſtate. Wherefore they induſtriouſly fomented this diviſion, in expectation that the preſbyterians would at laſt be obliged to abandon their projects, and unite with the royal party, to free themſelves from the perſecutions they ſuffered.

Such were the intereſts of the parties which divided the people of England immediately after the death of Charles I. The remembrance of all this is abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the tranſactions during the inter-regnum.

Preſently after the king's death, the houſe of commons publiſhed an act to forbid the proclaming of Charles Stewart, eldeſt ſon of the late king, or any other perſon whatever, on pain of high-treaſon. Here was laid, as it were, the foundation of the commonwealth, which the independents meant to erect in England. The ſame day the lords deſired a conference with the commons about ſettling the government and the adminiſtration of juſtice, the judges commiſſions being determined by the death of the king. The commons, without anſwering the meſſage, voted the houſe of lords to be uſeleſs and dangerous, and therefore to be aboliſhed. They only left the lords the power of being elected members of parliament, in common with other ſubjects. This privilege was embraced by a few[a], but rejected by moſt of the peers, nay, ſome publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the power aſſumed by the commons, which was little regarded. Thus, the parliament, which at firſt was compoſed of the king, fixſcore lords, and five hundred and thirteen commoners, was reduced to a houſe of commons, conſiſting of about eighty members, of whom very few at the beginning, had five hundred pounds yearly income. And yet, theſe members, though ſo few in number, aſſumed the name of a parliament, and acted as if in their body had been united the power, which before reſided in the king, lords, and commons. This might appear very ſurpriſing, if we had not ſeen the foregoing tranſactions, and the univerſal terror inſpired by the army. Hence appears with what care and ability Cromwell and his aſſociates had, upon the ſelf-denying ordinance, filled the army with their creatures. Certainly, nothing leſs than an army entirely independent and republican could have procured a power ſo exceſſive and extraordinary to ſo inconſiderable a number of members of parliament. But it muſt alſo be confeſſed, that, of theſe new governors, ſome were men of great genius and uncommon capacity, and that if they erred in their principles, they wanted not ſkill to purſue the conſequences. Their principle was, that the ſovereign authority reſided originally in the people, by whom a part of it was committed to the kings, choſen to govern them according to law. That the king's abuſe of this truſt, had broken the original contract between king and people, and by this violation, the contract ſubſiſting no longer, the ſovereign power returned to the people as to the fountain thereof. So, conſidering themſelves as the repreſentatives of the people, they believed, they had a right to change the form of the government, without any regard to the original contract annulled by the king in his violation of the laws.

In conſequence of this principle the commons, aſſuming the name of parliament, voted, and afterwards enacted, that the kingly office ſhould be aboliſhed as unneceſſary, burdenſome, and dangerous, and that the ſtate ſhould be governed by the repreſentatives of the people in a houſe of commons without king or lords, and under the form of a commonwealth. This grand alteration in the government produced many others in things conſiſtent with monarchy, but not with a commonwealth. The oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy were to be aboliſhed[b], juſtice was no longer to be adminiſtered in the king's name[c], a new great ſeal was to be made, new money to be coined; in a word, every thing to be removed which bore any marks of royalty. A great ſeal was therefore made, on one ſide of which was ſeen the parliament ſitting, with this inſcription, "The great ſeal of the parliament of the commonwealth of England;" on the other ſide, the arms of England and Ireland, with theſe words, "The firſt year of freedom by God's bleſſing reſtored[d]." This ſeal was committed to a certain number of perſons, who were ſtiled keepers of the liberties of England. And it was ordained that for the future, all publick orders ſhould be diſpatched in the name of theſe keepers, under the direction of the parliament[e]. Laſtly, The parliament made choice of thirty-nine perſons to form a council of ſtate for the adminiſtration of publick affairs under the parliament[f]. The projects of theſe changes were formed in February, but the execution of them all required ſome months.

In the beginning of March, the parliament erected a new high court of juſtice, conſiſting of ſixty members, to try ſome perſons of diſtinction, who were in their power. It ſeems, as there was no houſe of lords, the peers of the kingdom had loſt their privileges under this new democracy, and that conſequently the impriſoned lords might have been tried by a jury, in one of the courts of juſtice. The parliament, without doubt, was apprehenſive, that a jury, impannelled as uſual, would never find perſons of quality guilty of death, for ſupporting the cauſe of their ſovereign. The independents were not ſufficiently numerous among the people, to be ſecure of a jury of their party. Beſides, they were not aſſured of the judges, ſix of whom had refuſed to accept commiſſions from the commonwealth. But in erecting a court of juſtice, the parliament could name ſuch judges as would be obedient to their orders.

Before this new court, of which Bradſhaw was preſident, as he had been of that which condemned the king, were brought duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the lord Goring, lately created earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, all for the ſame crime, namely, for having appeared in arms againſt the parliament. When the king had a mind in the beginning of the civil wars, to put to death priſoners taken at Edgehill and Colebrook, the parliament thinking it unjuſt, declared, they would inflict the ſame puniſhment on their priſoners, if the condemned perſons were executed. But when victory had decided in their favour, it was found very agreeable to juſtice, to puniſh with death thoſe who had fought for the king. This will ſeem the leſs ſtrange, when it is remembered, that the king himſelf had been put to death, for making war upon the parliament.

The duke of Hamilton repreſented, that being a ſubject of Scotland, he had entered England with an army, as an open enemy, by virtue of a commiſſion from the parliament of Scotland, which he was bound to obey, and conſequently, could be treated but as a priſoner of war. As this objection had been foreſeen, he was told, he was not proceeded againſt as duke of Hamilton in Scotland, but as earl of Cambridge in England; and ſince he had accepted that title, and as ſuch, taken a ſeat in parliament, he was thereby become a ſubject of England: that if the title of duke of Hamilton obliged him to obey the parliament of Scotland, that of earl of Cambridge ought to have engaged him to refuſe the commiſſion. Beſides, they were informed, that his accepting the command of the Scotch army, was not owing to mere obedience, but to his own ſollicitation, and that he had been the principal author of the war.

The earl of Holland ſpoke but little in his defence. Beſides, the ſteps he had taken, and his frequent changing ſides, did not much favour his cauſe.

The lord Goring (earl of Norwich) repreſented, that he had been educated in the court from his cradle, having been a page to king James I. that he had never ſerved any other maſter than the king, whom he had followed without examining the juſtice or injuſtice of his cauſe, not having had opportunity to be informed in ſuch points, which were above his capacity.

The lord Capel, ſtedfaſt to his principles, and zealouſly attached to the cauſe of his ſovereign, defended himſelf with more courage and reſolution. He refuſed, at firſt, to own the authority of the court, alleging, that if he had committed any crime he ought to be tried in the uſual form, and not before a court unſupported by any law. But the condemnation of the king himſelf, by a court of the like nature, might have convinced him of the unſerviceableneſs of ſuch a defence. He ſaid afterwards, that having ſurrendered himſelf priſoner at diſcretion, he was, by the law of nations, exempted from death, if not inflicted within ſo many days, which were long ſince expired. He urged, that when after the taking of Colcheſter, the council of war had condemned Lucas and Liſle to be ſhot, general Fairfax promiſed life to the other priſoners, and therefore he demanded the benefit of that promiſe. The court being a little embarraſſed, ſent to the general, to know what promiſe he had made the lord Capel. His anſwer was, that as general, he had promiſed the priſoners an exemption from military execution, to which three had been condemned, and that his intention reached no farther. Upon this anſwer it was decided, that the general's promiſe did not exempt the priſoner from the juſtice of the parliament.

Sir John Owen ſaid only, he was obliged in conſcience to ſerve the king according to his oath of allegiance.

[a] The earl of Saliſbury, and the lord Edward Howard of Eſcrick, ſigned the engagement, to be true and faithful to the commonwealth, as it was eſtabliſhed, without a king or houſe of lords, and took their ſeats in parliament by virtue of an election from the people, Ludlow, tom. I. p. 293. ——And alſo, April 16, 1649, upon the death of ſir Francis Pile, a writ iſſued out for a new election, and the earl of Pembroke, with all his titles, was returned for knight of the ſhire for Berks, primæ impreſſionis, and his lordſhip was accordingly admitted into the houſe with great reſpect. Whitelock, p. 396.

[b] Inſtead thereof a new oath was prepared, called the engagement, whereby every man ſwore, That he would be true and faithful to the government eſtabliſhed, without king or houſe of peers. Clarendon, Tom. III. p. 204.

[c] The name, ſtile, and teſt, of the writs were to be, cuſtodes libertatis Angliæ, authoritate parliamenti.——And in indictments, inſtead of, contrary to the peace of——the king, it was to be——againſt the peace, juſtice, and council of England, Whitelock, p. 371, 374.

[d] The lord Clarendon ſays, on one ſide was engraven the arms of England and Ireland, viz. a red croſs and harp, with this inſcription, The great ſeal of England; and on the other the portraiture of the houſe of commons circumſcribed, In the firſt year of freedom, by God's bleſſing reſtored, 1648. Tom. III. p. 202. This ſeal, and the inſcriptions, were the fancy of Henry Martin. Whitelock, p. 367.

[e] Widdrington and Whitelock were firſt appointed keepers of the new great ſeal; but Widdrington deſiring to be excuſed, and his excuſe being admitted, an act paſſed, appointing Bulſtrode, Whitelock, Richard Keeble, and John Liſle, lords commiſſioners of the great ſeal, quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint. Whitelock, p. 387, 379.

[f] See a liſt of this council in Whitelock, p. 381.

Notwithſtanding their defence, they all received ſentence of death[g]. But as they had many friends, petitions were offered to the parliament in their name for a pardon. Theſe petitions were examined in the houſe, and thoſe of duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, and lord Capel rejected. The votes were equally divided upon that of the earl of Norwich, and as, according to cuſtom, the ſpeaker's vote was to decide, he declared for pardon, ſaying, He had formerly received from the earl ſome civilities, and therefore voted in his favour[h]. The execution of ſir John Owen was ſuſpended, becauſe, as a commoner, he ought to have been tried before an inferior court. This ſaved his life. The three firſt were executed on a ſcaffold, erected before Weſtminſter Hall.

Duke Hamilton complained, when on the ſcaffold, that he was condemned to die for obeying the parliament of Scotland, which if he had not done, he muſt have been put to death there. But it was with little reaſon that he inſinuated a danger of being put to death in Scotland, for a refuſal to accept the command of an army raiſed by his intrigues and authority. He intimated, that if he would have confeſſed who invited the Scots army into England, it would probably have ſaved his life. Before his proceſs was formed, he had been ſtrongly ſollicited to make this diſcovery, which he utterly refuſed to do[i]. The character of this duke is not eaſy to be conceived. All that can be inferred from what has been ſaid for or againſt him, is, that he had the art to adapt himſelf to the times. And the earl of Clarendon plainly inſinuates, that when he was employed by the king, he was ſecretly making friends in the contrary party, in caſe affairs ſhould turn to the king's diſadvantage.

The lord Capel maintained, That he had acted nothing contrary to the laws, and conſequently was unjuſtly ſentenced to die. He ſpoke of king Charles I. as of a ſaint, and enlarged upon the great underſtanding, excellent nature, and exemplary piety of the prince, to whom he gave the title of king, affirming, he would never be ſhaken in his religion. In all appearance, the lord Capel ſpoke his real ſentiments. But the ſequel diſcovered, either that he did not ſufficiently know Charles the IId, or that prince had other principles when reſtored to the throne, than thoſe he had imbibed in his youth.

At or about the ſame time, many others were executed for the ſame crime in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; and amongſt the reſt were Morrice and Blackbourn, who had ſurpriſed the caſtle of Pontefract for the king. Poyer, Powell, and Langhorn, who had drawn into a revolt from the parliament the principality of Wales, caſt lots for their lives, and the firſt was executed.

When the army drove from the houſe above an hundred members, who were unacceptable to them, thoſe only were expreſsly excluded, which were then preſent: but many were abſent, againſt whom nothing had yet been determined. Indeed, theſe had never ſince taken their ſeats in the houſe, being apprehenſive of the ſame fate. But poſſibly they might return in great numbers, whenever a favourable opportunity offered. This the houſe reſolved to prevent, by an act, which excluded for ever, all who had not ſat ſince the trial of the king, unleſs they gave the houſe an entire ſatisfaction. At the ſame time, a committee was appointed to examine thoſe who ſhould offer themſelves. This committee received, without ſcruple, thoſe who were of independent principles, and found reaſons to exclude their enemies. This indeed was a good expedient to prevent diviſions in the parliament, becauſe the members were all of one party. But this precaution bred an inconvenience, which called for other meaſures. The parliament conſiſted of ſo few members, that they perceived the ridiculouſneſs of ſtiling themſelves the repreſentatives of the commonwealth. It is true, the vacant ſeats might have been filled by new elections, but the parliament did not care to run that riſque, knowing, their party was yet too inconſiderable, to hope for new members of their own principles. The houſe therefore reſolved, in order to increaſe their authority by a greater number of members, to permit all who had ſat in the preſent parliament, to reſume their places, on condition of ſigning an inſtrument called the Engagement, by which, "they rejected all conceſſions made by the king in the treaty of Newport; approved of all the proceedings againſt him; and engaged themſelves to be true and faithful to the commonwealth, as eſtabliſhed without king or houſe of lords." By this engagement were excluded all the royaliſts, and the preſbyterians, who were the moſt rigid obſervers of the covenant. But however, a good number of the latter ſigned, and took their ſeats in the houſe, being either leſs ſcrupulous than their brethren, or in hopes to recover ſome influence in the parliament. Notwithſtanding, thoſe who were known to be moſt incenſed againſt the independents, were excluded by the committee. Edmund Ludlow, a member of this committee, freely owns in his memoirs, that an expedient was found to admit only thoſe, from whom it was believed, there was no danger.[k].

The prince of Wales received at the Hague the melancholy news of the tragical death of his father, and immediately aſſumed the title of king, being then eighteen years of age. Within two or three days, the ſtates general, the ſtates of Holland, and the miniſters of the Hague[l], paid him their compliments of condolence. He cauſed thoſe of his father's council, who attended him, to be ſworn of his privy council, with the addition of only one perſon[m]. He had no ſooner eſtabliſhed his council, than he received a letter from the queen his mother, who, after expreſſions of her extreme affliction, adviſed him to retire into France, and form no council till ſhe had ſpoke with him, but her advice came too late. Probably, the queen deſigned to govern her ſon, as ſhe had governed his father, though the power of the new king was inſignificant. His condition was deplorable, not having wherewithal to maintain his houſhold, or any table but that of the prince of Orange his brother-in-law, and ſubſiſting entirely by his aſſiſtance, which too could not laſt very long. The ſtates of Holland, foreſeeing the parliament would ſhortly ſollicit the king's removal out of their dominions, would have been very glad to be freed, by his voluntary retreat, from the neceſſity of deſiring him to depart. Some of the ſtates deputies were even of opinion, to prevent the deſires of the parliament. The king was informed of this diſpoſition, and wiſhed to be gone, but knew not whither. He had been ill received in France whilſt his father was alive, and had no reaſon to expect a better reception. He knew too well the queen regent and cardinal Mazarin, to imagine, they would prefer his friendſhip to that of the new commonwealth of England. So, though he had reſolved to withdraw into France, it could have been but for a very ſhort ſpace. On the other hand, he had no great inclination to be with the queen his mother, knowing, ſhe would hold him in a ſort of ſervitude, which he could neither brook, nor avoid without a quarrel. Ireland alone ſeemed to promiſe him an honourable retreat, by reaſon of the ſituation of affairs in that kingdom, which it is neceſſary to deſcribe.

In the year 1646, the marquis of Ormond, by expreſs orders from the king, concluded a peace with the Iriſh rebels, in hopes of receiving ſufficient forces to drive from that Iſland the Engliſh parliamentarians and the Scots. But however advantageous this peace was to the catholic religion, the pope's nuntio did not think fit to conſent to it. The pretence was, that the catholics found in it neither ſufficient advantages, nor ſecurity. But the true reaſon was, that by this peace he would have loſt all his credit, ſince the marquis was to be acknowledged governor by the Iriſh. He caballed therefore with ſuch ſucceſs among the people, that, not only they deſerted the marquis, but alſo by their inſults obliged him to retire to Dublin, unprovided of every thing to defend that [g] When ſentence paſſed, that they ſhould all loſe their heads, ſir John Owen made a low reverence, and humbly thanked them; and being aſked by a ſtander-by, what he meant? he ſaid aloud, "It was a very great honour to a poor gentleman of Wales, to loſe his head with ſuch noble lords; and ſwore a great oath, that he was afraid they would have hanged him." Clarendon, Tom. III. p. 206.

[h] Upon this occaſion Whitelock obſerves, this may be a caution againſt the affectation of popularity, when the earl of Holland, who was as full of generoſity and courtſhip to all ſorts of perſons, and readineſs to help the oppreſſed, and to ſtand for the rights of the people, as any perſon of his quality in the nation, was given up by the repreſentatives of the people; and the lord Goring, who never made profeſſion of being a friend to liberty, either civil or ſpiritual, and exceeded the earl as much in his crimes, as he came ſhort of him in his popularity, was ſpared by the people, p. 386.

[i] Rapin, miſled by Baker's Continuator, ſays, "he offered to diſcover what had been deſired, if his life might be ſpared," which contradicting all the hiſtorians, is altered by the tranſlator from Whitelock, &c.—Inſtead of quoting Edward Phillips, Baker's Continnator, Rapin has all along in the margin quoted Baker himſelf; but that is rectified every where. Sir Richard Baker died in 1644, in the Fleet.

[k] To ſupport their authority, the powers in being ordered, that there ſhould be twenty eight thouſand horſe and foot kept up in England, and twelve thouſand in Ireland, whoſe pay ſhould be 80,000l. a month. Whitelock, p. 386.

[l] The body of the clergy in a Latin oration delivered by the chief preacher of the Hague, lamented the misfortune in terms of as much aſperity and deteſtation of the actors, as unworthy the name of chriſtians, as could be expreſſed. Clarendon, Tom. III. p. 216. For which reaſon perhaps the ſtates inhibited their miniſters from inſiſting upon matters of ſtate in their pulpits, and particularly not to meddle with England's, or other kingdoms proceedings. capital, which they were preparing to beſiege. In this extremity, he choſe rather to deliver Dublin and Drogheda to the parliament, than ſee them fall into the hands of the rebels. He capitulated therefore with the parliament, and ſurrendered theſe two places to colonel Jones, who took poſſeſſion the 17th of June 1647. After that the marquis withdrew into England, where he had frequent leave to viſit the king, then a priſoner of the army, till at laſt he was forced to paſs into France.

After the marquis had quitted Ireland, the nuntio exerciſed a tyranny, which grew intolerable to the Iriſh. They therefore ſent to the queen and prince then at Paris, that they were diſpoſed to ſhake off the nuntio's yoke, and if the marquis of Ormond were ſent to them with a ſupply of arms and ammunition, they would put him at the head of an army capable of expelling all the king's enemies out of the iſland. The nuntio had notice of this plot, and excommunicated the authors; but for this once, he proved not the ſtrongeſt. He was forſaken by all his adherents, and even forced to aſk as a favour, the liberty to withdraw.

The marquis of Ormond long waited at Paris for the performance of a promiſe made him by the cardinal, of a ſupply of money, arms and ammunition. But finding at laſt, he was only amuſed, he departed without any aſſiſtance, and arrived in Ireland the beginning of October 1648. Three months after, he concluded a new treaty with the grand council of the Iriſh aſſembled at Kilkenny[n]. At the ſame time the proceſs was forming in England againſt the king. But this peace was not general. Owen Roe O'Neal, who commanded in Ulſter, rejected it, becauſe, as he pretended, it was not advantageous enough to the catholic religion. Much time was ſpent to gain him, without ſucceſs. At laſt, the marquis of Ormond, not to loſe the opportunity of making progreſs in Ireland, while the parliament was erecting their new commonwealth, reſolved to take no farther notice of O Neal, but act ſingly with the army which the council of Kilkenny had at their diſpoſal. He put himſelf therefore at the head of that army, and advancing towards Dublin, took Dundalk, Newry, Trim, Drogheda, and ſome other towns and caſtles, which facilitated his intended ſiege of Dublin.

On the other hand, prince Rupert, admiral for the king, being purſued by the parliament's fleet, put into Kingſale, where he was ſecure, and in a condition to favour the marquis of Ormond's deſigns. This diſpoſition of affairs made the king judge that Ireland was a convenient retreat, where at the head of an army, he might make himſelf maſter of Dublin, and then of the whole iſland. After which he hoped, that with his Iriſh ſuccours and his friends in England, he might recover his throne. But news from Scotland made him ſuſpend his reſolution of going to Ireland. And this it will be neceſſary to explain.

Since Cromwell's expedition into that kingdom, after the defeat of duke Hamilton, the face of affairs was entirely changed. The marquis of Argyle, with all the rigid covenanters who oppoſed the war againſt England, had regained the advantage they had loſt. The new parliament had declared incapable of all employments, thoſe who were concerned in the engagement formed by duke Hamilton, and the kirk had excommunicated them: ſo that they were conſidered as enemies of God and the ſtate. Of this number were William earl of Lanerick, brother of duke Hamilton, the earl of Lautherdale, and many others, who formed a faction, which I ſhall call Hamiltonian, and which was entirely cruſhed. By this revolution Scotland remained united with England, ſo long as the Engliſh parliament continued preſbyterian, that is, to the 6th of December 1648.

The revolution in England, upon the army's expelling the preſbyterian members from the parliament to leave only independents, changed the intereſts of Scotland. The independents mortally hated the Scots on account of their attachment to the covenant, and theſe again looked upon the independents as enemies, no leſs formidable than the royaliſts. This might have ſunk the credit of Argyle, which partly ſubſiſted upon his friendſhip with Cromwell and Vane, the chiefs of the independents. But the Scots had a confidence in him, becauſe in religion he was an approved preſbyterian, though in politicks he leaned to the republican ſcheme. When the parliament of England had erected a court of juſtice for the trial of the king, the Scots found themſelves extremely embarraſſed. To ſuffer the independents to remain maſters of England after the death of the king, which was viſibly their deſign, could not but be very diſadvantageous to them. They perceived, that a parliament ſo compoſed would diſregard Scotland, and infallibly ruin the covenant between the two kingdoms, which it was of the utmoſt importance for the Scots to maintain, becauſe the preſbyterians might poſſibly one day recover the ground they had loſt. But on the other hand, they could not take up arms for the king without manifeſt danger. After their late loſs, they were hardly able to raiſe another army to fight the independents; and though they had done it, they would not have ſaved the king's life. They therefore reſolved to ſhew the Engliſh and all Europe, that they highly diſapproved the proceedings of the parliament of England, which was all they could do on that occaſion.

Purſuant to this reſolution, commiſſioners were ſent to London, where they arrived the beginning of January 1648-9, and preſented a memorial to the parliament, ſetting forth the reaſons which ought to divert them from their purpoſe of trying the king. But this memorial produced no effect. At laſt, after the king had been twice brought before the high court of juſtice, they gave in their proteſtation, in which they put them in mind, "That they had, near three weeks before, repreſented to them, what endeavours had been uſed for taking away the king's life, and for the change of the fundamental government of the kingdom, and introducing a ſinful and ungodly toleration in matters of religion; and that therein they had expreſſed their thoughts, and fears, of the dangerous conſequences that might follow thereupon; and that they had alſo earneſtly preſſed, that there might be no farther proceeding againſt his majeſty's perſon, which would certainly continue the great diſtractions of the kingdom, and involve them in many evils, troubles, and confuſions; but that by the free counſels of both houſes of parliament of England, and with the advice and conſent of the parliament of Scotland, ſuch courſe might be taken in relation to the king, as might be for the good and happineſs of both kingdoms; both having an unqueſtionable and undeniable right in his perſon, as king of both; which duly conſidered, they had reaſon to hope, that it would have given a ſtop to all farther proceedings againſt his majeſty's perſon. But now underſtanding, that after the impriſonment and excluſion of divers members of the houſe of commons, and without and againſt the conſent of the houſe of peers, by a ſingle act of their own, and theirs alone, power was given to certain perſons of their own members of the army, and ſome others, to proceed againſt his majeſty's perſon, in order whereunto he had been brought before that extraordinary new court; they did therefore, in the name of the parliament of Scotland, for their vindication from falſe aſperſions and calumnies, declare, that though they were not ſatisfied with his majeſty's late conceſſions in the treaty at Newport, in the Iſle of Wight, eſpecially in the matters of religion, and were reſolved not to crave his reſtoration to his government, before ſatisfaction ſhould be given by him to that kingdom; yet they did all unanimouſly with one voice, not one member excepted, diſclaim the leaſt knowledge of, or occaſion to the late proceedings of the army here againſt the king; and did ſincerely proteſs, that it would be a great grief to their hearts, and lie heavy upon their ſpirits, if they ſhould ſee the truſting his majeſty's perſon to the two houſes of the parliament of England, to be made uſe of to his ruin, contrary to the declared intentions of the kingdom of Scotland, and ſolemn profeſſions of the kingdom of England: and to the end that it might be manifeſt to the world, how much they did abominate and deteſt ſo horrid a deſign againſt his majeſty's perſon, they did, in the name of the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, declare their diſſent from the ſaid proceedings, and the taking away his majeſty's life; proteſting, that as they were altogether free from the ſame, ſo they might be free from all the miſeries, evil conſequences, and calamities, that might follow thereupon to the diſtracted kingdoms."

The parliament anſwered this proteſtation, but after the king's death, ſaying, "They had heretofore told them, what power this nation had in the fundamentals of government: that if Scotland had not the ſame power and liberty, as they went not about to confine them, ſo they would not be limited by them; but leaving them to act in theirs as they ſhould ſee cauſe, they reſolved to maintain their own liberties, as God ſhould enable them. And as they were very far from impoſing upon them, ſo they ſhould not willingly ſuffer impoſitions from them, whilſt God gave them ſtrength or lives to oppoſe them." They, ſaid, "The anſwer they made to their firſt and ſecond letter was, that after a long and ſerious deliberation of their own intrinſical power and truſt, (derived to them by the providence of God, through the delegation of the people) and upon the like conſiderations, of what themſelves and the whole nation had ſuffered, from the miſgovernment and tyranny of that king, both in peace, and by the wars; and conſidering, how fruitleſs, and full of danger and prejudice the many addreſſes to him for peace had been, and being conſcious how much they had provoked and tempted God, by the neglect of the impartial execution of juſtice, in relation to the innocent blood ſpilt, and miſchief done, in the late wars, they had proceeded in ſuch a courſe of juſtice, againſt that man of blood, as they doubted not the juſt God (who is no reſpecter of perſons) did approve, and would countenance with his bleſſings upon the nation; and though perhaps they might meet with many difficulties, before their liberties and peace were ſettled, yet they hoped they ſhould be preſerved from confuſion, by the good will of him who dwelt in the buſh, which burned and was not conſumed; and that the courſe they had taken with the late king, and meant to follow towards others, the capital enemies of their peace, was, they hoped, that which would be for the good and happineſs of both nations; of which, if that of Scotland would think to make uſe, and vindicate their own liberty and freedom, (which lay before them, if they gave them not away) they would be ready to give them all neighbourly and friendly aſſiſtance, in the eſtabliſhing thereof; and deſired them to take it into their moſt ſerious conſideration, before they eſpouſed that quarrel, which could bring them no other advantage, than the entailing upon them, and their poſterities, a laſting war, with all the miſeries which attended it, and ſlavery under a tyrant and his iſſue."

Shortly after, the Scotch commiſſioners were recalled. But after their departure, an anſwer was in their name preſented to the parliament, which charged the ſitting members with unfaithfulneſs, breach of promiſes and oaths, and other things very offenſive. This was ſo ill received by the parliament, that they ordered them to be arreſted on the road, and put under guard, till it ſhould be known whether they were avowed by their principals. But, the Scotch parliament juſtifying them, and complaining of the violation of the law of nations, they were immediately diſcharged.

In ſo nice a juncture, the Scots had but two ways to prevent their falling into a dangerous anarchy. They were either, with the Engliſh, to change their government into a common-wealth, or elſe acknowledge the eldeſt ſon of the late king for their ſovereign. But each of theſe ways had its difficulties. A republican government was directly contrary to their antient conſtitution, the two covenants, and the inclination of the people. Beſides it was not ſeen what advantage could accrue to the nation from ſuch a change. The ſecond way was likewiſe very embarraſſing, conſidering the circumſtances of Scotland for many years paſt. Had James I. and Charles I. not invaded the privileges of Scotland, by introducing the religion of England, contrary to the inclinations of the people: had the differences between Charles I. and his Scotch ſubjects produced no civil war: had not the treaty which ended that war, and reſtored to the Scots their antient religion, been extorted from the king: had not the invincible diſtruſt of the Scots, with regard to Charles I. armed them to leſſen his power in England, and diſable him to revoke his conceſſions to Scotland: had not the Scots ſworn two covenants, the one national, and the other common to both nations, to maintain preſbyterianiſm: had theſe things, I ſay, never happened, the Scots might, nay, ought to have acknowledged for ſovereign the next heir of the crown, according to the immemorial cuſtom of Scotland. But in the recognition of this new king, the maintenance of their laws, their privileges, their religion, was concerned. Herein lay the difficulty, for the acceſſion of a new king to the crown, was no reaſon to oblige them to relinquiſh things, which had coſt them a ten years war. They knew, prince Charles, eldeſt ſon of the late king, had the ſame principles as his father, concerning religion, and civil government; and had never entertained, nor did now entertain, any perſons about him, but what were mortal enemies to their nation and religion. Wherefore, in receiving him for king without any previous condition, they ran the riſk of being replunged into their former ſtate under Charles I. who by artifices, and, as they thought, by deceit, and at laſt by open violence, had undertaken to reduce the kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the church of England. As therefore, agreeably to the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom, it was natural to acknowledge for ſovereign him, to whom the crown was to devolve, it was no leſs proper, in the preſent juncture, to take care to preſerve what they had with ſo much difficulty recovered. Was it reaſonable for them, to deliver themſelves to the mercy of a young prince, yet a ſtranger to them, and cauſe their peace and happineſs to depend on his ſole will, notwithſtanding their ſuſpicions, that he had no more affection for them than his father? Nevertheleſs, as his affairs were almoſt deſperate, they imagined the offer of their crown, might engage him to become a good Scot, and diſmiſs his Engliſh counſellors, who were not proper for Scotland; in a word, would think himſelf very happy to recover one of his kingdoms, and ſee himſelf in the ſame ſtate in which his anceſtors were, before his granfather's acceſſion to England. They reſolved, therefore, to acknowledge and proclaim him, but however with reſtrictions, which left them at liberty to capitulate with him. The proclamation was thus worded:

"The eſtates of parliament preſently [o] convened in this ſecond ſeſſions of this ſecond triennial parliament, by virtue of an act of the committee of eſtates, who had power and authority from the laſt parliament, for convening the parliament; conſidering, that foraſmuch as the king's majeſty, who lately reigned, is, contrary to the diſſent and proteſtation of this kingdom, removed by a violent death; and that by the lord's bleſſing, there is left unto us a righteous heir, and lawful ſucceſſor, Charles prince of Scotland and Wales, now king of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland; we the eſtates of the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, do therefore moſt unanimouſly and chearfully, in recognition and acknowledgment of his juſt right, title, and ſucceſſion to the crown of theſe kingdoms, hereby proclaim and declare to all the world, that the ſaid lord and prince Charles is, by the providence of God, and by the lawful right of undoubted ſucceſſion, king of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, whom all the ſubjects of this kingdom are bound, humbly and faithfully to obey, maintain, and defend, according to the national covenant, and the ſolemn league and covenant betwixt the two kingdoms, with their lives and goods, againſt all deadly enemies, as their only righteous ſovereign lord and king."

"And becauſe his majeſty is bound by the law of God, and the fundamental laws of this kingdom, to rule in righteouſneſs and equity, to the honour of God, the good of religion, and the wealth of his people: it is hereby declared, that before he be admitted to the exerciſe of his royal power, he ſhall give ſatisfaction to the kingdom, in thoſe things that concern the ſecurity of religion, the unity betwixt the kingdoms, and the good and peace of this kingdom, according to the national covenant, and the ſolemn league and covenant; for which end we are reſolved, with all poſſible expedition, to make our humble and earneſt addreſſes to his majeſty. For the teſtification of all which, we the parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, publiſh this our acknowledgment of his juſt rights, title, and ſucceſſion to the crown of theſe kingdoms, at the market-croſs at Edinburgh, with all uſual ſolemnities in like caſes, and ordain his royal name, portrait, and ſeal, to be uſed in the public writings and judicatories of this kingdom, and in the mint-houſe, as was uſually done to his royal predeceſſors, and command this act to be proclaimed at all the market-croſſes of the royal burghs, and to be printed, that none may pretend ignorance."

When the proclamation was publiſhed, the council diſpatched ſir Joſeph Douglas, to give the king notice of it, and the ſtates ſent alſo two commiſſioners [p], only to inform him of what had been acted in his favour, but without any order or inſtruction to treat with him. Before the conditions on which he was to be inveſted with the royal authority were propoſed to him, it was neceſſary to know, if he would accept the crown upon terms not yet known, but eaſy to be gueſſed [q]. The commiſſioners found the king at the Hague, where there arrived at the ſame time, but in another ſhip, the earls of Lanerick and Lautherdale, and ſome time after the earl of Montroſe alſo from France. When the late king, after his retreat to the Scotch army, ordered Montroſe to lay down his arms, he retired into Germany, and ſerved in the emperor's army. Afterwards he went into France, where the queen and prince of Wales gave him a reception very different from what he expected, after his great ſervices in Scotland. This coldneſs was owing to his arrival in France, at the very time the queen was uſing her endeavours to perſuade the king her huſband, to throw himſelf upon the preſbyterians and Scots, and grant all their demands, imagining, he had no other refuge. It was therefore no proper ſeaſon to careſs a man, who was extremely hated in Scotland. He had been very ſucceſsful in ſerving the king, but had uſed his advantages with ſuch barbarity, that he had been degraded by the parliament, and excommunicated by the kirk; ſo that in Scotland he was conſidered as an enemy to the nation, and to preſbyterianiſm. As his reſidence in France was very diſagreeable, he no ſooner heard of the death of Charles I. than he repaired to the Hague to offer his ſervice to the new king. In his retinue were ſome Scottiſh lords and gentlemen attached to his fortune.

The king received very coldly the news of his being proclaimed, by reaſon of the reſtriction in the proclamation. There was however nothing ſtrange in it, ſince the Scots pretended only to require what had been aſked of Charles I. agreeable to their covenant, and the covenant of the two kingdoms. But the king and his council, it ſeems, were perſuaded, that the Scots had not the leaſt right to exact ſuch conditions. That is to ſay properly, the Scots in their recognition of the new king, ought at the ſame time to acknowledge the injuſtice of their covenants, and depart from all their pretenſions. Theſe were two contraries which they thought to be irreconcileable, namely, that the Scots ſhould own the king's undoubted right, and yet deſire to capitulate with him. In a word, they pretended that the tranſactions of the laſt ten or twelve years, ought to be entirely buried in oblivion. Charles I. Charles II. and their counſellors, were prepoſſeſſed with an opinion which often deceived them, namely, that there was no mean between an abſolute attachment to the king, and a total enmity to him. The lord Clarendon's hiſtory abounds with inſtances of this prepoſſeſſion. But to confine myſelf to the preſent occaſion, this illuſtrious hiſtorian in repreſenting the Scotch nation, as animated with a juſt indignation againſt the Engliſh parliament, for the king's death, would infer, that Scotland, was inclined to accept the prince his ſon for ſucceſſor without any condition. But as this did not happen, he aſcribes it to the artifices and credit of the marquis of Argyle. He ſays, the marquis would have been glad to prevent the king's being proclaimed, but as he durſt not oppoſe the general ſentiment of his country, he was forced to conſent to it. According to him, the marquis of Argyle was the ſole cauſe of the reſtriction in the proclamation. This ſuppoſes the proclamation to have been the general ſenſe of the people, and the reſtriction the effect of Argyle's intrigues. But if this reſtriction was agreeable to the intereſts and ſentiments of the ruling party, as I have ſhewn, why is it aſcribed to the marquis alone? Was it impoſſible for the people of Scotland to acknowledge king Charles II. without an entire confidence in him? But the Scots acted with him only in the ſame manner as they acted with his father, as appears in the covenant itſelf, wherein they ſhewed an extreme diſtruſt of the late king, even when they engaged to defend his perſon and rights. The reſtriction therefore contained nothing new, or extraordinary. It was a natural conſequence of the troubles begun in 1637.

However this be, Charles believed, that no great regard was due to what had yet been done for him in Scotland. He underſtood, that in the intended capitulation, things would be demanded which he had reſolved not to grant, as the confirmation of the covenant and the preſbyterian government. He wiſhed however to juſtify his diſinclination to Scotland, by the advice and opinion of the Scotch lords who were with him at the Hague. For this purpoſe he would have had them appear together before his council, and upon being conſulted, diſſuade him from going to Scotland, and the council thereupon form their reſolution. The marquis of Montroſe approved of this proceeding; but the earl of Lautherdale, and the earl of Lanerick who took the title of duke Hamilton, on hearing at the Hague the tragical death of his brother, would not conſent to it. They thought it too nice a proceeding, for Scotch lords to appear before an Engliſh council. By that the earl of Traquaire had been ruined. On the other hand, they were ſo enraged againſt the marquis of Montroſe, that they would have no communication with him. When the king found he could not bring them together to conſult upon this ſubject, he declared however, he would not go into Scotland, and perſiſted in his reſolution for Ireland. Thus, upon a bare information that Scotland would not receive him without conditions, he reſolved to refuſe the crown of that kingdom. And, what is more, he gave commiſſion to the marquis of Montroſe to raiſe forces in Germany, and make a deſcent upon Scotland. So, receiving with acknowledgment, the offer made him by the Scots, he ordered a war to be levied upon them, as upon enemies, becauſe they refuſed to admit him for their ſovereign, without a previous engagement. Nothing is more proper to demonſtrate the neceſſity of the precautions taken by the Scots, though ſome hiſtorians are pleaſed to repreſent them as very unjuſt.

The king could not reſide any longer in Holland, where it was intimated to him, that the dread, the ſtates were under, of a quarrel with the new commonwealth of England, made his ſtay there very unwelcome. Beſides, they received advice, the parliament was to ſend an agent, to propoſe between the two commonwealths a ſtrict alliance: and the affair was not to be negotiated whilſt the king remained at the Hague. This agent, named Doriſlaus, arrived indeed before the king left the place. But the ſame evening that he came to the town, as he was at ſupper in his inn, with ſome other perſons, ſix Scots of the marquis of Montroſe's retinue entered the room, and dragging him from the table murdered him[r]. The aſſaſſins were neither arreſted, nor immediately purſued; and though afterwards ſome pains were taken to apprehend them, the ſtates ſhewed on that occaſion a great regard for the king, which offended the parliament. Nevertheleſs the king knew, after this action, there was no remaining at the Hague, and the prince of Orange adverti ſed him, that he would be deſired to depart. He therefore ſent his heavy baggage and ſome of his domeſtics to Ireland, with a reſolution to follow them, after he had paid a viſit to his mother in France. But as he was not yet ready, he prevented the ungrateful compliment he was to receive, by preſenting himſelf to the ſtates a memorial of the ſtate of his affairs, and aſked their opinion, whether he ought to go to Ireland or Scotland. The ſtates obſerving he was about to depart, thought it not convenient to preſs him, and thereby he gained time to be prepared.

While the king was deliberating at the Hague, concerning the offer from Scotland, the ſtates of that kingdom were ſettling the terms on which he was to be received, not doubting his inclinations and readineſs to accept the offered crown. But he had friends in Scotland, who, better informed of his ſentiments, reſolved to diſturb the publick deliberations, by an inſurrection, in hopes that a happy ſucceſs would cauſe the king to be admitted without any condition. With this view Middleton, Monroe, the Gordons and others, aſſembled ſome forces in the north, and ſeized the town of Inverneſs. But the parliament having before received intimation of their deſign, had already raiſed forces, which immediately marched to the north, under Straughan and Kerr, and diſperſed the mutineers before they could aſſemble all their forces.

Though the king had firmly reſolved to go into Ireland, it was impoſſible for him to execute his deſign, by reaſon of the turn in his affairs in that iſland. After the parliament was become maſter of Dublin, it had been often moved in the houſe to ſend a powerful reinforcement to Ireland: but the oppoſite intereſts of the preſbyterians and independents hindered the taking any reſolution. The firſt were for ſending ſir William Waller to command there, and the latter were as earneſt for major-general Lambert. The diviſion between the parliament and army which aroſe quickly after, brought new obſtacles to the affair. At laſt, the revolt of Wales, the inſurrections in other counties, and the preparations of the Scots to invade England, diſcharged all thoughts of Ireland. If, in this interval, the Iriſh could have come to an union amongſt themſelves, and have joined the marquis of Ormond, they might have expelled the parliament's forces, and rendered themſelves maſters of the whole kingdom. But their diviſions hindered them from improving ſo favourable an opportunity. It was not, as I obſerved, till the end of the year 1648, that they made peace with the marquis of Ormond, and the oppoſition of O'Neal kept the marquis from taking the field till April 1649, when the king was dead, and the government of England modelled into a commonwealth.

The union of the Iriſh with the royaliſts, the progreſs of [r] He was doctor of the civil law, born at Delft in Holland, and bred at Leyden, but afterwards lived long in London, having been received into Greſham college, as a profeſſor in one of thoſe Chairs, which are endowed for public lectures in that ſociety: and had been from the beginning of the troubles, in the exerciſe of the judge advocate's office in the earl of Eſſex's army. The lord Clarendon ſays, they were Scots, and dependents upon the marquis of Montroſe, that murdered him, tom. 3, p. 226. But Whitelock ſays, that they were twelve Engliſh cavaliers who ſtabbed him in ſeveral places, and cut his throat, one of them ſaying at the ſame time, thus dies one of the king's Judges. Whitelock, p. 401. Ludlow ſays, they were Engliſh and Scots. tom. 1. p. 291.

the marquis of Ormond, the extreme weakneſs of the parliament's party in that nation, brought at laſt the houſe to a reſolution of ſending thither a good army with all poſſible diligence. Waller, who was a preſbyterian, was no longer conſidered as a proper general to ſerve the parliament; and Lambert, till then ſupported by Cromwell, was now ſupplanted by him. Cromwell believed, the government of Ireland was a poſt not unworthy of himſelf, and ſo managed by his intrigues, that he was unanimouſly choſen to fill the dignity of lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. But before his troops could be ready for that expedition, he had a difficulty to overcome, which might have had dangerous conſequences.

Beſides the cavaliers and preſbyterians, the parliament had other enemies, who only waited an opportunity to declare and were in the army itſelf. Theſe were the levellers, who were diſſatisfied, for that after they had ſerved as inſtruments to ruin the preſbyterian parliament, they were not only diſregarded, but even called ſeditious and rebels. This occaſioned their aſſembling upon Cromwell's being appointed to command in Ireland, under a pretended neceſſity of enquiring what troops were proper to ſerve in that kingdom[s]. To that end they met at Burford, to the number of five thouſand, and without any precaution continued there, pretending a promiſe from Cromwell, that no part of the army ſhould approach within ten miles. But Raynolds, by the command of general Fairfax, unexpectedly fell upon them with five or ſix thouſand men, and gave them an entire defeat. Nine hundred horſe, and four hundred foot were ſent priſoners to London, and ſome of them executed. Others obtained their pardon by Cromwell's mediation. This affair being thus happily ended, the army was prepared which Cromwell was to lead into Ireland.

While this army was aſſembling, the marquis of Ormond approached Dublin to beſiege it. Whereupon, Cromwell immediately ſent about three thouſand men to reinforce the garriſon which was very weak. Mean while, as he believed he could not arrive ſoon enough to ſave that city, he reſolved to land his army in Munſter, where he hoped to find no obſtacle, becauſe he knew, the lord Inchiquin, preſident of that province, was departed with his Engliſh troops, to reinforce the army under the marquis of Ormond. But the marquis having notice of his intention, immediately diſpatched the lord Inchiquin with the forces under his command to prevent his landing, by which he conſiderably weakened his army. He however continued his march, and began the blockade of Dublin about the middle of June. He ſtayed ſome time at Finglas, five miles from Dublin, in expectation of freſh troops, and at laſt paſſed the river, and poſted himſelf at Rathmims, to lay the ſiege in form. While he was in this camp, the ſuccours ſent by Cromwell arrived in Dublin. A few days after, the marquis of Ormond reſolved to repair an old caſtle, which by its ſituation was proper to hinder any freſh relief from entering the town. Then colonel Jones the governor, who from a lawyer was become a good officer, perceiving how much theſe fortifications might annoy him, reſolved to prevent their being finiſhed. For that purpoſe he put the garriſon under arms in the night, and at break of day making a ſally, marched directly to the caſtle, and carried it ſword in hand. This ſucceſs cauſed him to advance towards the enemy's camp. He met by the way a body of horſe, which ſtopped him ſome time. But the body being diſperſed brought ſuch terror to the Iriſh army, that they fled in confuſion without ſtriking a blow. The marquis of Ormond was forced to follow them, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies. After the defeat, he was obliged to retire to ſome diſtance, to wait for the ſuccours he had been promiſed.

Cromwell informed of this good ſucceſs whilſt he was embarking his army, altered his deſign, and inſtead of going to Munſter, ſailed to Dublin, where he ſafely arrived about the middle of Auguſt with about fifteen thouſand men. When the marquis of Ormond knew that Cromwell was at Dublin, he retired to a ſtill greater diſtance, and left in Drogheda a numerous garriſon[t], under the command of ſir Arthur Aſton, an officer of reputation, who had been governor of Reading, and afterwards of Oxford. About the ſame time Londonderry, the moſt conſiderable city in the north of Ireland, which was beſieged by the king's forces, was relieved by a ſally made by ſir Charles Coot, much in the ſame manner as Dublin was by Jones[u].

From what has been ſeen, it is manifeſt the king could not venture into Ireland, where he had no other ſuccours to carry but his perſon, while Cromwell was aſſembling his army on the coaſt, and ſtill leſs after Ormond's defeat. But as, on the other hand, he was looked on with no good eye in France, where, ſince his arrival, the court had made him no offers of ſervice, he reſolved to withdraw into the iſle of Jerſey, as the only place where he could hope to be favourably received[w]. He retired therefore to that iſle with his brother the duke of York and his ſmall court, where he continued ſome months[x].

The commotions raiſed by the king's friends in Scotland being appeaſed, the committee of eſtates aſſembled to prepare the conditions to be demanded of the king. It ſeems, they were not informed in Scotland of the king's ſentiments, ſince they continued to deliberate upon that ſubject, which doubtleſs they would not have done, had they been acquainted with his reſolution. In all probability, as the eſtates had not yet expreſsly invited him to come and receive the crown, he did not think himſelf obliged to communicate his thoughts to them, and if the envoys of the eſtates and council had received an anſwer from him, it was too general for any thing to be inferred from it. However this be, the committee of eſtates having learned, the king was in Jerſey, ſent mr. George Windram to acquaint him, they were deſirous to treat with him concerning his eſtabliſhment in Scotland: but as the iſle of Jerſey was neither ſafe, nor commodious, he was deſired to name ſome town in the Low Countries, where he might receive their commiſſioners. For that purpoſe, it was required of him as a preliminary, without which there could be no negotiation, to acknowledge the authority of the preſent parliament, and particularly of the two laſt ſeſſions. Windram left Edinburgh the 25th of September, but was not with the king till towards the end of October, being detained by contrary winds: ſo that the king was fully informed of what had paſſed in Ireland, where Cromwell having taken Drogheda by aſſault, had put the garriſon to the ſword, and was continuing his progreſs with wonderful rapidity. This news made the king look upon Scotland with another eye than before. He knew, he ſhould be unwelcome both to France and Holland. From Ireland he was entirely excluded, nor could Jerſey long afford him ſubſiſtence. Beſides, he was told, the parliament had given orders for a fleet to reduce that iſland, which was not in a condition of defence. Scotland therefore was the only place where he could find ſafety and ſubſiſtence. For this reaſon, he received Windram very graciouſly, and named Breda for the reception of the Scotch commiſſioners, promiſing, he would be there the 15th of the following March. It was not however without ſome uneaſineſs that he came to this reſolution. Beſides his little affection for the Scots, whom he regarded as the principal authors of his father's misfortunes, not one counſellor adviſed him to put himſelf into their hands, though it was impoſſible to direct him to another retreat. So it was meer neceſſity which cauſed him to reſolve to liſten to the propoſitions the Scots were to make him. That this was his only motive, can hardly be doubted, when it is conſidered, that on the 30th of January 1649-50, he writ to the marquis of Montroſe, that the Scots had ſent Windram to him, and that their commiſſioners were to repair to Breda in March, to treat with him. Wherefore he preſſed him to haſten his preparations for a deſcent into Scotland before the affair ſhould be ſettled, in order if it was poſſible, and ſhould pleaſe God to favour him with ſucceſs, to prevent the concluſion thereof[y].

Windram being returned with the king's anſwer, the committee of eſtates laboured inceſſantly to finiſh the propoſitions to be ſent to the king. The draught was laid before the parliament, and after ſome amendments, ordered to be communicated to the general assembly of the kirk, where it was approved. Hence it appears, that these propositions were settled with the common consent, since they had the concurrence of both parliament and kirk, though some have been pleased to ascribe them solely to the marquis of Argyle, as if they were more agreeable to his interest than that of the kingdom. After that, the parliament and general assembly named commissioners to carry them to the king. These commissioners arrived at Breda at the time appointed [z], and presented the conditions to him, on which the Scots would admit him to the exercise of the regal power. They consisted of these four articles:

1. That all those who have been, and continue excommunicate by the kirk of Scotland, may be removed from having any access to the court.

2. That he would be pleased to declare, that he would by solemn oath under his hand and seal, allow the national covenant of Scotland, and the solemn league and covenant of Scotland, England and Ireland; and that he would prosecute the ends thereof in his royal station.

3. That he would ratify and approve all acts of parliament, enjoining the solemn league and covenant, and establishing presbyterian government, the directory of worship, the confession of faith and catechism in the kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approved by the general assembly of the kirk, and by the parliament of that kingdom, and that he would give his royal assent to the acts of parliament enjoining the same in the rest of his dominions, and that he would observe the same in his own practice and family, and never make opposition therein, or endeavour any change thereof.

4. That he would consent and agree that all matters civil might be determined by the present and subsequent parliaments of the kingdom of Scotland, all matters ecclesiastical by the ensuing general assemblies of the kirk, as was formerly condescended and agreed to by his late father.

After hearing these conditions, the king demanded, whether these papers they had delivered to him, contained all the particulars which they had to propound or desire? Whether they had power to recede from any particular article, or to treat with him concerning the assistance of Scotland, to place him on the throne of England? They answered, their commission extended only to the offering of these propositions, and to receive either his consent or refusal.

These conditions, which appeared to the Scots very just, lawful, and absolutely necessary for the safety of Scotland, seemed to the king very hard and unreasonable. This contrariety will not appear strange, if it is considered, that the king and the Scots reasoned upon different principles, and with opposite views. And this it will not be improper to unfold.

The people of Scotland were persuaded, they had been oppressed by James VI. in the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland by that prince, which had been abolished by the reformation: that this had been effected by address, by artifice, by violence, whilst corrupt parliaments were employed to enact new laws concerning religion, without consulting the kirk, contrary to her will and express declarations: that Charles I. by a fraud supported with force, had invested himself with a power of ordaining whatever he pleased in matters of religion, by virtue of an act supposed by him to be granted by a plurality of voices, though it was rejected: that by this pretended power, he had not only restored bishops to their revenues and government in the church, but also given them a jurisdiction more extensive than ever: that he had established a high commission to support that injustice, and entirely suppressed the general assemblies. In a word, that he had changed the presbyterian government, established by the reformation, into an hierarchy, exactly like that of the church of England: that he had also attempted to impose upon them a liturgy and canons, unknown to their ancestors, and to reduce the worship of the church of Scotland, to a perfect conformity with that of England: that the people of Scotland, for their own preservation, and the maintenance of their rights, so manifestly invaded, had judged it proper to unite in a covenant, intended for the preservation of the king's just rights and privileges of the people and kirk: that the king, not contented with what of right belonged to him, had twice made war upon his Scotch subjects to maintain his usurped power, and render Scotland dependent upon England: that the war had been ended by a treaty, to which the king would not have consented, if he had not been forced to it by the affairs of England: that after the treaty he came into Scotland, where he granted his subjects whatever they demanded, and even those things which before he had haughtily and obstinately refused: that therefore it was to be suspected, he had only accommodated himself to the times, till a favourable opportunity offered, to revoke his concessions: that it was not strange the Scots should entertain that suspicion, since the king, by the same conduct in England, had destroyed all confidence in him: that it was therefore absolutely necessary to reduce him to a state, which would remove all danger of his retracting: that to this end, the Scots had made with the English a solemn league, as having the same common interest, and that the sword had decided in favour of the allies against the king: that notwithstanding the decision, the Scots had never thought of withdrawing from the obedience due to the king, but only of obtaining other security than his bare word: that the tragical death of Charles I. had not changed the state of affairs in Scotland, or procured them the so long desired security: that they required no more of the new king, than they had a right to demand of his father: that their desires were not unjust, since they expected only to be maintained in the state, which they enjoyed before the two last kings had attempted to alter the established religion according to their caprice, and the pleasure of their English counsellors: that they had run all hazards to restore themselves to the condition from whence they were fallen: that God having granted them a happy success, they saw no sufficient reason to oblige them to desist, and expose their repose and religion to the caprices of a young prince, who was known to be of the same sentiments and principles as his father and grandfather: that the conditions offered him, limited not his prerogative as king of Scotland, but only put it out of his power, to tread in the steps of his father: that in offering him the crown of Scotland, it was lawful to require, that he should govern according to the true interest of the kingdom: that if these conditions appeared to him contrary to his interest with regard to England, he was at liberty to reject them; but his interest with respect to England, was not a good reason to engage the Scots to venture their happiness, in leaving him to govern as he pleased: that it was not yet fifty years since James VI. became king of England, and that Charles I. having lost that crown by his ill conduct, and Charles II. being utterly unable to recover it, he ought to esteem himself happy, that his Scotch subjects had offered him the crown of his antient kingdom, on the same terms it had been enjoyed by his ancestors for many ages; and that in becoming a good Scotsman, he would be restored to what his predecessors, kings of Scotland, had formerly been: that it was not reasonable to suffer persons excommunicate, and conspirators against the state, in attempting, by force, to restore the late king, to approach the new king with their pernicious counsels, tending to sow division between him and his subjects.

But the king reasoned upon other principles. The offer of the crown of Scotland was no farther regarded by him, than as a means of restoring him to the throne of England; that was the principal object of his attention. He little cared to be king of Scotland, if he could not use the forces of that kingdom to procure him the English crown. Mean while, his power was to be so limited that it should not be possible to receive any advantage from Scotland to that end. Those who were esteemed by him as his best friends, and had used their utmost endeavours to free his father and restore him to the enjoyment of his rights, were to be removed from his person and council, yet these were the men he designed to employ for the recovery of England. In accepting the crown of Scotland, he was to forget, he had any just claim to England, he was to govern Scotland as his ancestors governed it before their accession to the English throne; that is to say, he was to look upon his English friends with continual distrust, and consequently renounce all hope of a re-establishment in England. He was to swear to the national covenant, made against the king his father, the intent of which was to prevent for ever the introducing the church government and worship of England into Scotland, which alone in his opinion were lawful. He was to swear to the covenant of the two kingdoms, the sole design of which was to maintain presbyterianism already established in England, which was an infallible way to make him lose all his friends. He was, lastly, not only to approve and protect presbyterianism in the two kingdoms, but also promise a sincere and constant profession of it himself. But this was directly contrary to his sentiments and conscience, since he hardly believed the presbyterian to be any part of the christian church.

There

Hence it appears that the intereſts of the king and thoſe of the Scots were no leſs oppoſite than during the life of Charles I. and that the ſame difficulties ſtill ſubſiſting, could be ſurmounted only by the arms or acquieſcence of one of the parties. The king was unable to uſe force, and yet the terms to be impoſed upon him appeared ſo hard, that he would have immediately rejected them, if he could have taken any other courſe. But his melancholy circumſtances, not knowing where to ſubſiſt or even to be ſafe, obliged him though very unwilling, to diſſemble his reſentment, and to treat with the Scotch commiſſioners upon propoſitions which to him ſeemed moſt unjuſt. There were two articles which he could not digeſt. The firſt was, the obligation to ſwear to the covenant. He ſaid, the covenant was made for the ſubjects, and not for the prince, ſince the taker ſwore to be faithful to the king, and it was abſurd to make him ſwear allegiance to himſelf. This objection would have been unanſwerable, had the covenant contained only this article. But there were others, in which it was ſaid, the king was no leſs concerned than his ſubjects. The ſecond related to religion. He was willing, he ſaid, to conſent to the eſtabliſhment of preſbytery in Scotland by act of parliament: but, as to his own perſon, he could not with juſtice be required to renounce the religion for which the king his father had died a martyr; however, he would content himſelf with only three chaplains to celebrate divine ſervice in his preſence after the manner of the church of England. But all he could allege was ineffectual; the commiſſioners had not power to recede from any article. Thus had the parliament of England offered to treat with his father, without leaving him other liberty than to accept or refuſe their propoſitions. But though the king perceived it would be to no purpoſe to diſpute upon the articles, he deſired however to prolong the negotiation as much as poſſible, in hopes of good news from Scotland, where he knew the marquis of Montroſe would ſhortly make his appearance. This was his laſt refuge; and had the marquis been attended with his former ſucceſs, the treaty of Breda would ſoon have ended, ſince it was in the king's power to reject abſolutely the offered conditions. But the marquis's progreſs did not anſwer the king's expectations.

[1650] After that lord had left the king at the Hague, he went into Germany to endeavour to raiſe forces and money, the king having only given him a bare commiſſion without other aſſiſtance. The king of Denmark, as Charles's near relation, furniſhed him with a ſum of money, and the Engliſh ſettled in Sweden aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of their power. With this relief he was enabled to buy arms and ammunition, and to liſt five hundred ſoldiers, which he ſent in March to one of the iſles of Orkney. He followed them himſelf in April, and from thence repaired with his troops to Cathneſs in the north of Scotland. This was at the very time the Scotch commiſſioners were with the king at Breda. As the king was informed that Montroſe was now gone for Scotland, he waited the ſucceſs of the expedition, before he would conclude with the commiſſioners, whom he nevertheleſs entertained with hopes of granting their demands.

After the marquis's arrival at Cathneſs, he ſeized a caſtle where he might ſecure his arms and ammunition, and then writ to his friends to join him. At the ſame time he publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring, "That he was come with a commiſſion from the king to protect his good ſubjects; but "with no deſign to obſtruct the negotiation at Breda; on the "contrary, he hoped to haſten the concluſion of it by means "of his army. If the treaty ſucceeded, he ſhould readily lay "down his arms on the firſt command from his majeſty."

The Scotch parliament then ſitting at Edinburgh was ſurpriſed to hear of Montroſe's arrival in that juncture, with the king's commiſſion. It was not difficult to perceive that, whatever was pretended, this was not to advance the treaty, but rather to obſtruct it, and force the parliament to deſiſt from conditions which were thought neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom. It may well be imagined, this tended not to breed a good opinion of the king's ſincerity.

Mean while, as Montroſe was very formidable, by reaſon of his former great ſucceſſes in favour of the late king, the parliament gave immediate orders for raiſing, with all poſſible expedition, an army of ſix thouſand men, under the command of David Leſley. Till the army was ready, colonel Straughan was detached with three hundred horſe to the northward, in order to awe the country, and prevent the king's friends from riſing and joining Montroſe. This precaution had a ſurpriſing effect. The king's adherents, whether through fear of falling into the hands of Straughan, or becauſe of the ſix thouſand men which were to follow, durſt not ſtir, and Montroſe was joined only by ſome ill armed and worſe diſciplined highlanders. So, his little army, if it deſerves that name, compoſed of ſoldiers of different nations, ſtrangers to one another's language, and in a barren country, could make no great progreſs. Beſides, as Montroſe had no cavalry to ſend out for intelligence, he knew not what paſſed in other places, and particularly Straughan's march, vainly expecting the king's adherents to come and join him. To this ignorance was owing his being ſurpriſed by Straughan's little troop, which, after a long march, fell upon him when leaſt expected. At the approach of the enemy, the highlanders deſerted and fled; the foreigners made more reſiſtance, but were routed at laſt[a]. The marquis himſelf being forced to fly, threw away his ribband and george, diſguiſing himſelf like a peaſant to prevent a diſcovery. He wandered ſome days in that habit, and at laſt put himſelf into the hands of a gentleman, named Aſton, who had formerly ſerved under him, and promiſed to conceal him. But, whether through the hope of the reward publiſhed for taking him, or the fear of being rigorouſly puniſhed if he did not diſcover him, it is certain, he delivered him to Leſley, who immediately ſent him to Edinburgh[b]. The parliament now ſitting reſolved to try him themſelves; and as, ſince his degradation, he was called only James Graham, and was univerſally hated, no regard was paid to his birth. He was condemned to be hanged on a gallows thirty feet high; with this addition to his ſentence, that, after he was dead, his head ſhould be ſevered from his body, and ſet on Edinburgh talbooth; his arms and legs ſent to four ſeveral towns, to be expoſed as a ſpectacle, and his body buried under the gallows. He met death with extraordinary courage, and before his execution, made a ſpeech to the people, in which, far from owning himſelf worthy of death, he teſtified, on the contrary, an entire perſuaſion of the juſtice of the cauſe he had ſupported. He ſaid that Charles I. died a martyr, and aſſured the people, the new king would obſerve all his promiſes to the Scots, wherein he was as falſe a prophet as the lord Capel had been in England. Thus fell the marquis of Montroſe, who had rendered himſelf famous by his great actions for the late king in Scotland, but withal, odious to his countrymen, by his inhumanity to them, when he had the advantage.

The tragical death of the marquis of Montroſe diſappointed all the king's hopes, who was thereby deprived of his laſt refuge. He complained loudly to the commiſſioners of the execution of that lord, during the negotiation, affirming it to be a breach of faith. He writ in the ſame ſtrain to the committee of eſtates, but was ſilenced by their anſwer, and told, it would be much better not to inſiſt upon that affair. The anſwer imported, that papers were found upon Montroſe, which it was more for his honour to conceal than to publiſh. The king eaſily underſtood, that by this was meant his commiſſion to the marquis after the news of his being proclaimed, and his letter of the 30th of January, after the time and place of conference were fixed. This juſtified the parliament of Scotland from breach of faith, of which he himſelf was not entirely guiltleſs.

The death of Montroſe leaving the king without refuge or retreat, he at laſt accepted the conditions preſented to him by the commiſſioners. Only the ſigning of the covenant was deferred till his arrival in Scotland, upon his promiſe however of compliance, in caſe it was judged proper to preſs him when he ſhould be at Edinburgh. The commiſſioners were willing to grant him this favour, knowing, the eſtates would never deſiſt from that article. It is certain, the king ſubmitted to theſe conditions only becauſe he had no other courſe to take, and it is, perhaps, no leſs certain, that he meant to obſerve them but whilſt he ſhould be forced. This plainly appears in the hiſtory of thoſe times, penned by the king's adherents. For they could not forbear to think it ſtrange that the king, when in Scotland, ſhould be obliged to a ſtrict obſervance of what he had promiſed by oath. As if his promiſe and oath had been only formalities, which were not to bind him.

When the king had ſigned the conditions, he went to Scheveling near the Hague, and embarked, being attended by duke Hamilton, the earl of Lautherdale, and ſome other Scots, who gave him hopes that his preſence in Scotland would remove all ſuſpicions, and that an exact obſervation of what he had promiſed would be diſpenſed with. But at his arrival, before he was ſuffered to land, the covenant was ſo preſſed upon him, that he could not avoid taking it. He had positively promiſed it at Breda, and no man durſt adviſe him to break his word. This ſtrictneſs of the eſtates convinced duke Hamilton and the earl of Lautherdale, that it was not ſafe for them to appear publicly in Scotland. Wherefore, finding means to land with the king, they retired to their own eſtates, or their friends, in expectation of a more favourable juncture.

The marquis of Argyle received the king with extraordinary reverence and outward marks of reſpect. But within two days, all his Engliſh domeſtics were removed, except the duke of Buckingham. Some were obliged to return into Holland, others withdrew at a diſtance from the court, to friends who were willing to entertain them. This rigour at firſt appears very ſtrange, and by ſome is ſo repreſented. But it muſt be conſidered, the Scots were for receiving the king on thoſe terms only, on which they would have admitted his father, had he happily eſcaped from captivity, and retired into Scotland. Certainly they would never have ſuffered about him, men whoſe principles and maxims were directly oppoſite to the intereſts of Scotland, and who were the kingdom's reputed enemies. Why then were they to repoſe more confidence in Charles II? Precaution was not more neceſſary under the laſt, than under the preſent reign.

When the friends and confidents of the king were thus removed from his perſon, he ſaw himſelf in the hands of men whom he knew not, and whoſe principles were entirely different from thoſe in which he had been educated; ſo that he was extremely uneaſy, though outwardly he received all the reſpect due to his rank. What troubled him moſt, was the importunity of the miniſters, who thought it their duty to inſtruct him in the preſbyterian religion, and ſcrupled not to brand the hierarchy and worſhip of the church of England with the name of doctrine of devils. They pretended, the king's promiſe and oath to profeſs preſbyterianiſm obliged him to receive their inſtructions. His embarraſſment on this occaſion was a natural conſequence of the promiſe he had made, without intending to keep it. To be rid as well as he could of this trouble, he was preſent at their ſermons and prayers, but with ſo little attention, that it was plainly againſt his will[c]. The reluctance he ſhewed upon this article bred in the Scots a very ill opinion of him, being perſuaded, he had ſworn againſt his conſcience, and with an intention to break his promiſes, when freed from reſtraint. It ought not therefore to ſeem ſtrange, that they had no confidence in him, and that thoſe who were at the helm, imparted not to him all the affairs. He was not conſidered as a prince attached to the intereſts and religion of the kingdom, but as intending to eſtabliſh other maxims if it was in his power. But if the tranſactions of ſome years paſt, and the occaſion of the troubles, be conſidered, it will not be thought ſo ſtrange, that the Scots took precautions with regard to their new king, and refuſed him a confidence, which in that juncture, appeared to them very dangerous.

It was quickly perceived how neceſſary theſe precautions were, by the king's endeavours to reconcile to the ſtate and the church, thoſe who had entered into the late duke Hamilton's engagement to raiſe an army, which under colour of acting againſt the independents, was deſigned to reſtore the late king to the throne of England without any condition. The authors of that deſign had thereby plunged Scotland into a war not only unneceſſary, but directly contrary to her intereſts. Beſides, their ill conduct had occaſioned the loſs of a numerous army, and a great effuſion of blood. What might not the Scots have added in aggravation of the crimes of the Hamiltonians, had they known the ſecret treaty made with the late king in the Iſle of Wight, ſo contrary to the covenant of both kingdoms? It is not therefore ſtrange, that men who had acted with views ſo oppoſite to the intereſts of the kingdom, or at leaſt of the prevailing party, were regarded by that party as enemies of the ſtate and religion. And yet theſe were the men for whom the king laboured ſo ſtrenuouſly, under the pretence of procuring a happy union amongſt his ſubjects. But at the ſame time he clearly diſcovered his averſion to the maxims by which Scotland was then governed, and his intention to enable his friends to oppoſe the marquis of Argyle, who was the head of the contrary faction and of the government. That lord eaſily fathomed the king's deſign. And therefore, whereas he had hitherto conſtantly attended him, he gradually withdrew himſelf from him, as from a ſecret enemy who only waited an occaſion to ruin him.

While theſe things paſſed in Scotland, the parliament of England were not idle. When they learned that commiſſioners from Scotland were to confer with the king at Breda, they imagined, Charles would accept the crown of Scotland on any terms, in order to uſe the forces of that kingdom to invade England, in which they were not miſtaken. This war, which the parliament deemed unavoidable, could not but be very dangerous to the independent party, if it was brought into England. The independents, though uppermoſt, had no ſupport but the army, with the preſbyterians, the royaliſts and the city of London for their enemies. It was therefore very likely, that if the king entered England with a Scotch army, he would be joined by the royaliſts, and favoured by the preſbyterians. To prevent therefore this danger, the parliament reſolved to carry war into Scotland. This reſolution was founded entirely upon policy, foraſmuch as the parliament had no cauſe to complain of the Scots, who in recognizing for their ſovereign, the eldeſt ſon of their late king, did not injure England. Nay, it was a conſequence of the covenant between the two kingdoms, though manifeſtly violated by the Engliſh parliament. But on this occaſion, the parliament believed themſelves not bound to a ſcrupulous obſervance of the rules of equity, for fear of the prejudice with which ſuch ſcruples might in time be attended. Intereſt therefore was ſolely regarded, which required, that the war ſhould rather be carried into Scotland than expected in England.

After this reſolution, Cromwell was haſtily recalled out of Ireland to take the command of the army which was to act againſt Scotland. In the late Scotch invaſion under duke Hamilton, the behaviour of general Fairfax had given occaſion to judge, that he would unwillingly accept of the conduct of the new war, which was really the caſe. Cromwell's ſucceſs in Ireland had been ſuch as the parliament could have wiſhed. After the taking of Drogheda, he ſeized Kilkenny and many other places, and in a little time reduced the greateſt part of the iſland to the obedience of the parliament. The marquis of Ormond was little capable of reſiſting him, becauſe of the diviſion ſtill reigning amongſt the Iriſh. This diviſion went ſo far, that O Neal had at laſt concluded a treaty with Monk, one of the parliament generals, commiſſioned by the council of ſtate. But the parliament refuſed to ratify the treaty as being too favourable to the catholics, and therefore O Neal had begun to treat with the marquis of Ormond, and was upon the point of joining him, when his death prevented the execution of his deſign. His troops diſperſing upon his death, were of no advantage to the marquis of Ormond. In the mean time, Cromwell continued his conqueſts with ſurpriſing rapidity, and to prevent the agreement and junction of the Iriſh amongſt themſelves, he thought of an expedient which ſucceeded. He publiſhed by proclamation a permiſſion to all the Iriſh officers to liſt, in the ſervice of foreign princes, what ſoldiers they pleaſed of their own nation, with a promiſe to give them no diſturbance or moleſtation. More than twenty five thouſand immediately choſe to ſerve France and Spain, and afterwards a much greater number[d]. This precaution prevented the marquis of Ormond from bringing an army into the field capable to reſiſt that of the parliament. So, when Cromwell was recalled, the Iriſh affairs were in ſo good condition, that his ſon-in-law Ireton, whom he left there as his lieutenant, had but little to do.

Cromwell being returned to London, took his ſeat in the parliament, where, by order of the houſe, the ſpeaker thanked him for his late ſervices. After that, the Scotch war being the moſt preſſing affair, the parliament cauſed Fairfax to be aſked, whether he would take upon him the conduct of the war? He replied, if the Scots entered England with an army, he would endeavour to repel them; but deſired to be excuſed from attacking them in their own country. Some endeavours were uſed to convince him of the juſtice and neceſſity of the war, but without any ſucceſs. Cromwell acted his part ſo well, that though he paſſionately wiſhed to be commander in chief, he gave his opinion in favour of Fairfax, and pretended he ſhould be well ſatisfied to ſerve as his lieutenant. Fairfax perceived that being a preſbyterian (though he had but too faithfully ſerved the independents) the parliament would have had no great confidence in him, and that the zeal ſhewn on his behalf was only ceremony. He therefore ſent his commiſſion to the houſe, which was chearfully received, and an annual penſion of five thouſand pounds was ſettled on him in acknowledgment of his ſervices. Immediately Cromwell was declared general of the armies of the commonwealth, and his commiſſion preſently diſpatched [e].

[c] Biſhop Burnet ſays, that in one faſt day there were ſix ſermons preached before the king without intermiſſion:——And adds, the great rigour the kirk uſed towards him, contributed not a little to beget in him an averſion to all ſorts of ſtrictneſs in religion. Tom. I. p. 53.

[d] The lord Clarendon obſerves, that Cromwell found a way to ſend above forty thouſand men out of that kingdom, for the ſervice of foreign princes; when the marquis of Ormond, notwithſtanding all the promiſes, obligations, and contracts of the Iriſh with him, could not draw together a body of five thouſand. Tom. III. p. 280.

While the army, which was to act againſt Scotland, was raiſing, the parliament appointed a committee to draw up a manifeſto, concerning the intended war. This precaution appeared the more neceſſary, as the houſe was not ignorant, that the cavaliers and preſbyterians would induſtriouſly repreſent this war, as the moſt unjuſt that ever was, ſince the Scots had given no provocation. The committee employed about the manifeſto, being unwilling to publiſh the true reaſon of the war, namely, to ſupport the independents, contented themſelves with ſuppoſing, that the Scots deſigned to force the Engliſh to acknowledge king Charles II. though hitherto they had not moved one ſtep towards it. It was nevertheleſs, very likely the king would attempt to engage them in a rupture with the Engliſh parliament; but there was no probability of ſucceſs, conſidering his manifeſt averſion to become a good preſbyterian.

The Scots hearing of the preparations againſt them in England, raiſed an army with all poſſible diligence [f], and gave the command to general Leſley, not daring to truſt the king for the reaſons above-mentioned. He was even ſuffered to ſee the army but once, for fear of gaining the officers and ſoldiers by his intrigues. David Leſley formed his camp between Leith and Edinburgh, and fortified it with ſuch intrenchments, that he was not to be attacked without manifeſt danger.

About the middle of July, Cromwell put himſelf at the head of the Engliſh army, conſiſting of eighteen or nineteen thouſand men, and marched to the frontiers of Scotland, where he publiſhed his manifeſto. As the enemy's army lay encamped near Edinburgh, he entered Scotland without any difficulty. But he found the country deſtitute of inhabitants, and every thing capable to ſubſiſt his army conveyed away; ſo that he was obliged to maintain it with ſupplies from his fleet. He advanced, however, and came in ſight of the enemy's army; but found it too well intrenched to be attacked. He choſe therefore to retire towards Muſſelborough, whereupon Leſley detached a large body of horſe, which fell upon the Engliſh rear, commanded by Lambert, with ſome advantage [g]. The day after, there was a ſharp ſkirmiſh, in which the Scots beat ſome Engliſh regiments; but at laſt were repulſed to their camp with conſiderable loſs. Then, Cromwell once more attempted, by his approach, to draw the Scotch army out of their intrenchments, but his endeavours were fruitleſs. At laſt, after the two armies had remained almoſt in ſight ſeveral weeks, Cromwell, for want of proviſion and forage, was forced to retire. His deſign was to embark his foot, and return into England with only his horſe. To execute this reſolution, he marched towards Dunbar, where his fleet expected him, his army being much diminiſhed, and reduced to about twelve thouſand men.

The Scots, advertiſed of Cromwell's reſolution, imagined the Engliſh were ſeized with terror, and that a more favorable opportunity could not offer to fight them, and therefore they left their camp to follow them cloſely. The firſt day, they encamped upon a hill, about a mile from Dunbar, ſo that it was impoſſible for Cromwell to embark his foot, without expoſing himſelf to the danger of a defeat. General Leſley was not for attacking the Engliſh, but only for watching an opportunity to engage them with advantage. But the clamours of the miniſters who were in his army, and promiſed a certain victory, as if by ſome revelation [h], obliged him the next day to draw nearer to the enemy. Cromwell, who obſerved them with a perſpective glaſs, ſeeing them deſcend the hill, cried out, "that God had delivered them into his hands." He immediately went to prayers, and then told ſome of his officers, that he had felt, in praying, ſuch a repoſe in his mind, that he doubted not but God would give him the victory. Perhaps this was his real belief, or elſe an artifice to inſpire his ſoldiers with courage, who were moſt of them fanatics. The two armies remained in ſight all the reſt of the day, Leſley ſtill alleging ſome excuſe to delay fighting. But in the night, Cromwell reſolved to attack the Scots at break of day. It was his frequent and ever ſucceſsful maxim, not to expect, but attack the enemy, without any regard to number, being perſuaded, the aſſailants have always a great advantage.

This reſolution being taken, he drew up his army in the night, and, not to be prevented, begun the fight an hour before day. The Scotch cavalry on the right wing behaved well at firſt, but were at laſt put to flight. The left wing fled, without charging once. Three regiments of Scotch infantry fought with ſuch bravery, that they were almoſt all ſlain on the ſpot, without offering to fly. The reſt ſeeing themſelves deſerted by the horſe, fled in confuſion, leaving the field, and an undoubted victory to the Engliſh. It is ſaid, the Scots loſt three thouſand men [i], beſides ſeven or eight thouſand priſoners, with twenty ſeven pieces of cannon; and that the Engliſh loſt but three hundred. The Scots after their defeat, abandoned Leith and Edinburgh, of which Cromwell made himſelf maſter, but the Caſtle of Edinburgh held out till the end of December.

This misfortune to the Scots was advantageous to the king, as it obliged them to alter their behaviour to the Hamiltonians. When the army lately defeated at Dunbar was raiſed, great care was taken not to admit any who had been concerned in the engagement of the late duke Hamilton, or were ſuſpected to be of the king's party. In a word, the rigid preſbyterians, who were then at the head of affairs, would have no ſociety with thoſe whom they called the luke-warm, that is, men who were not ſufficiently zealous for the covenant. After the defeat at Dunbar, a new army was to be raiſed, to oppoſe Cromwell, who threatened Scotland with entire ruin the next ſpring. The parliament was therefore convened at St. Johnſtoun's, where the king had retired [k]. But as a new army was not eaſily to be formed of the zealous, it was propoſed in parliament, to receive into this, thoſe who had hitherto been called luke-warm, and who offered their ſervice to their country in its preſent diſtreſs. This affair being debated, the parliament was forced to reſolve, that all who had been excluded from places, ſhould be allowed to produce proofs of their repentance, and then be employed in the ſervice of their country. In conſequence of this reſolution, thoſe who had till then oppoſed the marquis of Argyle, who had wanted zeal for the covenant, who had ſhewn an inclination for the king, who had ever been employed by Charles I. readily gave outward marks of their repentance, in a diſavowal of their paſt conduct, and a reconciliation with the kirk. After that they were admitted, as well into the parliament as to publick employs, and eſpecially to poſts in the army to be raiſed. Hence the king at laſt obtained, what he had ſo paſſionately deſired, namely, to ſee thoſe who were attached to his intereſts, in a condition to ſerve him, when occaſion ſhould offer.

But the reſolution of the parliament, of which neceſſity had been either the motive or the pretence, was not agreeable to all. The zealots could not bear the admiſſion of malignants (as they called them) to employments, under colour of a reſolution obtained from the parliament by intrigue and cabal, in the ſame manner as the levying an army had before been obtained, to ſerve againſt the intereſts of Scotland. They ſaid, it was mocking God, to receive the guilty to a hypocritical repentance, in order to re-admit them to employs, from which they had been juſtly excluded. But it was anſwered, it was ſtrange cruelty to remove from employs, men who offered their ſervice to their country, at ſo critical a juncture, and had profeſſed a repentance, for not having been ſufficiently zealous for the common cauſe. In a word, the firſt proteſted ſolemnly againſt the reſolution of the parliament, and formed a party called the proteſtors, whilſt thoſe who adhered to it formed another called the reſolutioners. Whereupon the council of ſtate appointed Cromwell, Lambert, Harriſon, St. John, and Whitelock, to confer with Fairfax, and endeavour to ſatisfy him of the juſtice of the undertaking. Whitelock gives us the conference at length in his memorials; wherein, though Cromwell and the reſt of the ſoldiers were very earneſt with him not to lay down his commiſſion; yet, ſays Whitelock, there was cauſe to believe, they did not much deſire he ſhould continue. weſtern counties [l] joined the proteſtors, and entering into an aſſociation, publiſhed a remonſtrance, which being offered to the parliament, was voted ſeditious. But this did not hinder ſeveral officers of reputation, as Straughan, Kerr, and ſome others, from adhering to the party of the proteſtors.

It is certain, if the people of Scotland had been conſulted, this reſolution had never paſſed in the parliament. The people were ſo attached to the covenant, that there was no likelihood of their departing from their rigidneſs at once, in favour of perſons who had not ſubſcribed it, or ſcrupled to violate it. It is therefore very probable, this reſolution was owing to the artifices and cabals of the enemies of Argyle, on pretence of the neceſſity of raiſing new forces. Nothing is a clearer evidence of its being contrary to the general ſenſe of the people, than the condition of profeſſing a repentance, required of all who were to be admitted to any employs. This ſhews a condeſcenſion for the people, who were perſuaded, that a luke-warmneſs for the covenant, was the moſt heinous of crimes. Accordingly, it was publicly ſaid, that the defeat at Dunbar was the juſt puniſhment of having called in the king, before any proofs were given of his repentance. This was the moſt general ſentiment, though the parliament had decided the contrary. But neither in Scotland nor England are the reſolutions of parliament to be always conſidered, as the ſenſe of the nation. It is a defect in the conſtitution of both the ſtates, that the members of parliament receive no inſtructions from their electors. The moment they are met, they become maſters and ſovereigns of thoſe by whom they are choſen, and palm upon the nation their own deciſions for thoſe of the public, though they are often contrary to the ſentiments and intereſts of the people repreſented. Inſtances are ſo frequent, that I need not ſtay to prove what I advance.

The managers of this affair in the parliament, knew, that the party of the proteſtors was much more numerous than that of the reſolutioners. Wherefore, it was thought convenient to give an appearance of ſatisfaction to the former, to prevent their obſtructing the deſigns formed in favour of the king. Their project was, to put the king at the head of an army, almoſt wholly at his devotion, that he might, upon occaſion, march into England, where it was not doubted, he would find many friends, and a powerful aſſiſtance. The rigid preſbyterians were therefore not to be alarmed at ſeeing the king at the head of the army, for fear of their concerting meaſures to hinder the execution of the project. For this purpoſe it was thought proper, that the king ſhould publiſh a declaration of a ſtrange nature, where he was made to ſpeak a language agreeable to the ſentiments of the people, but very contrary to his own. In the declaration, "he owned the ſin of his father, in marrying into an idolatrous family: he acknowledged, the blood-ſhed in the late wars lay at his father's doors: he expreſſed a deep ſenſe of his own ill education, and the prejudices he had drank in againſt the cauſe of God, of which he was now very ſenſible: he confeſſed all the former parts of his life to have been a courſe of enmity to the work of God: he repented of his commiſſion to Montroſe, and of every thing he had done that gave offence: and with ſolemn proteſtations he affirmed, that he was now ſincere in his declaration, and that he would adhere to it to the end of his life, in Scotland, England, and Ireland." When this declaration was offered him to ſign, he appeared at firſt bent to reject it; ſaying, "that if he paſſed it, he could never look his mother in the face." But upon a repreſentation of its abſolute neceſſity to gain the confidence of the proteſtors, without which he could never execute his deſigns, he ſwallowed the bitter pill, and the declaration was publiſhed.

This declaration procured not all the advantage the king was made to expect. No man could believe he had voluntrily ſigned a paper ſo ſcandalous, and ſo prejudicial to the memory of his father. The proteſtors, on the contrary, imagining, he concealed ſome deep deſign in this ſtrange proceeding, united ſtill more cloſely againſt him, and at laſt declared, they would have no communication with the reſolutioners, nor with Cromwell and the independent party in England.

Charles was extremely troubled, to ſee that his declaration produced no other effect, than the loſs of the confidence of both parties, and of his own reputation. It was univerſally believed, ſo ſcandalous a diſſimulation was intended to deceive the people. At laſt, this falſe ſtep, taken ſo contrary to his own opinion, joined to the ſad life he had led, made him liſten to propoſitions offered by ſome of his friends, in the highlands [m], who would receive no employs at the price of an hypocritical repentance. Theſe gentlemen ſent a meſſage to him, that if he would come and head them, they would ſend to a place appointed, a good body of troops to receive him, Dr. Frazier, Charles's phyſician, was the conductor of this intrigue, and took care to convey the letters. The king therefore conſented to join the malecontents, being extremely deſirous to withdraw from the preſbyterians, who had put ſo many hardſhips upon him. He had prepared a declaration, ſhewing the ill treatment he had received from the marquis of Argyle, and the cruel ſervitude in which he had been held ſince his arrival in Scotland. The duke of Buckingham, having diſcovered this ſecret, by letters left upon the king's table, informed the marquis of Argyle, who would not believe the execution of the project was ſo near. Nevertheleſs two days after, the king withdrawing from St. Johnſtoun, repaired to the place appointed, where he found only a very inconſiderable body, inſtead of the good number of troops he had been promiſed. But while he was deliberating what to do, the committee of eſtates diſpatched major-general Montgomery to him, who very rudely preſſed his return to St. Johnſtoun, to which he at laſt conſented, believing, doubtleſs, that thoſe who had wiſhed him among them, were not in ſo good a condition to receive him, as they had made him believe [n].

This deſign, however imprudent, produced a good effect for the king, though withal, it loſt him the confidence of the preſbyterians, who ſaw plainly, his heart was not with them, and that he little regarded his promiſes at Breda. Mean while, the marquis of Argyle, and the committee of eſtates perceived, a too great rigour might throw the king upon deſperate reſolutions, and, in the preſent juncture, great diſorders might happen, if the king ſhould deſire to head the malecontents. This procured him better treatment, and a larger ſhare in the public affairs. The king, on his part, ſaw alſo, he ſhould never be eaſy in Scotland, or able to execute his deſigns, without the aſſiſtance of Argyle, who was at the head of the kirk party. He therefore courted him extremely, making him great offers, and even talking of marrying his daughter. But the marquis, knowing his ſentiments, looked upon theſe offers as ſo many ſnares, and was upon his guard, though he outwardly paid the king all due reſpect. The lord Lorn his ſon, captain of the king's guards, did him many ſervices, and privately brought to him thoſe perſons, whoſe company he deſired [o].

At laſt, the king was crowned at Scone, the firſt of January 1650-1 [p], and from that day all perſons had acceſs to him. After this, the Scots were wholly intent upon raiſing an army, into which all who deſired it were received without diſtinction of party. [1651] The army was ready the beginning of June, before Cromwell could take the field for want of forage. It conſiſted of fifteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, which the king headed himſelf with David Leſley for his lieutenant general [q]. As they were moſtly new-raiſed troops, the king judged it not proper to go in queſt of Cromwell, who was formidable for his courage and experience, and was beſides at the head of a diſciplined and victorious army. He poſted himſelf therefore very advantageouſly at Torwood, between Edinburgh and Sterling, having behind him[r] a large and deep river, of which the paſſes were all ſecured, and by that means he received proviſions out of the plentiful county of Fife, whereas the country before him was entirely laid waſte. The army in the front was ſo ſtrongly intrenched, that it would have been raſhneſs to attack it. Here he reſolved to wait the enemy's motions, and take his meaſures accordingly.

Cromwell, having aſſembled his army, marched directly to the king with deſign to give him battle, but found him ſo ſtrongly intrenched, that he did not think fit to attack him. The armies remained in their reſpective camps about ſix weeks, all Cromwell's artifices to draw the king out of his intrenchments, proving ineffectual. The laſt year's experience had taught the Scots greater circumſpection. At laſt, Cromwell, unable any longer to ſtay in his camp by reaſon of the difficulty of getting proviſions, whilſt the county of Fife plentifully ſupplied the king, reſolved to deprive the king of that advantage. For he ſaw plainly, it was in the king's power to avoid fighting as long as he pleaſed, and oblige him to ſpend the whole campaign in a ſtate of inaction.

Wherefore he detached ſixteen hundred men under colonel Overton, who marched towards Edinburgh to a place provided with boats, and paſſing the frith, took his poſt in the county of Fife[s]. Overton was immediately followed by Lambert with a more conſiderable body. At the ſame time, Cromwell with the reſt of the army, advanced towards the king's intrenchments as if he intended to attack them, in order to prevent any detachment from the king's army to oppoſe the landing of his forces. As ſoon as the king was informed that the Engliſh were in Fife, he detached major general Brown with four thouſand men to fight them. Brown was routed, and Cromwell thereby free to tranſport his whole army into Fife. By this means he deprived the king of any farther ſupplies from that country.

It was indeed an advantage to Cromwell to put the king under a neceſſity of quitting a poſt where he could not be attacked. But withal, he had made it impoſſible to fight him, becauſe there was a deep river between the armies which joins the lake of Lomund to Edinburgh-Frith. The king might have paſſed the river, becauſe he was maſter of all the paſſes, but it was not thought proper to purſue Cromwell, who was now at a diſtance, having taken St. Johnſtoun, and threatened Sterling. On the contrary, the king ſuddenly reſolved to march into England, ſince he had no oppoſition before him, being pleaſed, that Cromwell had given him opportunity to form and execute a deſign ſo agreeable to his intereſt. He ſaw himſelf at the head of eighteen thouſand men, and doubted not that his army would be greatly increaſed in England, by the junction of the royaliſts and preſbyterians equally oppreſſed by an independent parliament. This was the idea the king and his council formed of this expedition. The marquis of Argyle was alone of the contrary opinion, and ſo far incurred the ſuſpicion of diſloyalty, that the king was adviſed to put him under an arreſt. But it was not thought proper to follow this advice, from which no advantage could be reaped. The marquis therefore was left in Scotland, and the king began his march to Carliſle with extraordinary diligence. He had now marched ſome days[t] before Cromwell heard of it, and entered England the ſixth of Auguſt, where he was proclaimed by his army.

The news of the king's march greatly ſurprized Cromwell who never expected it. He believed, he had gained a conſiderable advantage in forcing his way into Fife, but this had given the king opportunity to march into England, where, very likely, he would be joined by a great number of adherents. The avoiding of this, was the ſole aim of the parliament in carrying the war into Scotland. It may therefore be ſaid, that Cromwell was guilty of an error, which might have been attended with very ill conſequences to the new modelled commonwealth, and the governing party. Accordingly, his greateſt care was to prevent the miſchiefs that might follow. As he doubted not, the parliament would be alarmed at the news of the king's march, he ſpeedily informed them of it, and withal, of his intention cloſely to purſue him. He adviſed them alſo to put the militia in arms in all the counties of the kingdom, with all poſſible diligence, to keep the king's party in awe, and prevent their joining his army. He gave himſelf the ſame orders in the northern counties, as well to hinder the cavaliers from riſing, as to find ſeveral bodies of the trained bands ready to reinforce his army on his arrival in England. At the ſame time he detached major general Harriſon with three thouſand horſe, which were to be followed by Lambert at the head of another body of cavalry, to retard the king's march as much as was poſſible. After theſe precautions, he left major general Monk in Scotland with five thouſand men, with orders to endeavour to make himſelf maſter of Sterling and Dundee. At laſt, he put himſelf upon the march, three days after the king's departure, making all poſſible haſte to reach the king before he ſhould arrive at London, not queſtioning but he would march thither without halting.

The king entered England full of hopes that all the enemies of the independents, as well preſbyterians as royaliſts, would eagerly join him. For that purpoſe he ſent colonel Maſſey before with a detachment to receive all who were willing to ſerve him[u]. He writ likewiſe to the earl of Derby, then in the iſle of Man[w], to repair to him, greatly relying on his credit in Lancaſhire. But many things conſpired to diſconcert his projects. 1. As he advanced, the Scotch ſoldiers deſerted in ſuch numbers, that it was computed four or five thouſand returned to Scotland. Theſe deſerters were probably the zealous preſbyterians, who believed, they could not in conſcience aſſiſt the king in the recovery of England by force of arms, which was the opinion of moſt of the Scots. 2. The militia, every where in arms, hindered the king's friends from aſſembling, by guards placed on all the public roads. 3. The committee of the kirk, which had followed the army, feared, if the king's forces were augmented with too great a number of royaliſts, their ſuperiority might oblige the Scotch army not only to aſſiſt in the ruin of the independents, but moreover in the reſtoration of the king without any conditions, which was directly contrary to the intereſts of Scotland. In this belief the committee ſent Maſſey a declaration, with orders to publiſh it, ſignifying, that the king being zealous for the covenant, no perſons were to be received into his army who refuſed to ſign it. This was done without the king's privity, who was extremely troubled at the news. He even forbid Maſſey to publiſh the declaration. But the import of it being now every where ſpread, the king's friends thought proper to conceal themſelves, not daring to mix with the Scotch army, becauſe they could not reſolve to take the covenant. 4. The Engliſh preſbyterians were indeed enemies to the independents; but not ſuch friends of the king, as to reſtore him to the throne without a previous aſſurance of his ratifying the conceſſions made by the king his father at the treaty of Newport. But this not being a proper ſeaſon to enter into ſuch a negotiation, they did not appear very eager to ſerve him. 5. The earl of Derby, who had been ſent by the king into Lancaſhire, and had there raiſed twelve hundred men, was defeated by colonel Lilburn at the head of ten troops of horſe brought from York to join Cromwell. It was with great difficulty that the earl eſcaped to the king after the loſs of his forces, the lord Widdrington and ſir Thomas Tildeſly being left dead upon the ſpot. This defeat much diſcouraged the king's friends of thoſe parts, who intended to repair to his army.

At laſt, after a very fatiguing march, the king arrived at Worceſter, where he was honourably received by the magiſtrates, and ſolemnly proclaimed. He reſolved to refreſh his weary troops in the neighbourhood of that city, as they were not able to continue their march without ſome repoſe. Probably his deſign was to have marched directly to London, if his army, according to his expectation, had been conſiderably ſtrengthened on their rout. But on the contrary he ſaw it ſo diminiſhed by deſertion, as to be reduced to twelve or thirteen thouſand men, without any hopes of its being augmented for the forementioned reaſons. It is therefore likely, he durſt not farther advance, and thought the ground about Worceſter proper for defence in caſe of an attack.

Whilſt the king's army refreſhed themſelves at Worceſter, Cromwell was advancing with ſpeed. His orders for aſſembling the forces and militia of the north were ſo well obeyed, that on his arrival in England, his army was daily increaſed by parties from all quarters. By this means, after his junction with Lambert and Harriſon, he found his army much ſuperior to the king's, which lay encamped about a mile from Worceſter, with a reſolution to ſtand upon the defence. Cromwell before he attacked the king's army, thought proper to make a diverſion on the other ſide the Severn. For that purpoſe he detached Lambert, who marched directly to Upton, where was a bridge guarded by Maſſey. This paſſage was ſo vigorouſly attacked, that after a ſharp engagement, Maſſey was obliged to abandon it. Immediately after, Cromwell ordered part of his army to go over to the weſtern ſide of the Severn, which forced the king to ſend ſome of his forces the ſame way, and ſo to weaken that part of his army which was to ſuſtain Cromwell's attack.

The 3d of September, a day fortunate to Cromwell by the defeat of the Scots at Dunbar the year before, he charged the royal army on both ſides the Severn. After an engagement of ſome hours the king's forces were repulſed on both ſides the river, and forced to retire into the town in ſuch confuſion, that the entrance was forgot to be defended. The king's ſolicitations were fruitleſs, to inſpire his now vanquiſhed troops with reſolution to reſiſt any longer the conqueror. At laſt, his cavalry ſeeing the enemy breaking into the town, fled, and left the infantry to the mercy of the Engliſh. The king himſelf was forced to fly through St. Martin's gate, and with great difficulty avoided falling into the enemy's hands. The foot were almoſt entirely killed or taken; and the horſe being warmly purſued, were eaſily diſperſed: ſo that moſt of the officers were made priſoners. It is pretended, of the Scots there were ſlain about two thouſand, and ſeven or eight thouſand taken priſoners [x], who being ſent to London, were ſold for ſlaves to the plantations of the American iſles. Duke Hamilton, mortally wounded, died nine days after. Amongſt the principal perſons were general Leſley, the earls of Lautherdale, Rothes, Carnwarth, Kelly, Derby and Cleveland [y].

The king, though happily eſcaped from the defeat, was under great difficulties. He was to avoid his purſuers; that was his only concern, but the thing was not eaſy. He found himſelf in the middle of England, which he could conſider but as an enemy's country, though he had in it ſtill ſome friends. He was under a neceſſity to quit it, and find ſome way to convey himſelf beyond ſea, which ſeemed impracticable. It was ſtill more dangerous to attempt a return into Scotland, becauſe he would probably be ſearched for moſt carefully on that road, and though he ſhould ſafely reach that kingdom, the danger would be almoſt the ſame there as in England. The parliament army, victorious in Scotland, as we ſhall ſee preſently, would not have afforded him a ſecure retreat there. He reſolved therefore to go that night as far as poſſible. After that, he diſmiſſed his attendants, who could only ſerve to diſcover him the more eaſily, and put himſelf into the hands of a truſty guide, by whom he was diſguiſed like a peaſant, and conducted through by-roads. In this melancholy ſtate he ſpent a whole day in a tree near the road [z], from whence he ſaw and heard people as they paſſed by, talking of him, and wiſhing he would fall into their hands. He travelled only in the night, his guide concealing him by day in cottages where he was not known, and where his diet generally was only a little milk. At laſt, after two months great fatigues, after infinite dangers eſcaped, after a great part of the kingdom traverſed from Worceſter to the county of Suſſex [a], he embarked, and ſafely arrived in Normandy the 22d of October. The curious are referred to the earl of Clarendon, who, from the mouth of the king himſelf, has given a circumſtantial account of the means of his eſcape, and the adventures in his flight [b].

We muſt now return to the tranſactions of Scotland, ſince the two armies left that kingdom. While Cromwell was in purſuit of the king, Monk, in obedience to his orders, laid ſiege to Sterling, which reſiſted but few days. This place, one of the ſtrongeſt of Scotland, where the public records were kept, ſurrendered the 14th of Auguſt [c]. All the papers and records were ſent to London, from whence they never returned, the ſhip which was bringing them back, after the reſtoration, being caſt away. After the ſurrender of Sterling, Monk beſieged Dundee, where the inhabitants of Edinburgh had conveyed their beſt effects, after the battle of Dunbar. During this ſiege, ſome Scotch gentlemen aſſembling ſome forces to relieve the town, they were ſurpriſed and diſperſed by a detachment from Monk, and their leaders taken priſoners. Notwithſtanding this misfortune, major Lumſdale the governor made a ſtout defence, till the town was taken by ſtorm the firſt of September, two days before the battle of Worceſter. The taking of Sterling and Dundee were followed by that of Aberdeen, St. Andrews, and all the reſt of the towns and caſtles, capable of making reſiſtance. Thus, in a ſhort time, Monk reduced the whole kingdom of Scotland to the obedience of the Engliſh parliament. And this was the remarkable conſequence of the king's reſolution to conduct the Scotch army into England.

The victory of Worceſter and the reduction of Scotland gave ſuch a reputation to the new republic, that every ſtate in Europe, either courted its friendſhip, or dreaded its arms. For this reaſon, moſt of the ſovereigns excuſed themſelves from making offers to the king, or ſupplying him with money, for fear of being ſuſpected by the parliament. So, the king ſaw himſelf reduced to great extremities, and even to a want of common neceſſaries. He lived at Paris, maintained by his mother, who had a penſion from the crown, but cardinal Mazarin making his court to the parliament of England, took no notice of the diſtreſs of her unfortunate ſon.

On the other hand, Cromwell's glory and credit were ſo increaſed ſince the battle of Dunbar and Worceſter, that as he was maſter of the armies of the three kingdoms, he was in effect, maſter of the reſolutions of the parliament, no man daring openly to oppoſe him. He had, beſides, in the houſe ſo great a number of creatures, that it was eaſy for him to procure what reſolutions he pleaſed. So, it may be truly ſaid, that he was the head of the common-wealth, whilſt he had only the title of general.

This common-wealth was very powerful from its beginning. This appears ſtrange at firſt, conſidering the great ſums that were expended, and the blood that was ſhed, during the civil war. But it is to be conſidered with regard to the expence, that the money had not been carried out of the kingdom. The only alteration was, that the rich were become poor, and the poor rich, which had not ſunk the capital of the kingdom. And as to the number of men killed in the war, it muſt alſo be conſidered, that England ſwarmed with people in the year 1642, having had no wars ſince the death of Elizabeth. So the effuſion of blood had not diminiſhed the inhabitants ſo as to weaken the kingdom to any degree. This is evident, from the eaſineſs wherewith, in the ſpace of one year, the parliament raiſed an army for Ireland, and another more conſiderable for Scotland, beſides the forces remaining in England. The navy, having had no enemies to engage during the war, was in a flouriſhing condition. In a word, England was not leſs powerful than under Elizabeth, or than it might have been under James I. and Charles I. had thoſe princes thought proper to engage in foreign wars. Nothing therefore was altered but the government, and that was in the hands of the moſt able men England had for a long while produced, though their uſurpation was the moſt unjuſt. In this reſpect, England found itſelf in a very different ſtate from what it was under the two foregoing kings, whoſe capacities to govern cannot be greatly commended by the impartial.

Cromwell returned to London the 21ſt of September, leading with him, in triumph, his principal priſoners, who were committed to the Tower, from whence Maſſey, ſome time after, found means to eſcape [d]. A majority of the parliament, with the ſpeaker at their head, attended by the lord mayor and aldermen of London, met him as far as Acton. Eight days after, the earl of Derby was tried and ſentenced by a council of war, and beheaded at Bolton in the county of Lancaſter [e].

While theſe things paſſed in England, the parliament's fleet became maſter of the iſle of Jerſey, Cornet caſtle in the iſle of Guernſey, and the Iſle of Man. In January following, ſir George Aſcough reduced the Iſle of Barbadoes, then governed by the lord Willoughby of Parham for the king; and the iſles of Nevis and St. Chriſtopher ſubmitted without oppoſition.

England enjoying a profound tranquillity, and Ireland being almoſt reduced, the parliament thought of means to unite Scotland with the commonwealth of England. As they had conquered that kingdom, they believed they had a right to do with it as they pleaſed, without conſulting the Scots, who were no longer able to oppoſe their will. An act therefore paſſed in the Engliſh parliament, which entirely aboliſhed kingly power in Scotland, and united that kingdom to the Engliſh commonwealth, with a power to ſend a limited number of repreſentatives to the parliament. Commiſſioners were afterwards ſent into Scotland, to adjuſt the particulars of the union. Moſt of the Scotch nobility ſeeing themſelves unable to reſiſt the parliament, ſubmitted to their pleaſure. The marquis of Argyle became one of the moſt zealous adherents of the commonwealth, but the clergy were very much diſſatisfied with the union.

Since the independents had openly appeared, they had made a great progreſs. They had beheaded king Charles I. aboliſhed the houſe of lords, turned the monarchy into a commonwealth, quelled the faction of the levellers, humbled the preſbyterians, ſubdued Scotland, and almoſt finiſhed the conqueſt of Ireland. By the victory at Worceſter, they ſeemed to have deprived the king of all refuge, and to have nothing more to fear from him. Nevertheleſs, the royaliſts were ſtill a thorn in their ſide, and gave them continual apprehenſions. Indeed, that party appeared too weak to recover by their own ſtrength, but they were not without a poſſibility of receiving aſſiſtance from foreign powers. Of theſe powers, they dreaded neither France nor Spain, becauſe they were ſatisfied, that the managers of the affairs of theſe two kingdoms had no deſign to attempt the reſtoration of king Charles, and though they ſhould have attempted it, their naval forces could not withſtand the navy of England. But there was another power which inſpired them with fear. This was the republic of the United Provinces, who could ſtrongly aſſiſt the royaliſts: nay, it was likely, the prince of Orange, brother-in-law to the king, would uſe his great credit in thoſe provinces, to engage them in the quarrel between the king and the parliament. It was therefore no leſs important, to prevent any aſſiſtance to the king from Holland, than it had been to hinder the Scots from aſſiſting the preſbyterians.

For this purpoſe, the parliament, in the year 1649, ſent Doriſlaus to Holland, to propoſe a ſtrict union betwixt the two republics. The aſſaſſination of that agent at the Hague, made the leſs noiſe in England, becauſe the parliament intended to prevent the danger which might come from that quarter by a ſtrict alliance with the ſtates. The prince of Orange dying October 1650, the parliament judged the occaſion favourable to treat with the ſtates, becauſe the intereſt of that prince could no longer obſtruct the negotiation. They ſent therefore, in March 1651, Oliver St. John and Walter Strickland to the Hague, to negotiate, not a bare alliance, but ſuch an union, as might render them one commonwealth. This propoſal met with great oppoſition from the ſtates. Firſt, the Engliſh pretended, the ſtates ſhould renounce all their alliances, except thoſe common to them with the republic of England. Secondly, the conditions propoſed by the Engliſh were of ſuch a nature, that all the advantages were on their ſide, and the forces of the United Provinces were properly but to ſerve for augmentation of thoſe of England. Thirdly, if the time of the arrival of the two envoys at the Hague be conſidered, it will be eaſily ſeen, that the affairs of the parliament were not yet in a ſituation to oblige the ſtates to be contented with conditions, ſo little advantageous. Indeed, Cromwell had, the year before, gained the battle of Dunbar: but that was not a deciſive victory, ſince the king was going to head a new army, as he afterwards did before the Engliſh envoys left the Hague. The ſtates would therefore have acted with too much precipitation, had they concluded this union before a deciſion between the king and the parliament. Laſtly, the party of the houſe of Orange not being yet entirely ſuppreſſed, ſtrongly oppoſed the union of the two republics, which would have deſtroyed all the hopes of the young poſthumous prince of Orange. On all theſe accounts, the Engliſh envoys returned in July, diſſatisfied not only at their ill ſucceſs, but alſo at ſome inſults on their perſons from the rabble at the Hague[f]. By that they perceived, the ſubjects of the ſtates were more inclined to the king, than to the parliament, and were confirmed in the ſuſpicion, that the ſtates waited only a favourable opportunity to eſpouſe openly the king's intereſts, ſo, their report to the parliament contributed to exaſperate them againſt the ſtates. Their reſentment would perhaps have been immediately ſhewn, had they not been engaged in the war with Scotland. Wherefore, it was judged proper to diſſemble, till that war was ended, to which the battle of Worceſter and Monk's ſucceſs in Scotland gave at laſt a proſperous concluſion.

But if the happy end of this war enabled the parliament to undertake another againſt Holland, it ſeems, on the other hand, to have removed the motives of a freſh war. For after the parliament was become maſter of Scotland and Ireland, there was no likelihood, the ſtates of the United Provinces would think of aſſiſting the king. Beſides, as the prince of Orange was dead, it was not even probable, the ſtates would contribute to the king's reſtoration, uncle of the young prince, whom they deſigned to reduce to the condition of a private perſon. Nevertheleſs, the parliament's reſentment againſt the ſtates was ſo great, that a war was reſolved[g]. Pretexts were ſought from injuries ſaid to be done to the Engliſh by the Dutch thirty years before at Amboyna, and other places in the Indies. It is pretended, Cromwell conſented to this war, of which he ſaw no neceſſity, in pure complaiſance to St. John, and ſome others, who appeared extremely incenſed againſt Holland.

The ſtrong deſire ſhewn by the parliament to engage in this war upon ſuch remote pretences, gives room to conjecture, there were other motives than what publicly appeared. Very probably, even then ſome members, ſecret enemies or enviers of Cromwell, ſought means either to ruin him, or at leaſt conſiderably to leſſen his power. This power in a private perſon ſeemed to them too dangerous for a commonwealth. They had participated in his counſels and deſigns to ſubvert the preſbyterian parliament, and therefore knew his genius, and of what it was capable. Wherefore they could not help dreading, that inſtead of labouring for the common-wealth, he was labouring for himſelf, however careful he was to hide his ambition under the maſk of the public good. They ſaw at leaſt with uneaſineſs, that if he was forming his own advancement, nothing could hinder him from executing his deſigns as long as he was maſter of the army. The ſupport was therefore either to be taken from him, or the common-wealth expoſed to his ambitious deſigns. But it was difficult to obtain his conſent to diſband an army which was at his devotion, and his great credit in the parliament afforded no hopes of effecting it there, without a preſſing neceſſity. It was believed therefore, that if the republic could be engaged in a ſea war, the great expence of which was foreſeen, the parliament would by degrees be induced to diſband a land army, to avoid an unneceſſary charge. This policy perhaps may appear at firſt too refined, but three things ſtrengthen this conjecture. Firſt, The cauſes alleged for the war appear not of ſufficient weight to engage the parliament in ſo great an expence, at a time when it would have been on the contrary very advantageous to let the people enjoy the fruits of peace, in order to make them reliſh the late eſtabliſhed republican government. Secondly, It will appear in the ſequel, that all the ſubmiſſions of the Hollanders were ineffectual to procure them a peace, and that the parliament would ſcarce hear their propoſals. This plainly ſhews, the parliament had ſome ſecret motive for the continuation of the war; and it is difficult to diſcover any other than what I have general riſing of the preſbyterians in Lancaſhire, to join with the king; but it was diſappointed by the apprehending of Mr. Birkenhead. He confeſſed alſo the matter of treaſon charged againſt him, and ſubmitted to the mercy of the parliament. And for plea, 1. He alleged, he had quarter given him, and therefore was not to be tried by a court martial. 2. He pleaded ignorance of the acts of treaſon ſet forth by the parliament. But theſe pleas were over-ruled; and he was ſentenced to loſe his head at Bolton. Whitelock, p. 511. He married the daughter of the duke de la Tremouille in France. What reward his ſon had for this famous earl's loyalty, will apppear by the following inſcription, fixed by the preſent earl of Derby, on a building erected at Knowſley, his ſeat in Lancaſhire:

[g] Hoſtilities began between the two nations in October 1651, when an Engliſh man of war, meeting with ſome Dutch fiſhermen, demanded of them the tenth herring, as an acknowledgment of England's ſovereignty in thoſe ſeas (or elſe, inſiſted upon their ſtriking ſail) which the Dutch refuſed; whereupon they fell from words to blows, and the Dutch ſhooting firſt at the Engliſh, the Engliſh man of war ſunk one of their ſhips, and all the men were loſt. Whitelock, p. 512.

They

mentioned. Thirdly, It is certain, Cromwell at laſt perceived, as will hereafter appear, this war was continued only to give the parliament occaſion to diſband the army, and that this made him reſolve to deſtroy a parliament which ſought his ruin. I own, it is not eaſy to prove, that the authors of the war againſt the United Provinces, had at firſt the deſign I have aſcribed to them; and that with reſpect to the beginning, it is only a conjecture. But this conjecture is confirmed, when it is conſidered, that the principal members joined together to humble the power of Cromwell, and that the war was only continued to make the expence of it a proper reaſon for diſbanding the land army as uſeleſs, but which was neceſſary to Cromwell's ſupport.

However this be, Cromwell returning victorious from Worceſter, as he had before done from Ireland and Scotland, his credit ſo increaſed, that he became as it were the ſoul of the parliament and commonwealth. Whether he did not at firſt perceive the ſecret motives of the projected war, or for ſome other reaſon, he readily conſented to the deſign of humbling Holland, which was conſidered as the only foreign power the parliament had to fear. But as the people were to be managed, who would not have been eaſily perſuaded of the neceſſity of this war, it was reſolved to force the Hollanders to be the aggreſſors, or at leaſt to furniſh a pretence for the war. To that end the parliament, under colour of encouraging navigation, made an act prohibiting the importation of all foreign commodities except upon Engliſh bottoms, or ſuch as were of the country from whence the commodities came. By this act, which was to commence the firſt of December 1651, all commerce between England and Holland was deſtroyed, ſince that commerce conſiſted only in foreign merchandizes imported from Holland in their own veſſels. Beſides this, the parliament granted letters of mart to ſeveral private men, who complained of an unjuſt confiſcation of their ſhips in Holland.

The ſtates eaſily perceived the parliament's deſign, but inſtead of beginning hoſtilities, as was expected by the Engliſh, they ſent an embaſſy to London, to ſolicit a revocation of the act. The parliament received the embaſſadors with marks of reſpect, and granted them ſeveral audiences, their aim being to intimate, that it ſhould not be their fault if the peace between the two republics were not preſerved. But when the particular articles came to be diſcuſſed, it was plain the parliament was bent upon war. Inſtead of revoking the navigation act, ſeveral ſtale pretenſions were revived. Satisfaction was demanded for the maſſacre of the Engliſh at Amboyna in the year 1622; for the loſſes ſuſtained from the Dutch ſince the year 1618 in the Indies, Perſia, the Mogul's dominions, Muſcovy, Greenland, and the iſle of Poleron. Theſe loſſes, according to the parliament's eſtimation, amounted to ſeventeen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. A ſuitable reparation was alſo inſiſted on for the murder of Doriſlaus committed at the Hague, under the eye of the ſtate, who had taken no proper meaſures to bring the authors to puniſhment. In fine, it was pretended, that ſatisfaction ſhould be given for the ſecret intelligence which the laſt embaſſadors from the ſtates had held with the late king during the civil war. For theſe ſatisfactions and reparations, the parliament offered to make an alliance with the United Provinces upon the terms propoſed by their envoys at the Hague[h].

[1652] Theſe propoſitions convinced the ſtates that they were to prepare for war. Accordingly, with great care and expence a fleet was put to ſea of a hundred and fifty ſail. They were unwilling however to declare war againſt the parliament, and reſolved, if poſſible, to cauſe the Engliſh to be the aggreſſors. For this purpoſe, while the ſtates ambaſſadors were ſtill at London, their admiral Martin Van Trump, one of the braveſt and moſt experienced ſea officers in Europe, appeared in the channel with a fleet of forty-five ſhips of war, pretending to convoy ſome merchantmen, and came and anchored in Dover road, probably with deſign to give the Engliſh a provocation to begin hoſtilities. Admiral Blake, who commanded the Engliſh fleet conſiſting only of twenty-ſix ſail, appearing in ſight, the Dutch weighed anchor, and put to ſea without ſtriking their flag, whereupon Blake fired three guns without ball for a ſignal to ſtrike, to which Trump anſwered no otherwiſe than by drawing up his ſhips in line of battle, and in contempt of the ſignal, diſcharged one ſingle gun, and coming up to the Engliſh admiral gave him a broad ſide. So, the fight began without any certainty which ſide was the aggreſſor[i]. The two admirals had poſitive orders ſo to behave, as not to come to an engagement without apparent neceſſity. The Engliſh ſay, Trump had orders from the ſtates not to ſtrike to the Engliſh, to oblige them to begin hoſtilities. This is not improbable, though the Dutch authors do not mention it[k]. Blake being reinforced with eight ſhips, the engagement laſted from four in the afternoon till night. The Engliſh, if their hiſtorians are to be credited, had not a ſingle ſhip damaged, and the Dutch loſt two, one taken, and one ſunk. They ſay farther, that night coming on, Trump drew his fleet to the back of the Goodwin Sands, and the next morning ſailed for Zealand. The Dutch own the loſs of two ſhips, but affirm the Engliſh had ſix ſunk, and that the night only ſaved their fleet from entire deſtruction. It is difficult exactly to diſcover the truth in ſuch contradictory accounts, particularly concerning ſea engagements. It ſeems however, that the conſternation at London, occaſioned by this battle, and the inſults offered to the Dutch embaſſadors from the populace, which obliged the parliament to give them a guard, ſhew, the people were not pleaſed with the ſucceſs.

The Dutch embaſſadors, knowing the intention of their maſters, endeavoured, in an audience obtained of the parliament, to ſhew, the battle was a pure effect of chance. On the other hand, the ſtates ſent to the parliament an embaſſador extraordinary, to propoſe an agreement. This was Adrian Paw, who had been plenipotentiary at the peace of Munſter. But the parliament not receding from any of the articles propoſed before the rupture[l], the ſtates recalled the embaſſadors, and reſolved to continue the war, ſince there was no other way to procure a peace. A manifeſto was publiſhed, in which they pretended to demonſtrate, the parliament attacked them without any provocation; and the parliament anſwered in another, declaring all the occaſions of complaint above-mentioned. To this was added the refuſal of ſtriking the flag, a right they were reſolved to maintain at all hazards. The ſtates replied, it was true, their republic, in its infancy, had paid that compliment to the royal dignity, when England was under the dominion of a king, but they could not believe themſelves obliged to the ſame reſpect ſince the monarchy was changed into a commonwealth. After all, this was by no means the real cauſe of the war. But theſe manifeſtos were neceſſary on both ſides for an intimation to the people, that they were not engaged without neceſſity in extraordinary expence to ſupport a war.

The war being ſufficiently declared, as well by the manifeſtos, as by a battle, Van Trump put to ſea with a fleet of ſeventy ſhips, whilſt Van Gallen ſailed to the Mediterranean to fight the Engliſh there. Trump's deſign was to engage admiral Aſcough who lay in the Downs with part of the Engliſh fleet. But, while he was waiting an opportunity, admiral Blake with forty ſhips ſailed to the northward, to attack the herring fleet, and their convoy[m], Trump being informed of it, follows and overtakes him near Newcaſtle. But while he was preparing for the fight, a furious tempeſt ſo diſperſed his fleet, that he returned to Holland but with forty ſail. The reſt that eſcaped ſhipwreck, arrived not at the Texel till ſome weeks after.

About the ſame time, Ruyter convoying a fleet of merchantmen with thirty four ſhips[n], was met by ſir George Aſcough, and a furious engagement enſued, which was bravely fought on both ſides, till Aſcough at laſt was forced to retire to Plymouth, and leave Ruyter free paſſage to convoy his fleet into Holland.

Mean while, the Engliſh putting to ſea with a formidable fleet, made themſelves maſters of the channel, the Dutch not daring to appear. During that time, a conſiderable number of Dutch veſſels returning to Holland, without being informed of the war, fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and amongſt others, a fleet of forty ſail from Portugal, and ſix India ſhips richly laden.

Whereupon the Dutch, not to expoſe their merchants to greater loſſes, gave notice to the merchantment, homeward bound, to ſail to the iſle of Rhé, where a fleet ſhould be ready to convoy them. Purſuant to this project, Trump left the Goree in November, with ſeventy men of war, and ſix fire ſhips, and met Blake, who expected him in the channel. The fight laſted from eight in the morning till night, when part of the Engliſh fleet returned to the Downs, and part into the Thames. A wound received by Blake having thrown his fleet into ſome diſorder, he could not hinder Trump from purſuing his courſe [o].

[i] The refuſal of ſtriking the flag, and the broadſide given by Trump to Blake, ſeems to put it out of all doubt, that the Dutch were the aggreſſors. Though Rapin takes this account from lord Clarendon, yet either himſelf, or the French tranſlator has ſo mangled this paſſage, that I thought beſt to inſert it, as it is in the author he quotes.

Since the death of Charles I, the duke of Glouceſter, his third ſon, had been confined in the iſle of Wight, and educated as a private gentleman, they who had the charge of his education, being expreſsly commanded to ſhew him no reſpect, that might put him in mind of being a king's ſon. At laſt, the parliament reſolved to ſend them out of the kingdom, for which purpoſe he was conducted to Dunkirk, from whence he viſited his ſiſter the princeſs of Orange at Breda, and then repaired to the king his brother at Paris.

In February, Blake again put to ſea with a fleet of eighty ſail, being aſſiſted, at his own requeſt, with Monk and Dean, newly arrived from Scotland for that purpoſe. The intention of the three admirals was to fall upon Trump in his return from the iſle of Rhé, with three hundred merchant ſhips, he was to convoy to Holland. The ſtates being informed of the great preparations in England, had equipped twenty ſhips to join their admiral in his paſſage, but they were hindered by contrary winds. In the mean time Trump entering the channel, and conducting the merchantmen along the coaſts of France, met the Engliſh fleet, much ſuperior to his own in number of ſhips. But finding himſelf too far advanced to recede, a furious engagement began, which laſted three days, and would have been renewed the fourth, had the ſhips on either ſide been able to ſuſtain a freſh charge. The Dutch loſt in this engagement eighteen men of war, and eight merchantmen [p]. But their hiſtorians pretend, that one and twenty ſhips of the enemy were ſunk, and three ſtranded. Each ſide challenged the victory. However that be, Trump convoyed his three hundred merchantmen into Holland, the eight excepted, which fell into the hands of the Engliſh, After he had ſecured the merchantmen, he engaged the Engliſh four ſeveral times, but not in ſo important a manner.

[1653] Shortly after, the king imagining, he had many friends amongſt the commanders of the Engliſh fleet, offered the ſtates to put himſelf on board their fleet, without any command, except of ſuch Engliſh ſhips as ſhould come and join him. But the ſtates thought not fit to accept his offer. It was conſidered by them as a ſnare, to engage them to declare for him, to which, in their preſent circumſtances, they had no inclination. They wanted peace, and were unwilling to remove or render it impoſſible, by eſpouſing the king's cauſe. They even found a way to convey privately to Lenthal the ſpeaker, a letter from the ſtates of Holland, to propoſe an agreement. Some ſay, this was owing to a private intimation from Cromwell, who began to diſcover, that the peace was now proper for his intereſts. He had the addreſs to obtain from the parliament a civil anſwer to the letter received by Lenthal; but the anſwer was directed to the ſtates general. This drew from the ſtates a letter of the 30th of April, in which it was openly deſired, the parliament would pleaſe to name a place for the treaty.

Cromwell at laſt perceived, the continuation of the war was a contrivance of his enemies, that the expence might render it neceſſary to diſband the army, now become uſeleſs, to which he ſaw the houſe was inclined. This tended manifeſtly to undermine his authority. For though he had excellent qualities, and by his valour and capacity had raiſed the common-wealth to its preſent grandeur, he was, however, ſtill feared. Had he not been ſupported by the army, his ruin had been infallible, the parliament fearing that his credit, already too great, would become ſtill greater, to the prejudice of the common-wealth. Cromwell had even private information, that a conſpiracy was forming againſt him, in which were engaged not only ſeveral preſbyterians and royaliſts, but alſo ſome conſiderable members of the houſe, though of the independent party. Affairs therefore were in ſuch a ſituation, that the parliament was either to be ſubdued, or himſelf ruined. Such a choice does not long amuſe the ambitious. Cromwell, diſpleaſed at a deſign to requite his ſervices with ingratitude, eaſily determined to riſque every thing to make himſelf maſter of the parliament, rather than become their ſlave, who properly owed all their power to him.

The parliament, as I obſerved, was entirely ſupported by the army, and by their means held the nation in ſubjection. But ſince the battles of Dunbar and Worceſter, Cromwell had ſo acquired the eſteem and affection of the officers and ſoldiers, that they ſupported the parliament, only as its intereſts were confounded with thoſe of their general. The leading members perceived it, and therefore had formed the project of diſbanding the army, to ruin Cromwell with the more eaſe. But ſuch a project was not to be long concealed from one of Cromwell's penetration. As ſoon as he diſcovered the deſign of his enemies, he judged, there was no other way to ſupport himſelf, than by withdrawing the confidence of the army from the parliament; after which, it would not be difficult to deſtoy them. This was the very method practiſed by himſelf and the other independents, to ruin the preſbyterian parliament. He therefore cauſed the officers of the army, in a general council, to frame a petition, and preſent it to the parliament; in which they demanded, "The arrears of their pay, that they might not be compelled to take free quarter upon their fellow ſubjects, who already paid ſo great contribution and taxes, which, they were well aſſured, if well managed, would defray all the charges of the war, and of the government."

The parliament, as Cromwell had foreſeen, complained of the inſolence of this petition, and ordered a reprimand to the officers for their preſumption, to intermeddle in affairs which belonged not to them, and to arraign the parliament's management of the treaſury. This drew from the army a ſecond petition, which put the houſe in mind of ſome former profeſſions they had made, That they would be glad to be diſſolved, and that there might be ſucceſſive parliaments, to undergo the ſame trouble they had done. They therefore deſired them to remember, how many years they had ſat, and though they had done great things, yet it was a great injury to the reſt of the nation, to be utterly excluded from bearing any part in the ſervice of their country, by their ingroſſing the whole power into their hands: and thereupon beſought them, that they would ſettle a council of war for the adminiſtration of the government, during the interval, and then diſſolve themſelves, and ſummon a new parliament; which, they told them, would be the moſt popular act they could perform.

This remonſtrance, though intended to exaſperate the parliament, appeared however very juſt in itſelf, and agreeable to the general ſentiment of the nation. This will be evident, when it is conſidered, in what manner the members, which compoſed this parliament, had poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſupreme authority. The violence they had uſed to their colleagues, the late king's tragical death, the change of the monarchy into a common-wealth, and the taxes impoſed on the people for an unneceſſary war, had rendered them odious to the whole kingdom. They were themſelves ſenſible of theſe things; but, beſides that it was very mortifying to them to diveſt themſelves of an authority which had ſo many charms, they had reaſon to fear, that an account would be demanded of their actions. They were therefore unwilling to quit poſſeſſion, and yet, could not avoid ſolemnly deliberating upon the petition, which was of a nature not to be neglected. In this debate, all the members, who were officers in the army, ſtrenuouſly ſupported the petition. The preſbyterians who had been received into the houſe upon their ſwearing to the engagement, were alſo of opinion, that the parliament ought to diſſolve themſelves, ſince it could not be doubted, that it was the nation's deſire. But the negative was carried by a majority of voices. It was therefore reſolved, that it was not yet time to diſſolve the parliament, while affairs were depending that could not be left unfiniſhed, and particularly the important war with Holland. That nevertheleſs, the ſpeaker ſhould iſſue out writs for filling the vacant ſeats in the houſe. At the ſame time, a committee was appointed, ſpeedily to prepare a bill, by which all perſons were forbid to preſent ſuch petitions, under pain of being declared guilty of high treaſon.

This was what Cromwell expected from the parliament. After ſo expreſs a declaration, it could not be doubted, that the members who had ſat more than twelve years, and had but too much abuſed their power, would always retain the ſupreme authority in their hands, under colour of being the repreſentatives of a republic, which properly conſiſted only of themſelves. Cromwell being therefore very certain, the parliament was odious to the people, and not leſs diſagreeable to the army, believed, he owed no farther regard to men, who only ſought his ruin. When things were concerted with the principal officers, he came to the houſe, the 20th of April, with ſome officers and ſoldiers, and without any ceremony, told the members, he was come to put an end to their power of which they had made an ill uſe; and therefore they were immediately to be diſſolved. The officers and ſoldiers entered at the ſame time, and ſtayed at the door till the members walked out. Cromwell, as they came by him, reproached one with drunkenneſs, another with corruption, not ſparing any of thoſe whom he knew to be his enemies. After that he gave the mace to one of his officers, and locked the door [q]. This was an extraordinary action, but no more than was done a few years before by general Fairfax, when he expelled and impriſoned the members, who were diſagreeable to the army.

It cannot yet, however, be affirmed, that Cromwell, by this proceeding, had pulled off the maſk. He might ſtill be thought to have good intentions to the public, ſince he had only delivered the nation from a parliament, which had long held them in ſervitude. And had he, after this, called a free parliament, and ſubmitted to it himſelf, the people would have loaded him with bleſſings. But the ſequel clearly diſcovered, he was only labouring for himſelf [r]. And yet, if it is conſidered that the nation was then divided into three parties, each mortally hating the other two, it is not eaſy to conceive, how a parliament, though ever ſo free, would have been able to ſettle the peace of the nation. It was hardly poſſible to find expedients to content the three parties, whoſe intereſts and principles were ſo oppoſite, as well concerning government as religion. Only force, by giving a ſuperiority to one of the three, was capable of awing the other two. This doubtleſs was conſidered by Cromwell, and therefore he reſolved to model the government after his own way, ſupport his ſettlement by force, and regard not the chimerical project of contenting every man. He ſaw the neceſſity of a ſupreme authority capable of commanding obedience, without which all would run into confuſion, and that this authority was to be ſupported by the army; and doubtleſs, he believed himſelf more capable than any other, to manage the reins of the government. I pretend not here to juſtify all the actions of this great man, whoſe ability was never conteſted; but only to ſhew, that, in this juncture, he could have taken no other courſe, without throwing the ſtate into the moſt terrible confuſion that can be imagined. Since therefore, as matters then ſtood, England was to be governed by force, was it more inconvenient to ſee the nation ruled by the greateſt general and ſtateſman the kingdom had for many years produced, than by a parliament, independent or preſbyterian, or by a king intoxicated with arbitrary power? The people had made trial of theſe three ſeveral governments, and found them inſupportable. A fourth therefore was to be tried, things being in ſuch a ſtate, that it was neither poſſible nor proper to ſubmit to any of the other three. This ſuppoſed, it is not to be denied, that Cromwell was more capable to govern this great State, than any other man then in England. No objection could be raiſed againſt him, which might not, with more juſtice, have been urged againſt any other man who ſhould have ſeized the government, or any body of men inveſted with the ſupreme power. If, on certain occaſions, he abuſed his authority; if, in his actions, he had only a view to his own glory and intereſt, that is what I pretend not to vindicate. It is however certain, that things have been greatly aggravated, and ſome of his actions miſrepreſented, which with diſintereſted and unprejudiced perſons, are capable of being eaſily juſtified. All the difficulty concerning this affair, lies in the ſuppoſition made by each of the three parties, that their ſcheme of government was the beſt and moſt perfect. But as Cromwell diſregarded all the three ſchemes, he was equally exclaimed againſt by the three parties. The independents, fond of their democracy, which was, however, but an empty name, were enraged at him, for overturning a building which he himſelf had erected. The preſbyterians could have wiſhed, he would have reſtored the parliament to the ſtate it was in, at the beginning of the year 1648, when they were maſters; and could not forgive him, for not taking that courſe, which, in their opinion, was the moſt natural. The cavaliers or royaliſts were well pleaſed that Cromwell had diſſolved the independent, without reſtoring the preſbyterian, parliament. But to ſatisfy them, he muſt have reſtored the king to his throne, and the church of England to all her rights. The reader is left to judge, whether, in the preſent ſituation of affairs in England, what the three parties deſired, was either juſt, proper, or practicable. It is no wonder therefore, if theſe three parties were equally diſpleaſed with Cromwell's proceedings, and loaded him with invectives.

A little after, Cromwell publiſhed a declaration to juſtify the diſſolution of the parliament, and as his deſigns were not yet manifeſted, this declaration was ſubſcribed by the colonels of the army, and all the ſea-captains, and met with a general approbation.

The parliament being diſſolved, the ſovereign power was neceſſarily to be lodged ſome where. Cromwell might have taken the adminiſtration of the government, by the ſame authority that he had diſmiſſed the parliament. But he had no deſign to uſurp it ſo notoriouſly. He had contrived, that it ſhould be given him by a parliament, in order to dazzle the eyes of the public with ſo venerable an authority. The council of officers, who had preſented the petition to the parliament, being ſtill aſſembled, Cromwell cauſed them to reſolve, that a hundred forty-four perſons ſhould be intruſted with the ſupreme power. In the choice of theſe perſons, Cromwell at once diſplayed his abilities, and diſcovered, that he had ſome ſecret deſign, which, would at a proper ſeaſon manifeſt itſelf. They were all men of no birth, illiterate, with no particular merit, unexperienced in affairs, in a word utterly incapable of an employ of that conſequence [s]. Cromwell eaſily foreſaw, they would ſoon be weary, and forced to put the government into his hands, and ſo furniſh him with a pretence to aſſume it to himſelf. This notable choice being made, he writ to each in particular, to require them to aſſemble at Whitehall the 4th of July in order to take upon them the adminiſtration of the government [t].

Theſe new ſovereigns meeting on the day appointed, Cromwell made a ſpeech, and when it was ended, gave them an inſtrument ſigned by himſelf and the principal officers of the army, by which the ſupreme power was lodged in their hands. This inſtrument imported, that all theſe members, or any forty of them, were to be held and acknowledged the ſupreme authority of the nation, to whom all perſons were to yield obedience and ſubjection till the 3d day of November, in the year 1654, that is, during one year and four months. That three months before their diſſolution, they were to make choice of other perſons to ſucceed them, whoſe authority ſhould not exceed one year, and then they likewiſe were to provide and take care for a like ſucceſſion in the government. But it will preſently appear, that Cromwell did not intend, this regulation ſhould be exactly obſerved. Theſe members, thus empowered, made no ſcruple to call themſelves a parliament, and choſe one Rouſe [u] for their ſpeaker. The whole nation was ſurpriſed to find themſelves under the dominion of ſuch men, moſt of whom were artificers, or retail merchants [w]. Amongſt theſe members was one Barebone a leather-ſeller, who in his neighbourhood paſſed for a notable ſpeaker, becauſe he uſed to entertain them with long harangues upon [q] Whitelock, who was preſent, ſays, Cromwell led into the houſe a file of muſqueteers with him, and in a furious tone bid the ſpeaker leave his chair, and told the houſe, "They had ſat long enough, unleſs they had done more good; that ſome of them were whore-maſters, (looking toward Henry Martin, and ſir Peter Wentworth,) others of them were drunkards, and ſome corrupt and unjuſt men, and ſcandalous in the profeſſion of the goſpel; and that it was not fit they ſhould ſit any longer, and deſired them to go away." Whereupon, among all the parliament-men of whom many wore ſwords, and would ſometimes talk big, not one offered to draw againſt Cromwell, but all tamely departed the houſe. He bid one of his ſoldiers "Take away that fool's bauble the Mace." Whitelock, p. 554.

[r] It is probable, he had formed the deſign of invading the government, juſt after the battle of Worceſter. For he had a meeting at the ſpeaker's with ſeveral members of parliament, and principal officers of the army, to conſider of the ſettlement of the nation. The ſoldiers were for a republick, the lawyers for a mixed monarchy, and many for the duke of Gloceſter to be made king; but Cromwell ſtill put off that debate. And it is thought, his deſign in that conference, was only to ſound thoſe great men, that he might manage accordingly. See Whitelock, p. 516.

the times. From this man the people, in deriſion, called them Barebone's parliament[x]. I ſhall leave this ridiculous aſſembly for a moment, which did nothing worth remembering, to reſume the recital of the war and the affairs between England and the united Provinces.

The letter writ by the ſtates-general to the parliament the 20th of April, the day on which the parliament was diſſolved, was referred to the council of ſtate, eſtabliſhed by Cromwell and his officers till the new parliament ſhould aſſemble. This council, under the direction of Cromwell, gave a favourable anſwer to the ſtates, with hopes of peace, upon ſending plenipotentiaries to London.

The Engliſh affairs were then in a ſtate of uncertainty, of which it was difficult to foreſee what would be the event. Cromwell had, by his ſole authority, diſſolved the parliament, and named a council of ſtate which governed the kingdom, with no other right than what was derived from the officers. It was therefore not very proper for the ſtates either to treat of or conclude a peace with men ſo little authorized. But the provinces of Holland and Zealand, the greateſt ſufferers by the war, wiſhed to end it at any rate. At laſt, after great conteſts, the ſtates general named four embaſſadors to negotiate a peace at London.

Whilſt their inſtructions were preparing, the fleets of England and the ſtates met the 2d of June, and came to an engagement, which was renewed the next day. In this laſt engagement, Trump fighting with great diſadvantage, was obliged to retire in diſorder, having loſt many ſhips, which were ſunk or taken by the Engliſh[y].

After this battle, the Engliſh fleet being reinforced to the number of a hundred ſhips, ſaw itſelf, ſome time, miſtreſs of the ſea, and gave frequent alarms to the coaſts of Holland. At laſt, Trump having repaired his fleet as much as poſſible, though it was inferior to the Engliſh both in the number and largeneſs of the ſhips[z], attacked the enemy's fleet again near the Texel. The fight laſted from morning to night without any conſiderable advantage to either ſide. It was renewed the next day with the ſame fury, Trump being reinforced with twenty-ſeven ſhips, nor did this ſecond day decide the victory. The third day opened with a freſh engagement, in which Trump was killed by a muſket ball. But vice-admiral de Witzen continued the fight, till the two fleets, as if by conſent, retired to their own coaſts, unable to fight any longer. The loſs on both ſides was very conſiderable [a], and neither could juſtly boaſt of the victory; but the loſs of admiral Trump was irreparable to Holland.

Cromwell took care ſpeedily to repair the Engliſh fleet, in hopes of receiving ſome advantage from the conſternation cauſed by the death of Trump, the loſs of ſo many ſhips, and the diviſion then reigning amongſt the United Provinces. But a violent ſtorm ſo damaged his fleet, that he was under a neceſſity of either making a peace, or loading the people with new taxes, which, in his preſent ſituation, was very improper. He liſtened therefore to the propoſitions of the ſtates, and the whole following winter was ſpent in the negotiation.

Barebone's parliament did nothing conſiderable in a ſeſſion of more than five months[b]. nor was it called for that purpoſe. At laſt, the 12th of December, the ſpeaker, with a good number of the members, who knew Cromwell's intentions, being aſſembled ſooner than uſual, one of them roſe up and ſaid, that they were unequal to the burden laid upon them, and therefore propoſed a diſſolution of themſelves, and a reſignation of the ſovereign authority into the hands from whom it was received. This propoſal met with a ready and unanimous approbation. Then the ſpeaker and all the preſent members, without waiting for thoſe who were not yet come, left their ſeats, and went directly to Cromwell and the council of officers: To whom they declared, that they found themſelves incapable of the truſt repoſed in them, reſigned the inſtrument they had received, and beſought them to take care of the government. Thus Cromwell and his council of officers were once more inveſted with the ſupreme power, by that parliament on which themſelves had conferred their pretended authority. It is manifeſt, this had been reſolved from the calling of the parliament, in order to derive a parliamentary authority to thoſe, who had by their own power diſſolved the former parliament. This artifice was ſo groſs, that Cromwell's belief to impoſe upon the people, is amazing. But an abſurdity is ſwallowed by means of an irreſiſtible power.

Two days after, the council of officers, by virtue of the authority lately given them by the parliament, declared, that for the future the government of the republic ſhould reſide in a ſingle perſon, namely, Oliver Cromwell, captain general of the forces of England, Scotland and Ireland, who ſhould have the title of protector of the three kingdoms, and be aſſiſted by a council of twenty-one perſons.

The 16th of December the council of officers ſent for the commiſſioners of the great ſeal, with the lord mayor and aldermen of London, and informing them that Cromwell was made protector, cauſed to be read in their preſence a writing called the inſtrument of government, the ſubſtance whereof was: I. A parliament to be called every three years by the protector. II. The firſt to aſſemble on the 3d of September 1654. III. No parliament to be diſſolved till they have ſat five months. IV. Such bills as are offered to the protector by the parliament, if not confirmed by him in twenty days, to be laws without him. V. That his council ſhould not exceed the number of one and twenty, nor be leſs than thirteen[c]. VI. That immediately after the death of Cromwell, the council ſhall chuſe another protector before they riſe. VII. That no protector after the preſent ſhall be general of an army. VIII. The protector ſhall have power to make war and peace. IX. That the protector and his council may make laws, which ſhall be binding to the ſubject, during the intervals of parliament. After the reading of this inſtrument, Cromwell took an oath to obſerve it to the utmoſt of his power. Then he was conducted to Whitehall with great ceremony, Lambert carrying the ſword of ſtate before him, and from that time the title of highneſs and lord protector was given him. Immediately after, he was proclaimed as ſuch at London, and then in the three kingdoms, which formed but one commonwealth. The city of London invited him to a ſplendid entertainment, where the ſolemnity of his reception was ſuch as had been at any time performed to the king.

Thus Cromwell, whoſe birth ſeemed to have placed him at an infinite diſtance from ſovereignty, found means to be inveſted with the ſupreme power. When the proceedings of the long parliament againſt the late king, the methods uſed to effect his ruin, their obſtinate refuſal of peace without the abolition of epiſcopacy and reduction of the regal power, the policy of the independents in concealing themſelves many years among the preſbyterians, and in not diſcovering themſelves, till the king was unable to hurt them, their artifices to gain the army, their tyranny againſt the preſbyterians and the king himſelf, and laſtly, Cromwell's early adherence to that party, (when theſe things I ſay) are conſidered, one is apt to believe, the project of his advancement was formed from the beginning of the long parliament, and that the ſubſequent tranſactions flowed ſolely from that project. Accordingly this is inſinuated by ſome, their aim being to ſhew, that Charles I. was perſecuted only to render that project the more practicable. But when it is conſidered, on the other hand, that it was almoſt impoſſible for Cromwell to have any ſuch views, at a time when he had but little credit, and was ſcarce known in the parliament; that his reputation increaſed by a ſeries of contingent events entirely out of his power, and by battles which he might have loſt, it is difficult to believe he could have formed ſuch a deſign before his victory at Worceſter. He had, very probably, even before that battle, his own advancement in view, but not to the ſupreme power. There were in his party men of too great a penetration not to diſcover ſuch a deſign, had it been entertained by him. But as they thought not of his ruin till after that victory, very likely, his deſigns were not ſooner perceived, and that it was only from that time, or perhaps not ſo early, that he began to ruminate on his grand project. For being then general, he had leſs way to go, than if he had formed the deſign while he was but lieutenant-general[d].

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XXII.

PART II.

OLIVER CROMWELL Protector.

[1654] THE peace be tween England and the United Provinces was at laſt concluded, and the treaty ſigned the 5th of April 1654. By the treaty Cromwell made great advantage of the neceſſity the ſtates were under to make peace. They could not obtain it without promiſing to pay large ſums for the damages done to the Engliſh thirty years ſince [b]. They conſented to ſtrike to the ſhips of the common-wealth, as they had before done to thoſe of the king. They entirely abandoned the intereſt of Charles II. and obliged themſelves to receive no exile from England into their dominions. They promiſed to reſtore to the Engliſh twenty-two merchant ſhips confiſcated by the king of Denmark, or to pay their full value. In this treaty I find no mention of the Navigation act, which had been the cauſe of the war [c]. It is likely, either that article was adjuſted in a private and particular treaty, or the ſtates were contented with a bare promiſe, that they ſhould not be diſturbed on account of that act. Laſtly, by a ſeparate article the ſtates bound themſelves never to admit the young prince of Orange to be their Stadtholder, general, or admiral. But this article was ratified only by the province of Holland, the other provinces refuſing it, and Cromwell not judging it proper to continue the war to force them to it. Thus ended a war which had been very warm on both ſides, and inexpreſſibly deſtructive to both nations. It is ſaid, the two provinces of Holland and Zealand loſt in it fifteen hundred ſhips, which fell into the hands of the Engliſh. And this very war, which had been undertaken to ruin Cromwell, ſerved to advance him, as it obliged him to diſſolve the parliament for his own preſervation.

Though the new protector met with a general ſubmiſſion, it was however with pretty open complaints of his uſurping the ſupreme power by a pretended title conferred on him by men without authority. The royaliſts conſidered Cromwell's advancement as a mortal wound to the king. The preſbyterians were not much more pleaſed with it: for though their government ſtill ſubſiſted in the church, they could hardly endure the liberty of conſcience enjoyed by all the proteſtants. Beſides, they were excluded from the beſt poſts, which it was Cromwell's care to fill with men of approved fidelity to himſelf. The preſbyterians were nevertheleſs careſſed by him, becauſe their aſſiſtance was needful to accompliſh his project of being confirmed in his dignity by a free parliament, where he foreſaw they would have conſiderable influence. But he hated the cavaliers, and kept them very low. This occaſioned many conſpiracies againſt him, the authors of which were rigorouſly puniſhed [d], particularly Mr. Vowell and Mr. Gerard [e], the firſt of whom was hanged in London, and the other beheaded in the Tower.

At the ſame time, and upon the ſame ſcaffold, Don Pantaleon Sa, knight of Malta, and brother of the Portugueſe embaſſador, loſt his head. That gentleman having quarrelled with the ſame Mr. Gerard on the New Exchange, returned next day with a ſtrong retinue. Unhappily, he fingled out a man in the crowd whom he miſtook for Gerard, and entering into a new quarrel, killed him, and others were wounded by his ſervants; after which, he retired to his brother the embaſſador's. This tumult drew the people together, who ſurrounded the embaſſador's houſe, and threatened to drag the criminals to juſtice. Cromwell being informed of it, diſpatched an officer, with ſome ſoldiers, to demand the murderers. The embaſſador loudly complained of the inſult offered him, and demanded an audience of the protector, but was refuſed, and told, that if the criminals were not delivered, the people would not be eaſily appeaſed, nor could the protector anſwer for the conſequences: that as a man had been killed, and ſeveral wounded, juſtice muſt be ſatisfied. In the mean time, the people continued their noiſe and menaces; ſo that the embaſſador, ſeeing himſelf too weak to reſiſt, was at laſt forced to deliver up his brother, and the reſt that were concerned, in expectation of afterwards obtaining their pardon. But Cromwell continuing inflexible, the Portugueſe gentleman was beheaded in the Tower, and his accomplices hanged at Tyburn. I pretend not to decide, whether this act of juſtice could be done, without a violation of the privilege of embaſſadors, or whether Cromwell had not done better, in conniving at the priſoner's eſcape. I ſhall only ſhew very briefly, that the preſent juncture was not favourable to the embaſſador or the king his maſter.

Don John IV. king of Portugal, formerly duke of Braganza, had, in 1640, ſeized the crown of Portugal, pretending, it was unjuſtly wreſted from his anceſtors by Philip II. of Spain. This had engaged him in a fierce war with Spain, during which Charles I. had, in a treaty ſigned at York, the 22d of May 1642, owned him for king of Portugal. Thus the two crowns of England and Portugal were in peace and alliance, before the war between Charles and the parliament was declared. Upon this foundation, the two princes palatine, Rupert and Maurice, the firſt of which commanded the king's navy, being obliged in 1650, to leave Ireland, where they could no longer continue in ſafety, ſailed into the river of Liſbon, They were no ſooner there, than a fleet from the parliament arrived in the mouth of the Tagus, and immediately the admiral required of the king of Portugal the delivery of the ſhips commanded by prince Rupert, ſaying, they belonged to the commonwealth of England. This demand extremely embarraſſed the king. He had made an alliance with the king of England; but on the other hand England was the king's enemy, and in that juncture, Don John was under a neceſſity of declaring for one or the other. Policy required a declaration for the parliament, but honour and hoſpitality demanded a protection for the king's ſhips, which were come for refuge to Portugal. This queſtion was warmly debated in his council. The majority adviſed him to relinquiſh a king, expelled his dominions, who could do him neither good nor hurt, and thereby gain the friendſhip of a powerful commonwealth, from which he might expect great aſſiſtance againſt Spain: whereas, in declaring againſt the parliament, he would perhaps engage himſelf in freſh difficulties, at a time when all his forces were hardly ſufficient to reſiſt his enemies. But the king, by his reaſons and authority, cauſed it to be decided, that the king of England's ſhips ſhould be protected. Purſuant to this reſolution, a ſquadron was immediately equipped of thirteen men of war, to join prince Rupert's. The two ſquadrons ſailed together with deſign to fight the Engliſh, if they were between the two capes [f]. For the Portugueſe ſquadron had orders to ſail no further, that it might appear the king intended only to ſecure the entrance of the Tagus. Upon notice of this junction, the Engliſh admiral ſailed away. But to be revenged for the protection granted to prince Rupert's, he fell upon a Portugueſe fleet, returning from Brazil, and took fifteen ſhips. The approach of winter obliging him to return to England, the two princes palatine ſailed to America, after cauſing a ſort of a rupture between England and Portugal. To adjuſt this difference, the king of Portugal had ſent to London the conde de Panaguaio; his circumſtances, during a war with Spain which had now laſted thirteen years, not ſuffering him to remain in a ſtate of hoſtility with the commonwealth of England. Probably, for the ſame reaſon he did not think proper to recall his embaſſador, after the execution of Don Pantaleon Sa. I do not know whether this accident did not retard the peace between England and Portugal, which was not ſigned till two years after in 1656[g].

Since Charles II's arrival in France, after his miraculous eſcape from the battle of Worceſter, he had lived in extreme want, not having wherewithal to ſubſiſt. The court of France took no notice of his neceſſities, whether in complaiſance to Cromwell, or from a deſire of making a ſtrict alliance with him, or through dread of his declaring in favour of Spain. So, the king was in a melancholy ſtate. He had even the mortification to ſee Monſieur de Bourdeaux, who till then had been his reſident in England, appointed embaſſador by the French court[h], upon Cromwell's being declared protector. This alteration convinced the king, that France deſigned an alliance with Cromwell, and he did not doubt but the treaty would be followed with a requeſt to him to depart the kingdom. Wherefore, to prevent this compliment, he let cardinal Mazarin know, that he intended to withdraw, which was welcome news to the cardinal. To facilitate the execution of this deſign, the cardinal promiſed him the arrears of a penſion of ſix thouſand livres a month, which had been granted him, but never regularly paid, and the continuance of the ſame, as long as he ſhould be out of France. At the ſame time, the king received another ſmall relief which enabled him to diſcharge his debts. Prince Rupert arrived ſafely at Nantes with the fleet, after having loſt his brother Maurice in a ſtorm. Beſides that the ſhips were extremely damaged, and the king unable to repair them, he was in great want of money, which determined him to ſell the ſhips, with the ordnance and tackling. Cardinal Mazarin was the purchaſer, though at a very cheap rate, if we may believe the lord Clarendon, and paid him the money without delay. After that, prince Rupert repaired to Paris, and taking leave of the king, withdrew into Germany. The king, as ſoon as he had received the money, left Paris, and choſe Cologne for his retreat, where he continued many years.

The king, before his departure from France, ſent Wilmot, now earl of Rocheſter, embaſſador to the emperor, and ſome other princes of Germany, to procure a ſupply of money. He even applied to the pope, by the mediation of cardinal de Retz, and it is pretended, that in order to ſucceed, the cardinal prevailed with him to change his religion, and privately received his abjuration. At leaſt, dr. Burnet, in the hiſtory of his own times, aſſures, that the king embraced the catholic religion before he left France, where he returned no more, after the time I am ſpeaking of. But others, who think themſelves better informed, aſſign this change of his religion to the year 1659.

While the king was in this ſtate of adverſity, Cromwell was honoured, reſpected, and feared by all the powers of Europe, who equally courted him. In England, his enemies durſt not look up; Scotland was entirely ſubdued, and Ireland reduced to the laſt extremity. But before I return to the affairs of England, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate what paſſed in Ireland and Scotland, to midſummer 1654.

Since Cromwell had left Ireland in 1650, Ireton his ſon-in-law, who commanded there as his deputy, treated the Iriſh rebels, who fell into his hands, with great ſeverity, the parliament having ordered no mercy to be ſhewn to the maſſacrers. But this was not capable to lead the Iriſh to an union with the marquis of Ormond. On the contrary, a religious zeal prevailing among them, by the perſuaſions of their monks and clergy, they could not bear to be under a proteſtant commander. Nay, they conſpired againſt the life of the marquis, and in an inſurrection at Limerick, raiſed by a monk, he was in danger of being killed. At laſt, the Iriſh biſhops, in a full aſſembly, publiſhed a declaration, proteſting, they would have no communion with heretics, nor obey the marquis of Ormond. Then, they required him to reſign his command to a catholic, on whom they could better rely. The marquis being thus expoſed to the ſuſpicions and treacherous deſigns of the Iriſh, and utterly unable to reſtore the king's affairs, made the marquis of Clanrickard his deputy, and retired into France, from whence, afterwards, he accompanied the king to Cologne.

Ireton dying of the plague in 1651, the parliament gave the command of their forces in Ireland to lieutenant-general Edmund Ludlow, a great republican, and one of Charles the firſt's judges.

The Iriſh were not more obedient to Clanrickard than to Ormond. The catholic Clergy, and all Ulſter, refuſed to have any ſociety with the Engliſh, under the command of the marquis, though a catholic. It was ſufficient that he had received his commiſſion from a proteſtant, to render him odious. A certain number of men were therefore choſen to form a council for the adminiſtration of their affairs. This council judged it expedient to call to their aſſiſtance a foreign catholic prince, who might be capable to conduct them, and put him in poſſeſſion of the government of their iſland. They caſt their eyes on the duke of Lorrain, then at Bruſſels, and reſolved to ſend deputies to treat with him. This reſolution being taken, they demanded of the marquis of Clanrickard a commiſſion for the deputies, fearing, they would be ill received, if not authorized by the king's governor in Ireland. But the marquis refuſed to give ſuch a commiſſion, till he knew the king's pleaſure. This refuſal inflamed their animoſities againſt him. He was exclaimed againſt with great bitterneſs, and their deputies were ſent notwithſtanding his oppoſition[i]. The duke of Lorrain judged it not proper to engage in ſuch an undertaking, without better information of ſome particulars, which it concerned him to know. He ſent a certain abbot into Ireland, who having learned, that the affairs of the Iriſh were almoſt deſperate, and this reſolution taken without the conſent of the king's lieutenant, refuſed to treat with them. The Iriſh, enraged with the marquis of Clanrickard for oppoſing their deſign, perſecuted him ſeveral ways, and at laſt, treated with Ludlow, by means of a certain monk, without the marquis's privity, who ſeeing himſelf unable to ſerve the king, informed him of what paſſed, and deſired leave to retire. The king readily granted his requeſt, as ſeeing no way to ſave Ireland, and left the Iriſh to their own meaſures, whoſe affairs from that time daily grew worſe.

It was then, and in the following years, that the Iriſh, wholly unable to reſiſt the parliament forces, were expoſed to the utmoſt ſeverity of the Engliſh commanders. The barbarity they had exerciſed upon the Engliſh proteſtants, ſettled in Ireland, was juſtly retaliated upon them. Many were executed, and others, to the number of a hundred thouſand, moſt of whom periſhed with hunger and miſery, had leave to go into the ſervice of foreign princes. The families which remained in the country, were for the moſt part removed into Connaught, where ſome lands were aſſigned them for their ſubſiſtence, while the reſt was delivered to the adventurers, who advanced money for the Iriſh war. Part alſo of theſe confiſcated lands was given to the officers and ſoldiers in payment of their arrears, and part was ſold to the beſt bidders. From that time, the nation has been kept ſo low, that there is no appearance of its ever recovering. In 1654, Fleetwood, who had married Ireton's widow, Cromwell's daughter, was made governor of Ireland, and two years after, was ſucceeded by Henry Cromwell, younger ſon of the protector.

Though Scotland was ſubdued, it was not entirely free from diſturbances. The general aſſemblies of the kirk had been ſuppreſſed by Cromwell, knowing, that from thence flowed all the troubles which had been for ſo many years in Scotland. Beſides, as it was his intention to introduce in that kingdom a liberty of conſcience as well as in England, he knew, it would be impoſſible to execute his deſign ſo long as theſe aſſemblies ſubſiſted. The people of Scotland were enraged at a liberty ſo contrary to their covenant, and the maxims of the kirk. They ſufficiently diſcovered their ſentiments, though to no purpoſe, ſince they had neither places, nor forces, nor arms, nor leaders, to enable them to attempt a deliverance. On the other hand, ſome lords and gentlemen of the king's party ſtill kept in the high-lands, with troops under the command of the earl of Glencarn. But theſe troops, neither well armed nor diſciplined, were defeated by colonel Morgan[k]. Neverthelefs, with the remains of their troops, they ſtill kept in ſome inacceſſible places, where it was impoſſible to attack them. But at laſt, diſcord ariſing among them, they were forced to ſend to the king for colonel Middleton and obtained his conſent. On Middleton's arrival, Glencarn quitted them, and made his own peace. Middleton ſupported the remains of this party about a year, and then was obliged to forſake it, ſeeing it was not poſſible to do the king any notable ſervice in that country. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

As, by the inſtrument of government, a parliament was to aſſemble the 3d of September, Cromwell called one for that day. But in his writs for election of members, there was a ſtrict order not to elect any perſons, or their ſons, who had borne arms for the king; and this was punctually obeyed. A new regulation was likewiſe made to proportion the number of repreſentatives to the largeneſs of the boroughs and counties, and to their reſpective ſhares of the public expences. This regulation, as being very juſt in itſelf, met with univerſal approbation[l].

The parliament being aſſembled, Cromwell made a ſpeech in the Painted Chamber, where the houſe waited on him. He briefly touched upon the diſorders of the preceding government, and endeavoured to juſtify the preſent eſtabliſhment. After an aſſurance of his good intentions, he repreſented to them his ſervices for the nation, ſince the diſſolution of the long parliament, and told them, he had called a free parliament, agreeably to the deſire of all good Engliſhmen: adding, that he did not ſpeak to them as one that would be a lord over them, but as one that would be a fellow ſervant, in the great affair of ſettling the government.

Cromwell hoped, this parliament, free indeed, excepting the excluſion of the royaliſts, who could not have been admitted with ſafety, would confirm his protectoral dignity, and that the confirmation of a free parliament, would ſtop the mouths of his enemies. Upon his own recommendation, Lenthal, ſpeaker of the long parliament, was choſen again to that poſt. It appeared very ſoon, that the parliament had many members who were enemies of tyranny, and having ſerved in the long parliament, had imbibed maxims very contrary to thoſe eſtabliſhed by Cromwell. The firſt thing propoſed, was to examine by what authority they were aſſembled; a queſtion unexpected by Cromwell. In all appearance, his enemies deſigned to give him a mortal blow, by a deciſion that his authority was imaginary and illegal, as indeed it was. Perhaps too, the parliament intended to ſeize the ſovereign power, though convened by an unlawful authority. Cromwell himſelf had given them an inſtance of what could be done with the aſſiſtance of force. But as he had friends, as well as enemies, in the houſe, he found means to make them loſe time, by the oppoſition they met with, from the officers and others who eſpouſed his intereſt, whether through friendſhip or fear. So though he could not hinder the frequent debates on this queſtion, he gave his enemies cauſe to apprehend, that they ſhould not carry it, when it came to be decided. At laſt, perceiving they only waited a favourable opportunity to put the queſtion, he ſent for the members to meet him in the painted chamber. Though in his firſt ſpeech he told them, that he would only be their fellow ſervant, in this he ſpoke as their lord, and told them they were too free in calling an eſtabliſhed government into queſtion, from which themſelves had derived their authority, ſince if they were not lawfully convened, they had no power to debate. At their return to the houſe they found a guard at the door, refuſing entrance to any perſon, who would not firſt ſign an engagement in theſe words——"I A. B. do hereby freely promiſe and engage myſelf, to be true and faithful to the lord protector, and to the common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and ſhall not (according to the tenor of the indenture, whereby I am returned to ſerve in this preſent parliament) propoſe or give any conſent to alter the government, as it is ſettled in one ſingle perſon and a parliament." Many refuſing to ſign this engagement, were excluded from the houſe[m].

Notwithſtanding all this, the members themſelves, who had ſigned the engagement, were not more tractable, and ceaſed not to ſhew their ill will to Cromwell. They had only ſigned to have it in their power to deſtroy him, when a favourable occaſion offered, which they hoped would not be long. [1654-5] A plot was formed chiefly by the cavaliers, but with the privity of many members of parliament, to raiſe an army in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. Cromwell being informed of it by his ſpies, prevented the deſign of his enemies, by a diſſolution of the parliament eleven days before the time fixed for its continuance, by the inſtrument of government[n], namely, on the 22d of January. At the diſſolution he told the members, he was not ignorant of their projects, and that ſeveral were engaged in a conſpiracy againſt the government[o].

It was not without foundation that he mentioned a conſpiracy, which was now ready to open. Though he was not informed of all the particulars, he knew, however, in general, that an inſurrection was intended in ſeveral places, and had the names of ſome that were to be the principal actors. Two days after the diſſolution of the parliament, major Wildman was arreſted by his order, and a declaration was found in his houſe, containing the reaſons which obliged the Engliſh to take up arms againſt Cromwell[p]. Some others, as well republicans as royaliſts, were alſo apprehended.

Since the king's retreat to Cologne, he had received frequent expreſſes from his friends, informing him of the general diſlike of Cromwell's government, and of the favourable opportunity for a general riſing. What they ſaid concerning the general diſcontent, was very true. But they built upon a falſe principle, which had often deceived Charles I. and now likewiſe deceived them. They imagined, that all who were diſpleaſed with the government, were diſpoſed to ſerve the king, and reſtore him without any condition. Indeed, the preſbyterians would have gladly reſtored the king, provided it was on the terms granted by the king his father in the treaty of Newport, that is, with the limitation of the royal power, and the eſtabliſhment of the preſbyterian government in the church. But it was not likely, Charles II, being at liberty, would grant the ſame conditions as were accepted by Charles I. under confinement. On the other hand, it is alſo true, that in general, the independents, anabaptiſts, and in a word, all the zealous republicans, were enemies of Cromwell ſince his ſeizing the government, and that in the army itſelf there was a ſtrong party againſt him. But nothing was farther from theſe men's thoughts, than the king's reſtoration, and yet the royaliſts imagined, all Cromwell's enemies would ſtrive to reſtore the king to the throne, as if there was no poſſibility of being enemy to the protector, without being devoted to the king. Upon this foundation it was, that they formed the project of an inſurrection in the weſt, and of another in the north, not doubting of the army's joining, or at leaſt ſuffering the cavaliers to act undiſturbed againſt Cromwell. This project was communicated to the king, who approved of it as well as of the day appointed for the execution, namely the 18th of April. The king diſpatched the neceſſary commiſſions, and privately came into Zealand to be ready to paſs into England if the undertaking ſhould be crowned with ſucceſs. At the ſame time, Wilmot earl of Rocheſter repaired ſecretly to London[q], with ſir Joſeph

[l] By the ninth and 10th articles of the inſtrument of government (which ſee in Whitelock, p. 552.) It was provided, that the perſons to be choſen in England and Wales, ſhould not exceed four hundred. Thoſe for Scotland and Ireland (for the three kingdoms united in one commonwealth, and the iſles of Jerſey and Guernſey were alſo included) were to be thirty for each kingdom. Then the perſons to be choſen in England and Wales were to be in a certain proportion there ſet down at large. A proportion, which it would have been well for England, had it been always obſerved, the little inſignificant boroughs being omitted, and the number of the knights of the ſhire increaſed from four to twelve, according to the extent of the county. This (ſays the lord Clarendon) was then generally looked upon as an alteration fit to be more warrantably made, and in a better time. Tom. III. p. 387.

Wagſtaff, who had been major-general in the army of the late king. At London their friends were conſulted, and it was reſolved, Wagſtaff ſhould conduct the inſurrection which was to be in the weſt, and the earl of Rocheſter that in the north [r].

[1655] On the day appointed, Wagſtaff came within two miles of Saliſbury, where he found Penruddock, a Corniſh gentleman, Jones, Grove, and ſome others, who had aſſembled about two hundred horſe. With this ſmall force, they entered Saliſbury without any oppoſition. For as it was then the time of the aſſizes, little notice was taken of thoſe who entered the city. The market place was immediately ſeized, and all the ſtables locked up, that the horſes might be at their devotion. After this, the judges were ſeized, with the ſheriff, and were in great danger of being hanged for their refuſal to proclaim the king, who notwithſtanding was proclaimed. But ſoon after, the conſpirators perceiving, that the inhabitants remained in their houſes, without offering to join them, they were diſcouraged, and leaving the town, took the weſtern rout. A troop of horſe, accidentally quartered in the neighbourhood, purſued and inſpired them with ſuch terror, that at their approach, they laid down their arms. Wagſtaff fortunately eſcaped, but Penruddock, Grove and Jones were taken. The two firſt were beheaded, and the other hanged [s]. Notwithſtanding the great hopes conceived by the royaliſts of a general riſing throughout the kingdom, the people no where attempted to favour the enterpriſe. It is impoſſible to know what would have been the behaviour of the army, ſince there was no neceſſity of their being aſſembled, this affair being ended in two or three days. One may here remark, what commonly happens on theſe occaſions, namely, that the contrivers of ſuch projects, keeping company for the moſt part with only men of their own party, are apt to believe the whole nation to be in the ſentiments of thoſe with whom they converſe, wherein they are frequently miſtaken. This was, as it were, the peculiar weakneſs of the royaliſts, of which the earl of Clarendon's hiſtory furniſhes various inſtances.

The inſurrection in the north vaniſhed before it was begun to be executed. The earl of Rocheſter repaired to the county of York, where he found ſome gentlemen zealous for the king's ſervice. But after an inquiry into what they could perform, he thought it not proper to make any attempt, but returned to the king with an account of what had paſſed.

The king, having loſt the hopes he had been made to conceive, returned to Cologne. Soon after his arrival, it was diſcovered, that one of his domeſtics, named Manning, lately come from England, held a ſecret correſpondence with Thurlo, Cromwell's ſecretary, and acquainted him with the tranſactions of the king's court. He was apprehended and ſhot to death in a caſtle belonging to the duke of Newburg. It is now time to ſpeak of Cromwell's affairs with France and Spain.

In the reign of Charles I. cardinal Richelieu, as hath been ſaid, was concerned in the troubles of Scotland in the year 1637, from which thoſe of England were afterwards produced. The court of France all along ſeemed to eſpouſe the intereſt of Charles I. during his life, but never gave him any real aſſiſtance. Cardinal Richelieu believed, that nothing could more advance his project of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, than to prevent England from aſſiſting Spain, in order to preſerve the balance of Europe, as the intereſt of England required. For this reaſon, that able miniſter, inſtead of aſſiſting Charles I. thought only of fomenting the troubles of England. Cardinal Mazarin his ſucceſſor, under the minority of Lewis XIV. followed the ſame maxim, and never gave any real aſſiſtance to Charles. But it may be ſaid, he carried this policy too far, ſince inſtead of keeping the balance even between the king and the parliament, he gave the parliament room to acquire a ſuperiority, which might become very prejudicial to France. After the death of Charles I. the common-wealth of England grew ſo powerful, that it was too late to endeavour to weaken it, eſpecially as France was then engaged in a war with Spain. If France had aſſiſted Charles II. ſhe would have run the riſk of ſeeing the parliament in alliance with Spain, which in that juncture was not to be hazarded. For this reaſon, the intereſts of Charles II. were entirely abandoned by France, and all his aſſiſtance from thence was a penſion too inconſiderable for his ſubſiſtence. And even this was privately, leſt the parliament ſhould be jealous. The Engliſh feared her ſo little, that in 1652, their fleet made no ſcruple to attack that of France, ſent to the relief of Dunkirk beſieged by the Spaniards, and taken by them the ſame year. Notwithſtanding that affront, France ſent an embaſſador to the parliament to deſire their friendſhip. Cromwell, when advanced to the protectorate, held, for ſome time, the two crowns of France and Spain in ſuſpence, equally flattering both kingdoms with hopes of the friendſhip of England. But it appeared afterwards, he only intended to amuſe Spain, being reſolved to make an alliance with France.

Spain had given no more aſſiſtance to Charles I. than France. On the contrary, Don Alenzo de Cardenas, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, had ſhewn a partiality for the parliament, which was conſidered by Charles as a ſort of declaration againſt him. After the death of Charles I. the king of Spain paid great regard to the parliament, and gave them no juſt cauſe to make war upon him. All that England could reproach him with, was his receiving, though very coldly, in 1649, lord Cottington, and Mr. Hyde as embaſſadors from Charles II. but without entering with them into any negotiation, that might create jealouſy in the parliament. The ſole deſign of this embaſſy was, to procure ſome money from the Spaniſh court for the king's ſubſiſtence, in which the embaſſadors were unſucceſsful. The murder of Aſcham, the parliament's envoy at Madrid, by ſome Iriſh, and the little zeal ſhewn by the court of Spain to puniſh the murderers, might be another cauſe of complaint. But things of this nature are liable to ſo many diſcuſſions, that it is difficult to know, whether it was in the king of Spain's power to give the parliament an entire ſatisfaction. However that be, theſe cauſes of complaint did not ſeem of ſufficient weight to breed a war between the two nations. Nevertheleſs, Cromwell, now made protector, had no ſooner concluded a peace with Holland, than he reſolved to attack Spain. The grounds of this war are not eaſy to be gueſſed [t], but what may be conjectured is this: Cromwell, as I obſerved, intended to be confirmed by a parliament, in his protectoral dignity received only from the officers of the army. It concerned him therefore firſt, to render ſome ſignal ſervice to the ſtate, in order to make his uſurpation paſs the more peaceably. Secondly, as Spain was then upon the decline, he believed perhaps, it would be eaſy to make ſome conqueſt upon that crown, which might render his protectorate famous, and ſhew the Engliſh that if he ſought to advance himſelf, it was in order to be more ſerviceable to the republic. Thirdly, it is likely, Mazarin was concerned in this reſolution, in order to give a powerful diverſion to Spain.

However this be, Cromwell on his advancement to the protectorſhip, ſent out two fleets, one under the command of Blake, to the Mediterranean to chaſtiſe the Algerines, who frequently took Engliſh veſſels, and the other under Penn, with thirty ſhips, and about five thouſand land ſoldiers commanded by Venables [u]. The two laſt commanders had ſealed orders from Cromwell, which were to be opened at a prefixed time [w]. This fleet ſailed from Portſmouth the 27th of December, and arrived at Barbadoes the 28th of January, from whence they ſailed again the 30th of March 1655. By the ſealed orders, the two commanders were to proceed to Hiſpaniola and take St. Domingo the capital of the iſland. Cromwell's inſtructions for this undertaking were ſo particular and circumſtantial, that they appeared to be drawn by men thoroughly acquainted with the country [x]. At the approach of the Engliſh fleet the Spaniards abandoned St. Domingo. But Venables, inſtead of landing his troops [y], according to his inſtructions, within a mile of the place, diſembarked them at a much greater diſtance [z]. This gave the inhabitants time to come to themſelves, return to the town, and put it in a poſture of defence. The Engliſh, when they approached Domingo, were ſo fatigued, by a long march, by the exceſſive heat, by hunger and thirſt, that they were eaſily repulſed, and forced to retire to their ſhips, leaving many dead and wounded in the iſland.

This attempt miſcarrying, the Engliſh fleet ſailed to Jamaica, and ſeized the iſland with little oppoſition. Some troops were left there, which were afterwards re-inforced by Cromwell, in order to preſerve this conqueſt, where the Engliſh have ſince eſtabliſhed a rich colony. Venables was ſent to the Tower on his return to London, but ſoon diſcharged. The war being ſufficiently declared by this attempt which the Spaniards had no cauſe to expect, the king of Spain ordered the effects of the Engliſh merchants in all his dominions to be ſeized, which was a very conſiderable loſs to them. Nor did the miſchief ſtop there; for by this war ſo unjuſtly undertaken, the Engliſh forfeited the Spaniſh trade, which transferred to the Dutch, helped them to repair the loſſes ſuſtained in the laſt war.

The war with Spain was ſoon followed by a peace with France, proclaimed at London the 23d of October. This peace was eaſily made, ſince France was willing to forget the injury received from the Engliſh in 1652. The point was only to renew the ancient treaties, to which there was no obſtacle, after Cromwell's declaration againſt Spain [z].

Beſides the inſurrections and conſpiracies from the cavaliers and preſbyterians, Cromwell was alſo in danger from the malecontents of his own party, who had effectually ſerved him, without knowing what were his deſigns, but who were extremely provoked at their having been tools to his private ambition. The republicans were incenſed againſt him. The republican government was as much their idol as the covenant was that of the preſbyterians. So Cromwell by being inveſted with the protectorſhip, had offended them no leſs than the cavaliers and preſbyterians. It was not eaſy to curb three parties, which, if they could have reſolved to unite, would have been ſtrong enough to ruin him. But he knew ſuch an union was very difficult, and yet it was not impoſſible, that particular men of each party, whether openly or privately, might combine for his deſtruction. The army was his only ſupport, in which too there were republicans who hated him mortally, as appears in the memoirs of Ludlow, one of the moſt inveterate againſt him. Nay very likely, if he had been obliged to aſſemble the diſperſed army, and the officers could have communicated their thoughts to one another, they would not have entirely obeyed him. As to the royaliſts, he never wanted pretences to perſecute them, which not only pleaſed the other parties, but was agreeable to their intereſts. As for the preſbyterians, as they were equally enemies of the cavaliers and independents, in keeping them low, he obliged theſe two parties, who knew if the preſbyterians ſhould again be ſuperior, they would treat them no better than Cromwell. But the rigid republicans were his moſt dreaded enemies, becauſe he had no pretence againſt them. They had the more cauſe to complain, and ſpeak freely, as Cromwell, being their head, had made uſe of them, under colour of acting for the public, and brought them to labour for his own private advancement. So, to hold all theſe parties in ſubjection, he divided England into eleven diſtricts, and eſtabliſhed in each, officers, whom he called major-generals, with an almoſt abſolute power, that they might be always ready to prevent or diſperſe inſurrections. In this eſtabliſhment his principal view was to awe the republicans, though the pretence was to curb the cavaliers. Theſe major-generals became true tyrants, and ſo oppreſſed the people, that Cromwell at laſt was forced to reduce their power within much narrower bounds[a].

Though Cromwell's ambition inclined him to ſupport by force the dignity conferred on him, he ſaw the ridiculouſneſs of exerciſing an authority given by men who had no lawful power to beſtow it. He eaſily perceived it to be a fertile ſource of plots and conſpiracies againſt his perſon and government. There was no law by which he could puniſh the conſpirators, ſince his dignity, far from having any ſolid foundation, was a mere uſurpation. On ſuch occaſions therefore it was neceſſary to uſe a tyrannical power, and ſuch violences might produce in the end very ill effects. To remedy this inconvenience, he had called a free parliament in expectation of having his authority confirmed, but was diſappointed. He reſolved therefore, inſtead of a free parliament, to call one, on which he might depend, and to uſe their authority to eſtabliſh his own.

The parliament, according to the natural meaning of the word, is the repreſentative of the nation, whoſe deciſions and laws are looked upon as conformable to the ſentiments of the people in general. The extreme reſpect, veneration, and attachment which the Engliſh have for the parliament, are therefore not to be thought ſtrange, ſince in ſupporting its privileges, they maintain their own liberty. But this ſuppoſes a parliament agreeable to the conſtitution, compoſed of king, lords, and commons, with an entire freedom in the elections. A parliament thus compoſed may truly be called the nation's repreſentative. It is unneceſſary here to obſerve, that artifices, intrigues and cabals have ſometimes altered this happy conſtitution. The frequent inſtances which have occurred in this hiſtory, render it unqueſtionable. We have ſeen parliaments regardleſs of their country's good, and devoted entirely to the will of the prince. By others, kings have been depoſed, and their ſovereigns deprived of their moſt lawful prerogatives. But without being obliged to look ſo far back, it needs only be conſidered, what paſſed in the late reign, particularly ſince December 1648. A parliament reduced by force and violence to leſs than a hundred members, brought the ſovereign to the ſcaffold, aboliſhed the houſe of lords, deſtroyed monarchy, changed the government into a common-wealth, and inveſted themſelves with a ſupreme authority, under the ſpecious pretence of repreſenting the nation, tho' without king and houſe of peers. Nevertheleſs, though the conſtitution of the parliament was entirely ſubverted, and though the name of parliament, one would have thought, ſhould not have deceived the people, that venerable name was ſtill uſed to force them to obedience, on a groundleſs ſuppoſition, that an aſſembly with only the name of parliament was inveſted with all the authority of the moſt legal parliament. Upon this foundation, theſe tyrants claimed a right to enact laws, to ordain, to decree, as the moſt regular parliament might have done. I ſhall not ſtay to ſhew the extravagance of this pretenſion. Very probably, thoſe that claimed it, were not themſelves ſatisfied with it. But as they were deſtitute of all other foundation, they built upon this, though weak and unſecure.

Cromwell's authority was no better ſupported. His uſurpation was ſo viſible, that a man muſt have wilfully ſhut his eyes not to ſee it. He himſelf was ſo convinced of the unlawfulneſs of his power, that he would fain have had it confirmed by a free parliament, being the only way which could furniſh him with a plauſible pretence to exerciſe it. But failing of ſucceſs, he continued where he was, that is, inveſted with the dignity of protector, by men who had no power to confer it. Wherefore, the authority of a parliament appeared to him abſolutely neceſſary to confirm him in his own. But, as he had experienced what was to be expected from a free parliament, he reſolved to call one which might be more at command. [1656] He therefore ſummoned a parliament to meet the 17th of September; but he took ſuch juſt meaſures, that though the people ſeemed to enjoy a perfect freedom in the choice of their repreſentatives, he ſecured a majority of voices. Beſides, he would admit no man into the houſe, who had not firſt promiſed under his hand, to do nothing againſt the eſtabliſhed government. This parliament, compoſed of the repreſentatives of the three kingdoms, met on the day appointed[b]. But above a hundred members refuſing to ſign the engagement, were denied their ſeats in the houſe. The reſt appeared ready to perform Cromwell's deſires. An act was forthwith paſſed, for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart, (for ſo they called the king) which was ſigned by all the members. By another act it was declared high treaſon to attempt the life of the protector. In ſhort, in the ſpace of ſome months, the parliament liberally granted all the money deſired by Cromwell, as well for the maintenance of the army and government, as for the continuation of the war againſt Spain.

Some days before the parliament met, Blake and Mon-

[z] This confederacy was dearly purchaſed on the part of England, for by it the balance of the two crowns of France and Spain was deſtroyed, and a foundation laid for the future greatneſs of the French, to the unſpeakable prejudice of all Europe in general, and of the Engliſh nation in particular, whoſe intereſt it had been hitherto accounted to maintain that equality as near as might be, Ludlow, Tom. II. p. 559.—It is very remarkable, that in this treaty, Cromwell would not allow the French king to call himſelf king of France, but of the French; when he himſelf aſſumed the title of protector of England and France. And, what is more, in the inſtrument of the treaty, Cromwell's name was put before the French king's. Welwood, p. 99.

[a] Bates makes the number of diſtricts to be fourteen. The major-generals were, Kelſey, Goff, Deſborough, Fleetwood, Skippon, Whaley, Butler, Berry, Worſley, Lambert, Berkſtead, who was alſo lieutenant of the Tower. They had all the authority which was before divided among committee-men, juſtices of peace, and other officers. They could commit to priſon all ſuſpected perſons; levied monies; ſequeſtered thoſe who refuſed to pay; had power to liſt horſe and foot upon occaſion; and from them lay no appeal, but to the protector himſelf. Clarendon ſays, there were twelve, tom. III. p. 458.——This year died James Stuart, duke of Richmond, and the learned James Uſher, primate of Armagh.

tague, their admirals, falling in with eight Spaniſh ſhips, returning from the Weſt-Indies richly laden, took two, and ſtranded ſome others. This action was performed near Cadiz, where the Engliſh admirals had long expected that fleet. Cromwell ordered the two prizes to be brought to Portſmouth, and the money and goods to be conveyed in waggons, in a ſort of triumph to London.

[1656-7] In January, a conſpiracy againſt his perſon, was diſcovered by Cromwell, by one Sindercomb, diſcharged out of his guards. This man being convicted, and condemned to die, was found dead in priſon, the day on which he was to be executed[c].

[1657] About two months after, ſome anabaptiſts were diſcovered, who had projected to kill Cromwell. Major-General Harriſon, vice-admiral Lawſon, colonel Rich, major Danvers, and ſome others, all anabaptiſts, on ſuſpicion of being concerned in the conſpiracy, were put under an arreſt.

Since Blake and Montague had taken the two prizes, they had continued cruizing off Cadiz, in expectation of the Spaniſh fleet returning from Peru. As this fleet did not appear, though it ſhould now have been arrived, Blake had notice, it was retired to Teneriff, one of the Canaries, till the Engliſh fleet ſhould be ſailed from Cadiz. Whereupon, he ſtood for the Canaries, the beginning of April, and found there the Spaniſh fleet conſiſting of ſix galleons richly laden, and ten other ſhips of leſs burthen. The commander of this fleet had anchored in the bay of Santa Cruz, and taken all imaginable care to ſecure himſelf againſt an attack. The ten ſmaller ſhips were moored cloſe to the land, and defended by two forts well mounted with guns, and ſeveral batteries erected on the ſhore. But the galleons drawing more water, could not come ſo near the land, but lay farther off, with their broadſides towards the ſea. Blake ſeeing no poſſibility of approaching the ten ſhips, reſolved, notwithſtanding the raſhneſs of the undertaking, to attack the galleons. Accordingly, with a fair wind, he approached the galleons, received their fire and boarded them. The particulars of this engagement are very confuſedly related by the hiſtorians. Thus much, however, is certain, that Blake, after an obſtinate fight, poſſeſſed himſelf of the galleons, and as the wind, which had brought him into the bay, would not ſerve to carry them out, ſet them on fire. Immediately after, a land breeze ariſing, put him ſafe to ſea again. The Spaniards on this occaſion ſuſtained a very great loſs, in ſhips, money, men, and merchandize: but the Engliſh acquired nothing but glory. Blake dying in his return to England, was pompouſly buried by Cromwell, in Henry the VIIth's chapel, among the monuments of the kings[d].

The parliament, which met the 17th of September, continued their ſeſſion without interruption, being employed in the moſt important affair that could ever come under their conſideration. Whether Cromwell had now formed the project of his higher advancement, or the diſpoſition of the houſe in his favour, inſpired him with the thought, he ſuddenly became more popular than ever. He careſſed all parties alike. The preſbyterians were told, he was not far from their ſentiments; the nobility met with great reſpect from him; and he appeared leſs incenſed againſt the king's party. At laſt, after his friends and creatures had been long labouring to diſpoſe men in his favour, Mr. Pack a member of parliament, and one of the city aldermen, propoſed, in direct terms, that he might be inveſted with the title of king. This propoſition was immediately ſeconded by a great many members[e], and it was even obſerved, that his known enemies very readily gave their conſent to it. Theſe imagined, there was no better way to ruin him, and excite plots againſt his life. But for the ſame reaſon, his principal friends oppoſed it with all their power. It is, nevertheleſs, very probable, he was privy to this propoſal, though he thought not fit to tell it to Deſborough his brother-in-law, or Fleetwood his ſon-in-law, from whom it met with the greateſt oppoſition. This contraſt, between Cromwell's friends, held thoſe in ſuſpence, who only intended to make their court to him, and cauſed them to be irreſolute. Wherefore the propoſal was debated in the houſe two days ſucceſſively. In all appearance, the irreſolute were informed, in this interval, what they were to do. However that be, it was at laſt carried by a majority of voices, that the crown ſhould be offered to Cromwell. Purſuant to this reſolution, the houſe immediately appointed a committee, to acquaint his highneſs with what had been reſolved for the public good. He ſeemed ſurprized at the offer, and told the committee, he thought it very ſtrange, the parliament ſhould entertain ſuch a deſign: That he did not believe it proper for them to offer, nor would his conſcience give him leave to accept it. The committee expecting this anſwer, replied, they did not queſtion but he would grant their deſire, when he ſhould be informed of the reaſons which had induced the parliament to take this reſolution, and which they beſought him only to hear. Whereupon, he appointed a day to hear what they had to ſay to him[f].

The committee[g], on the day appointed, entertained him with long diſcourſes, concerning the reaſons on which the parliament founded their requeſt, of which the principal were: "that the people of England had for many ages been accuſtomed to the government of kings: that in changing this government, there had neceſſarily been an abolition of many laws, cuſtoms, and formalities, and an eſtabliſhment of others, which would never be endured by the people on account of their novelty: that according to the laws of England, there could be no ſecurity to any act concerning the government, without the intervention and authority of a king: that hitherto thoſe concerned in the war, and the late changes, could not be ſafe, but would remain liable to dangerous inquiſitions, agreeable to the laws of the land: that the daily conſpiracies againſt the preſent government, clearly ſhewed, the people were inclined to a king, nor would be ſatisfied without one: in a word, that the kingdom would never be in peace, till things were brought back to their antient channel. That it was very true, the royal family had been rejected on account of their tyrannies; but this was no objection to the choice of a king of another family, nor could any kingdom be produced, where the like had not happened, as well as in England."

Theſe ſame reaſons had been alleged in the debates in the houſe, and were anſwered by the republicans to this effect: "that an oath had been taken to be faithful to the commonwealth without a king; and to make a new king, was returning to Egypt. Where was the neceſſity of recurring to kings, ſince it was agreed, they invaded the rights of the ſubject? that it was advantageous that all the ſubjects ſhould be equally liable to be called to an account, that they might be more united amongſt themſelves. That if a king was at laſt neceſſary, they would chuſe rather to have the true heir to the crown." Cromwell was not unacquainted with the reaſons alleged on both ſides in the houſe, and therefore to ſhew, he would neither accept nor refuſe the offer without deliberation, he appointed the 8th of May for his final anſwer.

It is pretended, that in this interval, he was in the utmoſt diſtraction, not knowing what to determine. His ambition prompted him to accept the offered crown, the whole intrigue probably being directed by himſelf. But the diſpoſition of his relations and principal friends made him tremble. For how could he promiſe himſelf allegiance from ſtrangers, when he ſaw his own moſt intimate friends determined to abandon him? Nay, it is ſaid, ſome of them threatened to kill him, and that he was informed of a plot to aſſaſſinate him, the moment he accepted the crown. The very day he was to give his anſwer, Deſborough and Fleetwood, walking with him in St. James's Park, told him, if he accepted the crown, they could ſerve him no longer. He was diſcouraged by all theſe things, at the very inſtant the crown was going to be placed on his head. His anſwer therefore to the committee was, that he could not accept the government under the title of a king[h]. Whether this refuſal was for or againſt his intereſt, is a problem that admits of great diſpute. For my part, I believe, that being ſo able a politician, he did not think the advantages equal to the inconveniences, of accepting the crown.

[c] He was tried at the upper-bench-bar. The court declared, "that by the common law, to compaſs or imagine the death of the chief magiſtrate, by what name ſoever he was called, whether lord protector, or otherwiſe, is high treaſon, and that the ſtatute 25 Edward III. was only declaratory of the common law." Whitelock, p. 655.

[d] He was (ſays Whitelock) a man of much gallantry and ſincerity as any of his time, and as ſucceſsful.

[e] Particularly by Charles Boyle lord Broghill, chief juſtice Glynn, &c Life of Cromwell, p. 363.

[f] Whitelock's account is thus: the parliament had been long about the ſettling of the nation, and had framed a writing, which they ſtiled the humble petition and advice of the parliament of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to his highneſs. The firſt buſineſs of it was, for the protector to have the title of king. This petition and advice was preſented to his highneſs by the houſe, and he deſired that a committee might be appointed to confer with him about it: which was named, and Whitelock one of the committee was made chairman. When the committee attended his highneſs, Whitelock ſpake to him upon the title of king, giving reaſons why he ſhould accept of it. The Protector urged his reaſons againſt it, and Whitelock replied. The whole debate is in print. Whitelock, p. 655.

Nevertheleſs, to reward in ſome meaſure ſo great a moderation, the parliament confirmed his dignity of protector, with more power than was annexed to it by the council of officers. This was done by a ſolemn inſtrument, called the humble petition and advice [i], the parliament thereby ſhewing it was not a law to be impoſed on him but an advice, which was ſubmitted to his judgment and diſcretion, with freedom to accept or refuſe it, as he ſhould think proper. The ſubſtance of it was:

"That his highneſs Oliver Cromwell ſhould, under the title of protector, be pleaſed to execute the office of chief magiſtrate, over England, Scotland and Ireland, and the territories and the dominions thereunto belonging, and to govern according to all things in that petition and advice. And alſo that he would in his life time appoint the perſon that ſhould ſucceed him in the government: that he would call a parliament conſiſting of two houſes once in a year [k], at fartheſt: that thoſe perſons who are legally choſen by a free election of the people to ſerve in parliament, may not be excluded from doing their duties, but by conſent of that houſe whereof they are members: that none but thoſe under the qualifications therein mentioned, ſhould be capable to ſerve as members in parliament: that the power of the other houſe be limited as therein is preſcribed: that the laws and ſtatutes of the land be obſerved and kept; no laws altered, ſuſpended, abrogated, or repealed, but by new laws made by act of parliament: that the yearly ſum of a million of pounds ſterling be ſettled for the maintenance of the navy and army; and three hundred thouſand pounds for the ſupport of the government; beſides other temporary ſupplies as the commons in parliament ſhall ſee the neceſſities of the nation to require: that the number of the protector's council ſhall not exceed one and twenty, whereof ſeven ſhall be a quorum [l]. The chief officers of the ſtate, as chancellors, keepers of the great ſeal, &c. to be approved by parliament: that his highneſs would encourage a godly miniſtry in theſe nations; and that ſuch as do revile and diſturb them in the worſhip of God, may be puniſhed according to law; and where laws are defective, new ones to be made: that the proteſtant chriſtian religion, as it is contained in the Old and New Teſtament, be aſſerted and held forth for the publick profeſſion of theſe nations, and no other; and that a confeſſion of faith be agreed upon, recommended to the people of theſe nations; and none to be permitted, by words, or writing, to revile or reproach the ſaid confeſſion of faith."

The general terms in which the three laſt articles concerning religion are expreſſed, plainly ſhew, that the intention of the parliament, or rather of Cromwell who directed them, was, to oblige equally the preſbyterians and independents. The firſt, by ſupporting the miniſtry, upon the preſent eſtabliſhment, and the others, by introducing into religion, a latitude which left every man free to believe and practiſe as he pleaſed, and both parties, by equally flattering them with a confeſſion of faith, in which each party ſhould find their account. The epiſcopalians alone could not expect any advantage.

Cromwell having ſolemnly ſworn the punctual obſervation of theſe articles, appointed the 26th of June for the day of his inauguration, which was performed with great pomp [m]. He was, doubtleſs, of opinion, that this ſecond inauguration was neceſſary to ſupply the defects of the firſt, which had been made without any lawful authority. This done, the houſe adjourned to the 20th of January 1657-8.

Since the renewal of the antient treaties between France and England, another negotiation was begun for a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Spain. This negotiation ſet on foot by the embaſſador of France in 1656, at London, was concluded at Paris the 13th of March 1657, by a treaty of league, importing, that Cromwell ſhould join ſix thouſand men with the French army; that Mardyke and Dunkirk ſhould be beſieged, and when taken, delivered to the Engliſh.

King Charles being informed of this negotiation, ſent a truſty meſſenger to archduke Leopold, ſtill governor of the Low Countries, to offer a league with Spain. The king's deſign was to give himſelf ſome reputation by a league with that crown; and, beſides, he wiſhed to reſide in the Low Countries in order to be nearer England, in caſe his preſence there ſhould be neceſſary. The archduke accepted the propoſal, believing, if the king of England was attached to Spain, he would have credit enough to draw the Iriſh forces from the French, into the Spaniſh ſervice. This was all the advantage Spain could expect from a junction with a prince, who had properly nothing to offer. Beſides he was to be ſubſiſted, when he ſhould be deſerted by France. However this be, the king and the archduke concluded a treaty, by which the king's reſidence at Bruges was only to be connived at by Spain, which was little able to maintain him according to his dignity. Spain was moreover to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men, as ſoon as he ſhould be poſſeſſed of ſome good port in England. The king, ſatisfied with theſe conditions, becauſe he had nothing to offer to procure better, ſigned the treaty which was ratified by the king of Spain. With the ratification, Philip ſettled upon the king a monthly penſion of ſix thouſand guilders, and another of three thouſand upon the duke of Gloceſter, who had been ſent for out of France by his brother the king, where his mother was perſuading him to change his religion. So, the king left Cologne in April 1657, and retired to Bruges, at the ſame time that archduke Leopold reſigned the government of the Low Countries to Don John of Auſtria, natural ſon of Philip IV. Afterwards the king prevailed with the lord Muſkerry, colonel of an Iriſh regiment in the ſervice of France, to deſert that ſervice, and join the Spaniſh army with his regiment. He alſo found means to cauſe four regiments of Engliſh, Scots and Iriſh, to come in ſingle companies, and offer him their ſervice. Theſe regi, ments, though not in very good order, ſerved in the Spaniſh army.

As ſoon as the treaty of league between France and England was ſigned, cardinal Mazarin ſignified to the duke of York, that he was to retire out of the dominions of France. All the Engliſh of the king's party, in the ſervice of France, had the ſame orders, and amongſt the reſt the lord Digby, now become earl of Briſtol upon the death of his father, and a convert to the catholic religion. All theſe Engliſh, diſmiſſed from France, retired into the Low Countries, ſome to their king, and the reſt to Don John of Auſtria, to ſeek employment in his army.

In conſequence of the league, Cromwell ſent ſix thouſand men of his beſt troops into France under the command of Reynolds, who had concluded the treaty at Paris in quality of his embaſſador. In this campaign, the French took ſeveral places from the Spaniards, and amongſt the reſt Mardyke which was delivered to the Engliſh. Reynolds was unhappily drowned in his return to England, and was ſucceeded in the command of the Engliſh forces in the ſervice of France, by Lockhart a Scotchman and embaſſador to that crown.

As by the 2d article of the humble petition and advice, the protector was every year to ſummon a parliament conſiſting of two houſes, Cromwell reſolved to obſerve that article, which had been inſerted in the inſtrument by his ſole direction. He therefore choſe a certain number at his own pleaſure, to compoſe the other houſe. Moſt of theſe were officers, or other perſons devoted to him, to whom he added ſome of the antient peers: but they refuſed to take their ſeats with theſe men [o]. This choice being made, he iſſued out writs for their meeting in parliament, in a ſeparate houſe, the 20th of January 1657-8. His intention was to have this houſe conſidered as a houſe of peers, and inveſted with the ſame privileges, the peers had formerly enjoyed. He durſt not however give it that name, but contented himſelf with calling it the other houſe, till a more proper name could be given it [p].

[l] This expreſſion is taken from the clauſe inſerted in moſt commiſſions, in which, after the number of commiſſioners is fixed, the king appoints ſome particular perſons amongſt them, who are to be preſent to give a validity to all acts done in virtue of the commiſſion, and this he does by ſaying, a quorum eſſe numero volumus, &c. [m] A place being prepared at the upper end of Weſtminſter-hall, in the midſt of it was ſet a rich cloth of ſtate, with a chair of ſtate under it, upon an aſcent of two ſteps. Before it a table and chair for the ſpeaker, and on each ſide of the hall covered ſeats one over another, for the members. About two a-clock his highneſs came, the earl of Warwick carrying the ſword before him (and being the only nobleman that was preſent at that ſolemnity, ſays Ludlow, tom. II. p. 592.) and the lord mayor of London, with the city-ſword. His highneſs ſtanding under the cloth of ſtate, the ſpeaker preſented to him a robe of purple velvet lined with ermines, which ſir T. Widdrington the ſpeaker, aſſiſted by Whitelock, put upon him. Then he delivered to him the bible richly guilt and boſſed; after that he girt on his ſword, and delivered into his hands the ſcepter of maſſy gold, and then made a ſpeech to him, and gave him the oath. After this, the people gave ſeveral ſhouts, and the trumpets ſounded; the protector ſat in the chair of ſtate, holding the ſcepter in his hand; on his right ſide ſat the embaſſador of France, on the left the embaſſador of the United Provinces: near him ſtood his ſon Richard, Fleetwood lord deputy of Ireland, Claypole maſter of the horſe, the council and others of ſtate. The earl of Warwick held the ſword on the right, and the lord mayor the city ſword on the left ſide of the chair. Near the earl of Warwick ſtood viſcount Liſle, general Montague, and Whitelock, each of them with a drawn ſword in their hands. Then the trumpets ſounded, and a herald proclaimed his highneſs's title, and proclamation was made to the people, crying, God ſave the protector. The ceremonies being ended, he went in ſtate to Weſtminſter-hall gate, where he took coach, and went to the houſe, and paſſed ſome bills. Whitelock, p. 662.

Cromwell, as hath been obſerved, had created himſelf many enemies, not only amongſt the royaliſts and preſbyterians, but even among the independents themſelves. Theſe were extremely provoked at his having made uſe of them for his advancement, under colour of labouring with them to eſtabliſh a republican government. The ſequel had ſhewn them, that in ſuppreſſing kingly power, he had never intended to aboliſh the monarchy, ſince under the name of protector, he had ſeized the ſupreme power. They therefore looked upon him as the moſt perfidious of men, and were not leſs his enemies than the preſbyterians and royaliſts. He was ſupported only by the army, filled by himſelf with fanatics and enthuſiaſts who imagined the time was come to erect a fifth monarchy, or the reign of Jeſus Chriſt upon earth. Cromwell was not ignorant, his enemies had deſigned to deſtroy him, on pretence of raiſing him higher, and this had made him refuſe the title of king. It was alſo to break their meaſures, that he had aſked and obtained a power of erecting another houſe, to oppoſe it occaſionally to the houſe of commons, where he knew he had but too many enemies, of which he had cauſe very ſoon to be ſtill more ſenſible.

His enemies having had time to concert their meaſures during the adjournment, took another courſe to deſtroy him when the parliament re-aſſembled. As by the IIId article [q] of the humble petition and advice it was ſaid, the members legally choſen, ſhould not be excluded without the conſent of their houſe, a motion was made to admit all the elected members, who had refuſed to ſign the engagement. This motion was ſo ſuddenly received and approved, that Cromwell had not time to oppoſe it, and he could have done it ſo much the leſs, as it was founded on a ſolemn act, which he had ſworn to obſerve. By this means above a hundred members, republicans and preſbyterians, all enemies to the protector, were admitted into the houſe of commons [r]. From that time, the face of affairs began to change, Cromwell's enemies having gained the ſuperiority in the very houſe which would have made him a king. As they had formed great projects againſt him, their firſt care was to hinder the other houſe, wholly conſiſting of his creatures, from uſing their pretended negative voice to break their meaſures. The authority therefore of the other houſe was called in queſtion, and it was affirmed to be abſurd, that they ſhould have a negative voice, ſince the commons, by whom they were created, never pretended to make peers of men who had no other power than what they voted them. It was added, that therefore it was ſaid in the humble petition and advice, that the power of the other houſe ſhould be limited. Cromwell, perceiving to what all this tended, ſent for the parliament to Whitehall, and in a ſpeech maintained the authority of the other houſe with ſuch vehemence, that the commons fearing an immediate diſſolution, found it neceſſary to acknowledge the other houſe as an eſſential part of the parliament [s].

Notwithſtanding this, the commons took into conſideration the humble petition and advice, and many were of opinion, it was null and void, becauſe it was made when many members were excluded from the parliament, without any lawful cauſe. This manifeſtly tended to a revocation of the act, and withal of the ſubſequent confirmation of Cromwell's protectorſhip. Cromwell was too quickſighted not to ſee how much it concerned his intereſt, not to ſuffer the parliament to ſit any longer. Wherefore he came to the other houſe and ſending for the commons, ſpoke to them in theſe terms:

"I had very comfortable expectations that God would make the meeting of the parliament a bleſſing: and the Lord be my witneſs, I deſire the carrying on the affairs of the nation to theſe ends. The bleſſing which I mean, and which we ever climbed at, was mercy, truth, righteouſneſs, and peace, which I deſire may be improved.

"That which brought me into the capacity I now ſtand in, was the petition and advice given me by you, who, in reference to the antient conſtitution, did draw me to accept of the place of protector. There is not a man living can ſay I ſought it; no, not a man, nor woman treading upon Engliſh ground; but I, contemplating the ſad condition of theſe nations, relieved from an inteſtine war unto a ſix or ſeven years peace, I did think the nations happy therein. But to be petitioned thereunto, and adviſed by you to undertake ſuch a government, a burden too heavy for any creature, and this to be done by the houſe that then had the legiſlative capacity, I did look that the ſame men that made the frame, ſhould make it good unto me: I can ſay in the preſence of God, in compariſon of whom we are but like poor creeping ants upon the earth, I would have been glad to have lived under my wood ſide, to have kept a flock of ſheep, rather than undertook ſuch a government as this is; but undertaking it by the advice and petition of you, I did look that you that had offered it unto me ſhould make it good.

"I did tell you, at a conference concerning it, that I would not undertake it, unleſs there might be ſome other perſon that might interpoſe between me and the houſe of commons, who then had the power to prevent tumultuary and popular ſpirits, and it was granted I ſhould name any other houſe; and I named it of men that ſhall meet you whereſoever you go, and ſhake hands with you, and tell you it is not titles, nor lords, nor party, that they value, but a chriſtian and an Engliſh intereſt, men of your own rank and quality, who will not only be a ballance unto you, but to themſelves, while you love England and religion.

"Having proceeded upon theſe terms, and finding ſuch a ſpirit as is too much predominant, every thing being too high or too low, when virtue, honeſty, piety and juſtice are omitted: I thought I had been doing that which was my duty, and thought it would have ſatisfied you; but if every thing muſt be too high or too low, you are not to be ſatisfied.

"Again, I would not have accepted of the government, unleſs I knew there would be a juſt accord between the governor and the governed, unleſs they would take an oath to make good what the parliament's petition and advice adviſed me unto; upon that I took one oath, and they took another oath upon their part anſwerable to mine; and did not every one know upon what condition they ſwore? God knows, I took it upon condition expreſſed in the government: and I did think we had been upon a foundation, and upon a bottom; and thereupon I thought myſelf bound to take it, and to be adviſed by the two houſes of parliament. We ſtanding unſettled till we were arrived at that; the conſequences would neceſſarily have been confuſion, if that had not been ſettled. Yet there are not conſtituted hereditary lords, nor hereditary kings; the power conſiſting in the two houſes and myſelf. I do not ſay, that the meaning of your oath was to you, that were to go againſt my own principles, to enter upon another man's conſcience: God will judge between me and you: if there had been in you any intention of ſettlement, you would have ſettled upon this baſis, and have offered your judgment and opinion.

thing elſe, but the playing the king of Scots his game, if I may ſo call him; and I think myſelf bound before God, to do what I mean to prevent it. That which I told you in the Banquetting-houſe was true, that there were preparations of force to invade us; God is my witneſs it hath been confirmed to me ſince within a day, that the king of Scots hath an army at the water ſide ready to be ſhipped for England. I have it from thoſe who have been eye-witneſſes of it. And while it is doing, there are endeavours from ſome who are not far from this place, to ſtir up the people of this town into a tumulting: what if I ſaid into a rebellion? and I hope I ſhall make it appear to be no better, if God aſſiſt me; it hath been not only your endeavour to pervert the army, while you have been ſitting, and to draw them to ſtate the queſtion about a common-wealth, but ſome of you have been liſting of perſons by commiſſion from Charles Stewart, to join with any inſurrection that may be made: and what is like to come upon this (the enemy being ready to invade us) but even preſent blood and confuſion? And if this be ſo, as I do aſſign to this cauſe your not aſſenting to what you did invite me to by the petition and advice, as that which might be the ſettlement of the nation, and if this be the end of your ſitting, and this be your carriages, I think it high time that an end be put to your ſitting, and I do diſſolve this parliament: and let God judge between me and you." At which many of the commons cried Amen.

[1658] When the parliament was diſſolved, Cromwell ſuſpecting, or perhaps being informed, that Lambert was one of the principal authors of the plot formed againſt him, diſmiſſed him from all his employments [t]. Fleetwood was recalled from Ireland to ſucceed Lambert in the lieutenant generalſhip, and Henry Cromwell, younger ſon of the protector, was ſent into Ireland in Fleetwood's room. Since Cromwell had been confirmed in the protectorate, he had called his eldeſt ſon Richard to court [u], and made him chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford. He had married his ſecond daughter to the lord Falconbridge, and his third to Mr. Rich, grandſon to the earl of Warwick. His eldeſt had been long ſince married to Mr. Claypole, and a fourth lived unmarried, if I am not miſtaken, till the reign of William III. [w]. Soon after the diſmiſſion of Lambert, Cromwell ſo reduced the authority of the major-generals, that they had no longer the power, as they had before, of oppreſſing the people. In all appearance, they were deeply concerned in the plot to gain the army, mentioned by Cromwell in his ſpeech to the parliament. It is pretended, he meant to make a greater reform in his army, and was reſolved to diſmiſs every perſon of ſuſpected fidelity. But he had not time to execute that project.

It was not without reaſon that Cromwell ſpoke of a conſpiracy forming in England in favour of the king. The royaliſts ever believing, that all who were enemies either of Cromwell's perſon or government, were the king's ſecret friends, built upon that foundation to place him on the throne by the aſſiſtance of his greateſt enemies. This would appear incredible, if they had not given frequent inſtances of their prejudice. The project was, as uſual, to raiſe inſurrections in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in the belief that the king's private friends would not loſe the occaſion of joining thoſe who ſhould be in arms. The principal managers of this plot were John Mordaunt brother of the earl of Peterborough, ſir Henry Slingſby a rich and popular man in the county of York, and Dr. Hewet a miniſter of the church of England. This plot had been repreſented to the king in ſo advantageous a manner, by reaſon of the general diſcontent under the preſent government, that he conceived hopes of ſucceſs. And therefore he had himſelf made ſome preparations in the Low Countries, and the four regiments raiſed by him, and after the miſcarriage of the deſign, added to the Spaniſh army, were intended for his ſervice. He had moreover ſent commiſſions into England, for thoſe who would engage in his intereſt. One of theſe commiſſions to raiſe a regiment of horſe had been granted to Mr. Stapley, whoſe father had been Cromwell's great friend, and one of the king's judges. Cromwell, upon ſome intimation, ſent for Stapley, and artfully drew from him a confeſſion of whatever he knew, and that he had received his commiſſion from Mr. Mordaunt. He alſo told him, the marquis of Ormond had been at London, and ſtaid there three weeks to concert meaſures with the conſpirators, and give them his directions; which was true. The earl of Clarendon intimates, the marquis had not found things in England ripe for the execution of what was intended, and yet the great number of commiſſions ſhew, that the court had a better opinion of the undertaking. However this be, the marquis had the good fortune to leave England, and return to the king, before Cromwell knew he had been there. Immediately after the diſſolution of the parliament, Mordaunt, Slingſby and Hewet were committed to the Tower, and many of their accomplices, were apprehended in all parts of the kingdom. After which, Cromwell erected a high court of juſtice [x] for trial of the criminals, and eſpecially of the three principal. Mr. Mordaunt eſcaped death by means of his wife, who bribed ſome of the judges, and prevailed with colonel Mallory [y], one of the two witneſſes againſt her huſband, to make his eſcape. Sir Henry Slingſby and Dr. Hewet were condemned and executed [z]. Before the ſame court were tried, condemned, hanged, and quartered for the ſame crime, Aſhton, Stacy, and Battely. Some others were condemned, and pardoned by Cromwell, not to multiply any more the number of his enemies. It is certain he had a great many, and that thoſe who had been moſt attached to him while he was believed to be in their views, hated him mortally, when they found themſelves deceived.

The earl of Clarendon relates on this occaſion a long addreſs to the king, from ſeveral independents, quakers and anabaptiſts, brought him by a young gentleman [a], wherein they ſuppoſed the death of Cromwell to be near, which ſeemed to intimate a deſign to aſſaſſinate him. To this addreſs were annexed ſome conditions required of the king, with which certainly he could not comply. Wherefore he contented himſelf with returning a general anſwer, that he did not intend to perſecute or trouble any for their opinions, if their actions were peaceable, and that they might hope for his favour, if he received ſervice from them; by which he ſeemed to encourage them to execute their deſign. It is certain, theſe men abhorred Cromwell, but depended too much on their own ſtrength, and filled their heads with chimerical deſigns. After all, though their projects ſhould have ſucceeded, the king would have received no advantage, their principles being ſo oppoſite to his. Probably, their intention was to make uſe of the king to accompliſh their aim, but not to place him on the throne in the manner he deſired, accordingly this project came to nothing.

In June, this year, marſhal Turenne, general of the French army, beſieged Dunkirk, contrary to the opinion of Don John of Auſtria, who expected that he would have opened the campaign with the ſiege of Cambray. As this belief had made him neglect to provide for the defence of Dunkirk, he was forced to hazard a battle to ſave that place, which was not in a condition to make a long reſiſtance. But this battle proved fatal to the Spaniards, who were entirely defeated [b], and the ſiege was continued by Turenne, who made himſelf maſter of Dunkirk the 26th of June. The town, in purſuance of the Treaty with England, was ſurrendered to Cromwell, who placed a ſtrong garriſon in it, and made Lockhart the governor [c].

Cromwell had for ſome time, appeared more uneaſy and Bridget had two huſbands, Ireton and Fleetwood; and Elizabeth (whom Rapin by miſtake ſays lived unmarried) was wife to Claypole. The lady Falconbridge lived to extreme old age.

He was for trying the conſpirators in the ordinary courſe of common law; but, ſays he, his highneſs was too much in love with the new way, which he thought to be more effectual, and would the more terrify the offenders. Mem. p. 673.

[y] He had been truſted by Mr. Mordaunt in the buſineſs of Suſſex, and apprehended about the ſame time with Stapley. He was an illiterate but ſenſible man, of no family, and at firſt only a common ſoldier in Cromwell's troops. The perſon that brought the addreſs, was, the lord Clarendon ſays, a young gentleman of an honourable extraction. Clarendon, tom. III. p. 488, 489.

fearful than ever. This is not very ſtrange, ſince he had informations from divers parts, of a deſign to aſſaſſinate him, by ſome of his former moſt zealous adherents. This cauſed him to uſe new precautions, as not to lie two nights together in the ſame chamber, nor appear in public without a ſtrong guard. But all theſe precautions to avoid a violent, could not ſecure him from a natural death. In Auguſt, this year, he was ſeized with a fever at Hampton-court, which at firſt had no dangerous ſymptoms, but his diſtemper daily increaſing, he was removed to Whitehall, where, after nominating his eldeſt ſon Richard for his ſucceſſor, he expired in the 60th year of his age, on the 3d of September, on which day he had gained the two great battles, of Dunbar in 1650, and of Worceſter in 1651 [d].

Cromwell's family was originally of Glamorganſhire in Wales, and called Williams, one of which marrying a ſiſter of Cromwell, vicar-general in the reign of Henry VIII. aſſumed the name of Cromwell, and tranſmitted it to his poſterity. Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntington, April 25, 1599. His education had nothing extraordinary [e]. nor is it known how he ſpent his time before he arrived at the age of thirty-five years, when he began ſeriouſly to reform his manners and lead a very regular life, without indulging himſelf in any indecent or ill action. Probably he then, if not ſooner, engaged in the preſbyterian party [f]. The reputation he had acquired of an honeſt man and good chriſtian, and doubtleſs his principles concerning the government, were the cauſe of his being returned for the town of Crambridge, to the parliament which met the 3d of November 1640 [g]. He ſat two years without being diſtinguiſhed, not having a genius for ſpeaking to place him upon a level with ſome of the members of that parliament. His delivery was ungraceful, and his ſpeeches prolix and confuſed. It was, probably, in theſe two years that he was gained by the independents, and liſted in their party, though concealed under the name of rigid preſbyterians. Agreeable to the views and intereſts of that party, Cromwell affected an extraordinary zeal for preſbyterianiſm, and the liberty of the nation againſt the uſurpations of the court, in which he followed the directions of the then leading members of the houſe, So, when the civil war began in 1642, he had a poſt in the army, as a man entirely devoted to the houſe of commons, of which he was a member. He was at firſt a major of horſe, and though he was two and forty years old before he had drawn a ſword, he was ſo diſtinguiſhed by his valour in that office, that he had ſoon after a regiment given him. There was not in the army an officer that faced danger with more intrepidity, or that more ardently ſought occaſions to ſignalize himſelf. His reputation increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he became major-general, then lieutenant-general under Fairfax, and at laſt his ſucceſſor. His great talents for war gave him occaſion to ſhew that he had no leſs genius for civil affairs. He entered into the deepeſt deſigns of his party, and at laſt became one of the principal leaders, advancing here with the ſame rapidity as in the army. It was he, who accuſing the earl of Mancheſter of not having done his duty in the ſecond battle of Newbury, broke the ice, and gave occaſion to the new model of the army, which was the firſt ſtep to the triumph of the independents. From that time, he was looked upon as the chief of the independent party, and, properly as general of the army, Fairfax acting only as directed by Cromwell. I ſhall no farther inſiſt upon what has been related at large, but only obſerve, that the troops believed themſelves invincible under his command, and that he was never once forced to turn his back. The victory gained over prince Rupert at Marſton Moor, was chiefly aſcribed to his valour. The reduction of Ireland in leſs than a year, greatly increaſed his fame, and the battles of Dunbar and Worceſter carried it to the higheſt degree.

Let us now view him in his government after he was protector. If his government be compared with thoſe of the two laſt kings, there will appear a very great diſparity with regard to the glory and reputation of the Engliſh nation. James I. and Charles I. ſeemed to have ſtudied to diſgrace the Engliſh name, whereas Cromwell, in the ſpace of four or five years carried the glory of his nation as far as poſſible, and in that reſpect was not inferior to Elizabeth [h]. He made himſelf equally dreaded by France and Spain, and the United Provinces. Theſe three ſtates courted his alliance and friendſhip with ſuch ardour, that they may be ſaid to cringe to him beyond what was becoming. Charles Guſtavus, king of Sweden, thought himſelf honoured in being his ally and particular friend. His greateſt enemies cannot help praiſing him on this account.

As for his morals and conduct, as a private perſon, they may be ſaid to have been very regular. He was guilty of none of the vices to which men are commonly addicted. Gluttony, drunkenneſs, gaming, luxury, avarice, were vices with which he was never reproached. On the contrary, it is certain, he prompted virtuous men: as, on the other hand, he was inflexible in his puniſhments of vice and ill actions. It is true, his own preſervation obliged him ſometimes to employ men of ill principles, but this is not uncommon to thoſe, who are at the head of a government.

Though, as to his religion, he was an independent, his principle was to leave every man at liberty in the religion he had choſen, and never perſecuted any perſon on that account. He even connived at the private meetings of thoſe, who remained attached to the church of England, though he was well informed of them. If they were not favoured with the free and publick exerciſe of their religion, it was becauſe they were conſidered by him as royaliſts, always ready to form plots in the king's favour, and from whom, conſequently, he had great reaſon to ſecure himſelf. Though he was in the ſentiments of the independents, and therefore averſe to all union with the national church, he however conſidered all proteſtant churches, as part of the proteſtant church in general; and without aiming to eſtabliſh independency and fanaticiſm by force and violence, he expreſſed, on all occaſions, an extreme zeal for the proteſtant religion. Dr. Burnet, in the hiſtory of his own times, ſays, that if Cromwell had accepted the title of king, he intended to eſtabliſh a council, in imitation of the congregation de propagandâ fide at Rome, to have an eye to what paſſed all over the world, with regard to the intereſts of the proteſtant religion. He adds, that a fund was to have been ſettled upon this council of ten thouſand pounds a year, for ordinary emergencies, beſides a ſalary of five hundred pounds apiece to four ſecretaries.

It may alſo be added, to Cromwell's honour, that never man was better acquainted with the inward ſprings of human actions, though he ſeemed not to have made it his particular ſtudy. Never man had more addreſs to manage people, and lead them to his ends, nor more natural capacity for affairs, which had received no aſſiſtance from learning; for he ſcarce remembered the little Latin he brought from ſchool; in a word, never man choſe at once his moſt advantageous courſe with more judgment, or executed a deſign with more vigour and readineſs. Such, in ſhort, were the virtues and ſhining qualities of Cromwell; but we muſt not conceal the faults and imperfections with which he is charged.

This charge turns ſolely upon three points. The firſt, that through a boundleſs ambition, he ſeized a government to which he had no right. The ſecond, that he maintained himſelf in his poſt, by an exceſſive diſſimulation. The third, that he put to death many of his private enemies, without any regard to laws immemorially practiſed in England. Upon theſe three articles I ſhall offer ſome conſiderations to the reader, to aſſiſt him in forming a juſt idea of Cromwell's character.

Upon the firſt, it muſt be conſidered, that though the royaliſt authors traduce Cromwell's memory as much as poſſible, and though in particular, the action by which he was poſſeſſed of the government, is the principal foundation of all their complaints, it is certain, the king was no way intereſted in the change it produced. It was not Charles II. but a republican parliament, that was deprived of the ſupreme power by Cromwell. Though he had been ſubjected to this parliament; though he had miſcarried, and himſelf been ruined by his ambition, the king's affairs would have received no advantage, ſince the parliament was not leſs his enemy than Cromwell. Of what therefore do they complain with reſpect to the king? It muſt be one of theſe two things, [d] Whitelock ſays, Cromwell went to reſt in the grave the ſame day he had obtained the victories at Dunbar and Worceſter: after his many great actions and troubles, he now died quietly in his bed. Some were of opinion he was poiſoned. Mem. p. 674.——There was that day one of the greateſt ſtorms of wind that ever was known, Clarendon, Tom. III. p. 505.

[e] His education was ſuitable to his birth, he being firſt ſent to Cambridge, and then to Lincoln's-inn.

[f] In 1637, Cromwell, Haſlerig, Hampden, and ſome others, reſolved to take refuge in New England (on account of the perſecution raiſed by archbiſhop Laud againſt the puritans) and were actually embarked for that purpoſe; but they were prevented, by a proclamation againſt tranſporting his majeſty's ſubjects to the plantations in America; and by an order of council, for ſtopping eight ſhips in the river of Thames, prepared to go for New England, in one of which Cromwell was. Life of Cromwell, p. 3.

[g] The reaſon of his being choſe, was, becauſe he oppoſed the draining the fen-lands in the iſle of Ely, which was then propoſed, and not liked by the town of Cambridge. Ibid.

rather that Cromwell was too wiſe, to ſuffer himſelf to be ſupplanted by all the efforts of the royaliſts; or that, after ſeizing the ſupreme power, he did not reſtore it to the king, to whom alone it belonged; that is, that Cromwell did not at once turn royaliſt, and entirely change his principles. But this charge lies no more againſt Cromwell, than againſt all the independents and preſbyterians, who were at leaſt three parts in four of the kingdom, and who, no more than Cromwell, thought it proper to declare for the king.

As for the republicans, they have not left us many writings on their ſide. The only memoirs of that party, which I know of, are thoſe of Edmund Ludlow. It appears there, that the republicans were enraged againſt Cromwell, and deemed him the moſt perfidious of men. This is not very ſtrange, ſince he had wreſted from that parliament the ſovereign power, ſeized by theſe republicans without any lawful authority. But, what was this parliament? It was an aſſembly of independents, anabaptiſts, fanatics, enthuſiaſts, and others of no religion, who, under colour of eſtabliſhing a free common-wealth, held the nation in ſervitude; who, to confirm their own authority, had treated their fellow members with unheard of violence, and dared to imbrue their hands in the blood of the late king, at a time when he had almoſt granted every thing that was deſired; who, in ſhort, were induſtrious to break the union of the church, to ſubvert all religion, or introduce the moſt ridiculous and extravagant one. Was it therefore more eligible for England to be governed by theſe men, than by a Cromwell? If, therefore, Cromwell be blameable, it is not for diſſolving a parliament, which certainly deſerved to continue no longer, and had ſtrangely abuſed the power they had aſſumed. But if, after the diſſolution of that parliament, Cromwell had reſtored the king (for this, in all appearance, is what the royaliſts would have) he had drawn upon himſelf the hatred and curſes of all England, which, at that time, was by no means diſpoſed to ſuch a reſtoration, whatever the royaliſts may ſay. He was, therefore, to do one of theſe three things; either to reſtore the king, contrary both to his own principles, and to thoſe of the preſbyterians and independents; or to abandon the ſtate to a horrible anarchy, which muſt have followed, if he had left things in the ſtate they were in after the diſſolution; or to take himſelf the adminiſtration of the government, unleſs he had intruſted it with ſome other perſon, which, in reſpect of the juſtice of the action, had been the ſame. Let it now be examined, which was moſt advantageous for England, conſidering her circumſtances, and whether it was not better, he ſhould himſelf take the government, than attempt a reſtoration, in which he could never have ſucceeded? Since his whole ſupport was the army, which at that time was very oppoſite to the king, not to mention the oppoſition he would have met from the republicans and preſbyterians. On ſuppoſition that he was in the right to diſſolve the parliament, was it not alſo better for him to aſſume the government, than relinquiſh the ſtate to a fatal anarchy? Thoſe who pretend, he had long before projected his advancement, ſpeak only by conjecture. They conſider not, that he had never been in a condition to form ſuch a deſign, before the battle of Worceſter; nor that this parliament, which he diſſolved, had, in ſeeking to ruin him, reduced him to a neceſſity of deſtroying them for his own preſervation.

But what cannot be juſtified in his conduct, is, his throwing himſelf, from the beginning of the parliament, into a violent party, which aimed at the ruin of church and ſtate; his directing afterwards that party; and his being the chief author of the violences put upon the parliament and the king. This, however, is ſlightly paſſed over, becauſe it is common to him with the whole independent party; and yet, it is, in my opinion, the only thing he can juſtly be reproached with, and on which it is hardly poſſible to excuſe him.

The ſecond charge againſt him is, his exceſſive diſſimulation; but here we are to diſtinguiſh. If it be true, as is pretended, though without proof, that he carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to mock God and religion, by expreſſing a piety and devotion which he had not, and by making long prayers, full of ſeeming zeal. If it be true, that his mouth uttered what his heart never meant, no man ought to endeavour to vindicate him. But his ſtrong biaſs to enthuſiaſm is well known; and who can affirm, it was rather out of hypocriſy than real perſuaſion? We are not raſhly to aſcribe to men inward motives, which no mortal can know. His diſſimulation, practiſed for the better management of the ſeveral parties, all equally his enemies, has nothing that I can ſee, very blameable in it, unleſs it was a crime, not to leave it in the power of his enemies to deſtroy him with eaſe. I ſhall juſt mention ſome of his methods to maintain himſelf in his dignity, by which it may be judged whether Cromwell's diſſimulation is to be juſtly imputed to him as a crime.

The parliament he diſſolved, was compoſed of independents, republicans, enthuſiaſts, or fifth monarchy men. If this parliament had continued longer, things would have been carried to the laſt extremity. They began to talk of pulling down the churches, diſcharging the tithes, deſtroying the clergy, and every thing that looked like the union of a national church. The preſbyterians, who knew this, were in continual apprehenſions of their executing their deſigns, and conſequently, the diſſolution of this parliament was conſidered by them, as a great happineſs. Cromwell, to gain their confidence, poſitively promiſed, he would maintain their miniſtry on the foot of the preſent eſtabliſhment, and kept his word, though he was far from being preſbyterian. By this means, the preſbyterians were attached to his intereſt, by reaſon of their dread to fall again under the tyranny of the independents.

In the republican party were two ſorts of men, whom it was very difficult to govern. The one were deiſts, or men very indifferent as to religion, who acted only upon the principles of civil liberty. The others were enthuſiaſts, who expected every day when Chriſt ſhould appear to reign upon earth. Theſe were the moſt difficult to manage, becauſe they would not hear reaſon, when it contradicted their headſtrong and violent zeal. Cromwell's accepting the protectorſhip was conſidered by them as a ſtep to kingſhip, to which they were ſuch enemies, that they affirmed it to be the great antichriſt, that hindered Chriſt's reign upon earth. Cromwell found means ſo to divide theſe two parties, that all combinations betwixt them for his ruin became impoſſible. To the deiſt, he made himſelf merry with the extravagant zeal of the fanatics; and to theſe, he talked of the others as of heathens and infidels. But as the enthuſiaſts were the moſt obſtinate, he intimated to ſome of them, that he would rather have taken a ſhepherd's ſtaff than the protectorſhip, had it not been to prevent every thing from running into confuſion: that he would reſign this dignity with more joy than he accepted it, as ſoon as things ſhould be ſettled: that nothing was more contrary to his inclination and principles, than a grandeur which obliged him to aſſume an outward ſuperiority over his fellow labourers. To convince them of what he ſaid, he frequently called them into his cloſet, and ſhutting the door, made them ſit covered, familiarly talking with them as his equals. Commonly theſe diſcourſes ended in a long prayer. It is not to be doubted, but there was in this much diſſimulation. The queſtion is, whether it was ſo criminal as it is pretended?

He had likewiſe chaplains of all ſorts. So, hinting ſometimes to one, ſometimes to another, that he was not averſe to their principles; the report was ſpread throughout the whole party, and made each hope for an advantageous change.

He took care to have ſpies amongſt all the parties, and was thereby fully informed of what was contriving againſt his perſon or government[1]. Among others, he gained ſir Richard Willis, chancellor Hyde's agent for conveying the king's orders to his friends in England. All the royaliſts confided in Willis, knowing he received the king's orders, and yet he betrayed them. But to keep the correſpondence more ſecret, Cromwell aſſured him, that the informations from him ſhould only be uſed to diſconcert the plots of his enemies, that none might ever ſuffer for them; and if he impriſoned any of them, it ſhould only be for a little time, and on other pretences. By that means he defeated their deſigns, as by accident, in committing them to priſon for ſuppoſed crimes, and releaſing them when their meaſures were broken.

He ſometimes intimated a willingneſs to treat with the king. Probably, his aim was to engage the royaliſts to offer propoſitions, which would have given him opportunity to [1] He laid it down for a maxim, to ſpare no coſt or charge in order to procure intelligence. When he underſtood what dealers the Jews were every where in that trade, that depends upon news, the advancing money upon high or low intereſt, in proportion to the riſque they run, or the gain to be made as the times might turn, and in the buying and ſelling of the actions of money ſo advanced, he brought a company of them over to England, for which ſome ſay, he received a conſideration of two hundred thouſand pounds, and gave them leave to build a ſynagogue. Burnet, p. 71.——Among other good regulations, he alſo appointed a council of trade, to conſider how to improve, order and regulate, the trade and navigation of the common-wealth. Whitelock, p. 632.

amuſe them and prevented any conſpiracies againſt his perſon: for he was informed from ſeveral parts of deſigns to aſſaſſinate him. Wherefore he affected to ſpeak publicly of aſſaſſinations with the utmoſt deteſtation, and to declare, he would never begin them, but if an attempt was made upon his life, and miſcarried, he ſhould not ſcruple to uſe the ſame method, and that he did not want inſtruments to execute it, nor money to reward them, This declaration kept the royaliſts in awe, through a fear of their own danger, or that of the king and royal family.

If this conduct of Cromwell be conſidered impartially, it will, doubtleſs, appear, that his diſſimulation and artifices for his own preſervation, were not ſo criminal as they have been repreſented. What has moſt offended thoſe who ſpeak of them with moſt paſſion, is, that they were proper to diſconcert the projects of his enemies. The diſſimulation of queen Elizabeth, for the ſame reaſon, has been extolled, though ſhe uſed it only for her own preſervation.

The third and laſt charge againſt Cromwell, is cruelty, for having, whilſt protector, put ſome men to death for conſpiring againſt his perſon and government. That is, according to this reproach, he ſhould have patiently ſuffered the plots againſt him, and when one failed, liberty ſhould have been given for a ſecond and a third, till ſome one had ſucceeded. This deſerves no confutation. But to ſhew, that Cromwell was not for an unneceſſary effuſion of blood, we need only recite what is owned by the earl of Clarendon in his hiſtory, who aſſures, that when it was propoſed in a council of officers, that there might be a general maſſacre of the royaliſts, Cromwell would never conſent to it.

To finiſh Cromwell's character, I will add, that in the beginning of the long parliament, he was a preſbyterian. After that, he threw himſelf into the independent party, and was even one of their leaders, and affected to be of the number of the enthuſiaſts. But when he had accepted the protectorſhip, he was neither preſbyterian, nor independent, nor republican, nor enthuſiaſt. As he had to manage all theſe different parties, who were equally oppoſite to him, he was not to appear an enemy to any in particular, and this management furniſhes convincing proofs of his great ability.

It is, nevertheleſs, certain, that Cromwell was very much hated, while he lived, by all the parties then in England, though they could not help fearing and eſteeming him. But if it be now conſidered, that the prejudices againſt him are not ſo ſtrong as they were then, it will be found that the hatred of him was owing to intereſt, and founded chiefly upon his ability to diſconcert the meaſures and deſigns of all the parties. This general hatred is ſolely referred to his principal action; that is, to the uſurpation of the government, which equally diſguſted the royaliſts, preſbyterians, and republicans. The royaliſts thereby ſaw their hopes more deſperate than ever of the king's reſtoration. The preſbyterians could hardly expect, by their intrigues, to render themſelves once more ſuperior in the parliament, after the diſſolution. The republicans were enraged to ſee the ſupreme power, which they had aſſumed, wreſted from them. It is therefore no wonder, that he has incurred ſo much cenſure, ſince all the people of England, that is theſe three parties, were equally concerned to aſperſe him. It was not for the enormity of the action, but becauſe, by his advancement, each party deſpaired of acquiring the ſuperiority over the reſt. This is what has drawn from many writers, expreſſions ſo injurious to his memory. The lord Clarendon ſpeaks thus of him and his uſurpation. "Without doubt no man with more wickedneſs ever attempted any thing, or brought to paſs what he defired more wickedly, more in the face and contempt of religion, and moral honeſty. Yet wickedneſs, as great as his, could never have accompliſhed thoſe deſigns, without the aſſiſtance of a great ſpirit, an admirable circumſpection and ſagacity, and a moſt magnanimous reſolution." It is eaſily ſeen, that this wickedneſs is referred only to his uſurpation of the government. "In a word, (continues the ſame author) as he was guilty of many crimes, againſt which damnation is denounced, and for which hell-fire is prepared, ſo he had ſome qualities which have cauſed the memory of ſome men in all ages to be celebrated, and he will be looked upon by poſterity as a brave wicked man." Here the author, no doubt, has an eye to the murder of Charles I. in which Cromwell was too deeply concerned for me to pretend to excuſe him. I ſhall only obſerve, that this accuſation is not peculiar to him, but is common to him with the whole independent parliament.

To form a juſt and rational idea of Cromwell's character, his conduct and actions in themſelves muſt be examined, and joined to the juncture of the time, independently of the opinions of his enemies. We have no other hiſtorians of thoſe times than the royaliſts, who have laid down certain principles, by which he is condemned. But, it muſt be obſerved, theſe principles were not generally received in England, during his life. What can never be entirely excuſed in him, is the death of Charles I. to which he contributed to the utmoſt of his power, and which will be an indelible blot upon his memory. Another principle, and of which he made great uſe, is likewiſe to be condemned in him: which was, that moral laws were only binding on ordinary occaſions, but might be diſpenſed with upon extraordinary caſes; which is abſolutely falſe. His uſurpation of the government has been already conſidered, and the reader is left to his judgment. I ſhall only obſerve, that the confuſion which prevailed in England, ſoon after the death of Cromwell, clearly ſhews the neceſſity of that uſurpation.

In general it can't be denied, that Cromwell was one of the greateſt men of his age, if it is conſidered, that without the advantages of birth or fortune, he roſe ſo near a throne, that it was in his power to mount it. Hiſtory furniſhes very few inſtances of this kind[k].

Cromwell's death was followed with ſo many alterations in the government, that the interval between that and the reſtoration, may be juſtly called a time of true anarchy. Cromwell ſhould have had a ſucceſſor like himſelf, to finiſh what he had ſo ably begun. But two ſo great men are not commonly found ſo near one another, nor often in the ſame age.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND

BOOK XXII.

[1658] IN the laſt days of Cromwell's illneſs, ſome of his moſt intimate friends, ſeeing him in danger, aſked him twice concerning the ſucceſſion, and he readily anſwered, he would have his ſon Richard to ſucceed him. He had however, in the time of his protectorſhip, ſigned an inſtrument by which he appointed Fleetwood his ſon-in-law for his ſucceſſor; but probably he had burnt that paper, for it could never be found[1]. An hour after his death, the privy council met, and upon the report made of the will of the deceaſed, as alſo upon the inſtrument of government, impowering them to chuſe a protector, they immediately elected Richard Cromwell. Fleetwood even relinquiſhed before them the right he might have, in caſe the paper ſigned in his favour ſhould be found. Preſently after, the lord mayor of London was acquainted with the election, and the day following Richard was proclaimed protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The ſame proclamation was made in all the principal towns of the three kingdoms, without the leaſt oppoſition. On the contrary, addreſſes were preſented to Richard from all parts, ſigned by many thouſands to congratulate him upon his acceſſion to the dignity of protector, and to aſſure him, they would willingly hazard their lives and fortunes to ſupport him. But ſuch addreſſes are not always to be depended upon, experience having often ſhewn, they are far from being ſincere, though generally expreſſed in the ſtrongeſt terms. Thus Richard was inſtalled ſucceſſor to his father Oliver, and took the ſame oath. The firſt care of the new protector, after his inſtallation, was to gain Monk, governor of Scotland, to his intereſts. After the voluntary reſignation of Fleetwood his brother-in-law, of Deſborough his uncle and all the officers of the army, as well republicans as preſbyterians, he ſeemed to have nothing to fear from England. Henry Cromwell his brother, then governor of Ireland, held that iſland in ſubjection. Scotland therefore only remained to be ſecured to his intereſts. Monk had commanded in that kingdom ever ſince his reduction of it, and had ſo artfully managed the Scots, ſometimes by rigour, ſometimes by gentleneſs and the exact diſcipline of his army, that he had acquired their eſteem and affection, who were never more happy than under his government, though the earl of Clarendon inſinuates that he ruled like a tyrant, which ſeems to have no other foundation, than his diſabling the Scots to withdraw their obedience from the parliament or the protector, by means of forts erected in convenient places. However this be, it is certain, Monk was maſter of Scotland, and Cromwell himſelf would have found it difficult to deprive him of that government againſt his conſent. Many blamed the confidence Cromwell repoſed in Monk, who had borne arms for the late king, and only engaged in the ſervice of the parliament, to free himſelf from captivity after the battle of Nantwich, where he was taken priſoner. It was, perhaps, for theſe ſuſpicions, that Richard thought himſelf obliged to neglect nothing to gain him to his intereſts. For this purpoſe, knowing Monk's eſteem and affection for Clarges his brother-in-law, he ſent him to deſire his friendſhip. But Clarges, as well as Monk, had been zealouſly attached to the king, and was ſtill ſo in his heart, though outwardly he complied with the times. So, in the diſcharge of this commiſſion, he took occaſion to ſound him, and eaſily found he was far from being the king's enemy. From that time Monk and Clarges held a ſtrict correſpondence. Clarges informed Monk of the tranſactions of London, and, in all appearance, deſigned then to ſerve the king, though perhaps he did not yet think proper to explain himſelf to Monk, who was very reſerved. Clarges, according to his inſtructions, acquainted Monk with the new protector's great eſteem for him, in which he followed the ſentiments of Oliver his father, who had expreſsly charged him to be entirely directed by his advice. Monk readily ſubmitted to Richard's government. He obligingly acknowledged his civilities, and only told him, in general, that having no particular advice to give him, by reaſon of his diſtance, he recommended to him to encourage a learned, pious, and moderate miniſtry in the church, to permit no councils of officers, a liberty they had too often abuſed, and to endeavour to be maſter of the army.

At the beginning of his protectorſhip Richard had, as I ſaid, the pleaſure of receiving addreſſes from boroughs, cities, and counties, to the number of fourſcore and ten, and afterwards, he had the like compliment paid him from all the regiments, without any exception, ſo that he had reaſon to believe his power ſufficiently eſtabliſhed. Mean while, preparations were making for Oliver's funeral, which was ſolemnized with great magnificence, large ſums of money being borrowed for that purpoſe by the new protector[b]. After the ceremonies uſually paid to deceaſed ſovereign princes, his body was depoſited in Henry VII's chapel, amongſt thoſe of the kings and queens of England[c].

Though the late protector was both careful and capable to preſerve himſelf amidſt the parties then in England, and to keep them in awe, it was not however in his power to extinguiſh them. When he was taken out of the world, each party hoped to gain the advantage under the protectorate of Richard, who had not his father's qualities, and to theſe hopes perhaps muſt be aſcribed, their ready concurrence in declaring him protector. The royaliſts juſtly flattered themſelves, that the different parties into which their enemies were divided, having no longer a common head capable to govern them all together, would diſunite, and that diſunion be ſerviceable to the king, and perhaps procure his reſtoration. Thoſe who had approved of the government by a ſingle perſon in the deceaſed protector, and had been moſt truſted by him, hoped to preſerve the ſame credit under the ſon, which they had enjoyed under the father, and to direct the new protector according to their pleaſure. Theſe were the principal members of the council, though they had alſo amongſt them a mixture of republicans and fanatics.

If the republicans had conſented to acknowledge Richard, it was becauſe they were unprepared to make any oppoſition. The army chiefly compoſed of that party, being diſperſed in ſeveral counties, the officers had neither time nor opportunity to conſult together. But they deſpaired not of finding an occaſion to diſplace the new protector, and reſtore the common-wealth to the ſtate it was in till the year

[1] Some ſay, Oliver had actually made Fleetwood his heir; but one of his daughters knowing where his will was, took it away, and burnt it, before Fleetwood could come at it: and a few minutes before Cromwell's death, when he was aſked, "Who ſhould ſucceed him?" He replied, "In ſuch a drawer of the cabinet, in my cloſet, you will find it." Life of Cromwell, p. 405.

[b] The charges of it came to ſixty thouſand pounds. Manley, p. 279.

[c] The corps was removed, September 26, privately in the night, from Whitehall, to Somerſet-houſe; where it lay in ſtate till the 23d of November; and then it was carried, in a very ſolemn and magnificent manner, to Weſtminſter Abbey, where it was depoſited.——Some ſay, that it was depoſited, as to outward appearance there, but that in reality, it was carried below bridge, and thrown into the Thames.—And again, others affirm, that it was buried in Naſeby fields. See Compl. hiſt. and the life of Cromwell, p. 418.—422. Old colonel Barkſtead, who lived to the year 1720, and had an office in the tower when Cromwell died, conſtantly affirmed the truth of his being buried in Naſeby field, and that he attended the corps thither privately in the night in a coach and four. He related many circumſtances of the affair to a friend of one of the tranſlator's correſpondents, who ſent him theſe particulars.

The

1653, when Oliver diſſolved the parliament which had formed it.

The anabaptiſts were all of the republican party, becauſe they perceived the impoſſibility of eſtabliſhing their fifth monarchy under a protector. Theſe were the moſt zealous republicans, and the hardeſt to be managed, on account of their ſingular notions, which cauſed them to refer every thing to their extravagant religion, and rendered them deaf to any reaſons not drawn from their principles.

There was another ſet of republicans, who regardleſs of religion, were governed by political views. They were accuſed of having no religion, or of being properly deiſts.

As for the preſbyterians, who were very numerous in England and Ireland, beſides the Scots, who were almoſt all of this ſect, they had not changed their principles, ſince their expulſion from the parliament in 1648. They would have gladly admitted the king with a limited power, and the firm eſtabliſhment of preſbyterian government in the church. This principle had always cauſed them to remain by themſelves, without being able to unite either with the royaliſts, who would hearken to no limitation upon the king's power, and were averſe to their church government, or with the republicans, who would have neither king nor protector. Beſides, theſe granted an entire liberty to all ſects, which had joined the independent party, a liberty which was inconſiſtent with the principles of the preſbyterians. For, though the preſbyterians had under the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I. taken it very ill to be denied the free exerciſe of their religion, they were by no means inclined to grant others the ſame liberty they had demanded for themſelves. Nevertheleſs, as their number was conſiderable, and they might at laſt find a leader capable to conduct their affairs, the deceaſed protector thought it proper to manage them, and preſerve their government in the church, but without obliging any perſon to conform to it. This moderation kept the preſbyterians quiet under Oliver's government, and the more, as they could expect no aſſiſtance from the army, as it was then modelled. But in remaining thus ſeparate from all the other parties, they diſabled themſelves from making any great progreſs againſt the independent party, who took care to keep them low. This gave the royaliſts room to hope, the preſbyterians would at laſt be obliged to unite with them, to free themſelves from the ſervitude in which they were held by the independents and republicans. The ſequel will ſhew, this hope was not groundleſs.

This ſhort recapitulation of the intereſts of the ſeveral parties, plainly demonſtrates Cromwell's capacity, who could keep them all in awe, without a poſitive declaration in favour of any one party. Richard propoſed to begin his protectorate with his father's maxims. He formed the deſign of making himſelf maſter of the deliberations of his council, and of reducing the army to receive his orders with ſubmiſſion. By theſe two things Oliver maintained his authority, and if he had lived, he would not have left an officer in the army of ſuſpected fidelity. But to purſue theſe maxims and execute this project, Richard ſhould have had his father's capacity for civil and military affairs, his bravery and reſolution, and, in a word, by a ſeries of victories, ſhould have been able to ſtrike terror into all who could oppoſe his deſigns. But Richard had none of theſe great talents to command fear and reſpect, or to inſpire his friends with hopes of a powerful protection. So, heading no party, and being incapable to govern all, he ſtood expoſed to their ambition and violence, without being ſure of an effectual aſſiſtance when he ſhould want it. Mean while, knowing that the bare election of his perſon by the council, and the addreſſes preſented to him, were inſufficient to eſtabliſh his authority, he believed it expedient to have his dignity confirmed by parliament, and accordingly ſummoned one to meet the 27th day of January 1658-9. This parliament was to conſiſt of two houſes, namely, a houſe of commons, containing four hundred Engliſh, thirty Scotch, and thirty Iriſh members; and of the other houſe (for as yet it had no other name) which was inſtead of a houſe of peers, and conſiſted chiefly of officers. They were generally men of no birth, who had advanced themſelves by military poſts, during the laſt war.

Richard had made no change in his father's council, but he was ſoon ſenſible, that this council, which was entirely directed by Oliver, was aſpiring to more power under his ſucceſſor. On the other hand, the army appeared leſs devoted to the ſon than to the father. They had even begun before Oliver's death, to appear leſs ſubmiſſive, which had obliged him to remove Lambert, and ſome other colonels and officers, who were ſowing diviſion among the troops. His deſign was to make other changes, by degrees, in the army, in order to reduce them to an entire obedience, but he was prevented by death. He wanted no aſſiſtance nor advice for ſuch purpoſes, and commonly his deſigns were executed before they were publicly known; and ſo well eſtabliſhed was his authority, that no officer whatſoever retained any credit amongſt the troops, the moment he was caſhiered. This Lambert and ſome others had lately experienced. Richard was deſirous to tread in his father's ſteps, but being ſenſible that his authority was not great enough, he thought he ſhould attempt nothing, without conſulting ſome of his principal friends. He therefore held a privy council, in which he propoſed, firſt, the admiſſion of more new counſellors, to ſecure a majority and make himſelf maſter of the debates, in ſpite of the old counſellors, who were leſs tractable than in the time of his father. Secondly, he propoſed to reduce the army, to an entire dependence upon him[d].

His friends, whom he conſulted on this occaſion, were ſelf-intereſted and attached to him, only in hopes of governing in his name. They apprehended, the protector's propoſal might be prejudicial to themſelves, and that in procuring him an abſolute power, they might be the firſt ſufferers. He therefore found a ſtrong oppoſition in theſe pretended friends. Inſtead of approving his deſign, they adviſed him to call into his council two colonels, wholly devoted to the republican party. Nor was this all; ſome of the leading officers of the army were informed of the protector's deſigns, and that was ſufficient to put them in motion. Fleetwood his brother-in-law and Deſborough his uncle, were the firſt to combine againſt him and cabal with the officers, to deprive him of the generalſhip of the army, to which they were authoriſed by the inſtrument of government. But, probably, they would never have thought of uſing that power, if Richard had not diſcovered his intentions of becoming abſolute maſter of the army, and putting himſelf in a condition not to want their aſſiſtance. However, as the army lay diſperſed, and it was neceſſary, that the officers ſhould conſult together, and act in concert for the preſervation of their authority, and the oppoſing the protector's deſigns, a ſnare was laid, in which he ſuffered himſelf to be taken. It was inſinuated, that the parliament which was going to ſit, might prove dangerous to his authority, ſhould they not be tractable, and therefore it was neceſſary to fortify himſelf with a good number of officers, as well to conſult them, as to ſhew the parliament, he was ſupported by the army, which could not but produce a good effect. Richard, believing this advice proceeded from their zeal for his ſervice, was eaſily perſuaded to order every regiment to ſend to London as many officers as could be ſpared. This order was punctually executed, and immediately a great number of officers appeared in London, who formed amongſt them a council, which frequently met, and aſſumed the title of the great council of the army.

Beſides this great council, ſome members of the privy council, and officers of the army met alſo at Deſborough's houſe, as well to conſult how to deprive Richard of the generalſhip, as to direct the great council, which being compoſed of many inferior officers, wanted to be directed in their deliberations. The reſult of this council was, that Deſborough, attended with ſeveral officers, waited on the protector with a petition, "That no officer or ſoldier ſhould be turned out but by ſentence of a council of war: that no member of the army ſhould be proceeded againſt capitally, otherwiſe than by martial law: and laſtly, that the army might have power to chuſe their own general." As nothing was more contrary to Richard's deſigns than this demand, he poſitively rejected it, and threatened even to caſhier them if they brought him any more ſuch propoſals.

The parliament aſſembling the 27th of January[e], it was immediately debated in the lower houſe, by what right the Scots and Iriſh ſent repreſentatives to the Engliſh parliament. The authority of the other houſe was alſo taken into conſideration, and the ſame objections made to it, as had been in Oliver's laſt parliament. As there were many republicans in [d] The officers of the army were then divided into three parties. The firſt, or common-wealth party, conſiſted of colonel Aſhfield, Lilburn, Fitz, Maſon, Moſs, Farley, Creed, &c. The ſecond called the Wallingford houſe, or army party, who had ſet up Richard Cromwell, in expectation of governing as they pleaſed, were, Fleetwood, Deſborough, Sydenham, Clark, Kelſey, Berry, Haines, Blackwell, &c. The third, or Richard's party, were, Ingoldſby, Gough, Whalley, Howard, Goodrick, Keins, &c. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 631.

Par-

the houſe of commons[f], great endeavours were uſed to ſuppreſs the other houſe, for fear of its becoming at laſt a houſe of lords, and oppoſing the re-eſtabliſhment of the commonwealth, which was the object of their moſt ardent wiſhes. The debate upon theſe two articles held two whole months; and it was the 28th of March, before it was reſolved, by a majority of voices, that the other houſe ſhould ſubſiſt, and the Scotch and Iriſh repreſentatives continue to ſit in the houſe of commons. After that, the parliament made an act to recognize Richard Cromwell for protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland[g].

[1659] While theſe things were tranſacting in parliament, the great council of officers at Fleetwood's houſe, and the private council at Deſborough's continued their conferences and deliberations. At laſt, they preſented a petition to the protector, deſiring Fleetwood for their general. This was directly depriving the protector of the command of the army, to which he could not conſent, without expoſing himſelf to the caprices of the principal officers, who directed the army as they pleaſed. Wherefore, inſtead of returning a favourable anſwer to their petition, he ſharply reprimanded them, ordering them to diſſolve their council, and return to their quarters. On the other hand, the houſe of commons perceiving, the officers were contriving ſome plot which might be prejudicial to the parliament, voted againſt the holding a council of officers during the ſeſſion of the parliament; and moreover that no perſon ſhould have any employ in the army, till he had taken an oath not to diſturb the deliberations of the parliament. Immediately after, theſe votes were ſent to the other houſe, now called the upper houſe, for their concurrence. But as the officers were moſt prevalent there, they believed it no part of their duty to contradict what their comrades were doing. So, the votes of the commons were no more capable, than the orders of the protector, to diſſipate the councils of the officers, who ſtill continued to aſſemble.

At laſt, on the 22d of April, Richard had notice, that the officers had reſolved to force him to diſſolve the parliament. He immediately aſſembled his council to prevent, by their advice, this attempt. Some were of opinion, that he ought abſolutely to refuſe ſuch a demand, and adhere to the parliament, as his only ſupport. But he was not directed to the means to defend himſelf againſt the officers, who began to aſſemble in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, and would probably have been too ſtrong for his guards. Others adviſed him to leave Whitehall, and ſuffer the officers to do as they pleaſed with the parliament, without any promiſe to diſſolve it. But the officers, foreſeeing, he might take that courſe, had now ſeized all the avenues about Whitehall. In ſhort, every man propoſed expedients, to which others objected inſuperable difficulties. During theſe irreſolutions, Deſborough, with a ſtrong retinue, demanded an audience of the protector, and required him, in the name of the officers, to diſſolve the parliament[h]. Richard at firſt refuſed to grant this demand; but he was told, his refuſal would be attended with danger to himſelf, and that, in a word, they were reſolved to obtain, by fair means or foul, what they demanded. In fine, Richard, who, before Deſborough came, had not been able to take any reſolution, was ſtill more incapable to conſider what was to be done, after he was ſurrounded with men who ſhewed but little regard for his authority. He therefore promiſed to diſſolve the parliament by commiſſion under the great ſeal. But as the commons, informed of what paſſed, had adjourned themſelves for three days, the parliament was diſſolved by proclamation.

From that time, Richard was no longer regarded, though he ſtill bore the title of protector. The officers conſidered him as an impotent enemy, incapable of hurting them. So he loſt on a ſudden the ſupport of the parliament, without gaining that of the army. This is what cannot be denied. But thoſe who imagine, that if he had ſtood by the parliament, he would have engaged the people in his intereſts, and been ſupported by Monk and his army, build their conjecture upon a very uncertain ſuppoſition. Beſides, was it in his power to refuſe a diſſolution of the parliament, without hazarding his own life, or to ſupport himſelf, till he ſhould have received a ſufficient aid, againſt the violence of the army? Be this as it will, after the parliament was diſſolved, the great council of officers thought themſelves impowered to ſettle the government as they pleaſed, without conſulting the protector, who was now regarded but as a private perſon[i]. This anarchy however laſted only a few days, during which the officers elected Fleetwood for their general. They diſcharged alſo by their own authority five colonels, who adviſed Richard to adhere to the parliament, namely, Ingoldſby, Goff, Whaley, lord Falconbridge, brother-in-law to Richard, and Howard, afterwards earl of Carliſle, and reſtored Lambert and others diſmiſſed by Cromwell a little before his death. After this, they conſidered of ſettling the government, it being impoſſible for things to continue long in their preſent ſituation.

Lambert was a man of immoderate ambition, and would not have ſcrupled to follow the example of Oliver, had the juncture ſeemed favourable to him. But Fleetwood being his general, and the idol of the army, he could not hope to ſucceed in an attempt to ſeize the government. He therefore thought proper to wait a more favourable opportunity, and, in the mean time, hinder Fleetwood from putting himſelf at the head of the government, whether under the name of protector, or any other title, to which he had ſeveral reaſons to believe he was aſpiring. Firſt, Cromwell had once named him for his ſucceſſor by an inſtrument under his own hand, and many believed this inſtrument had been artfully conveyed out of the way, either during Cromwell's life, or after his death, leſt it ſhould obſtruct his ſon Richard's election. It was even ſaid, that Cromwell's nomination of his ſon in the time of his illneſs, was only the contrivance of ſecretary Thurlo, and another perſon, to procure the ſucceſſion to Richard. Secondly, Fleetwood was one of the moſt zealous enthuſiaſts, of whom the army was full, and therefore looked upon with veneration by the ſoldiers, and judged moſt worthy to be Cromwell's ſucceſſor. Thirdly, it was hardly to be doubted, that it was the intereſt of the army to chuſe a protector, who ſhould depend on them, and in his turn ſupport their credit. This Lambert conſidered, but as it was not for his advantage to have Fleetwood raiſed to a dignity to which he himſelf aſpired, he ſecretly engaged colonel Lilburn to cabal among the inferior officers, and break Fleetwood's meaſures, if they pointed to the protectorſhip, whilſt he regularly made his court to him, and endeavoured by his flatteries to influence him as Cromwell had formerly influenced Fairfax. This example made Lambert hope, that he might the ſame way put himſelf one day at the head of the government.

Lambert's cabal being made with the greateſt ſecrecy, Fleetwood, as general, convened his officers to Wallingford houſe to ſettle the government. All the ſuperior officers came, but at the ſame time the inferior, by the intrigues of Lambert and Lilburn, aſſembled at St. James's in much greater numbers. In this aſſembly, the ſettlement of the government was likewiſe debated, and occaſion taken, to magnify the happineſs which England enjoyed under the adminiſtration of the parliament, from the 6th of December 1648, to the 20th of April 1653, when it was diſſolved by Cromwell. Their prudence, ſteadineſs, and happy ſucceſs in England, Scotland, Ireland, and in the Dutch war were extolled, with ſome intimations of advice, that nothing could be more advantageous to the three nations, than the reſtoration of that parliament[k].

This debate was carried no farther; but it ſufficed to convince the aſſembly at Wallingford houſe that a diviſion between them and the inferior officers could not but be dangerous to both, and that their beſt way was to join with the inferior officers in reſtoring the long parliament. It is not known what was the deſign of the chief officers with re-

[i] Ludlow ſays, one great offence given by Richard to the nation was, by his irreligion. For an officer having murmured at the advancement of perſons, who had been cavaliers, to commiſſions in the army, was brought to Whitehall to anſwer for it. Richard, in a deriding manner, aſked him, "Whether he would have him prefer none but thoſe that were godly? here, continued he, is Dick Ingoldſby, who can neither pray nor preach, and yet I will truſt him before you all." Mem. tom. II. p. 633.

[k] Whitelock ſays, upon the diſſolution of the parliament, all matters were at a ſtand; the army had thoughts of raiſing money without a parliament; but upon advice, they durſt not adventure upon it, but thought it a ſafer way to reſtore the members of the long parliament. The great officers of the army were adviſed to conſider better of their deſign of bringing in the members of the old parliament, who were moſt of them diſcontented, for their being formerly broken up by Cromwell, and did diſtaſte the proceedings of the army; and whether this would not probably more increaſe the diviſions, and end in bringing in the king; but the officers had reſolved on it. Mem. p. 677.

1653, when Oliver diſſolved the parliament which had formed it.

The anabaptiſts were all of the republican party, becauſe they perceived the impoſſibility of eſtabliſhing their fifth monarchy under a protector. Theſe were the moſt zealous republicans, and the hardeſt to be managed, on account of their ſingular notions, which cauſed them to refer every thing to their extravagant religion, and rendered them deaf to any reaſons not drawn from their principles.

There was another ſet of republicans, who regardleſs of religion, were governed by political views. They were accuſed of having no religion, or of being properly deiſts.

As for the preſbyterians, who were very numerous in England and Ireland, beſides the Scots, who were almoſt all of this ſect, they had not changed their principles, ſince their expulſion from the parliament in 1648. They would have gladly admitted the king with a limited power, and the firm eſtabliſhment of preſbyterian government in the church. This principle had always cauſed them to remain by themſelves, without being able to unite either with the royaliſts, who would hearken to no limitation upon the king's power, and were averſe to their church government, or with the republicans, who would have neither king nor protector. Beſides, theſe granted an entire liberty to all ſects, which had joined the independent party, a liberty which was inconſiſtent with the principles of the preſbyterians. For, though the preſbyterians had under the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I. taken it very ill to be denied the free exerciſe of their religion, they were by no means inclined to grant others the ſame liberty they had demanded for themſelves. Nevertheleſs, as their number was conſiderable, and they might at laſt find a leader capable to conduct their affairs, the deceaſed protector thought it proper to manage them, and preſerve their government in the church, but without obliging any perſon to conform to it. This moderation kept the preſbyterians quiet under Oliver's government, and the more, as they could expect no aſſiſtance from the army, as it was then modelled. But in remaining thus ſeparate from all the other parties, they diſabled themſelves from making any great progreſs againſt the independent party, who took care to keep them low. This gave the royaliſts room to hope, the preſbyterians would at laſt be obliged to unite with them, to free themſelves from the ſervitude in which they were held by the independents and republicans. The ſequel will ſhew, this hope was not groundleſs.

This ſhort recapitulation of the intereſts of the ſeveral parties, plainly demonſtrates Cromwell's capacity, who could keep them all in awe, without a poſitive declaration in favour of any one party. Richard propoſed to begin his protectorate with his father's maxims. He formed the deſign of making himſelf maſter of the deliberations of his council, and of reducing the army to receive his orders with ſubmiſſion. By theſe two things Oliver maintained his authority, and if he had lived, he would not have left an officer in the army of ſuſpected fidelity. But to purſue theſe maxims and execute this project, Richard ſhould have had his father's capacity for civil and military affairs, his bravery and reſolution, and, in a word, by a ſeries of victories, ſhould have been able to ſtrike terror into all who could oppoſe his deſigns. But Richard had none of theſe great talents to command fear and reſpect, or to inſpire his friends with hopes of a powerful protection. So, heading no party, and being incapable to govern all, he ſtood expoſed to their ambition and violence, without being ſure of an effectual aſſiſtance when he ſhould want it. Mean while, knowing that the bare election of his perſon by the council, and the addreſſes preſented to him, were inſufficient to eſtabliſh his authority, he believed it expedient to have his dignity confirmed by parliament, and accordingly ſummoned one to meet the 27th day of January 1658-9. This parliament was to conſiſt of two houſes, namely, a houſe of commons, containing four hundred Engliſh, thirty Scotch, and thirty Iriſh members; and of the other houſe (for as yet it had no other name) which was inſtead of a houſe of peers, and conſiſted chiefly of officers. They were generally men of no birth, who had advanced themſelves by military poſts, during the laſt war.

Richard had made no change in his father's council, but he was ſoon ſenſible, that this council, which was entirely directed by Oliver, was aſpiring to more power under his ſucceſſor. On the other hand, the army appeared leſs devoted to the ſon than to the father. They had even begun before Oliver's death, to appear leſs ſubmiſſive, which had obliged him to remove Lambert, and ſome other colonels and officers, who were ſowing diviſion among the troops. His deſign was to make other changes, by degrees, in the army, in order to reduce them to an entire obedience, but he was prevented by death. He wanted no aſſiſtance nor advice for ſuch purpoſes, and commonly his deſigns were executed before they were publicly known; and ſo well eſtabliſhed was his authority, that no officer whatſoever retained any credit amongſt the troops, the moment he was caſhiered. This Lambert and ſome others had lately experienced. Richard was deſirous to tread in his father's ſteps, but being ſenſible that his authority was not great enough, he thought he ſhould attempt nothing, without conſulting ſome of his principal friends. He therefore held a privy council, in which he propoſed, firſt, the admiſſion of more new counſellors, to ſecure a majority and make himſelf maſter of the debates, in ſpite of the old counſellors, who were leſs tractable than in the time of his father. Secondly, he propoſed to reduce the army, to an entire dependence upon him[d].

His friends, whom he conſulted on this occaſion, were ſelf-intereſted and attached to him, only in hopes of governing in his name. They apprehended, the protector's propoſal might be prejudicial to themſelves, and that in procuring him an abſolute power, they might be the firſt ſufferers. He therefore found a ſtrong oppoſition in theſe pretended friends. Inſtead of approving his deſign, they adviſed him to call into his council two colonels, wholly devoted to the republican party. Nor was this all; ſome of the leading officers of the army were informed of the protector's deſigns, and that was ſufficient to put them in motion. Fleetwood his brother-in-law and Deſborough his uncle, were the firſt to combine againſt him and cabal with the officers, to deprive him of the generalſhip of the army, to which they were authoriſed by the inſtrument of government. But, probably, they would never have thought of uſing that power, if Richard had not diſcovered his intentions of becoming abſolute maſter of the army, and putting himſelf in a condition not to want their aſſiſtance. However, as the army lay diſperſed, and it was neceſſary, that the officers ſhould conſult together, and act in concert for the preſervation of their authority, and the oppoſing the protector's deſigns, a ſnare was laid, in which he ſuffered himſelf to be taken. It was inſinuated, that the parliament which was going to ſit, might prove dangerous to his authority, ſhould they not be tractable, and therefore it was neceſſary to fortify himſelf with a good number of officers, as well to conſult them, as to ſhew the parliament, he was ſupported by the army, which could not but produce a good effect. Richard, believing this advice proceeded from their zeal for his ſervice, was eaſily perſuaded to order every regiment to ſend to London as many officers as could be ſpared. This order was punctually executed, and immediately a great number of officers appeared in London, who formed amongſt them a council, which frequently met, and aſſumed the title of the great council of the army.

Beſides this great council, ſome members of the privy council, and officers of the army met alſo at Deſborough's houſe, as well to conſult how to deprive Richard of the generalſhip, as to direct the great council, which being compoſed of many inferior officers, wanted to be directed in their deliberations. The reſult of this council was, that Deſborough, attended with ſeveral officers, waited on the protector with a petition, "That no officer or ſoldier ſhould be turned out but by ſentence of a council of war: that no member of the army ſhould be proceeded againſt capitally, otherwiſe than by martial law: and laſtly, that the army might have power to chuſe their own general." As nothing was more contrary to Richard's deſigns than this demand, he poſitively rejected it, and threatened even to caſhier them if they brought him any more ſuch propoſals.

The parliament aſſembling the 27th of January[e], it was immediately debated in the lower houſe, by what right the Scots and Iriſh ſent repreſentatives to the Engliſh parliament. The authority of the other houſe was alſo taken into conſideration, and the ſame objections made to it, as had been in Oliver's laſt parliament. As there were many republicans in the houſe of commons[f], great endeavours were uſed to ſuppreſs the other houſe, for fear of its becoming at laſt a houſe of lords, and oppoſing the re-eſtabliſhment of the commonwealth, which was the object of their moſt ardent wiſhes. The debate upon theſe two articles held two whole months, and it was the 28th of March, before it was reſolved, by a majority of voices, that the other houſe ſhould ſubſiſt, and the Scotch and Iriſh repreſentatives continue to ſit in the houſe of commons. After that, the parliament made an act to recognize Richard Cromwell for protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland[g].

[d] The officers of the army were then divided into three parties. The firſt, or common-wealth party, conſiſted of colonel Aſhfield, Lilburn, Fitz, Maſon, Moſs, Farley, Creed, &c. The ſecond called the Wallingford houſe, or army party, who had ſet up Richard Cromwell, in expectation of governing as they pleaſed, were, Fleetwood, Deſborough, Sydenham, Clark, Kelſey, Berry, Haines, Blackwell, &c. The third, or Richard's party, were, Ingoldſby, Gough, Whalley, Howard, Goodrick, Keins, &c. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 631.

[1659] While theſe things were tranſacting in parliament, the great council of officers at Fleetwood's houſe, and the private council at Deſborough's continued their conferences and deliberations. At laſt, they preſented a petition to the protector, deſiring Fleetwood for their general. This was directly depriving the protector of the command of the army, to which he could not conſent, without expoſing himſelf to the caprices of the principal officers, who directed the army as they pleaſed. Wherefore, inſtead of returning a favourable anſwer to their petition, he ſharply reprimanded them, ordering them to diſſolve their council, and return to their quarters. On the other hand, the houſe of commons perceiving, the officers were contriving ſome plot which might be prejudicial to the parliament, voted againſt the holding a council of officers during the ſeſſion of the parliament; and moreover that no perſon ſhould have any employ in the army, till he had taken an oath not to diſturb the deliberations of the parliament. Immediately after, theſe votes were ſent to the other houſe, now called the upper houſe, for their concurrence. But as the officers were moſt prevalent there, they believed it no part of their duty to contradict what their comrades were doing. So, the votes of the commons were no more capable, than the orders of the protector, to diſſipate the councils of the officers, who ſtill continued to aſſemble.

At laſt, on the 22d of April, Richard had notice, that the officers had reſolved to force him to diſſolve the parliament. He immediately aſſembled his council to prevent, by their advice, this attempt. Some were of opinion, that he ought abſolutely to refuſe ſuch a demand, and adhere to the parliament, as his only ſupport. But he was not directed to the means to defend himſelf againſt the officers, who began to aſſemble in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, and would probably have been too ſtrong for his guards. Others adviſed him to leave Whitehall, and ſuffer the officers to do as they pleaſed with the parliament, without any promiſe to diſſolve it. But the officers, foreſeeing, he might take that courſe, had now ſeized all the avenues about Whitehall. In ſhort, every man propoſed expedients, to which others objected inſuperable difficulties. During theſe irreſolutions, Deſborough, with a ſtrong retinue, demanded an audience of the protector, and required him, in the name of the officers, to diſſolve the parliament[h]. Richard at firſt refuſed to grant this demand; but he was told, his refuſal would be attended with danger to himſelf, and that, in a word, they were reſolved to obtain, by fair means or foul, what they demanded. In fine, Richard, who, before Deſborough came, had not been able to take any reſolution, was ſtill more incapable to conſider what was to be done, after he was ſurrounded with men who ſhewed but little regard for his authority. He therefore promiſed to diſſolve the parliament by commiſſion under the great ſeal. But as the commons, informed of what paſſed, had adjourned themſelves for three days, the parliament was diſſolved by proclamation.

From that time, Richard was no longer regarded, though he ſtill bore the title of protector. The officers conſidered him as an impotent enemy, incapable of hurting them. So he loſt on a ſudden the ſupport of the parliament, without gaining that of the army. This is what cannot be denied. But thoſe who imagine, that if he had ſtood by the parliament, he would have engaged the people in his intereſts, and been ſupported by Monk and his army, build their conjecture upon a very uncertain ſuppoſition. Beſides, was it in his power to refuſe a diſſolution of the parliament, without hazarding his own life, or to ſupport himſelf, till he ſhould have received a ſufficient aid, againſt the violence of the army? Be this as it will, after the parliament was diſſolved, the great council of officers thought themſelves impowered to ſettle the government as they pleaſed, without conſulting the protector, who was now regarded but as a private perſon[i]. This anarchy however laſted only a few days, during which the officers elected Fleetwood for their general. They diſcharged alſo by their own authority five colonels, who adviſed Richard to adhere to the parliament, namely, Ingoldſby, Goff, Whaley, lord Falconbridge, brother-in-law to Richard, and Howard, afterwards earl of Carliſle, and reſtored Lambert and others diſmiſſed by Cromwell a little before his death. After this, they conſidered of ſettling the government, it being impoſſible for things to continue long in their preſent ſituation.

Lambert was a man of immoderate ambition, and would not have ſcrupled to follow the example of Oliver, had the juncture ſeemed favourable to him. But Fleetwood being his general, and the idol of the army, he could not hope to ſucceed in an attempt to ſeize the government. He therefore thought proper to wait a more favourable opportunity, and, in the mean time, hinder Fleetwood from putting himſelf at the head of the government, whether under the name of protector, or any other title, to which he had ſeveral reaſons to believe he was aſpiring. Firſt, Cromwell had once named him for his ſucceſſor by an inſtrument under his own hand, and many believed this inſtrument had been artfully conveyed out of the way, either during Cromwell's life, or after his death, leſt it ſhould obſtruct his ſon Richard's election. It was even ſaid, that Cromwell's nomination of his ſon in the time of his illneſs, was only the contrivance of ſecretary Thurlo, and another perſon, to procure the ſucceſſion to Richard. Secondly, Fleetwood was one of the moſt zealous enthuſiaſts, of whom the army was full, and therefore looked upon with veneration by the ſoldiers, and judged moſt worthy to be Cromwell's ſucceſſor. Thirdly, it was hardly to be doubted, that it was the intereſt of the army to chuſe a protector, who ſhould depend on them, and in his turn ſupport their credit. This Lambert conſidered, but as it was not for his advantage to have Fleetwood raiſed to a dignity to which he himſelf aſpired, he ſecretly engaged colonel Lilburn to cabal among the inferior officers, and break Fleetwood's meaſures, if they pointed to the protectorſhip, whilſt he regularly made his court to him, and endeavoured by his flatteries to influence him as Cromwell had formerly influenced Fairfax. This example made Lambert hope, that he might the ſame way put himſelf one day at the head of the government.

Lambert's cabal being made with the greateſt ſecrecy, Fleetwood, as general, convened his officers to Wallingford houſe to ſettle the government. All the ſuperior officers came, but at the ſame time the inferior, by the intrigues of Lambert and Lilburn, aſſembled at St. James's in much greater numbers. In this aſſembly, the ſettlement of the government was likewiſe debated, and occaſion taken, to magnify the happineſs which England enjoyed under the adminiſtration of the parliament, from the 6th of December 1648, to the 20th of April 1653, when it was diſſolved by Cromwell. Their prudence, ſteadineſs, and happy ſucceſs in England, Scotland, Ireland, and in the Dutch war were extolled, with ſome intimations of advice, that nothing could be more advantageous to the three nations, than the reſtoration of that parliament[k].

This debate was carried no farther; but it ſufficed to convince the aſſembly at Wallingford houſe that a diviſion between them and the inferior officers could not but be dangerous to both, and that their beſt way was to join with the inferior officers in reſtoring the long parliament. It is not known what was the deſign of the chief officers with regard to the government, but it is certain, the propoſal of the inferior officers was contrary neither to the principles nor the ſentiments of the army in general. This will be eaſily perceived, when it is conſidered, that the officers and ſoldiers, for the moſt part were independents, anabaptiſts, enthuſiaſts, republicans, ſuch in a manner as were the members of the parliament diſſolved in 1653, and now propoſed to be reſtored. However this be, all the officers being united, declared for the good old cauſe, that is, for the cauſe ſupported by the parliament, which brought the king to the ſcaffold, and turned the monarchy into a common-wealth. It was therefore reſolved in a general council at Fleetwood's houſe, to reſtore the long parliament.

Mean while, as this parliament had no reaſon to be pleaſed with the army, which, in 1653, took part with Cromwell againſt them, the great officers were afraid, that when the members were reſtored to their authority, they would think of being revenged. Beſides, they knew the reſolution and firmneſs of theſe members, who would infallibly keep the army in a ſtate of dependence. The officers therefore judged it abſolutely neceſſary, before they proceeded, to demand certain conditions, and to be previouſly aſſured of that compliance of the parliament, when they ſhould reſume their authority. For that purpoſe, they had conferences with ſome of the members, who had been the leading men in the parliament, namely, Vane, Haſlerig, Scot, Salway, to engage them to promiſe, theſe conditions ſhould be granted. But theſe members would not make any ſuch promiſe, under colour, it did not belong to them to preclude the reſolutions of the parliament. This refuſal rendered them ſuſpected to the ſuperior officers, but the inferior, being the moſt numerous, overlooked this difficulty, and were contented with a verbal promiſe from theſe four members, that they would uſe their endeavours to procure a grant of theſe conditions.

THINGS being thus ſettled, Lambert at the head of a conſiderable number of officers[l], repaired to the houſe of Lenthal, ſpeaker of the long parliament, and preſented to him the declaration of the great council of officers, by which the members of the parliament diſſolved by Cromwell April the 20th, 1653, were invited to return to the exerciſe of their authority. Lenthal anſwered, he would communicate the declaration to the members then in London, which he did the next day, and, the invitation being accepted, they met in parliament the 7th of May, to the number of only forty two[m]. Thus the three nations were once more under the tyrannical dominion of a parliament, which had not feared to imbrue their hands in the blood of their ſovereign: but with this difference, that the number was reduced to the half of what it was in 1648, when the preſbyterian members were excluded. Hence they were called in deriſion the rump parliament, in alluſion to a fowl all devoured but the rump. The preſbyterian members, who had been expelled in 1648, would have reſumed their ſeats, but none were admitted beſides thoſe who had ſat, from the firſt of January, 1648, to the 20th of April, 1653, and in this the pretended parliament was ſupported by the officers, whoſe intereſt it was, not to ſuffer the preſbyterians to prevail in the houſe.

When the parliament was reſtored to their authority, they ſent Clarges to Monk, to engage him to ſubmit to the new government. They knew Monk was not of their principles, and if they had dared, inſtead of deſiring his acquieſcence, they would have ſent him a ſucceſſor, to govern Scotland. But Monk had ſo eſtabliſhed himſelf in that country, that being maſter of the fortified places, and aſſured of the affection of the Scots and of his army, it would have been dangerous to deprive him of his government againſt his will. It was therefore judged ſafeſt by the parliament to gain him by fair means, and undermine by degrees his credit and authority in the army. Monk had ſo little foreſeen the late change in England, that he had not time to take any meaſures to regulate his conduct. When he founded his officers, he found they were pre-engaged by letters from their friends in London. So, all he could do after the arrival of Clarges, was to acquieſce, and expreſs his ſatisfaction to ſee the parliament reſtored, though he was convinced, the leading men both in the parliament and army were not his friends.

Four days after the parliament met, Lambert, attended by ſeveral officers, preſented a petition and addreſs from the general council of officers, in which after ſome compliments, they demanded,

"1. That the liberty of the perſons, and property of the eſtates of all free people of theſe nations, be maintained, preſerved, and kept inviolable, according to law, under the government of a free ſtate and common-wealth, without a ſingle perſon, kingſhip, or houſe of peers.

"2. That there may be ſuch a juſt and due regulation of law, and courts of juſtice and equity, as that they may be a protection, and not vexatious or oppreſſive to the people of theſe nations.

"3. That by an act of oblivion, all and every perſon and perſons, who have, ſince the 19th of April, 1653, mediately or immediately adviſed, acted, or done any matter or thing whatſoever, in reference to the ſeveral changes or alterations in the government of theſe nations, ſince the ſaid 19th of April, 1653, or in order to the public ſervice, peace, or ſafety of theſe nations, be indemnified and ſaved harmleſs, to all intents and purpoſes whatſoever.

"4. That all laws, ordinances, declarations, and eſtabliſhments, made in the ſeveral changes and alterations of government, that have been in theſe nations, ſince the 19th of April aforeſaid, and not as yet particularly repealed, be deemed good in law, until particularly repealed.

"5. That ſuch debts as have been contracted for the public ſervice and affairs of this common-wealth, and for the charges of the government, ſince the 20th of April, 1653, be carefully paid and ſatisfied.

"6. That all perſons who profeſs faith in God the father, and in Jeſus Chriſt his eternal Son the true God, and in the Holy Spirit God co-equal with the Father and the Son, one God bleſſed for ever, and do acknowledge the holy ſcriptures of the Old and New Teſtament, to be the revealed or written word or will of God, ſhall not be reſtrained from their profeſſion, but have due encouragement, and equal protection in the profeſſion of their faith, and exerciſe of religion, whilſt they abuſe not their liberty to the civil injury of others, or diſturbance of others in their way of worſhip: ſo that this liberty be not extended to popery or prelacy, nor to ſuch as ſhall practice or hold forth licentiouſneſs or profaneneſs, under the profeſſion of religion: and that all laws, ſtatutes, or ordinances, and clauſes in any laws, ſtatutes, or ordinances to the contrary, may be declared null and void.

"7. That a godly, faithful, and painful goſpel-preaching miniſtry be every where encouraged, countenanced, and maintained.

"8. That the univerſities and ſchools of learning be ſo countenanced and reformed, as that they may become the nurſeries of piety and learning.

"9. That ſuch perſons as have, at any time ſince the 20th of May, 1642, aided, or aſſiſted, or adhered to the late king, Charles Stuart his ſon, or any other perſon or perſons whatſoever of that party, againſt the parliament or common-wealth of England, and all other perſons whatſoever, that have made uſe of any authority or power under pretence of law, or otherwiſe, to deprive or abridge any of the good people of theſe nations of their chriſtian liberty, or have, or ſhall expreſs themſelves in any way mockers, ſcoffers, or revilers of godlineſs, or of the profeſſors thereof, or are otherways ſcandalous or looſe in their converſations, or have not given good ſatisfaction of their affection and faithfulneſs to this cauſe, may be ſpeedily removed out of all places of power or truſt in the magiſtracy, or other management of the public affairs of theſe nations; and that no ſuch perſons may be admitted unto any ſuch place of power or truſt for the future.

"10. And foraſmuch as no godly, or other good intereſt can be preſerved, or maintained, unleſs the perſons, who are chiefly intruſted with the management and exerciſe of the government, be of ſuitable ſpirits to thoſe intereſts; that thoſe who are or ſhall be intruſted therein, be ſuch perſons as ſhall be found to be moſt eminent for godlineſs, faithfulneſs, and conſtancy to the good cauſe and intereſts of theſe nations.

"11. That to the end the legiſlative authority of this common-wealth may not, by their long ſitting, become burthenſome or inconvenient, there may be effectual proviſion made for a due ſucceſſion thereof.

" 12. And for the better ſatisfaction, and more firm union of the forces of this common-wealth, in this juncture of affairs, for preſerving and maintaining the principles, and other matters thereunto ſubſervient, we do unanimouſly acknowledge and own the lord Charles Fleetwood lieutenant general of the army, to be commander in chief of the land forces of this common-wealth.

" 13. That in order to the eſtabliſhing and ſecuring the peace, welfare, and freedom of the people of theſe nations, for the ends before expreſſed, the legiſlative power thereof may be in a repreſentative of the people, conſiſting of a houſe, ſucceſſively choſen by the people, in ſuch a way and manner as this parliament ſhall judge meet, and of a ſelect ſenate, co-ordinate in power, of able and faithful perſons, eminent for godlineſs, and ſuch as continue adhering to this cauſe.

" 14. That the adminiſtration of all executive power of government, may be in a council of ſtate, conſiſting of a convenient number of perſons qualified, in all reſpects, as aforeſaid.

" 15. That all debts contracted by his late highneſs, or his father, ſince the 15th of December, 1653, may be ſatisfied, and that an honourable revenue of ten thouſand pounds per annum, with a convenient houſe, may be ſettled upon him and his heirs for ever; and ten thouſand pounds per annum more upon him during life; and upon his honourable mother, eight thouſand pounds per annum during her life, to the end a mark of the high eſteem this nation hath of the good ſervice done by his father, our ever renowned general, may remain to poſterity."

The parliament returned a general anſwer to this petition, and thanked the army for their affection to the public. Then, taking it into conſideration, they approved of all the articles in general, but appointed a particular committee to examine thoſe which concerned the government. As to what related to Richard Cromwell and his mother, it was not to be debated, till they ſhould be aſſured of his ſubmiſſion to the government. For this purpoſe, a committee was ſent to inform him of the reſolutions of the houſe, and to require his acquieſcence in the late change. The day after, Richard delivered to them the following anſwer in writing:

" I have peruſed the reſolve and declaration which you were pleaſed to deliver to me the other night, and for information touching what is mentioned in the ſaid reſolve, I have cauſed a true ſtate of my debts to be tranſcribed, and annexed to this paper, which will ſhew what they are, and how they were contracted.

" As to that part of the reſolve, whereby the committee are to inform themſelves, how far I do acquieſce in the government of this common-wealth, as it is declared by this parliament:

" I truſt, my paſt carriage hitherto hath manifeſted my acquieſcence in the will and diſpoſition of God, and that I love and value the peace of this common-wealth much above my own concernments; and I deſire, that by this, a meaſure of my future deportment may be taken, which, through the aſſiſtance of God, ſhall be ſuch as ſhall bear the ſame witneſs, having, I hope, in ſome degree, learned rather to reverence and ſubmit to the hand of God, than to be unquiet under it. And (as to the late providence that have fallen out amongſt us) however, in reſpect of particular engagements that lay upon me, I could not be active in making a change in the government of the nations; yet, through the goodneſs of God, I can freely acquieſce in it being made; and do hold myſelf obliged, as (with other men) I expect protection frem the preſent government, ſo to demean myſelf with all peaceableneſs under it, and to procure to the utmoſt of my power, that all in whom I have any intereſt do the ſame."

RICHARD CROMWELL.

When the parliament examined the account of Richard's debts, the article of expences for his father's funeral was rejected, ſo that Richard was forced to pay that debt out of his inheritance, which ſwept away the greateſt part of his eſtate, which was not very large, conſidering Cromwell's advancement during his life. As to the revenue, and annual penſion deſired by the officers for Richard and his mother, the parliament referred the conſideration of them to another opportunity, and contented themſelves with aſſigning twenty thouſand pounds for the payment of his private debts[n]. The members had but too much cauſe to complain of Oliver Cromwell, who had deceived, and ſhamefully diſmiſſed them, to think themſelves obliged to do ſo much honour to his memory, and beſtow ſo great advantages on his widow and ſon. When they granted him the twenty thouſand pounds, they required him to remove from Whitehall in ſix days[o].

It may be obſerved in the 12th article of the petition of the officers, that, as they expreſſed themſelves, they did not intend to leave to the parliament the liberty of not appointing a general, or of naming any other than Fleetwood, ſince, inſtead of petitioning, they ſaid in that article, " We do unanimouſly acknowledge the lord Charles Fleetwood to be commander in chief of the land forces of the commonwealth." The parliament thought it not proper then to examine the manner in which this article was expreſſed, for fear of raiſing ſome difference between them and the army, at a time when they derived their authority only from the declaration of the officers who had reſtored them. Fleetwood therefore was appointed commander in chief of the land forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but only for one year. This reſolution being taken, the parliament voted, that Fleetwood ſhould have power to ſign and ſeal ſuch commiſſions, for the conſtituting of officers under him, as ſhould be approved by the parliament, and nominated by ſir Henry Vane, ſir Arthur Haſlerig, lieutenant-general Fleetwood, and the colonels Lambert, Deſborough, Ludlow, Berry, or the major part of them, who were made commiſſioners for that purpoſe. But upon the ſecond reading of the bill, the clauſe impowering Fleetwood to ſign commiſſions was altered, and it was ordered, that all commiſſions, both to the commiſſion-officers of the army, and the captains of the fleet, ſhould be ſigned by the ſpeaker of the parliament of the common-wealth of England, to be written by the clerks attending the council of ſtate[p], and delivered to the officers gratis by the ſpeaker, in the parliament houſe. This was a plain indication, that the parliament pretended, that the officers ſhould owe their advancement to them alone. The ſame day the parliament voted, That the government of Ireland ſhould be by commiſſioners, nominated and appointed by parliament, and not by one perſon, and that Henry Cromwell ſhould be acquainted with the order, and required forthwith to repair to the parliament. He peaceably ſubmitted, though, in all probability, if he had been inclined to reſiſt, the new governors would have found it difficult to remove him. He was extremely beloved in Ireland, both by the army and the Engliſh inhabitants, having never injured any perſon, but, on the contrary, obliged every one, as far as lay in his power. But, doubtleſs, not thinking himſelf ſecure of ſucceſs, and receiving no orders from his brother, he was unwilling to undertake ſo important an affair. All the hiſtorians are unanimous in their praiſes of him, and generally believe, that if he had been protector inſtead of his elder brother, the officers would have met with their match, or not attempted what they undertook againſt Richard.

Fleetwood, Deſborough, Lambert, and the reſt of the principal officers, were by no means pleaſed with the proceedings of the parliament, but knowing, the inferior officers conſidered their dependence on the parliament as an advantage, they diſſembled their reſentments, and received their commiſſions from the ſpeaker. On the other hand, the parliament believed it of the utmoſt importance, to be maſter of the army; which they flattered themſelves, would enable them to rule peaceably and abſolutely, and, without doubt, perpetuate their authority. But till this was done, [n] Whitelock ſays, that his debts were in all, twenty-nine thouſand, ſix hundred, and forty pounds. p. 681. And Ludlow, that the parliament ordered twenty thouſand pounds to be preſently paid him, and paſſed a reſolution to pay thoſe debts he had contracted on the public account. Tom. II. p. 665.

[o] After the reſtoration he went to France, and continued ſome years in obſcurity at Paris; but upon the rumour of a war between France and England, he removed to Geneva. Some years before the death of king Charles II. he returned to England, and died at Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire in 1712. Life of Cromwell, p. 432.

[p] The parliament had named a council of ſtate, for the more immediate executive power. It was to conſiſt of thirty one perſons, whereof twenty one were to be members of parliament, and ten not. The twenty one were, Whitelock, ſir James Harrington, ſir Arthur Haſlerig, ſir Henry Vane, Thomas Chaloner, Henry Nevil, chief juſtice St. John's, Thomas Scott, Robert Reynolds, Wallop; lieutenant-general Fleetwood, major Saloway, colonel Morley, Algernon Sidney, Walton, Dixwell, Thompſon, Sydenham, Jones, Downes, and Ludlow: the ten were, preſident Bradſhaw, lord Fairfax, major-general Lambert, ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, ſir Horatio Townſend, colonel Deſborough, Berry, Barnes, Johnſon, and Honywood. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 656. They had alſo nominated the judges and commiſſioners of the great ſeal, a new one being made different from the old, &c. Whitelock, p. 679.

Where

they ſaw they were to expect a ſtrong oppoſition, conſidering the reſtleſs temper of the principal officers, who were ever ſeeking to make themſelves neceſſary, for fear of loſing their poſts. This was the firſt and almoſt open deſign of the parliament. For this purpoſe, the committee appointed to examine commiſſions was continued, who knowing the intentions of the houſe, made great alterations in the army, diſplacing ſuch as were ſuſpected, and ſubſtituting others of more aſſured fidelity. The ſame thing was done to the army commanded by Monk, and many officers being removed, others were appointed to ſucceed them, and thoſe that were diſplaced were moſt confided in by Monk. Clarges had now acquainted Monk with the parliament's deſigns, which were very manifeſt, and Monk had but too much cauſe to perceive them by the alterations, the committee would have made in the army of Scotland. He writ to the committee ſo as to ſhew them, he plainly ſaw their deſign to undermine his authority. He uſed ſome expreſſions in his letter, which made the parliament apprehenſive there would be danger in driving a man to extremities, who had twelve thouſand men, and all Scotland at his diſpoſal. For this reaſon, the officers, appointed by the committee to go into Scotland, received orders, not to proceed on their journey. But this was only to gain time, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity.

The 18th of June the parliament voted the continuation of the monthly aſſeſſment of thirty-five thouſand pounds, impoſed by the parliament of the year 1656. Then, commiſſioners were named for the civil government of Ireland, and a commiſſion granted to Edmund Ludlow, who was one of the king's judges, and a moſt zealous republican, to command the forces of that country.

Mean time, the parliament having received confuſed intimations of a plot forming in favour of the king, the royaliſts had orders to withdraw twenty miles from London. This intimation was not groundleſs. In March this year, the king, by a declaration, had impowered commiſſioners to treat in his name with thoſe, who having been againſt him or his father, were willing to return to his obedience. Theſe commiſſioners ſpared neither pains nor promiſes, to increaſe the number of the king's friends, and certainly there could not be a more favourable opportunity. All were weary of the tyranny of an independent parliament, conſiſting of forty perſons, and of an army, whoſe officers were moſtly fanatics, and who, under colour of promoting piety, and extending the kingdom of Chriſt, had only their intereſt in view. The preſbyterians themſelves, and the members of that party, who had been expelled the houſe in 1648, ſeeing little appearance of ever recovering the ground they had loſt, and that nevertheleſs they remained expoſed to the tyranny of the independents and fanatics, agreed at laſt with the king's party, to deliver the nation from the ſervitude to which it was reduced. The particulars and terms of this union are not known, becauſe the hiſtorians who ſpeak of it, being all royaliſts, have not thought fit to do ſo much honour to the preſbyterians. But it can't be concealed, that from this time, the preſbyterians no longer appeared as the king's enemies, but on the contrary, as will hereafter be ſeen, very much promoted his reſtoration.

It was on the hopes, that the preſbyterians would aſſiſt, or at leaſt not oppoſe them, that the royaliſts projected an inſurrection in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in expectation, it would at laſt become general. For this purpoſe, they intended to ſeize at once Glouceſter, Lynn, Plymouth, Exeter and Cheſter. They believed their meaſures ſo well taken, that they doubted not of ſucceſs. For they ſtill relied on the people's affection for the king, in which they were often miſtaken. Mr. Mordaunt croſſed the ſea, to inform the king of the project, which he thought ſo well laid, that he repaired ſecretly to Calais[q], and then to St. Malo's, to be nearer England, in caſe the plot ſucceeded. But this project vaniſhed like the reſt. Sir Richard Willis who as I have ſaid, betrayed the king's party, informed Thurlo of it, and Thurlo the council of ſtate, who immediately put the militia in ſafe hands, and took other precautions, which invincibly obſtructed the execution of the project. Maſſey was taken in attempting to ſurprize Glouceſter, but found means to eſcape. The lord Willoughby of Parham, and ſir Horatio Townſend, who were gone to the weſt[r] to ſerve the king, were arreſted and ſent to priſon. There was only ſir George Booth, who aſſembling about four or five thouſand men, took Cheſter, and publiſhed a manifeſto againſt the tyranny of the parliament, without any mention of the king, intending to make the public believe, that the people's diſcontent was the ſole motive of his taking up arms. Sir Thomas Middleton joined him with ſome troops, but theſe two united bodies were ſo inconſiderable, that Lambert, who marched againſt them, by order of parliament, eaſily defeated them, and retook Cheſter. Sir George Booth had the good fortune at firſt to eſcape, but was taken ſome days after in woman's clothes, and brought to the Tower of London. Middleton retired to a caſtle of his own, which held out but few days. It did not appear on this occaſion that the people had the king's intereſt much at heart[s].

During theſe tranſactions, the king's friends not doubting of ſucceſs, ſent the reverend Nicolas Monk, the general's brother, into Scotland, to engage him in the king's party. Some have pretended, that Monk, full of hopes, that the king's party in England would ſucceed, was upon the point of marching to ſupport them, but was ſtopped by the news of Booth's defeat, and forced to feign himſelf entirely devoted to the parliament. I cannot eaſily believe that Monk ſo early thought of ſerving the king. However, it cannot be denied, that the parliament looked on Monk as a man in whom they could not confide, becauſe his principles were very far from fanaticiſm, which then infected both parliament and army. This the parliament plainly ſhewed, immediately after Booth's and Middleton's defeat by Lambert. For judging that victory would keep Monk in awe, they readily confirmed the changes before intended in the army of Scotland. Monk was ſo offended with this proceeding, that he writ to the ſpeaker, to diſire his diſmiſſion, but Clarges his brother-in-law prevailed with the ſpeaker not to communicate this letter to the parliament, who doubtleſs would not have failed to grant his requeſt.

As the peace between France and Spain was to be treated at St. Jean de Luz, by the prime miniſters of the two crowns, the king believed his preſence at this negotiation might procure him ſome advantage. He therefore departed for Fontarabia in September, and croſſed the kingdom of France incognito. I ſhall ſpeak preſently of the ſucceſs of this journey, but muſt firſt relate the change which happened in England.

The principal officers of the army, who kept in London, were ſtill highly diſpleaſed with the parliament, plainly perceiving, their deſign was to become maſter of the army. Wherefore, they began to think of means to prevent this deſign, and maintain themſelves in their credit and poſts. They had for that purpoſe ſeveral ſecret meetings. But one difficulty was to be ſurmounted, before any reſolution could be taken. This was, that the inferior officers were very well pleaſed with the parliament, who greatly careſſed them, intending to uſe them, to get rid of their commanders. Lambert, who commanded the forces about Cheſter, was entirely in the party of Fleetwood and Deſborough, knowing, the parliament had no better intentions for him, than for the others. Beſides, his chief aim was to procure a perpetual confirmation of the generalſhip to Fleetwood, in hopes to govern and make uſe of him for his own advancement to that poſt, as Cromwell had before done to Fairfax. Though he was abſent from London, he was informed of what paſſed at their meeting, and gave his advice. At laſt, after many deliberations, it was reſolved, that Lambert ſhould try to gain the inferior officers of his army, which was leſs difficult, than to gain the officers of the reſt of the army, who were diſperſed in different quarters. Purſuant to this reſolution, Lambert coming to Darby, ſo managed, that his officers, whom he had carefully inſpired with diſcontent, met to draw a petition, which, before it was offered to the parliament, was to be communicated to Fleetwood, for the approbation of the general council of officers. Sir Arthur Haſlerig having received advice that the petition was come to London, informed the commons, and told them, the army was contriving a very dangerous plot, of which it was neceſſary to prevent the conſequences. Upon this declaration Fleetwood was examined by the parliament, whether he knew any thing of the petition? He anſwered, he had a copy of it, and the original was in the hands of three officers, whom he named. Whereupon he was ordered to give notice to theſe officers to attend the houſe that afternoon with the petition, which was done, and the petition read. The ſtile was in the faſhionable language of that time.

[q] Where he ſtaid ſome time, before he went to St. Malo's.

[r] They undertook to ſecure Norfolk and Lynn for the king. Thoſe that deſigned to act in the weſt, were, Arundel, Pollard, Greenvil, Trelawny, &c. Clarendon, tom. III. p. 521, 522.

[s] After this defeat, the parliament thought of tranſporting the loyal families into Barbadoes, Jamaica, and other plantations; and by degrees to remodel the army, that they might never give them more trouble. Clarendon, tom. III. p. 541.

The

amongſt thoſe who pretend to a more exalted piety. The ſubſtance of it was to this effect:

" 1. That the parliament would be pleaſed not to ſuffer the petition of the general council of officers at Wallingford houſe to be laid aſleep, as it was the beſt expedient yet offered to a happy and durable ſettlement.

" 2. That ſince a great many ill-affected perſons were endeavouring to ſow diviſion in the army, the parliament would be pleaſed, for the preſervation of that union, wherein its greateſt ſtrength lay, to eſtabliſh firmly the lord Fleetwood in the command of the army, whoſe commiſſion was to expire in a few months, with Lambert for his lieutenant-general, Deſborough for the command of the horſe, and Monk of the foot.

" 3. That conſidering the negligence of a great many perſons intruſted with public employs; the ill deſigns of the enemies of the good cauſe; the activity of ſome to favour thoſe deſigns, and the affection and zeal ſhewn by others for a blameable neutrality, at a time, when their aſſiſtance is moſt wanted; the parliament would be pleaſed to make a diligent enquiry upon this ſubject, and proceed to the depriving of the guilty of all their employs: that on the contrary, ſuch as in this diſtracted juncture declared willingly and cheerfully for the good cauſe, either in the county troops, or militia volunteers, or otherwiſe, may be looked on as friends, encouraged, ſatisfied in their arrears, and inveſted with authority in their ſeveral counties.

" 4. That in the late inſurrections ſome conſiderable corporations having aſſiſted the enemy, received and furniſhed them with arms; the parliament would be pleaſed to give ſome ſignal mark of their diſfavour againſt them; and for the future ſo regulate the corporations, that perſons well qualified, according to the government of a well conſtituted common-wealth, may be intruſted with authority of the magiſtracy in any of the ſeveral towns, that ſo the footſteps of monarchy may be rooted out.

" 5. That all perſons whatſoever, magiſtrates, miniſters, or others, who have ſecretly ſtirred up the inhabitants of theſe nations to war and commotions againſt the parliament, and particularly to the late inſurrections, may be proceeded againſt as the parliament in their judgment ſhall think fit."

The houſe, in a debate upon this petition, the next morning voted, " That to have any more general officers in the army than are already ſettled by the parliament, is needleſs, chargeable, and dangerous to the common-wealth; and that Fleetwood ſhall acquaint them with this reſolve [1].

Fleetwood having communicated this vote to ſome officers at his own houſe, it was reſolved, that the petition ſhould not be inſiſted on, but, on the contrary, an addreſs offered to the parliament, to profeſs an adherence to their authority againſt the common enemy, and that they would ſtand by them in the ſettlement of the common-wealth, againſt all oppoſitions whatſoever; and that this ſhould be prepared and brought to be read, and conſidered by a general council of officers, to meet for that purpoſe, the 27th of September.

Thoſe who had the care of preparing the addreſs, diſcharged their truſt, in a manner little agreeable to the intention of the perſons who ordered it, as will be ſeen preſently. However, the addreſs was approved in the general council of officers, by a majority of voices, and ſigned by two hundred and thirty officers, who were in and about London, but was not preſented till the 5th of October. In this interval of ſeven or eight days, the officers ſent a copy of the petition to general Monk for his concurrence, though they were reſolved not to ſtay for his anſwer. On the other hand, the parliament took all poſſible meaſures to hinder its being preſented, whether by ſatisfying the army in its arrears, or by ſowing diviſion amongſt the officers, as they knew the addreſs was not univerſally approved, the viſible aim whereof was, to beget a breach between the army and the parliament. But all their endeavours were fruitleſs. The 5th of October, Deſborough, with many other officers, went to the houſe to preſent the petition. It was introduced by a long preamble, in which it was pretended, That the intentions of the army were maliciouſly repreſented to the parliament by ill-affected perſons, to create diviſion betwixt the parliament and the army; and that it was in juſtification of themſelves, from ſuch falſe accuſations, that they preſented this humble addreſs, containing the four following aſſertions:

" We do humbly and plainly declare,

" That notwithſtanding what any perſons may ſuggeſt, or ſay to the contrary, we are not for, but againſt the ſetting up any ſingle perſon whatſoever in ſupreme authority: and for a demonſtration hereof we may appeal to your own judgments, upon our late actings, wherein, ſince our declaration of the ſixth of May laſt, we have, with all induſtry and faithfulneſs, endeavoured to render ourſelves ſerviceable to you and the common-wealth, and have chearfully obſerved your commands, ſome of us with our lives in our hands in your late ſervice: wherein to our great encouragement, the Lord hath once appeared to own you and your army, and the good old cauſe, for which we have contended. And at the late return of this parliament to the diſcharge of their remaining truſt, we did with ſimplicity and plainneſs, in our humble petition and addreſs preſented to you, manifeſt our hearts and deſires, and that with much unanimity and fulneſs of conſent, which we apprehend was well accepted by you.

" 2. That we have not ſince changed our principles leading to a well regulated common-wealth, wherein the liberties of the people thereof, both ſpiritual and civil, may be fully ſecured, and perſons of known integrity, piety, and ability, employed in places of truſt and concernment, but reſolve, by the aſſiſtance of God, to remain conſtant to them: and make it our humble prayer to God, that he would incline your hearts effectually to proſecute the ſame, and make you inſtrumental in bringing forth ſuch a foundation of government, whereby all the good people of theſe nations may rationally expect, that ſuch liberties and rights ſhall be preſerved to them and their poſterity. And we can truly ſay, that it is in our hearts earneſtly to deſire that God would crown you with the honour of making theſe nations happy, by ſuch a ſettlement as may not be liable to every change of governors, and to have the peace thereof diſturbed by introducing new governments.

" 3. Whereas a petition and propoſals were lately drawn up by the officers of the brigade, that (under the command of major-general Lambert) hazarded themſelves in your ſervice with good ſucceſs, whereby, through the bleſſing of God upon them, and others of your faithful friends and ſervants, the peace of this common-wealth is ſtill continued: and the ſaid petition was ſent up to ſome officers here, to be preſented to the lord Fleetwood; which had been by ſome interpreted to evil and ſiniſter ends, and from thence ſuggeſtions derived, as if they were intentions to violate the parliament, to ſet up a ſingle perſon, or another general: in order thereunto, we do ſincerely profeſs (whatever the deſign of any perſons may be to promote ſuch cauſeleſs jealouſies) we have had no other than faithfulneſs and candour in our hearts and actions towards the parliament; nor do we apprehend (with ſubmiſſion we may ſpeak it) any reaſon or cauſe of offence to be conceived againſt your faithful ſervants, who lately gave ſo ample proof of their fidelity and courage.

" 4. We cannot but eſteem ourſelves unhappy to have been ſo miſrepreſented to the parliament, as ſhould occaſion ſuch a public admonition upon record: and conſidering what evil uſe may be made of theſe things by the public enemy, and to the end they may be diſappointed of their hopes, and all ſuch perſons diſcouraged, as ſhall go about for the future to promote jealouſies, or by miſinformation, to beget diviſions betwixt the parliament and their faithful ſervants the army: and that a good underſtanding may be preſerved between them, we humbly pray:

" That the officers of the army, and particularly thoſe who have reaſon to bear the marks of your favour for their faithfulneſs in the late northern expedition, may ſtand right in your opinion, and have your countenance.

" 2. That whatſoever perſon or perſons ſhall for the future groundleſly and cauſeleſly, inform the houſe againſt your ſervants, thereby creating jealouſies, and ſcandalous imputations upon them, may be brought to examination, juſtice, and condign puniſhment.

" 3. That it being an undoubted right of the people to have a liberty, in a peaceable and ſubmiſſive way, to petition the ſupreme authority, which liberty hath been by yourſelves aſſerted, allowed, and approved of; we cannot but alſo aſſert the ſaid liberty, and humbly conceive, that your faithful ſervants of the army, have no ways forfeited their rights as freemen, and that therefore they hope it will be no offence for them to ſubmit their humble deſires to the parliament.

" 4. That you would be pleaſed to take into your ſerious conſideration, the neceſſitous condition of the poor ſoldiers of your armies, and that all poſſible care may be taken for their timely ſupply, their wants being ſuch as earneſtly call for it: and that ſome ſpeedy and effectual courſe may be taken to provide for the maimed ſoldiers, and the poor widows and orphans of ſuch as have been ſlain in your ſervice, that the bleſſing of God may be upon you.

" 5. That ſuch who have freely offered themſelves in the ſeveral counties and cities of theſe nations, to own and ſtand by you and your cauſe in the late inſurrections, with the hazard of all which is dear unto them, may have your encouragement, and be employed in places of truſt and command.

" 6. That it being a thing granted by all, that without due execution of martial diſcipline, the peace, union, and good government of an army cannot be preſerved inviolable, and in particular, that no officer or ſoldier of the army may be caſhiered, or diſmiſſed from their places, without a due proceeding at a court martial, or by his own conſent, except in caſes of reducement or diſbanding.

" 7. That it being judged neceſſary by the parliament, for the keeping of the army under ſuch a conduct, as may render the ſame ſerviceable to the common-wealth, to appoint a committee of nominations, for the propoſing of officers to the parliament, for their approbation; we humbly pray, that no officers may be brought into the army, but ſuch as ſhall firſt come under the conſideration of the ſaid committee, and be by them preſented.

" 8. The office of the commander in chief of the army, being of ſo great concernment to the peace of this common-wealth, and his commiſſion at preſent (as we conceive) expiring within a few months, we humbly pray, that the conſideration of that matter may come before you, and ſome ſuch effectual courſe be taken therein, as may prevent our fears, and the hazard of leaving the army to confuſion.

" 9. And that you would retain a good opinion of your army, and, againſt all diſcouragement whatſoever, proceed in the carrying on of that good work intruſted in your hands, for the glory of God, and advantage of theſe nations. In the proſecution whereof, through the help of our God, we ſhall be found (notwithſtanding all endeavours to the contrary) faithful to you and this common-wealth."

How reſpectful ſoever the terms of this addreſs might be, the parliament were not pleaſed with the contents, as it ſeemed to teach them their duty, or rather to reproach them for neglecting it. They had forgot, that this was the language of the army to the preſbyterian parliament, in ſupport of the independent party, and how grateful it had been to them. It was manifeſt, the officers ſought an occaſion of quarrel, and the parliament was but too ſenſible of it. But they had no ſupport againſt the army, and the hopes of diviſion amongſt the officers, becauſe many oppoſed the preſenting the addreſs, was their only reſource. For this reaſon after ſome members had warmly inveighed againſt the inſolence of the officers, the houſe, however, returned a moderate anſwer, to gain time, and keep them in temper, whom they were unable to reſiſt. The officers therefore, who had delivered the addreſs, were called in and thanked by the ſpeaker, for their affection and faithfulneſs to the parliament: to which he added, that the parliament had already taken into conſideration the relief of the maimed ſoldiers, orphans, and widows; and had alſo ſettled a way for ſatisfaction of the arrears due to the army, and would endeavour to bring the ſame to ſpeedy effect.

Deſborough brought the anſwer to the general council of officers, who aſſembled that day. But as they were informed of the ſpeeches againſt them in the houſe, it was ſuſpected, that the parliament intended only to gain time, to ſtrengthen themſelves, or to change the conſtitution of the army. Wherefore, they reſolved to cauſe their addreſs to be ſigned by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and to write to them on that ſubject, which was done the ſame day.

Two days after, the parliament receiving a letter from Monk, with aſſurances of his entire obedience, returned him a gracious anſwer, letting him know the high eſteem they had of his ſervices, with a promiſe to revoke all the orders which might have given him any cauſe of diſguſt. The parliament and officers thought it of great importance to gain Monk to their intereſt. The parliament's hopes of that general's good diſpoſition towards them, gave them a little more firmneſs than they had at firſt ſhewn. So, in their debates upon the propoſals of the officers, a particular anſwer was returned to each article, and the officers given to underſtand, that their complaints were cauſeleſs, and the parliament neither obliged nor pleaſed to give them an account of their conduct. This anſwer convinced the officers, that things were come to that point, that they were either to ſubmit to the parliament, or endeavour a diſſolution. But they could not reſolve to ſubmit, without trying firſt to render themſelves ſuperior. To that end, Lambert marched his brigade towards London, and appeared there himſelf to ſupport his friends. The parliament on their ſide, ſeeing a breach with the army was not very remote, haſtily paſſed an act, to declare it high treaſon to levy money upon the people without the conſent of parliament. Herein their aim was to hinder the army's ſubſiſtence. They did ſtill more: For Monk the clergyman being arrived from Scotland, with aſſurances from his brother the general of his ſupporting the parliament, and marching to their aſſiſtance, if required, Lambert, Deſborough, and ſome other principal officers, who had ſigned the addreſs, were diſplaced by the parliament. Then they annulled Fleetwood's commiſſion, and named commiſſioners[u] for the government of the army, from the 11th of October to the 22d of February. But theſe proceedings not being ſupported with power, the officers received the parliament's orders with ſcorn.

Mean time, the council of ſtate, being informed that Lambert was aſſembling the army, ordered two regiments to Weſtminſter, to guard the parliament, whoſe colonels and officers were devoted to them, and had refuſed to ſign the addreſs. This did not prevent Lambert from executing his deſign. Having drawn ſome regiments into London, on the 13th of October he ſecured all the avenues to the parliament[w]. Preſently after, the ſpeaker appearing in his coach, as he was going to the houſe, was ſtopped by Lambert, and forced to return. Then he ſent to the colonels of the two regiments in Palace-yard, to retire to their quarters, which they refuſing to do, he ſmiled and bid them ſtay there as long as they pleaſed. But at the ſame time, he took care to ſtop all the members who were going to the houſe, and hinder them from entering[x]. So the parliament, as well for want of a ſufficient number of members, as for the abſence of the ſpeaker, not being able to ſit that day, the two regiments placed at Weſtminſter to ſecure them from violence retired, after having remained there till night. They were no ſooner gone, than Fleetwood ſeized the poſts, and placed a ſtrong guard at the door of the parliament-houſe, to hinder the members from aſſembling. Next day the diſcontented officers caſhiered, by their own authority, thoſe of the two regiments appointed to guard the parliament, and ſent others to fill their places. The ſoldiers obeyed the new officers, and abandoned the old.

This anarchy laſted ten days, before the officers now grown ſuperior, thought of ſettling any form of government. All they did, was to nominate ten of their own body to form a council, to take care of the moſt urgent affairs. Then they declared Fleetwood their general, Lambert their lieutenant-general, and Deſborough commiſſary general of the horſe. They eſtabliſhed likewiſe a council of ſeven to nominate ſuch officers as were not ſuſpected, with orders to exclude thoſe, in whom they could not confide. Mean while a diſcipline ſo exact was obſerved by the troops, that it was wonderful to ſee ſoldiers ſo ſubmiſſive to their officers, and ſo inoffenſive to the people during ſuch an anarchy. As the officers were ſtill uneaſy about Monk, whom they ſuſpected, becauſe he was not of their principles, and beſides, was an enemy to Lambert, colonel Cobbet was ſent to try to gain him to their party, with ſecret orders, in caſe he could not ſucceed, to endeavour to corrupt his troops, and, if poſſible, put him under an arreſt. Clarges gave Monk intelligence of Cobbet's ſecret commiſſion.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the king was on his journey to Fontarabia, where he arrived but very little time before the treaty between the two crowns was concluded, having by miſtake[y] proceeded to Saragoſſa, where [w] Whitelock ſays, Evelyn who commanded the life guard of the parliament, marching forth with his troop, was met by Lambert at Scotland yard gate, who commanded him to diſmount, which he thought ſafeſt to do, though at the head of his troop, and though Lambert was alone, and on foot. The troop alſo obeyed Lambert, which he placed along King-ſtreet, and ſtopped the ſpeaker. Mem. p. 685.

[x] Sir Peter Wentworth alone, being rowed by ſome able watermen, broke through the guard on the river, and got into the houſe. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 725.

[y] This miſtake aroſe not from the ignorance of the way leading to Fontarabia, but from a miſtake in the king's intelligence. That the treaty between the two crowns was finiſhed, whilſt it was actually in negotiation. In the firſt caſe, the king had no buſineſs at Fontarabia, and therefore curioſity, and perhaps ſome better view, determined him to go to Madrid. When his miſtake was removed, he turned back, and purſued his firſt intended journey, to Fontarabia. See Clarendon, tom. III. p. 537.

Con-

he had no buſineſs, while the two miniſters of France and Spain finiſhed their treaty. But in all likelihood, he would have received no advantage from that treaty, though he had arrived at the beginning. Nay, it is difficult to conceive, what advantages he propoſed to himſelf from this journey, nor has the earl of Clarendon thought fit to inform his readers. Don Lewis de Haro, prime miniſter of Spain, received him very civilly, and expreſſed a ſenſe of his unhappy condition, by making him a preſent of ſeven thouſand piſtoles. But cardinal Mazarin, for fear of rendering himſelf ſuſpected to the parliament, would not ſo much as ſee him. So the king left Fontarabia, in order for Bruſſels, where he arrived the latter end of December.

MEAN time, the great council of officers held frequent aſſemblies in London, to endeavour at ſome ſettlement of the government, which could not be in greater confuſion than at preſent. At laſt, on the 26th of October, thirteen days after the diſperſion of the parliament, they agreed to eſtabliſh a committee of ſafety[z], and put the government into their hands. Sir Henry Vane, who, ſince the laſt change, had come into the meaſures of the army, was of this committee, with Fleetwood, Lambert, Deſborough, Ludlow, &c. The great council of officers as ſole ſovereign then of the three kingdoms, authoriſed this committee to execute all the powers of the late council of ſtate, with authority to puniſh delinquents concerned in the late conſpiracy: to give indemnity to all who had acted for the common-wealth ſince the year 1649: to oppoſe and ſuppreſs all rebellions and inſurrections: to diſpoſe of all places of truſt that were void, and remove ſuch as were ſcandalous: to treat with foreign ſtates: to raiſe the militia: and laſtly, to make ſale and compoſition for the eſtates of delinquents. At the ſame time, a declaration was publiſhed, to annul the acts or orders of the parliament, of the 10th, 11th, and 12th of October. In this paper the officers declared, that they had no deſign to erect a military government, but had already lodged the executive part in a committee of ſafety, who were to prepare ſuch a form of government as might beſt comport with a free ſtate and common-wealth, without a ſingle perſon, kingſhip, or houſe of lords. This declaration ended with ſome ſcriptural expreſſions, adapted to the taſte and practice of the godly party.

While the officers ruled in England, Monk was greatly embarraſſed in Scotland. He was indeed at the head of the government, and of twelve thouſand men, moſt of whom he could rely on, though many of the officers were fanatics, or inclined to be ſo, and conſequently juſtly ſuſpected by him. But this army was ſupported by money regularly paid from England, Scotland being unable to maintain them. Monk had thereby been able to keep the army under ſtrict diſcipline, and to procure Scotland a tranquillity, to which ſhe had long been a ſtranger, though the clergy were diſſatisfied with the liberty of conſcience granted to all except catholics and prelatiſts. But forts erected by Monk in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, and well garriſoned by him, prevented all inſurrections. The changes in England ſince Cromwell's death diſturbed Monk's peaceable ſtate in Scotland. For though he was equally careſſed by the army and parliament, becauſe they either wanted or feared him, he perceived that on which ſide ſoever the advantage ſhould turn, he was to be the victim. He had already experienced it in the parliament's endeavours to undermine his credit, and could not doubt, if that parliament had ſubſiſted, he ſhould have been, by one means or other, diſplaced, becauſe he was feared. On the other hand, his hopes were no better from the army, which was properly commanded by Lambert, under the name of Fleetwood. Lambert conſidered Monk as a formidable rival, who would never ſuffer him to execute his deſigns, if it was in his power to prevent him[a]. Monk, for his part, would never have been willing to ſubmit to Lambert. He was nevertheleſs under an abſolute neceſſity of taking one of the two courſes. A neutrality would have expoſed him to the danger of being ſacrificed by both, if they ſhould be reconciled, which was not impoſſible. Beſides, on ſuch occaſions, the victorious party never thinks any great regard due to thoſe who have ſtood neutral. In fine, a neutrality would have entirely deprived him of the ſupplies received from England for the ſubſiſtence of his army. He therefore determined to ſide with the parliament, and without any evaſion ſent his reſolution to Fleetwood. For this purpoſe, he prepared for a ſpeedy march into England with the beſt part of his army.

When this reſolution is conſidered, it is difficult to believe, that Monk could take it, without being influenced by other motives than what appear at firſt ſight. Firſt, he had no cauſe to be pleaſed with this parliament, nor is it ſeen what intereſt, either public or private, he could have, to reſtore a parliament generally hated, and which had been always diſtruſtful of him. Secondly, Monk had joined with the republicans only to free himſelf from confinement. Thirdly, though he had twelve thouſand men, he could, at moſt, take with him but half, unleſs he would give the Scots opportunity to ſhake off the Engliſh yoke. How therefore could he venture to go with five or ſix thouſand men, to encounter an army ſtronger than his own? Laſtly, the people of England hitherto had declared for neither parliament nor army, but equally hated both. Monk therefore could not expect the people's aſſiſtance, to reſtore a parliament which had ever held them in ſervitude. This was not, at leaſt, the intereſt of the royaliſts or preſbyterians, who properly were the body of the nation, there being but very few who were really attached to the parliament or the army, though fear compelled them to obedience. And, by the way, the ſmall intereſt which the parliament had in the boroughs and counties, was the true reaſon they never filled the vacant ſeats, becauſe they could not be aſſured that ſuch members would be choſen as they deſired. Theſe are the conſiderations which naturally create a belief, that Monk, when he reſolved to march into England, under colour of re-eſtabliſhing the parliament, ſecretly intended to ſerve and reſtore the king. This is almoſt univerſally agreed. But it is not equally clear what was his plan, or his means to accompliſh ſuch a deſign. If the royaliſt authors are to be credited, he marched into England with only five thouſand men; and the terror of that army, joined to the wiſhes of the nation, and Monk's prudent conduct, produced this happy reſtoration. All this is true, but it is not the whole of the truth, party intereſt having obliged the hiſtorians to conceal, or ſpeak confuſedly of ſome things. For my part, I ſhall give my opinion, and leave it to the judgment of the unprejudiced reader. I own, I cannot ſupport it with the clear and undeniable teſtimony of the hiſtorians of thoſe times. But I think, I can ground it upon ſomething ſtronger than the teſtimony of the hiſtorians; I mean, upon the facts themſelves, and general Monk's whole conduct. The reader will judge of it hereafter.

Since the preſbyterians had been expelled from the parliament in 1548, they had been kept extremely low, becauſe their number ever rendered them formidable to the independent parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell. They had never been able to recover their ſeats in parliament, a few only excepted, who had thruſt themſelves in by diſſimulation, which nevertheleſs, as appears in Ludlow's memoirs, could not deceive the independents. Sir William Waller, one of their generals, was not in condition to head an army, and Maſſey had eſpouſed the king's cauſe. So, having nothing more to ſay in the parliament, and wanting a leader to head them, they had remained in ſubjection to the independent parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell, without any likelihood of reviving their humbled party. They had for enemies Cromwell, the army, the parliament, the royaliſts, and were in no places of truſt which might give them credit. We have already ſeen, that being weary of this ſituation, they had diſcovered an inclination to unite with the king's party, or at leaſt ſhewn that they ſhould not be diſpleaſed with the good ſucceſs of that party's deſign for an inſurrection in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. The miſcarriage of that undertaking was doubtleſs the reaſon, that the union was carried no farther. Nevertheleſs, Monk knowing how the preſbyterians ſtood diſpoſed, employed, in all likelihood, Clarges his confident, to make a ſecret agreement with ſome of their chiefs for reſtoring the king by their means. The ſcheme formed for that purpoſe, and which could not be executed without the preſbyterians, was, as appears by the ſequel, briefly this:

Monk engaged, no doubt, to march into England, and reſtore the rump parliament diſperſed by the officers. This was the firſt ſtep he was to take. The parliament being re-

[z] Conſiſting of twenty-three perſons. Whitelock (who was one) ſays, he was not deſirous of that employment, at ſuch a time as this. Mem. p. 685.

[a] In order to weaken Monk, the parliament ſent him an order, when Lambert was marching againſt Booth, to ſend Lambert two regiments of foot, and two of horſe; but he excuſed himſelf, under colour of the enemy's ſtrength, and inclination to revolt; though ſome then thought, that his engagements with Charles II. were the true reaſons of his refuſal. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 691.

He

ſtored, Monk was to join with the city of London, wholly preſbyterian, and demand that the members expelled in 1648, might reſume their ſeats, or, if the rump refuſed to admit them, to introduce them by force. Theſe reſtored members could not but, by their number, have a great majority in the houſe, and compoſe properly a preſbyterian parliament. It was agreed, that this parliament ſhould diſſolve itſelf, after ſummoning another free parliament, compoſed, agreeable to the antient conſtitution, of a houſe of lords and a houſe of commons. The new parliament muſt naturally conſiſt of royaliſts and preſbyterians (the independents having too little credit to carry any elections) and was to reſtore the king, to which the preſbyterians ſhould conſent. In all likelihood theſe ſtipulated ſome conditions, the particulars whereof are not known. It cannot however be doubted, that there were conditions, ſince, after the reſtoration of Charles II. they complained bitterly of breach of promiſe. This alſo appears in that, to vindicate Charles II. for not keeping his word with the preſbyterians, it is pretended, it was not in his power to diſpenſe with the laws, and conſequently his promiſe was void. This was the ſcheme for reſtoring the king, which, as will hereafter be ſeen, was cloſely purſued. If, on ſome occaſion, Monk ſeemed to ſwerve from it, 'twas becauſe he believed diſſimulation abſolutely neceſſary, and that he could not diſcover his intention without danger of rendering the project abortive. It was to be done on a ſudden, and under other pretences, before the enemies to royalty ſhould have time to oppoſe it. Now he could not uſe more proper inſtruments than the preſbyterians, who were little ſuſpected of deſiring the king's reſtoration. But the hiſtorians are very unwilling to allow the preſbyterians any ſhare in this unexpected event, though they are forced in ſome meaſure to follow, in their hiſtories, the ſcheme I have explained. They are contented to inſinuate, that the reſtoration was owing to the prayers of the people, as if the preſbyterians had not been a conſiderable, and perhaps the major part of the people. This ſcheme being ſuppoſed, all difficulties will vaniſh, and Monk's proceedings appear natural, and conſequences of it. But if it be ſuppoſed, that Monk reſtored the preſbyterian members, expelled from the parliament in 1648, without any previous agreement, it can never be conceived, that he ſhould think it neceſſary to reſtore a preſbyterian parliament in order to place the king on the throne without any conditions.

The firſt thing done by the committee of ſafety, lately eſtabliſhed by the general council of officers, was to ſend Clarges to Monk, to bring him to ſome agreement. They were not ignorant of the error committed by the officers, in uſurping the ſovereign power, without the approbation of a general at the head of twelve thouſand men, and would have gladly repaired it. But they could not chuſe a worſe meſſenger than Clarges, whoſe ſole aim was to ſerve the king, and who, probably, had engaged Monk in the ſame deſign.

Mean while, Monk was preparing with all poſſible diligence for his expedition, though not without ſeveral obſtacles. 1. His forces being diſperſed through all Scotland required, at leaſt, ſix weeks to draw them together. 2. Ready money was to be provided for their maintenance, becauſe he could expect no more from England. For this purpoſe, the taxes were to be anticipated, and even extraordinary ſupplies obtained of the Scots. 3. In his troops were ſome officers, on whoſe fidelity he could not rely. 4. In ſhort, it was abſolutely neceſſary to his deſign, to have ſome towns on the frontiers of England, to facilitate his entrance, as he knew that Lambert was marching to oppoſe him. All theſe difficulties were happily ſurmounted, except the firſt, becauſe of the remoteneſs of his forces. As to the reſt, he began with caſhiering ſeveral of his ſuſpected officers, and ſubſtituting others in their room. He kept thoſe whom the parliament had diſplaced, and whoſe ſucceſſors were not yet come. Then he ſummoned to Edinburgh the officers of the neareſt regiments, and communicating to them his deſign of marching into England, to reſtore the parliament, he had the ſatisfaction to meet with their concurrence. This done, he found means to ſecure Berwick, and arreſt colonel Cobbet, who was there, and whoſe ſecret inſtructions were told him by Clarges. Cobbet was ſent to Edinburgh, and there impriſoned. Monk alſo attempted to ſurpriſe Newcaſtle, but was diſappointed. As to the money he wanted, he raiſed as much as was poſſible, and while his army was aſſembling, ſolicited the Scots for an extraordinary ſupply.

While Monk was making theſe preparations, Clarges his brother-in-law arrived in Scotland, with a propoſal for a treaty with the committee of ſafety. It was reſolved betwixt them to accept the propoſal, not with deſign to conclude the treaty, but to gain time till Monk's army was ready [b]. Purſuant to this reſolution, Monk, with the conſent of his officers, made choice of colonel Wilks, lieutenant-colonel Cloberry, and major Knight to go and treat in his name with the committee, and ſent them away with ſuch inſtructions, as he thought would raiſe inſurmountable obſtacles to the concluſion of the treaty. Theſe three commiſſioners met Lambert at York, who told them, he was ſufficiently empowered to treat with them [c]. But to their demand for reſtoring the parliament, he anſwered, his power did not extend to that article, and ſo they were obliged to go on to London.

Theſe commiſſioners, ignorant of Monk's ſecret intentions, were no ſooner at London, than they made all poſſible haſte to conclude with the committee of ſafety, and the rather, becauſe every thing which they propoſed was accepted. So, the treaty was concluded and ſigned the 15th of November, to the great diſſatisfaction of Monk, whoſe aim was to prolong it, and then break off the negotiation. It would be needleſs to inſert the treaty, becauſe it was never executed. I ſhall only obſerve, that by the firſt article, a vigorous oppoſition to the king's reſtoration was agreed to by both parties. Monk, upon receiving the treaty, fought evaſions to hinder the ratification, pretending, his commiſſioners had acted contrary to their inſtructions, and thereby he became ſtill more ſuſpected by the committee of ſafety.

While Monk was preparing to march into England, the members of the late parliament were not idle. They were ardently endeavouring to re-eſtabliſh themſelves, and wreſt from the officers their uſurped authority, but without the leaſt thought of reſtoring the king. They believed, or pretended to believe, that Monk had no other view than the reſtitution of the parliament, and, in this belief, conſidered Monk's friends as their own. This was true in general, though ſome there were of Monk's adherents in London, better informed than the reſt, who knew what they were to believe. Be this as it will, all the friends of the rump united to ſupport Monk's deſigns, imagining, his ſole intention was to reſtore the parliament. For that reaſon, the members who had formed the council of ſtate, before the interruption of the parliament, being privately aſſembled, ſent to Monk a commiſſion, conſtituting him general of the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

On the other hand, colonel Whetham, governor of Portſmouth, Monk's particular friend, declared for the parliament, and received into his garriſon Haſlerig, Walton, and Morley, three members of parliament, the moſt incenſed againſt the army. The committee of ſafety, upon the firſt notice of this defection, ſent a detachment of the army to block up Portſmouth, but the ſoldiers deſerted their officers, declared for the parliament, and were received into Portſmouth as friends. Another detachment ſent from the army on the ſame errand, did almoſt the ſame thing, ſo that the committee knew not on whom to rely. At the ſame time, Lawſon, vice-admiral declared for the parliament againſt the army, and entered the Thames with ſeveral of his ſhips, to awe the adherents of the committee. Lambert, who commanded a body of the army in the north, being informed of the ill ſituation of the committee's affairs, detached Deſborough's regiment to the aſſiſtance of his friends in London, but that regiment, at St. Albans, declared for the parliament.

Mean while, the committee of ſafety ſeeing all this oppoſition, ſeemed to be diſcouraged. They took no meaſures for their own preſervation, and inſtead of aſſembling the army, ſuffered it to be diſperſed into quarters. It is likely, they feared to ſee the army together, ſince the ſoldiers of the two detachments ſent to Portſmouth had deſerted their officers. Mean while, Haſlerig, Walton, and Morley, finding themſelves ſufficiently ſtrengthened by the ſoldiers of the army, which had retired to Portſmouth, marched at the head of theſe troops, towards London. Then it was that

[b] He all along deluded the independents, by his ſolemn proteſtations, and public declarations of his firm reſolution to adhere to the parliament and their cauſe, againſt a king, a ſingle perſon, or houſe of peers. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 747, &c.

[c] Monk's commiſſioners ſo far ſatisfied Lambert of the reality of Monk's intentions, that Lambert ſtopt his forces from marching further northward. When notice of this came to Lambert, Whitelock was for ordering Lambert to advance ſpeedily with all his forces, and attack Monk, before he ſhould be better provided; believing, as he ſays, that Monk only ſought delays. But his advice was not taken. Whitelock, p. 688.

And

Fleetwood, and the reſt of the committee of ſafety, were in the utmoſt perplexity. They durſt not truſt their own ſoldiers, and knew not what courſe to take. Whitelock, as appears in his memorials, adviſed Fleetwood either to head the army, or agree with the king[d]. He ſeemed to approve of this laſt courſe, but preſently after altered his mind, and did neither. At laſt, his colleagues and himſelf wanting capacity and reſolution to extricate themſelves out of ſuch an emergency, conſented to the meeting of the parliament, and voluntarily reſigned their uſurped authority. They had no ſooner given their conſent, than they were entirely abandoned by their whole party.

THUS the parliament met peaceably the 26th of December, and named a committee to govern the army in their name, and under their direction. Then they diſpatched expreſs orders to Lambert to diſperſe his forces, and ſend them into the quarters aſſigned by the ſame order. But Lambert's troops hearing the parliament was reſtored, had in ſome meaſure prevented this order, and put their general under arreſt, who was ſent priſoner to the Tower of London. At the ſame time ſir Henry Vane, and ſome other members of parliament, who had taken part with the army, were confined to their own houſes. Thus, by a revolution little expected, the firſt and moſt difficult part of Monk's undertaking, namely, the reſtitution of the parliament, was executed even before he left Scotland, and without having any other ſhare in it, than his reſolution to march into England[e].

Mean while, this revolution ſeemed entirely to deſtroy the hopes of the king, ſince a parliament was reſtored ſo oppoſite to him. He was believed to be irrecoverably loſt. France and Spain began to think of making a firm and laſting alliance with the parliament, whereby the king would not have known where to retire for a ſubſiſtence. But though he himſelf feigned to be extremely afflicted, not to diſcover his ſecret, very probably he was informed of Monk's intentions, and of the manner in which they were to be executed. For though the earl of Clarendon affirms, the king had only a very faint hope of being ſerved by Monk, in order to provide for his own ſecurity, yet I cannot believe, that Monk, however reſerved he might be to others, concealed his intentions from the king, ſince there was no danger in the diſcovery[f].

Be this as it will, Monk, before he left Scotland, by circular letters, aſſembled at Edinburgh two commiſſioners from every ſhire, and one from each borough, and communicated to them his intentions to march into England, to reſcue the parliament from the force put upon them by the army, and reſtore them to their authority. Theſe commiſſioners, who made a ſort of convention of eſtates, though the union of the two kingdoms denied them the name, offered Monk to increaſe his army with twenty thouſand men of their nation, and granted him thirty thouſand pounds above the aſſeſſments to enable him to maintain them. He accepted the money, but refuſed the troops, believing he wanted them not. Some Scotch writers affirm, that in diſmiſſing this aſſemby, he recommended to them, to take all poſſible care to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, and deſired them to abjure the king, and royal family. But Gumble, who was his chaplain, and writ his life, poſitively denies it. Thus much is certain, it was abſolutely neceſſary for him, carefully to conceal his intention to ſerve the king, and his fear of betraying this ſecret, made him, on ſome occaſions, carry his diſſimulation to exceſs. He was, however, extremely ſuſpected by thoſe, who would not hear of the king's reſtoration. Theſe men were very numerous, not to mention the army, which aſſuredly had no ſuch intention, though, unknown to them, their march was deſigned for that purpoſe alone.

[1659-60.] Monk entered England with his army the 2d of January, and conſequently might now be informed of the rump's re-eſtabliſhment. Some days after he received a letter from the ſpeaker, acquainting him with the late tranſactions, thanking him, in the name of the parliament, for his kind intentions, and inſinuating, that if he thought it proper, he might ſave himſelf the trouble of coming to London, ſince the parliament was in peaceable poſſeſſion of their authority. But this letter did not interrupt his march. If it be conſidered, that the pretence he had hitherto alledged for his expedition into England, was the reſtitution of the parliament, and that he continued his march, though the parliament was reſtored, it will be eaſy to perceive, that he had quite another motive than what was at firſt alledged. This pretence failing him, he was obliged to find another, and that was, to aſſiſt the parliament, to reduce the army to obedience and ſubmiſſion. On his arrival at York, he found the lord Fairfax, formerly general to the parliament, at the head of ſome troops of that county, and in poſſeſſion of the city, in order to hinder the committee of ſafety from being maſters of it. The lord Fairfax received Monk into York without any difficulty, and they had many conferences together. Fairfax was a preſbyterian, though Cromwell had made him ſubſervient to the riſe of the independents. So, it would be hard to conceive what intereſt he could have in countenancing Monk's deſigns, if the preſbyterian party had not ſecretly agreed to concur in the king's reſtoration.

Whatever diſſimulation Monk had uſed, in pretending that he had no other view than to reſtore the rump, the members of that parliament were too wiſe not to perceive, he had ſome other hidden deſign. But they heſitated between two opinions, in appearance equally probable, namely, that he intended either to advance himſelf in imitation of Cromwell, or to deſtroy the king. For this reaſon, the rump, a few days after their meeting, appointed A COUNCIL OF STATE, conſiſting of twenty-eight members, of whom Monk was one, and ordered each counſellor to take the following oath:

"I do hereby ſwear that I do renounce the pretended title of CHARLES STEUART, and the whole line of the late king James, and of every other perſon as a ſingle perſon, pretending, or which ſhall pretend to the crown or government of theſe nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any of them, and the dominions and territories belonging to them, or any of them; and that I will, by the grace and aſſiſtance of Almighty God, be true, faithful and conſtant to the parliament and common-wealth, and will oppoſe the bringing in, or ſetting up any ſingle perſon or houſe of lords, and every of them in this common-wealth."

This precaution however did not remove the fears of the parliament with regard to Monk, who daily became more ſuſpected, notwithſtanding all his care to conceal his intentions. It was therefore reſolved to ſend two of their members to him, under the pretence of doing him honour, but in reality, to obſerve his proceedings. Scot and Robinſon were named, who found him at Leiceſter the 22d of January[g]. In this town[h] he received alſo commiſſioners from London, with an addreſs, to deſire the re-admiſſion of the members ſecluded in the year 1648. Scot, one of the commiſſioners from the parliament, interrupted the London commiſſioner who was reading the addreſs, and commanded him ſilence, looking upon this propoſal as tending directly to the deſtruction of the republican parliament. Nevertheleſs, Monk received the addreſs. As he continued his march, he received many ſuch, ſo that it ſeemed to be the general ſenſe of the nation, that the preſbyterians ſhould reſume the reins of the government. Let us reflect here a little on this extraordinary change.

It cannot be denied, that the ſecluded members in 1648 were preſbyterians, who had, on all occaſions, ſhewn an extreme animoſity againſt the king and the church of England. If they had teſtified a deſire to reſtore the late king by the treaty of Newport, this was owing to conditions, which he looked upon as intolerable, and which neceſſity alone compelled him to grant. Nay, the parliament could not reſolve to allow ſome reſtrictions deſired by the king to their demands. If they voted that the king's conceſſions might ſerve for foundation to a peace, it was at a time when the army was now in London, ready to execute the violence which was acted the next day. The preſbyterians therefore cannot be conſidered as having been at any time favourable to Charles I. Since the 6th of December 1648, they had been kept very low, having conſtantly had for enemies the royaliſts, parliament, protector, and army, ſo that [d] And thereby be beforehand with Monk; by which means he might make terms with the king for the preſervation of himſelf, his friends, and his cauſe; but if it were left to Monk, they, and all that had been done, would be left to the danger of deſtruction. Hereupon they two agreed, that Whitelock ſhould immediately go the king; but Vane, Deſborough, and Berry, coming to Fleetwood in the mean time, made him alter his reſolution. Whitelock, p. 691.

[e] This year, on October 31, died John Bradſhaw, preſident of the court that condemned king Charles I.

[f] Monk placed no confidence in Hyde, and when he ſent the aſſurance of his ſervice to the king by ſir John Greenvil, it was with this proviſo, that Hyde ſhould not be let into the ſecret. So ſays Bevil Higgens, who had it from his own mother, ſiſter to ſir John Greenvil.

[g] All the way from Leiceſter to St. Albans, they lodged in the ſame houſe with him, and when they withdrew to their own apartment, they always found or made ſome hole in the door or wall, to look or liſten. Skinner, p. 197.

[h] It was at Harborough, January 23. See Skinner, p. 195, and Phillips, p. 681.

they were without any power. And yet, during Monk's march, this party not only revives, but even becomes ſuperior to all the reſt, and the whole nation ſeems to conſpire to reſtore them the ſupreme authority, in demanding the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members in 1648. What could be the motive of ſo great a number of addreſſes on this account, preſented to Monk in his march? And why did Monk receive them ſo favourably? Certainly, when he left Scotland, his intention, however concealed, was to labour the king's reſtoration [i]. But if the preſbyterians had not engaged to favour this reſtoration, the raiſing their party, and putting them in poſſeſſion of the government, would have been a very unlikely means to accompliſh it. All that Monk could thereby have gained, was, the king's reſtoration on the ſame terms which his father had granted in the treaty of Newport, which, doubtleſs, was very far from his intention. Let us therefore conclude, that all theſe addreſſes were an effect, or conſequence of a ſecret agreement between the royaliſts and preſbyterians, whereby theſe had conſented to the king's reſtoration, on conditions relating to their religion alone, without inſiſting, as they had before conſtantly done, on any terms concerning the government. Without this ſuppoſition, the ſteps, afterwards taken for the king's reſtoration, can never be conceived, and with it, all the proceedings are natural.

This agreement was a ſecret which was carefully to be concealed, leſt its diſcovery ſhould produce an accommodation between the parliament and the army, in which caſe Monk, who had but five thouſand men, would have been little able to execute his deſigns. Wherefore, though he received all the addreſſes, he was very careful not to expreſs the leaſt ſigns of approbation, but contented himſelf with a general anſwer, that they ſhould be laid before the parliament [k].

Monk, as I ſaid, had but five thouſand men [l]. With this army it was not poſſible to withſtand the other, which was three times as numerous, and of which ſeveral regiments were now in London. If the parliament and army could have united together, they would, doubtleſs, have rendered all Monk's projects impracticable. But the parliament was ſtill more jealous of their own army than of Monk. They only ſuſpected that general of having ſecret deſigns, without knowing exactly wherein they conſiſted. But that the general officers of the army would become maſters, if their aſſiſtance was neceſſary, could not be doubted. It was Monk's intereſt therefore to foment this diſunion, and he could not more ſucceſsfully do it, than by profeſſing an entire devotion to the parliament. He thereby removed from the parliament all thoughts of an union with the army, which appeared unneceſſary, while Monk's fidelity could be relied on. This was the true reaſon of Monk's extreme diſſimulation, and of his pretending on all occaſions, that his march to London was only to ſerve and obey the parliament.

When he came to St. Albans, within twenty miles of London, he writ to the parliament, to deſire that the regiments in the city, might be ſent to more diſtant quarters, it not being convenient, that troops, which had ſo lately been in rebellion, ſhould mix with thoſe which were entirely devoted to the parliament, and come to offer their ſervice. With this letter he ſent the manner in which his ſoldiers might be lodged in London, and the quarters that might be aſſigned to the regiments which were to be removed. Though this demand was ſuſpected by many members to have ſome myſtery in it, it was however granted by a majority of voices, and the regiments in the city were ordered to remove. This ſhews, either that Fleetwood and Deſborough were no great politicians, if they did not ſee that Monk's demand tended to make himſelf maſter of the city and parliament, or that they believed they had not a ſufficient influence over their inferior officers, to venture to oppoſe it. It ſeems, they could reſolve nothing without Lambert, who was now priſoner in the Tower.

However this be, Monk artfully improving the diviſion between the parliament and the army, entered London, in triumph, the 3d of February 1659-60. After he had given orders for quartering his troops, he repaired to the council of ſtate, who immediately tendered him the abjuration oath, which all the members were obliged to take. But he aſked time to reſolve, ſaying, he had been informed that ſtrong objections had been made to this oath, even in the parliament itſelf. Upon this refuſal he was denied admittance into the council of ſtate, till he had taken the oath, and was obliged to withdraw.

The 6th of February he went to the parliament, where by the mouth of the ſpeaker, he received the compliments and thanks of the houſe; to which he returned the following anſwer;

Mr. Speaker,

"AMONGST the many mercies of God to theſe poor nations, your peaceable reſtitution is not the leaſt. It is (as you ſaid) his work alone, and to him belongs the glory of it; and I eſteem it as a great effect of his goodneſs to me, that he was pleaſed to make me, amongſt many worthier in your ſervice, ſome way inſtrumental in it. I did nothing but my duty, and deſerve not to receive ſo great an honour and reſpect as you are pleaſed to give me at this time and place, which I ſhall ever acknowledge as a high mark of your favour to me.

"Sir, I ſhall not now trouble you with large narratives, only give me leave to acquaint you, that as I marched from Scotland hither, I obſerved the people in moſt counties in great and earneſt expectations of a ſettlement, and ſeveral applications were made to me, with numerous ſubſcriptions to them. The chiefeſt heads of their deſires were for a free and a full parliament, and that you would determine your ſitting; a goſpel miniſtry; encouragement of learning and univerſities; and for admittance of the members ſecluded before the year 1648, without any previous oath or engagement. To which I commonly anſwered, that you are now in a free parliament; and if there be any force remaining upon you, I would endeavour to remove it; and that you had voted to fill up your houſe, and then you would be a full parliament alſo; and that you had already determined your ſitting: and for the miniſtry, their maintenance, the laws, and univerſities, you had largely declared concerning them in your laſt declaration; and I was confident you would adhere to it: but as for thoſe gentlemen ſecluded in the year 1648, I told them you had given judgment in it, and all people ought to acquieſce in that judgment; but to admit any members to ſit in parliament without a previous oath or engagement, to preſerve the government in being, it was never done in England.

"But although I ſaid it not to them, I muſt ſay, with pardon, to you, that the leſs oaths and engagements are impoſed (with reſpect had to the ſecurity of the common cauſe) your ſettlement will be the ſooner attained to. I am the more particular in theſe matters to let you ſee how grateful your preſent conſultations about theſe things will be to the people. I know all the ſober gentry will cloſe with you, if they may be tenderly and gently uſed; and I am ſure you will ſo uſe them, as knowing it to be the common concern, to amplify, and not to leſſen our intereſt, and to be careful that neither the cavalier, nor fanatic party have yet a ſhare in your civil or military power, of the laſt of whoſe impatience to government, you have lately had ſo ſevere experience. I ſhall ſay ſomething of Ireland and Scotland; indeed Ireland is in an unſettled condition, and made worſe by your interruptions, which prevented the paſſing an act for the ſettlement of the eſtates of adventurers and ſoldiers there, which I heard you intended to have done in a few days; and I preſume, it will be now quickly done, being ſo neceſſary at this time, when the wants of the commonwealth call for ſupplies; and people will unwillingly pay taxes for thoſe eſtates, of which they have no legal aſſurance: I need not tell you how much you were abuſed in the nomination of your officers of your armies there; their malice that deceived you, hath been ſufficiently manifeſted: I do affirm, that thoſe now that have declared for you will continue faithful, and thereby evince, that as well there as here, it is the ſober intereſt muſt eſtabliſh your dominion. As for Scotland, I muſt ſay, the people of that nation deſerve to be cheriſhed; and I believe your late declaration will much glad their ſpirits; for nothing was to them more dreadful, than a fear to be over-run with fanatic notions.

[i] Biſhop Burnet more reaſonably ſuppoſes, that Monk had no ſettled deſign any way, but reſolved to do as occaſion ſhould be offered to him, p. 84.

[k] He kept himſelf under ſuch a reſerve, that he declared all the while in the moſt ſolemn manner for a common-wealth, and againſt a ſingle perſon, in particular againſt the king. See Ludlow, tom. II. p. 811. The ſame day he entered London, Ludlow viſiting him, he told Ludlow, "That he was fully reſolved to promote the intereſt of a commonwealth." Adding, "We muſt live and die for and by a commonwealth." Idem. p. 820.

[l] Dr. Skinner ſays, his army, upon a review at Highgate, amounted to five thouſand eight hundred men (p. 221.) namely, four thouſand foot, and eighteen hundred horſe. The parliament's regiments in London conſiſted of two thouſand horſe, and eight thouſand foot. Phillips, p. 679.

I:

I humbly recommend them to your affection and eſteem; and deſire the intended union may be proſecuted, and their taxes made proportionable to thoſe in England, for which I am engaged by promiſe to become a ſuitor to you. And truely, ſir, I muſt aſk leave to intreat you to make a ſpeedy proviſion for the civil government there, of which they have been deſtitute near a year, to the ruin of many families: and except commiſſioners for managing of the government, and judges to ſit in courts of judicature, be ſpeedily appointed, that country will be very miſerable.

"I directed mr. Gumble lately to preſent ſome names to you, both for commiſſions and judges; but by reaſon of your great affairs, he was not required to deliver them in writing: but I humbly preſent them to your conſideration."

This ſpeech was not agreeable to all; ſome of the members complained, Monk ſpoke too poſitively, and aſſumed too great an authority: that he affected a popularity, which juſtly rendered him ſuſpected: that he engaged for the fidelity of the Iriſh officers, which, however, was to be doubted: in ſhort, that in ſaying, the cavaliers were not yet to have a ſhare in the government, he gave that party hopes of being one day admitted.

Two days after, the parliament had occaſion to try Monk's fidelity, and to be aſſured, whether he was ſo devoted to their intereſt as he ſtudied to appear. The common council of the city of London, aſſembling the 7th of February, reſolved to pay no more taxes till the parliament was filled [m]. They knew Monk's deſign was to reſtore the members ſecluded in 1648, and, doubtleſs, thought by this reſolution to advance the affair. They had nothing to fear from Monk, and knew the parliament would not recall the regiments which were removed from London, to force the city to obedience. Upon advice of this reſolution, the parliament ordered Monk to lead his army into the city, ſeize eleven members of the common council, and pull down the chains, gates, and portcullices. Monk readily and inſtantly obeyed the order [n]. He aſſembled his forces, entered the city, and arreſted the eleven members of the common council. Then he writ to the parliament an account of what he had done, praying them withal to moderate their rigour, with reſpect to the gates and portcullices. But the parliament, whether through animoſity againſt the city, or a farther trial of Monk's fidelity, and perhaps to engage him in an irreconcileable quarrel with the city, inſiſted upon a punctual compliance with their order, and were immediately obeyed. After that, he returned with his troops to Whitehall, which diſpleaſed the parliament, believing Monk ought not to have quitted the city without their order. The ſame, or the following day, Praiſe-God Barebone, formerly mentioned on occaſion of Oliver Cromwell's firſt parliament, preſented a petition to the houſe, ſubſcribed by many perſons, deſiring the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart might be taken by all perſons without exception, and he received the thanks of the houſe.

Monk's late proceedings aſtoniſhed both his friends and the city of London. The magiſtrates, enraged at this treatment, looked upon him as a perfidious man, who had amuſed them with hopes of his ſupporting the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members, in order to know their ſentiments and as one abſolutely devoted to the parliament. On the other hand, his friends repreſented to him, that he was guilty of an irreparable fault, in quarrelling with the Londoners, who alone were able to ſupport him againſt the parliament bent upon his ruin, whatever they might pretend: that this commiſſion was a ſnare, which had loſt him the confidence of the city, and expoſed him to the parliament's deſigns againſt him; beſides that without the aſſiſtance of London he would never, with his ſmall army, be able to execute his intentions [o].

Monk, convinced by theſe reaſons, that he had carried his diſſimulation too far, thought only of repairing his error, by an open rupture with the parliament, in order to regain the eſteem of the city. He therefore ſent, without loſs of time, Clarges his confident to ſir Thomas Alleyne lord mayor, to tell him, he was very ſorry for what he had done, and deſired a conference with him and the common council, to make reparation for his fault. But Clarges could obtain nothing from the lord mayor, who was perſuaded that Monk was deceitful and treacherous, and only ſought to deceive him. Notwithſtanding all this, Monk aſſembled his forces, with a reſolution to march once more into the city, and be reconciled to the magiſtrates, whatever might be the conſequence. At his departure, he ſent a letter to the parliament, writ with the approbation of his principal officers, complaining, "That they gave too much countenance to Lambert, Vane, and ſeveral that engaged with the late committee of ſafety; and that they had permitted Ludlow and ſome others to ſit in their houſe, that had been, by ſir Charles Coote and ſome of the Iriſh officers, accuſed of high treaſon; and had countenanced too much a late petition to exclude the moſt ſober and conſcientious, both miniſters and others, by oaths, from all employment and maintenance; and in fine, peremptorily demanded, that by Friday next, they would iſſue out writs to fill up their houſe; and when filled, ſhould riſe at an appointed time, to give place to a full and free parliament."

By this letter the parliament eaſily perceived, Monk ſought an occaſion of quarrel, which, as it was difficult to avoid, it was judged the wiſeſt courſe to vote Monk the thanks of the houſe for his care, and that his deſires ſhould be ſatisfied without delay. At the ſame time, Scot and Robinſon were diſpatched to him with this reſolution. But Monk was now marched into the city, and had, though with great difficulty, prevailed with the mayor to aſſemble the common council that afternoon. Mean time, the two commiſſioners of the parliament, having waited on Monk with the meſſage returned with little ſatisfaction. He only told them, "All would be well, if his letter was complied with." Upon this anſwer, the parliament voted, that the command of the army ſhould be lodged in five commiſſioners [p], of whom Monk himſelf was one, and that the quorum of them ſhould be three; but when it was moved, that Monk ſhould always be one of the three, it was carried in the negative.

In this interval, Monk repairing to the common council, made a ſpeech, in which he teſtified his concern for having accepted a commiſſion ſo diſagreeable in the execution to the city. That he was forced to accept it, or quit his command, which he had thought proper to keep at ſuch a juncture, for the good of the city, and of the whole nation, whoſe happineſs and advantages he ſhould always promote to the utmoſt of his power. To give an unqueſtionable proof of the ſincerity of his intentions, he communicated to the council his letter to the parliament, and anſwer to the two commiſſioners. As theſe proofs were convincing, the council was appeaſed, and Monk looked upon as a friend come to their relief, notwithſtanding the tranſactions of the foregoing day. When the news of this reconciliation was diſperſed through the city, it was followed with ringing of bells and bonfires in every ſtreet, at which were roaſted numberleſs rumps in contempt of the parliament [q]. Some days after, the council of ſtate ſent to deſire Monk to come and aſſiſt them with his counſels, in regulating the affairs of the nation: but he did not think fit to expoſe himſelf to that danger. He anſwered, that the inhabitants of London were ſo diſſatisfied, that his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary in the city, to keep them in awe. On the other hand, the lord mayor and aldermen conjured him to ſtay in the city, acquainting him, that the parliament was ſecretly endeavouring to corrupt his army, and that ſir Arthur Haſlerig had writ to ſeveral perſons in London, to that purpoſe. So Monk took care to avoid the ſnare laid for him.

Since Monk's union with the city, addreſſes for the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members were more frequent than ever. Very likely, there were emiſſaries diſperſed in ſeveral quarters, to incite the people to offer theſe petitions, which were always favourably received by Monk, it being neceſſary for him to ſupport his deſigns by the general inclination of the people. He knew what uſe was to be made of a preſbyterian parliament, though many who ſigned the petitions, imagined that preſbyterianiſm was going to remount the throne.

At laſt, on the 18th of February, Monk ſo ordered it, that ſome of the ſitting members had a conference with ſome of the ſecluded, concerning their re-admiſſion. He could have wiſhed, this might have been done by common conſent.

[m] It was an aſſeſſment of one hundred thouſand pounds a month, lately impoſed, Heath, p. 436. Whitelock ſays, The council of ſtate found the city of London generally inclined to the bringing in of the king; or to have forthwith a free parliament for that end, p. 695.

[n] "He offered himſelf, if they would command theſe things to be done, to ſee their orders put in execution." Ludlow, tom. II. p. 824.

[o] In Skinner's life of Monk, it is ſaid, that the orders to march the army into the city, were not directed to Monk alone, but alſo to the other commiſſioners, whereof Haſlerig, Walton, and Morley, were upon the place, and, ever ſince his arrival at London, had acted jointly with him; ſo that had the general refuſed his orders, the others might have done the buſineſs without him, and conſequently, put it to the hazard of removing him from the command of his army. But as he did not let his friends know this reaſon, the action was variouſly cenſured. p. 237.

[p] They were ſir Arthur Haſlerig, colonel Morley, Walton, Alured and Monk. Ludlow, tom. II. p. 830, 831.

But the conference was fruitleſs, becauſe the ſitting members could not, or would not, undertake for the parliament's accepting the conditions which ſhould be agreed on. They were for leaving that to the determination of the parliament, who, doubtleſs, would have found means to prolong the affair. But Monk ſaw himſelf indiſpenſably obliged to bring it to a ſpeedy concluſion, for fear a delay might produce an agreement between the army and parliament. This union was ſo natural, in the extremity to which the affairs of the parliament were reduced, that it is aſtoniſhing, no endeavours were uſed to procure it. At leaſt, hiſtory is ſilent upon that head. So Monk, deſirous to improve ſo favourable a juncture, reſolved to introduce the ſecluded members into the parliament, in ſpite of thoſe who were now ſitting. But as this could not be done without the aſſiſtance of the army, he aſſembled his officers, to acquaint them with his intentions. All conſented, on certain conditions relating to their own intereſts, and which were poſitively promiſed. Then Monk made the ſecluded members engage, that after their re-admiſſion, they would call a free parliament, and diſſolve the preſent[r].

Theſe reſolutions being taken, Monk repaired to Whitehall the 28th of February, attended by all the ſecluded members, and after an exhortation to take care of the intereſts of the nation, gave them a guard to conduct them to the parliament, where they took their ſeats, without any previous notice to the ſitting members. They were ſo ſuperior in number to the independents, that the heads of that party, after a ſhort demur among themſelves, thought fit to withdraw and abandon their cauſe.

The ſame day, Monk writ a circular letter to all the regiments, to inform them of the change in the parliament, to aſſure them of the zeal of the reſtored members for the intereſt of the army, and to deſire their oppoſition to all attempts in favour of Charles Stuart. This laſt clauſe was thought neceſſary to keep the army in temper, which was yet far from deſiring the king's reſtoration. This letter was ſigned by Monk himſelf, and his principal officers, and ſent the ſame day to the colonels of the ſeveral regiments.

This parliament continued their ſeſſion but twenty-five days, during which they did ſeveral things, plainly ſhewing they were far from being the king's enemies. Some of their proceedings ſhall here be laid together, that I may not be obliged to break the thread of the narration. 1. They annulled all votes and orders made by the parliament ſince the 6th of December 1648, againſt the ſecluded members. 2. They releaſed all the impriſoned friends of the king, and amongſt the reſt ſir George Booth[s]. 3. They conſtituted Monk, by act of parliament, captain general of the armies of the three nations. 4. They repealed the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart, and all the royal family. 5. They appointed a new council of ſtate conſiſting of one and thirty members, moſt of them royaliſts, and well diſpoſed to ſerve the king[t]. 6. They made great changes in the militia of London, and the ſeveral counties, and revoked all commiſſions granted by the republicans. 7. They abrogated the engagement "to be true and faithful to the common-wealth "without a king or houſe of peers," by which the lords, who were generally the king's adherents, were reſtored to their right of conſtituting a ſeparate houſe in parliament. Laſtly, they diſſolved themſelves the 16th of March, after having iſſued out writs for a free parliament to meet the 25th of April, who were to reſtore the king, which was no longer doubted[u]. However as ſuch a change could not pleaſe every one, after ſo long an interruption of kingly power, the parliament before their ſeparation, thought it ſtill neceſſary to amuſe the public, or at leaſt to leave room to doubt whether the king's reſtoration was intended. Wherefore it was voted, firſt, that no perſon ſhould be admitted to any military employ, before he had ſworn to acknowledge the lawfulneſs of taking up arms againſt the late king[w]. Secondly, that no perſon who had been in arms againſt the parliament, ſhould be choſen a member of the next parliament. In all appearance, theſe reſolutions were only taken to prevent diſturbances from the malecontents, in the interval betwixt the two parliaments. It is at leaſt certain, that the laſt was neglected in the new elections of repreſentatives, among whom were great numbers of royaliſts. As the non-obſervance of it was to be queſtioned by the next parliament only, there was nothing to be ſaid, till they ſhould meet.

But theſe deluſive votes were not capable of impoſing on the republicans, who ſaw but too plainly, that a reſolution was taken to reſtore the king. To prevent this blow which could not but cruſh them entirely, they endeavoured to perſuade Monk to take upon himſelf the government, and ſupply the place of Oliver Cromwell[x], chuſing rather to own him for governor or even ſovereign, than be expoſed to the king's vengeance. Monk having conſtantly rejected this offer, they applied to Clarges to deſire him to perſuade the general to accept the government. But Clarges diſcovered their plot to the council of ſtate, who, if Monk had not interceded for them, would have puniſhed them ſeverely.

This attempt failing, they privately excited a good number of officers of their own principles to draw up a declaration, by which they engaged to ſupport the republican government. They brought the declaration to the general to ſign, pretending it ſhould afterwards be ſubſcribed by the whole army. But Monk excuſed himſelf, alledging, this precaution was needleſs after the vote, That no adherent of the king ſhould be elected to ſerve in the enſuing parliament. But they made no account of this evaſion, knowing, that it belonged to the houſe of commons to judge of the qualifications of their members. In ſhort, as they continued to importune him, he forbad them with an air of authority, to aſſemble without his permiſſion.

The tranſactions in England being quickly carried to cardinal Mazarin, it was not difficult for him to perceive, that Monk had ſome great deſign in view. But as he could not judge whether that general was labouring for himſelf or the king, he ordered monſieur de Bourdeaux the French embaſſador at London, to offer his friendſhip to Monk, and every thing in his power, whatever were his deſigns. Probably, the cardinal, who had always treated the king with neglect, and was but little, if at all, deſirous of his reſtoration, would have been glad, Monk had been labouring for himſelf[y]. But in caſe Monk intended to reſtore the king, the cardinal was willing to have ſome ſhare in it, in order to make amends for his harſh uſage of the king, on ſundry occaſions. The embaſſador applying to Clarges, intimated to him, that the cardinal was ready to ſerve the general in all his undertakings, and deſired a conference with him. But though Monk would not abſolutely refuſe a viſit from the embaſſador, he ordered Clarges to tell him, it was on condition, he ſhould not propoſe any thing to him in reference to the Engliſh affairs. So, the viſit paſſed in general compliments.

The day after the diſſolution of the parliament, ſir John Greenvil, ſent by the king to general Monk, was introduced [r] Monk made the ſecluded members, before their admiſſion, ſubſcribe theſe four articles. 1. To ſettle the conduct of the armies in the three nations ſo as might beſt ſecure the peace of the common-wealth. 2. To provide for the ſupport of the forces by ſea and land, and money alſo for their arrears, and the contigencies of the government. 3. To conſtitute a council of ſtate for the civil government of Scotland and Ireland, and to iſſue out writs for the ſummoning a parliament to meet at Weſtminſter the 25th of April. 4. To conſent to their own diſſolution, by a time that ſhould be limited to them. Skinner, p. 241.

[s] The earls of Crawford and Lauderdale, and the lord Sinclair, were alſo releaſed.

[t] To let the reader ſee who were then the leading men, it may not be amiſs to inſert the names of this council, which Rapin, by miſtake, ſays, conſiſted but of twenty-one members. General Monk, William Pierpoint, John Crew, colonel Roſſiter, Richard Knightley, colonel Popham, colonel Morley, lord Fairfax, ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, ſir Gilbert Gerrard, lord chief juſtice St. John, ſir John Temple, lord commiſſioner Widdrington, ſir John Evelyn, ſir William Waller, ſir Richard Onſlow, ſir William Lewis, colonel Edward Montague, colonel Edward Harley, colonel Richard Norton, Arthur Anneſley, Denzil Holles, colonel George Thomſon, John Trevor, ſir John Holland, ſir John Potts, colonel John Birch, ſir Harbottle Grimſtone, John Swinfin, John Weaver, ſerjeant Maynard. Phillips, p. 690.

[w] In the act of the militia of London was a clauſe, that every commiſſioner ſhall acknowledge and declare, "That the war undertaken by both houſes of parliament in their defence againſt the forces raiſed in the name of the late king, was juſt and lawful, and that magiſtracy and ministry are the ordinances of God." Whitelock, p. 699.

[x] Among the reſt (ſays Skinner) ſir Arthur Haſlerig, to preclude the king's reſtoration, offered him one hundred thouſand hands that ſhould ſubſcribe his title, p. 276.

[y] Mr. Lock ſays, that Monk had agreed with the French embaſſador to take the government on himſelf, by whom he had promiſe from Mazarin of aſſiſtance from France, to ſupport him in this undertaking. This bargain was ſtruck between them late at night, but not ſo ſecretly, but that Monk's wife, who had poſted herſelf behind the hangings, where ſhe could hear all that paſſed, finding what was reſolved, ſent immediately notice of it by her brother Clarges to ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper. She was zealous for the reſtoration of the king, and promiſed ſir Anthony, to watch her husband, and inform him from time to time how matters went. Upon this notice ſir Anthony ſummoned the council of ſtate, and before them, indirectly charging Monk with what he had learned, propoſed, that to remove all ſcruples, Monk would at that inſtant take away their commiſſions from ſuch and ſuch officers in his army, and give them to thoſe whom he named. By this means the army ceaſed to be at Monk's devotion, and was put into hands that would not ſerve him, in the deſign he had undertaken. Memoirs of the earl of Shaftſbury.

to him in the night. He told him, the king expected great ſervices from him, and that he would finiſh a work ſo happily begun, and even very far advanced. Monk anſwered, he was always diſpoſed to ſerve his majeſty to the utmoſt of his power: but the troops of the two armies were yet ſo averſe to his reſtoration, that the deſign could not be kept too ſecret, becauſe a diſcovery would give occaſion to the republicans to ſubvert it. Diſſimulation therefore was yet neceſſary, till the parliament which was to meet ſhould complete the work; and, in the mean time, it ſhould be his care to model the army to the king's advantage, by the removal of the moſt ſuſpected officers. He added, the better to execute the projected deſign, he thought it abſolutely neceſſary for the king to prepare a declaration capable of diſpelling the fears of thoſe who were moſt guilty, and promiſe a free and general pardon to all his ſubjects, except ſuch as ſhould be exempted by parliament; and that he would conſent to any act which ſhould be preſented to him for the payment of the arrears due to the army, and for the ſettlement of public ſales and diſpoſitions of lands to officers, ſoldiers and others; as alſo for toleration or liberty of conſcience, and that no perſon ſhould be moleſted on account of his religion, who ſhould not diſturb the public peace. Laſtly, his advice was, that the king ſhould remove in time to ſome town of the united Provinces, to prevent his being arreſted by the Spaniards, ſhould they have any ſuch intention, which might ruin the whole undertaking.

The king punctually followed theſe inſtructions, as will be preſently ſeen, and removed from Bruſſels to Breda, not without danger of being ſtopped at Bruſſels, according to the lord Clarendon.

Mean while, Monk made good uſe of the time, which remained till the meeting of the parliament. He diſplaced, on divers pretences, ſuch officers as were moſt ſuſpected by him, and filled their poſts with others in whom he could entirely confide. Moreover, ſome officers, by his direction, framed an engagement in form of an addreſs to the general, by which they promiſed a ready obedience to the orders of the parliament, when aſſembled. This engagement being preſented to Monk, he approved it, and ordered it to be ſubſcribed by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, This gave him a pretence to remove ſuch as refuſed to ſign it.

While the hopes of the king and his party were daily increaſing, an accident happened, which might have been attended with ill conſequences, had it not been ſpeedily remedied. This was Lambert's eſcape out of the Tower, and his putting himſelf at the head of ſome troops[z]. As he was greatly eſteemed by the ſoldiers, there was danger that all the republicans, who were very numerous in the army, would declare for him. Wherefore Monk loſt not a moment to prevent this danger before the miſchief reached any farther. Lambert having aſſembled ſome diſcontented troops at Daventry, Ingoldſby was immediately ſent againſt him with Monk's own regiment, and ordered to take ſome other troops in his way and give him battle, This extreme diligence did the buſineſs effectually. As Lambert had not yet time to aſſemble many troops, Ingoldſby met him the 22d of April, thirteen days after his eſcape, defeated and ſent him to the Tower. Thus the fear which Lambert's eſcape had infuſed into the king's party was entirely diſpelled.

Two days before the parliament met, the republicans made another attempt to prevent the king's reſtoration, by diſperſing a forged letter from Bruſſels, in which it was ſaid, that the king only waited his reſtoration, to be ſeverely revenged upon all his oppoſers. It was alſo added, that his party was preparing to put them all to the ſword. This forged letter beginning to do miſchief, the lords, and others of the king's party, publiſhed a declaration ſigned by ſeventy perſons, in which they diſavowed the intentions aſcribed to them, and proteſted, that their deſire was to live peaceably, without any thoughts of revenge upon the authors of their ſufferings.

The new parliament met the 25th of April, in two houſes, the one of lords, the other of commons, agreeably to the antient conſtitution[a]. In the houſe of lords moſt were the king's friends. In that of the commons, it was found, that many royaliſts were elected, notwithſtanding the abovementioned vote. Some preſbyterians, who were not in the ſecret, had a mind to complain, and moved for an examination of the elections, but were not heard. Moſt of the preſbyterian members were no leſs zealous than the royaliſts for the king's reſtoration, which every one wiſhed, not ſo much, perhaps, out of affection to him, as to deliver the kingdom from the dominion of the independents and fanatics, and from the tyranny of the army, which had laſted twelve years.

Two days after the opening of the parliament, Greenvil, returning from Bruſſels, waited on Monk, with a commiſſion from the king, conſtituting him captain general of all the forces of the three kingdoms, and alſo with a letter from his majeſty to be communicated to the council of ſtate, and the officers of the army. But Monk declined to open the letter, till he had received the parliament's directions. Mean time, the commons having adjourned themſelves for two or three days, Greenvil applied himſelf to the lords, and preſented to them a letter from the king, with a declaration dated the 14th of April.

In the letter the king told the lords, that hearing, they were again acknowledged to have the authority, belonging to them by their birth, he hoped they would uſe it for the public good, for compoſing the diſtractions of the kingdom, and for reſtoring him to his juſt prerogatives, the parliament to their privileges, and the people to their liberties. As for the declaration, it will be neceſſary to inſert it at large.

CHARLES REX,

"CHARLES by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To all our loving ſubjects, of what degree or quality ſoever, greeting. If the general diſtraction and confuſion which is ſpread over the whole kingdom, doth not awaken all men to a deſire and longing, that thoſe wounds which have ſo many years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all we can ſay will be to no purpoſe: however, after this long ſilence, we have thought it our duty to declare how much we deſire to contribute thereunto: and that as we can never give over the hope, in good time to obtain the poſſeſſion of that right, which God and nature hath made our due; ſo we do make it our daily ſuit to the divine providence, that he will, in compaſſion to us and our ſubjects, after ſo long miſery and ſufferings, remit, and put us into a quiet and peaceable poſſeſſion of that our right, with as little blood and damage to our people as is poſſible; nor do we deſire more to enjoy what is ours, than that all our ſubjects may enjoy what by law is theirs, by a full and entire adminiſtration of juſtice throughout the land, and by extending our mercy where it is wanted and deſerved.

"And to the end that fear of puniſhment may not engage any, conſcious to themſelves of what is paſt, to a perſeverance in guilt for the future, by oppoſing the quiet and happineſs of their country, in the reſtoration both of king, peers, and people, to their juſt, antient and fundamental rights; we do by theſe preſents declare, That we do grant a free and general pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to paſs under our great ſeal of England, to all our ſubjects, of what degree or quality ſoever, who within forty days after the publiſhing hereof, ſhall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and ſhall by any public act declare their doing ſo, and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good ſubjects, excepting only ſuch perſons as ſhall hereafter be excepted by parliament: thoſe only excepted, let all our ſubjects, how faulty ſoever, rely upon the word of a king, ſolemnly given by this preſent declaration, that no crime whatſoever, committed againſt us, or our royal father, before the publication of this, ſhall ever riſe in judgment, or be brought in queſtion againſt any of them, to the leaſt endamagement of them, either in their lives, liberties, or eſtates, or (as far forth as lies in our power) ſo much as to the prejudice of their reputations, by any reproach, or terms of diſtinction from the reſt of our beſt ſubjects; we deſiring and ordaining, that henceforward all notes of diſcord, ſeparation, and difference of parties, be utterly aboliſhed among all our ſubjects whom we invite and conjure to a perfect union among themſelves, under our protection, for the reſettlement of our juſt rights and theirs, in a free parliament, by which, upon the word of a king, we will be adviſed.

"And becauſe the paſſion and uncharitableneſs of the times have produced ſeveral opinions in religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animoſities againſt each other, which, when they ſhall hereafter unite in a freedom of converſation, will be compoſed, or better underſtood; we do declare a liberty to tender conſciences; and that no man ſhall be diſquieted, or called in queſtion for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not diſturb the peace of the kingdom, and that we ſhall be ready to conſent to ſuch an act of parliament, as upon mature deliberation ſhall be offered unto us, for the full granting that indulgence.

" And becauſe in the continued diſtractions of ſo many years, and ſo many and great revolutions, many grants and purchaſes of eſtates have been made to and by many officers, ſoldiers, and others, who are now poſſeſſed of the ſame, and who may be liable to actions at law, upon ſeveral titles; we are likewiſe willing, that all ſuch differences and all things relating to ſuch grants, ſales and purchaſes, ſhall be determined in parliament, which can beſt provide for the juſt ſatisfaction of all men who are concerned.

" And we do further declare, that we will be ready to conſent to any act or acts of parliament, to the purpoſes aforeſaid, and for the full ſatisfaction of all arrears due to the officers and ſoldiers of the army under the command of general Monk, and that they ſhall be received into our ſervice upon as good pay and conditions as they now enjoy."

Immediately after the reading of this declaration, the lords voted, " That, according to the antient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, the government is, and ought to be by king, lords, and commons."

Then, ſir John Greenvil came to the houſe of commons, and preſented a letter to them from his majeſty, with the ſame declaration incloſed, which was read, as well as the letter directed to general Monk to be communicated to the council of ſtate and the army. Theſe papers, which, three months before, would have lain unregarded on the table, were now conſidered as convincing proofs of the king's good intentions, and ſufficient reaſons to reſtore him to the exerciſe of the kingly power, without requiring other conditions than what he ſhould himſelf be pleaſed to grant. The commons therefore readily agreed to the vote of the lords, and ſo the king ſaw himſelf reſtored without any of the conditions which had cauſed ſo long a war, and ſo great an effuſion of blood. This is a clear evidence, either that the royaliſts were much ſuperior in number in the houſe, which nevertheleſs is not very probable, or that the preſbyterians were willing to deſiſt from conditions which they had formerly ſo ardently demanded, for certain terms relating to their religion, which had been poſitively promiſed, but which, as they were never performed, gave afterwards too juſt cauſe of complaint.

The king being effectually recognized, by the vote of both houſes, the commons ordered, that fifty thouſand pounds ſhould be preſented to him, ten thouſand to the duke of York, and five thouſand to the duke of Glouceſter. Theſe princes had never before been maſters of ſuch ſums [b].

Then the commons ordered, that all the journals ſhould be ſearched, and thoſe acts and orders razed out which were inconſiſtent with the government of king, lords, and commons. The army, the navy, and the city of London prepared addreſſes to congratulate his majeſty on his reſtoration, and to promiſe him perfect obedience, and theſe addreſſes were delivered to Clarges, who undertook to carry them to the king. The 8th of May, the king was proclaimed in London, with great ſolemnity, and commiſſioners from the parliament and city departed on the 11th to wait on the king who expected them at the Hague. Some preſbyterian miniſters alſo repaired thither, as well to imprint on the king a ſenſe of the ſervice lately done him by the ſect, as to ſound his inclinations with regard to the liberty, which they had probably ſtipulated, before they engaged in the affair of his reſtoration. The king confirmed by word of mouth what he had promiſed by his declaration. But when they beſought him not to revive the uſe of the common prayer, in his chapel, and that the ſurplice might be diſcontinued, he warmly anſwered, " That whilſt he gave them liberty, he would not have his own taken from him [c]."

After the king had given audience to the parliament's commiſſioners the 16th of May, and received the homage of admiral Montague, and the other officers of the navy, who waited on him at Scheveling, he ſtill remained ſome days at the Hague, as well to prepare for his departure, as to receive the compliments of the ſtates [d], and embarked the 23d. He arrived at Dover the 25th, and the ſame day at Canterbury, where on the morrow, he honoured Monk with the order of the garter. The 29th, his birth day, he arrived at Whitehall, through a numberleſs multitude of people, who by their acclamations demonſtrated their joy at his reſtoration [e].

[b] The city of London ſent alſo ten thouſand pounds to the king, and a thouſand pounds a-piece to his two brothers. Phillips, p. 707.

[c] Whitelock ſays, " The miniſters had diſcourſe with the king, and were much ſatisfied with him," p. 702. But the lord Clarendon's words are; " Though they were much unſatisfied with him, they ceaſed further troubling him." Tom. III. p. 602.

[d] Who made him a preſent of ſix thouſand pounds. Whitelock, p. 701.

[e] Burnet obſerves, in the hiſtory of his own times, that ſuch unanimity appeared in the proceedings of the parliament for the king's reſtoration, that there was not the leaſt diſpute among them, but upon one ſingle point, yet that was a very important one. Hale, afterwards the famous chief juſtice, moved, That a committee might be appointed to look into the propoſitions that had been made, and the conceſſions that had been offered by the late king, and from thence digeſt ſuch propoſitions, as they ſhould think fit to be ſent over to the king. This was ſeconded, but by whom the biſhop forgot. As ſuch a motion was foreſeen, Monk was inſtructed how to anſwer it: he told the houſe, that he had information of ſuch a number of incendiaries ſtill in the kingdom, that if any delay was put to the ſending for the king, he could not anſwer for the peace either of the nation or army. And as the king was to bring neither army nor treaſure with him, either to fright or corrupt them, propoſitions might be as well offered to him when he ſhould come over; ſo he moved for ſending commiſſioners immediately. This was echoed with ſuch a ſhout over the houſe, that the motion was no more inſiſted on. And this, ſays Burnet, was indeed the great ſervice Monk did. To the king's coming in without conditions, may be well imputed all the errors of his reign, and it may be added, many miſchiefs that followed afterwards, p. 88, 89.

The parliament, on April 25, 1649, agreed upon a new ſort of coin, whereof were coined crowns, half-crowns, ſhillings, ſixpences, pence, and halfpence. The larger pieces were inſcribed on one ſide, THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND, and had St. George's croſs in a ſhield, betwixt a palm-branch and a laurel; reverſe, the ſame ſhield conjoined to another, in which is a harp for Ireland (vulgarly called the breeches) above which there is XII. the legend GOD WITH US. The ſixpence has VI. above the ſhields. The twopence and pence have no inſcription, only the initial figures; and the halfpenny only the ſingle ſhield, with the harp on the reverſe. There were likewiſe coined pieces of fine gold, of the ſame form and inſcription as the ſilver money, XX. above the arms. The half of them have X. (fig. 1.) The ſixpence 1651, is, ſtrictly ſpeaking, the firſt milled money, queen Elizabeth's being only marked on the flat edge. The copper farthing has the croſs under a garland, ENGLAND'S FARTHING. Reverſe, a harp, FOR NECESSARY CHANGE. Oliver Cromwell's crown-piece is inimitably performed, and preſerved as a choice medal in the cabinets of the curious, being the firſt milled money that has an inſcription upon the rim. It has his head laureat, OLIVER. D. G. RP. ANG. SCO. HIB. &c. PRO. Reverſe, in a ſhield crowned with the imperial crown of England, St. George's croſs in the firſt and fourth quarters; St. Andrew's for Scotland in the ſecond; and the harp for Ireland in the third; and in a ſcutcheon of pretence his paternal coat, namely, a lion rampant, legend PAX QUÆRITUR BELLO. 1658. upon the rim HAS. NISI. PERITVRVS. MIHI. ADIMAT. NEMO. The dye of this piece having received a flaw or crack, the firſt ſtroke leaves a mark upon the money juſt below the neck; a ſure token to diſtinguiſh the true crown-pieces from the counterfeit. The half-crown is equally beautiful, though not ſo rare. The ſhilling is likewiſe a very fair piece, milled on the edge, and very rare. (fig. 2.)

THE

BOOK XXIII.

26. CHARLES II.

[1660] AT the arrival of the king, the face of England was entirely changed, and joy, pleaſures, public and private rejoicings ſucceeded to trouble, fear, and conſternation. The people were ſo tired of the life they had led for twenty years paſt, that they did not believe it poſſible to be in a worſe ſtate. Every one rejoiced to ſee at laſt a calm after ſo long a ſtorm, and expected to enjoy a tranquillity, ſought in vain for ſo many years. The royaliſts and epiſcopalians were at once raiſed to the height of their wiſhes, in beholding Charles II. on the throne of his anceſtors, and the church of England about to reſume her former luſtre. The preſbyterians flattered themſelves, that their late ſervices for the king would at leaſt procure them an entire liberty of conſcience, and the free exerciſe of their religion. The republicans, independents, anabaptiſts could not indeed, hope to be reſtored to the ſtate they had enjoyed ſo many years, but expected at leaſt an intire impunity, agreeably to the Breda declaration. The regicides, that is, the late king's judges, were the only perſons that could not but expect the puniſhment, they juſtly deſerved, and yet, even they deſpaired not of the king's clemency, as indeed, ſuch as caſt themſelves upon it, were not wholly diſappointed. It is not therefore ſtrange that the whole kingdom ſhould reſound with joyful tranſports, and unite in receiving with loud acclamations a king, who, according to the general expectation, was to reſtore the public tranquillity and happineſs, and put all things in their natural order.

Charles II. at the time of his reſtoration, was thirty years old, and but little known to moſt of his ſubjects, becauſe he had long lived out of his dominions. His actions in the weſt, during his youth, where he commanded for the king his father, had been diſtinguiſhed by no advantageous event. His conduct in Scotland, when he was called to the crown of that kingdom, had not redounded to his honour, ſince, in his declaration publiſhed there, he had not ſcrupled to ſacrifice the king his father to his own private advantage. In ſhort, the battle of Worceſter had acquired him no reputation, in which ſome pretend he had been too careful of his perſon, though others ſpeak of his valour on that occaſion with great commendation. However this be, his defeat did not contribute to raiſe his fame as a general. Nevertheleſs, his friends, with a view to his reſtoration, had publiſhed ſuch extravagant praiſes of him and with ſuch aſſurance, that, before his arrival in England, he paſſed there for an accompliſhed prince, endowed with all the virtues and noble qualities of a hero. This prepoſſeſſion did more miſchief to England, than all the calumnies thrown upon the late king. Every one was thereby almoſt equally diſpoſed to put an entire confidence in the new king, in the belief, that a prince of ſuch a character could never abuſe it[a]. It was hoped, that content with reſtoring the government to the ſtate it was in under queen Elizabeth, he would avoid treading in the ſteps of his father and grandfather, without attempting to extend his prerogative. This hope was the more readily entertained, as it was not doubted, that the example of his father had made a ſtrong impreſſion upon him. It will hereafter appear, to what exceſs this confidence was carried, and what uſe Charles made of it to begin the ruin of the liberty and religion of the Engliſh, which his ſucceſſor James II. had certainly accompliſhed, had not God, by a revolution the moſt wonderful, blaſted his deſigns, when he thought himſelf moſt ſecure of ſucceſs. This project to render the king abſolute, and equally to employ for that purpoſe the aſſiſtance of catholics and proteſtants, begun by James I. vigorouſly purſued by Charles I. interrupted by twenty years troubles, was eagerly reſumed under Charles II. If this be not laid down as the baſis of the events of this reign, I do not think it poſſible to account for the conduct of king Charles II. unleſs it be believed, that he acted by mere caprice, without principles, maxims, or any deſign, which can not be thought of a prince, who had as much wit and ſenſe as any prince in Europe. But it is not yet time to deſcend to theſe particulars, eſpecially as it is uncertain whether this project was formed at the beginning of his reign, or owing to ſome favourable junctures. At leaſt, the conduct of Charles immediately after his reſtoration, gives no occaſion to ſuſpect he had already thought of it.

Charles had, as I have ſaid, embraced the catholic religion, before his return into England. Some ſay, he abjured the proteſtant religion to cardinal de Retz, before he left France the laſt time. Others pretend, it was in the year 1659, in his journey to Fontarabia, in order to procure his reſtoration by the aſſiſtance of the two crowns of France and Spain. However this be, the ſecret, known only to the earl of Briſtol and ſir Henry Bennet, afterwards earl of Arlington, was ſo well concealed, that the public was ignorant of it till after the king's death, when his ſucceſſor, James II. was pleaſed to divulge it. But at preſent, it is a thing of which there is no room to doubt. It may be affirmed, his embracing the catholic religion was not through a principle of conſcience, ſince, in the whole courſe of his life, he ſhewed no ſenſe of religion. The greateſt compliment a famous author thinks fit to pay him, is, to ſay he was no atheiſt[b]. This is confirmed by the character given of him by the earl of Mulgrave, who cannot be ſuſpected of a deſign to ſlander him. His ſentiments of religion in general may be judged of, by what Doctor Burnet ſays of him, in the hiſtory of his own times, namely, that he ſcrupled not to communicate the ſame day in two different chapels, publicly in the proteſtant, and privately in the popiſh. However, he loſt no opportunity, in his ſpeeches to the parliament, to boaſt of his attachment to the proteſtant religion, and his zeal for its advancement. Such behaviour, ſo unworthy of a chriſtian, cannot but be very injurious to his memory. Accordingly, thoſe, who have moſt endeavoured to palliate his failings, have not been able to deny, he was a perfect maſter of diſſimulation.

He had, beſides this, a maxim not much leſs dangerous, namely, that there was neither ſincerity nor chaſtity in the world out of principle, but that ſome had the one or the other out of humour or vanity; and believed no body ſerved him out of love, and therefore he was even with all the world, and loved others as little as he thought they loved him. He was extremely affable, and ſo eaſy and complaiſant, that he ſeemed to take a pleaſure in beſtowing favours, by his manner of receiving the requeſts that were made to him. But he forfeited at laſt the eſteem and affection of his ſubjects, who had almoſt adored him in the beginning of his reign, becauſe they diſcovered how little they could depend on kind words and fair promiſes, in which he was liberal to exceſs.

He was ſo addicted to his pleaſures, that though he was very capable of buſineſs, had a good judgment, quick apprehenſion and great penetration, his miniſters could hardly prevail with him to ſuſpend his pleaſures ſome hours, and attend to affairs which required ſome application. But it happened alſo ſometimes that when he would apply himſelf to buſineſs, he diſpatched more in one day, than his miniſters in ſeveral.

[a] When the earl of Southampton came to ſee what Charles II. was like to prove, he ſaid once, in great wrath, to chancellor Hyde, that it was to him they owed all they either felt or feared: for if he had not poſſeſſed them, in all his letters, with ſuch an opinion of the king, they would have taken care to have put it out of his power, either to do himſelf or them any miſchief. Hyde anſwered, he thought the king had ſo true a judgment, and ſo good nature, that when the age of pleaſure ſhould be over, and the idleneſs of his exile turned to an obligation to mind affairs, that he would have ſhaken off theſe intanglements. Burnet, p. 89.

[b] Burnet's words are. "He ſaid once to myſelf, he was no atheiſt, but could not think God would make a man miſerable, only for taking a little pleaſure out of the way." Tom. I. p. 93.

They

As his miſtreſſes devoured his whole time, ſo they conſumed all his treaſures. Though his revenues were larger than thoſe of any of his predeceſſors, except Henry VIII. and the parliament often granted him extraordinary ſupplies, he was ever in want, becauſe he ſpent his money without meaſure or diſcretion, as he received it. This threw him upon his parliament, and, not to break with the commons, he was obliged to promiſe what he never intended to perform.

Theſe are the principal faults imputed to king Charles. But, on the other hand, it cannot be denied, that he had many good qualities, which might have produced happy effects, had he made a better uſe of them. His wit was lively, his conception wonderful, and his judgment exquiſite. He knew the intereſt of the princes of Europe, better than any of his miniſters. He had applied himſelf, during his exile, to the ſtudy of phyſic and the mathematics, and more particularly to navigation, and the building of ſhips, in which he had made great progreſs. With theſe qualities, he might very eaſily have governed his dominions, in a manner glorious to himſelf and advantageous to his ſubjects, and made himſelf arbiter of Europe. And yet, his reign cannot be ſaid to be either glorious to himſelf, or happy to his ſubjects. The reaſon is, that becauſe of his attachment to his pleaſures and natural remiſſneſs, he delivered himſelf up to the counſels of his miniſters, and particularly of his brother the duke of York, who, during this whole reign, had but too much influence upon the reſolutions of the king's council, into which he found means to introduce ſuch as he believed proper for the execution of his projects, with regard to church and ſtate. The duke of York was of a temper more active, violent, haughty, and revengeful. He had formed the deſign of raiſing the royal authority to a great height, and withal, of reſtoring the catholic religion in England. He never ceaſed, through this whole reign, to purſue theſe projects, but more eſpecially, after he was aſſured, the king his brother could not expect any legitimate children. All the principal events of this reign, depending properly upon the humour and character of theſe two princes, I thought it neceſſary to premiſe this deſcription of them.

The king was received in London with extraordinary acclamations, and it began then to be perceived, that, under colour of rejoicing for the king's reſtoration, the Engliſh were throwing themſelves into a diſſoluteneſs, which would not have been endured under the preſbyterians and independents, but which daily increaſed during this whole reign, by the ill examples of the king and the court.

The king's firſt care was to eſtabliſh a council, compoſed chiefly of thoſe who had ſhewn moſt zeal or affection for himſelf, or the king his father. He received, however, ſome men into it, who ſeemed naturally to have no pretenſions thereto [c]. This was the effect of his policy: for it appeared, in his conduct at firſt, that his principal aim was to ſuppreſs the former troubles, in which he could not better ſucceed, than by ſecuring a perfect reliance on his promiſes publiſhed in his Breda declaration. His intention was to ſtifle, as much as was poſſible, the enmities which had ſo long divided his ſubjects, and to unite them all in an obedience to the laws, and a ſincere attachment to his perſon as their true center. He laboured this for ſome time with zeal, even, as I ſaid, to the receiving into his council men, who had profeſſed themſelves his greateſt enemies. Herein he imitated his grandfather Henry IV. of France; but, as will be ſeen hereafter, he was not ſuffered long to purſue this courſe.

Edward Hyde lord chancellor, and ſoon after earl of Clarendon, was the king's prime miniſter, in whom, with great reaſon, he entirely confided. But, as very viſibly appears in his hiſtory of the civil wars, he was a mortal enemy of the preſbyterians, and conſequently, little proper to preſerve the king in his reſolution of procuring tranquillity for all his ſubjects without diſtinction.

As ſoon as the king was arrived in England, the aſſembly, which from the 25th of April had been honoured with the name of parliament, was only called the convention, the king being unwilling to own for parliament, an aſſembly which had not been ſummoned by his writs. But this change of name was of no long continuance. Two days after his arrival, the king went to the houſe of lords, where he ſent for the commons, and gave the royal aſſent to three acts: the firſt was, to change the convention into a parliament [d]: the ſecond, to continue the monthly tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds for three months; and the third, to continue all judicial proceedings.

Had the directions and orders of the foregoing perliament been followed, this parliament ſhould have admitted no member, who had either ſerved the laſt or preſent king. But this order having been neglected in the elections, all were admitted without diſtinction or examination, who had been choſen. As the ſcheme for the king's reſtoration was entirely formed, when this parliament met, the preſbyterians, who were much ſuperior in number, did not think proper to exclude the royaliſts, with whom they had agreed to reſtore the king. Neither was it thought fit to exclude the republicans, nor the regicides themſelves, who were not conſiderable enough to obſtruct the project agreed on. This parliament is therefore to be looked upon as an aſſembly, where the preſbyterians had certainly a ſuperiority of voices, and it was this parliament that reſtored the king to the throne of his anceſtors, and, during their ſhort continuance, gave him very real marks of their zeal for his ſervice, and the re-eſtabliſhment of peace and tranquillity in the kingdom [e].

The affairs of this parliament, after the king's arrival, conſiſted in three principal points. The firſt was an act of pardon or indemnity for whatever had paſſed ſince the beginning of the troubles. This act was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity both of the perſons and deſcendents of thoſe who had been concerned in theſe troubles, and were liable to be called to an account, if the laws had been ſtrictly executed. For as, from the year 1642, the king's party had been deemed rebels by thoſe who were in power; the king, coming to rule in his turn, might have declared rebels all who had been in arms either againſt him or his father. The queſtion of right concerning the war between the king and the parliament, remaining undecided, it was natural for him who had the power in his hands, to explain the laws in his own favour. But, on the other hand, it was to be feared, that rigour, on this occaſion, would kindle a new flame. Beſides, it was very difficult preciſely to explain wherein conſiſted the rights of the king and thoſe of the ſubject, conſidering the arguments on both ſides, and the infinite cavils to which ſuch a diſcuſſion was liable. In a word, explications of this nature had occaſioned the troubles, which, if it was poſſible, were intended to be buried in eternal oblivion. It was thought therefore that the beſt means to quiet the minds of the ſubjects was, an act of indemnity for every thing during the troubles.

The ſecond affair of the parliament, was to enable the king to diſband the army. There was no reaſon for keeping on foot an army which had been the principal cauſe of the diſorders committed of late years, and which would have been ſtill capable of diſturbing the peace of the kingdom under an able leader.

The third affair was the ſettling the king's revenue, ſince it was abſolutely neceſſary to give him wherewithal to ſupport the government, and put him in a condition to be courted and feared. On theſe three important affairs the parliament beſtowed their firſt care, and began with the act of indemnity, as being the moſt urgent. For this purpoſe the houſe of commons ſolemnly declared, in an addreſs preſented to the king by the whole houſe, that they accepted, in the name of themſelves, and all the commons of England, the gracious pardon offered by his majeſty in his declaration from Breda, with reference to the excepting of ſuch as ſhould be excepted in an act of pardon. The lords likewiſe preſented a petition of the like import.

Immediately after, the king publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that all ſuch of the late king's judges as did not ſurrender themſelves within fourteen days, ſhould be abſolutely excluded from the general pardon. Though, by the words of this proclamation, thoſe who ſurrendered themſelves could not be aſſured of their lives, it was nevertheleſs underſtood,

[c] They were thirty in all. The dukes of York and Gloceſter, ſir Edward Hyde, general Monk, admiral Montague, earl of Sandwich, the marquis of Ormond, the marquis of Dorcheſter, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton, Lindſey, Berkſhire, Norwich, Manchester, Northumberland, St. Albans, and Leiceſter; viſcount Say; the lords Wentworth, Seymour, Colepeper, and Roberts; ſir Denzil Holles, ſir Frederic Cornwallis, ſir George Carteret, ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, colonel Howard, Arthur Anneſley, ſir Charles Berkley, ſir Edward Nicholas, and ſir William Morrice.

[d] And to prevent all doubts and ſcruples concerning this parliament, it was enacted, that the lords and commons then ſitting at Weſtminſter, were the two houſes of parliament, and ſo ſhould be declared and adjudged to be, notwithſtanding any want of the king's writs of ſummons. Statute 12. Car. 2. c. 1.

[e] Burnet ſays, theſe five following perſons, all preſbyterians, had the chief hand in the reſtoration; ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, afterwards earl of Shaftſbury, ſir Arthur Anneſley, afterwards earl of Angleſey, Denzil Holles, created lord Holles of Iſield, the earl of Mancheſter, and the lord Roberts. p. 96, that the king made uſe of this artifice only to have it believed, that he would not limit the power and reſolutions of the parliament on this point, and it was not doubted that the two houſes conſidered this proclamation as a ſort of pardon, at leaſt for life, to thoſe who ſhould confide in it. In conſequence of this proclamation, twenty of the late king's judges voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves. Others withdrew out of the kingdom, and ſome were taken in attempting to eſcape.

While the parliament proceeded in the bill of indemnity, ſome leading republicans, who had not been the king's judges, but had exerciſed civil or military employs during the troubles, fearing to be called to an account, demanded of the king letters of pardon under the great ſeal, in order to ſcreen themſelves from all proſecution. The king very readily granted their requeſt, ſhewing thereby that he really intended to perform his promiſe in his Breda declaration. For he was perſuaded, there was no better way to pacify the troubles and give his ſubjects confidence, than the exact obſervance of his promiſes.

The 5th of July, the city of London invited the king and the two princes his brothers, the great officers of the crown, and both houſes of parliament to an entertainment, the magnificence whereof was ſuitable to the riches of the city which gave it, and the quality of the perſons invited.

Though the king really intended the act of indemnity ſhould be quickly diſpatched, it met with great obſtacles in the houſe of commons with regard to the clauſes which were to be inſerted. Some were for having no regard to the Breda declaration, but for making examples of all who had moſt ardently ſupported the late uſurpation. This raiſed a ſuſpicion that the king encouraged theſe men, and intended to ſuſpend the effect of his declaration by means of the parliament, till he was revenged of his enemies. This was induſtriouſly diſperſed among the people in libels, tending to deſtroy all confidence in the king's promiſes, and revive the troubles by driving to deſpair thoſe who knew themſelves moſt guilty. To diſpel therefore theſe ſuſpicions, which might have produced ill effects, the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe, to preſs them to diſpach the act of indemnity, and to make it agreeable to his declaration from Breda. This meſſage ſo quickened the debates, that a few days after, the act paſſed the houſe of commons, and was ſent up to the lords for their concurrence.

In the bill, the houſe of commons excepted for life and eſtate, but a few of the moſt notorious and active regicides. But the lords, incited by divers petitions of the widows, children, and relations of perſons executed by the ſentences of the courts erected during the uſurpation, were for excepting from pardon all who had been judges in thoſe courts. The king fearing new delays from this difference of ſentiments between the two houſes, came to the houſe of lords, the 27th of July, and in a pathetic ſpeech, endeavoured to perſuade them to paſs the bill as ſent up by the commons. He repreſented to them "that he was obliged in honour to perform what he had promiſed in his declaration; that he never thought of excepting any but the immediate murderers of his father; that the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom entirely depended upon the performance of his promiſe, which (ſays he) if I had not made, I am perſuaded neither I nor you had now been here: I pray therefore let us not deceive thoſe who brought or permitted us to come together, and earneſtly deſire you to depart from all particular animoſities and revenge, or memory of paſt provocations, and paſs this act without other exceptions than of thoſe who were immediately guilty of the murder of my father."

This ſpeech, and a meſſage ſent by the king to both houſes on the ſame ſubject, determined the lords to conform to the declaration from Breda. They therefore ſent the bill to the commons with two amendments. The firſt concerned twenty perſons, who by the commons bill were liable to all the penalties, it ſhould pleaſe the parliament to inflict, death excepted, though they were not the king's judges. The lords refuſed their conſent to this clauſe[f], becauſe it was contrary to the declaration from Breda. The other amendment related to the twenty judges of the late king, who had voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves upon the king's proclamation of the 6th of June. For the lords included in the pardon, both for life and eſtate, theſe twenty, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves from the reſt by their confidence in the king's clemency, whereas the commons were only for granting them life, leaving them liable to forfeiture of eſtates, impriſonment, baniſhment, or ſuch other penalties as the parliament ſhould think proper. This was the ſubject of ſeveral conferences between the two houſes, which in the end produced an unanimity of ſentiments, according to which the act was formed. In one of theſe conferences, chancellor Hyde declared, that being employed in an embaſſy to Spain, he was expreſly charged by his majeſty to avow, "That the horrible murder of his father was not the act of the parliament, or people of England, but of a very wretched and little company of miſcreants in the kingdom." This was ſo agreeable to the commons, that they ordered ſuch of the privy council, as were members of the houſe, to thank the king for his juſt defence of the parliament and people of England. At laſt, the king repairing to the houſe of lords the 29th of Auguſt, gave the royal aſſent to the act of indemnity, which contained in ſubſtance:

Penalties againſt thoſe who ſhould uſe any words of reproach tending to revive the memory of the late troubles, with an abſolute pardon to all who had been engaged in them, excepting the following perſons, namely,

Forty-nine of thoſe who had been the late king's judges, with this diſtinction, that as to the twenty who had voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves, if they were condemned, their execution ſhould be ſuſpended till the king and parliament ſhould order the ſame.

Oliver Cromwell, Bradſhaw, Pride, and one and twenty others, who were dead, were made ſubject to confiſcations, and other penalties which the king and parliament ſhould ordain.

Phelps and ſir Arthur Haſlerig were put in the ſame condition.

Hutchinſon and Laſſels were declared incapable of exerciſing any office, and condemned to one year's forfeiture of the revenue of their eſtates.

It was moreover ordained, that Oliver St. John, and ſeventeen others named in this article, ſhould be excluded from any benefit by this act, if they accepted, or executed any office in England, either eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military.

All that had given ſentence of death in any of the late illegal high courts of juſtice, except colonel Ingoldſby and Colonel Tomlinſon, were diſabled from being members in any parliament, or bearing any office in England or Wales.

Thoſe who had converted to their uſe any goods, belonging to the church, were excluded from the benefit of this act.

Sir Henry Vane and Lambert were excepted from pardon, both as to life and eſtate.

The king likewiſe paſſed on this occaſion the following acts.

1. An act for confirmation of judicial proceedings from the 1ſt of May 1642, notwithſtanding their illegality.

2. An act for proviſion of monies to pay off the armies and navy.

3. An act to fix the intereſt of money at ſix per cent.

4. An act for a perpetual anniverſary thankſgiving on the 29th of May, the day of his majeſty's nativity and reſtoration.

After the king had given his aſſent to theſe five acts, he made a ſpeech to both houſes, to teſtify how much he was pleaſed with them; concluding, "I am ſo confident of your affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to myſelf: and yet I muſt tell you, that I am not richer, that is, I have not ſo much money in my purſe, as when I came to you. The truth is, I have lived principally ever ſince, upon what I brought with me, which was indeed your money: for you ſent it to me, and I thank you for it. The weekly expence of the navy eats up all you have given me by the bill of tunnage and poundage; nor have I been able to give my brothers one ſhilling ſince I came into England, nor to keep any table in my houſe, but what I eat at myſelf. And that which troubles me moſt is, to ſee many of you come to me at Whitehall, and to think you muſt go ſome where elſe to ſeek your dinner. I do not mention this to you as any thing that troubles me: do but take care of the public, and for what is neceſſary for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, and take your own time for my own particular, which I am ſure you will provide for, with as much affection and frankneſs, as I can deſire."

The commons obſerving what the king ſaid concerning his brothers, made a preſent to the duke of York of ten thouſand pounds, and of ſeven thouſand to the duke of Glouceſter. After this, they proceeded to the ſettling the king's revenue, and reſolved to raiſe it to twelve hundred thouſand pounds, which was more than any king of England had ever enjoyed, except Henry VIII[g]. But before this could be compleated, the king came to the parliament the 13th of September, and paſſing ſome bills that were ready, they adjourned themſelves to the 6th of November. The acts paſſed on this occaſion were:

1. An act for the the ſpeedy raiſing of a hundred thouſand pounds for a preſent ſupply by way of land tax.

2. An act to impower and direct the commiſſioners in what manner to diſband the army, and to pay off ſome part of the fleet.

3. An act for raiſing one hundred and forty thouſand pounds, at ſeventy thouſand pounds a month, to begin the firſt of November.

4. An act for regulating the bay trade.

5. An act for encouraging and increaſing ſhipping and navigation.

6. An act for reſtoring ſome miniſters to their places and confirming others in vacant places.

The ſame day died the duke of Glouceſter, the king's brother. This prince, now twenty years of age, was unexpectedly taken out of the world by the ſmall pox. As he had very good qualities, the king his brother who loved him tenderly, appeared more concerned for this loſs, than for any misfortune which had ever befallen him.

During the adjournment, the king appointed commiſſioners for trial of the regicides. The number of thoſe concerned in the late king's death, as judges, officers of the court of juſtice, and others, amounted to fourſcore and one, of whom twenty-five were dead, nineteen had made their eſcapes, ſeven others, for having been leſs engaged in the crime were thought worthy of the king's clemency, and twenty-nine were condemned to die. But of theſe, twenty who had ſurrendered themſelves upon the proclamation of the 6th of June, were pardoned as to life, but reſerved for other penalties, as impriſonment, baniſhment, and forfeiture of eſtate. So, ten only were executed, namely, Harriſon, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, Axtel. What was moſt remarkable in the death of theſe men was, that not one expreſſed any ſigns of repentance, or did not think himſelf a martyr. Two only were prevailed with to pray for the king. They were almoſt all anabaptiſts, enthuſiaſts, fifth monarchy men, who believed no violence unlawful to advance the kingdom of Chriſt, and all men of mean birth, except Carew and Scroop.

A few days after the adjournment of the parliament, the king publiſhed a proclamation concerning religion, containing eight articles, moſt of which preſcribed certain rules to the biſhops in the exerciſe of their ſpiritual juriſdiction. The two laſt deſerve a particular notice, becauſe they diſcover that the preſbyterians were not like to continue long undiſturbed. The VIIth ran, that a certain number of divines ſhould be appointed to reviſe the liturgy, and make ſuch alterations in it as ſhould be judged neceſſary, and that ſcrupulous perſons ſhould not be puniſhed or troubled for not uſing it at preſent. The VIIIth was concerning ceremonies, to which, for the preſent, no perſon ſhould be obliged to conform. This reſtriction, "for the preſent," clearly ſhews, that thoſe who adviſed the king to this proclamation, had no intention to leave the preſbyterians in poſſeſſion of that liberty which had been promiſed them by the Breda declaration, and, doubtleſs, by general Monk, when they engaged to promote the king's reſtoration.

There were yet living, nine of the old biſhops, who were reſtored to their ſees without any difficulty[h]. Seven or eight others were newly conſecrated for other dioceſes; and Coſins, againſt whom ſo many complaints had been brought before the parliament in 1640, for the ſee of Durham, where he had once been prebend[i]. Biſhoprics and eccleſiaſtical benefices were offered to the moſt eminent preſbyterian miniſters, but all refuſed except Reynolds, who accepted the biſhopric of Norwich[k].

I ſhall not enlarge on the embaſſies to the king from divers princes of Europe, to congratulate him upon his reſtoration; the ſtates of the United Provinces were the firſt who paid their compliments on this occaſion, and at the ſame time, ſent him ſeveral excellent pictures, drawn by the beſt hands.

September the 25th, the princeſs dowager of Orange came to London to congratulate the king her brother upon his reſtoration. And in November arrived from France the queen mother, who brought with her the princeſs Henrietta her daughter, and the prince palatine Edward, brother to prince Rupert. It is pretended, the queen endeavoured to perſuade the king to marry Hortenſia Mancini niece to cardinal Mazarin: but her propoſal being coldly received, ſhe adviſed him to purſue the negotiation already begun, of his marriage with the infanta of Portugal. Thus much is certain, ſhe propoſed to the king the marriage of the princeſs Henrietta with the duke of Orleans, to which ſhe found no obſtacle. If ſome authors are to be credited, ſhe had two other ends in her viſit. The firſt was to draw the king her ſon into the intereſt of France againſt Spain. The ſecond, to perſuade him to remove the chancellor, whom ſhe did not love, as he himſelf ſhews in his hiſtory. But the king did not think fit to part with ſo ſerviceable and affectionate a miniſter to pleaſe his mother.

The parliament meeting the 6th of November, appointed a committee to congratulate the queen-mother on her return to England. Shortly after, the commons made a preſent of ten thouſand pounds to each of the two princeſſes her daughters.

The duke of York had, ſince his return to England, married Anne, chancellor Hyde's eldeſt daughter, to which he had been in ſome meaſure compelled[l]. The young lady proving with child, there were not wanting perſons to diſſuade the duke from ſo unequal a match. But the king's affection then for the chancellor, over-ruled all conſideration of the injury which the duke his brother, and the royal family, might receive from it. He ſignified to the duke, that it would oblige him not to uſe any ſhifts, and plainly told him, he muſt drink as he had brewed, to which the duke ſubmitted from a motive of obedience. It may eaſily be imagined the queen-mother, who hated the chancellor, was not pleaſed with this marriage. Accordingly ſhe long refuſed to ſee her daughter-in-law, and it was at the preſſing inſtances of the king that ſhe at laſt conſented to receive her reſpects. But during her ſtay in England, ſhe ever treated her with ſo much coldneſs, that her averſion to the marriage was very viſible.

The parliament having, in their firſt ſeſſion diſpatched every thing relating to the act of indemnity, applied their next care to put the king in a condition to diſband the army. For this purpoſe, ſeveral ſums were granted him, and as the money was raiſed, regiments were broke, ſo that this work was finiſhed in the ſpace of a few months. Thus, the army, which had ſo long been the terror of England, was reduced to Monk's ſingle regiment. But in diſbanding the army, the king introduced a novelty, which diſpleaſed many people. He formed, for his ordinary guard two regiments, one of horſe, and one of foot, in imitation of the practice in France, and other kingdoms. This was ſo much like a ſtanding army, which the Engliſh have always oppoſed, that many began then to fear, the king had ill deſigns upon the public liberty. His predeceſſors had no other guards than the gentlemen penſioners, eſtabliſhed by Henry VII.

The diſbanding of the army being in ſuch forwardneſs, the king told the parliament, it was his intention to diſſolve them in December. Whereupon, the commons, to give his majeſty a freſh inſtance of their zeal, confirmed and renewed their former reſolution, of granting the king an annual revenue of twelve hundred thouſand pounds. But the time being too ſhort to ſettle the funds on which this revenue was to be raiſed, the houſe thought it more proper to employ what remained, in preparing the bills to be paſſed, before the diſſolution.

Little care has been taken to ſhew the reaſons inducing the king to diſſolve a parliament, which had been ſo favourable to him, and expreſſed ſuch zeal for his intereſt. It is my private opinion, that the miniſtry, and particularly the chancellor, looked with no good eye upon a parliament, which had ſo many members of that of 1640, and who, in all appearance, whatever they might pretend, had not relinquiſhed their antient principles, concerning kingly power. They, doubtleſs believed it would be very difficult to manage and govern, ſuch a parliament, at their pleaſure. Beſides, very probably, the chancellor, a great enemy of the preſbyterians, had formed the deſign of depriving them of their promiſed liberty, which would have been impoſſible, if this parliament had continued. They believed therefore, that in the preſent favourable diſpoſition of the people to the king, their credit would be ſufficient to have a new parliament, more proper for the execution of their deſigns. The tranſactions of the next parliament confirm this conjecture. It muſt, however, be ſaid for the chancellor, that though he deteſted the maxims of the parliament of 1640, with reſpect to the royal authority, yet he went not the lengths of the other ſide, nor believed it for the intereſt of England, to have a king, whoſe will ſhould be a law. This is manifeſt, from an incident at the very time I am ſpeaking of. A member of the commons, Mr. Alexander Popham, who had a conſiderable influence in the houſe, offered the king, that provided he was ſupported by the court-party, he would undertake to procure an act, for ſettling on him and his ſucceſſors two millions a year, which would free him from any dependence on his parliament, except in extraordinary caſes. The king was pleaſed with the propoſal, and ſpoke to the chancellor of it, as of a project advantageous for his intereſt. But he bravely anſwered, "that the beſt revenue his majeſty could have, "was the affection of his ſubjects, and if he would truſt "to them, he would never want ſupplies in time of need." Nor did he reſt ſatisfied with this anſwer to the king, but even took pains to undeceive the lord treaſurer the earl of Southampton, who had approved of the project, and by very ſolid reaſons, convinced him, that the ſucceſs of it would be the ruin of the kingdom. It is pretended, the chancellor's oppoſition to Popham's propoſal, was one of the chief cauſes of his diſgrace.

The parliament, before their diſſolution, ordered the bodies of Oliver Cromwell, Ireton, Bradſhaw, and Pride, to be taken out of their graves, drawn on a hurdle to Tyburn, and there hung from ten o'clock till ſun ſet, and then buried under the gallows. At the ſame time an act of attainder paſſed, not only againſt theſe four, but againſt the nineteen judges of the late king, who were fled from juſtice, among whom was Ludlow, author of the Memoirs under his name.

About the ſame time, William Drake, citizen and merchant of London, publiſhed a book, entitled; "the long parliament revived," in which he endeavoured to prove, that the long parliament was not yet legally diſſolved. The commons brought an impeachment of high treaſon againſt the author, but had not time to bring it to a trial.

At this time likewiſe ſeveral officers, who had ſerved under Cromwell, Deſborough, Morgan, Overton, and ſeveral others, were arreſted upon an uncertain rumour of a plot to ſecure the king's perſon, ſeize the Tower, and kill the queen-mother, but it did not appear that this rumour had any good foundation.

At laſt, on the 29th of December the king came to the parliament, and gave the royal aſſent to the following acts:

1. An act for levying the arrears of the twelve months aſſeſſment.
2. An act for the farther ſupplying ſeveral defects in the act for diſbanding the army.
3. An act for ſix months aſſeſſment, at ſeventy thouſand pounds per month, to begin the 1ſt of January.
4. An act for the better ordering the ſelling of wines by retail, and for preventing abuſes in the mingling, corrupting, and limiting the prices of the ſame.
5. An act for erecting a poſt office.
6. An act for an impoſt upon ale, beer, cyder, and other liquors, to hold for his majeſty's life.
7. An act for the raiſing of ſeventy thouſand pounds for his majeſty's farther ſupply.
8. An act for the attainder of ſeveral perſons guilty of the horrid murder of Charles I.
9. An act for confirmation of leaſes and grants for colleges and hoſpitals.
10. An act to prohibit the exportation of wool, and fuller's earth.
11. An act for prohibiting the planting of tobacco in England and Ireland.
12. An act for taking away the court of wards, and liveries, together with tenure in capite, knights ſervice, and purveyances, and for ſettling a revenue upon his majeſty in lieu thereof[m].

After giving the royal aſſent to theſe acts, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I WILL not entertain you with a long diſcourſe, the ſum of all I have to ſay to you, being to give you thanks, very hearty thanks: and I aſſure you, I find it a very difficult work to ſatisfy myſelf in my own expreſſions of thoſe thanks. Perfunctory thanks, ordinary thanks for ordinary civilities, are eaſily given; but when the heart is full as mine, it is a labour to thank you. You have taken great pains to oblige me; and therefore it cannot be eaſy for me to expreſs the ſenſe I have of it. I will enlarge no further to you upon this occaſion, than to tell you, when God brought me hither, I brought with me an extraordinary affection and eſteem for parliaments. I need not tell you how much it is improved by your carriage towards me. You have out done all the good and obliging acts of your predeceſſors towards the crown; and therefore you cannot but believe, my heart is exceedingly enlarged with the acknowledgment. Many former parliaments have had particular denominations for what they have done: they have been ſtiled learned and unlearned, and ſometimes have had worſe epithets, I pray let us reſolve, that this be for ever called the Healing, and the Bleſſed Parliament. As I thank you, though not enough, for what you have done, ſo I have not the leaſt doubt, by the bleſſing of God, but when I ſhall call the next parliament (which I ſhall do as ſoon as you can reaſonably expect or deſire) I ſhall receive your hearty thanks for what I have done, ſince I parted with you. For I deal truly with you: I ſhall not more propoſe any one rule to myſelf in my actions and councils than this: what is a parliament like to think of this action, or this council? And it ſhall be a want of underſtanding in me if it will not bear that teſt. I ſhall conclude with this, which I cannot ſay too often, nor you too often where you go: that, next to the miraculous bleſſing of God Amighty, and indeed as an immediate effect of that bleſſing, I do impute the good diſpoſition and ſecurity we are all in, to the happy act of indemnity and oblivion: that is the principal corner-ſtone which ſupports this excellent building, that creates kindneſs in us to each other, and confidence is our joint and common ſecurity. You may be ſure, I will not only obſerve it religiouſly and inviolably myſelf, but alſo exact the obſervance of it from others: and if ever any perſon ſhall have the boldneſs to attempt to perſuade me to the contrary, he will find ſuch an acceptation from me, as he would have, who ſhould perſuade me to burn magna charta, cancel all the old laws, and to erect a new government after my own invention and appetite."

This flattering ſpeech was received by the people with great applauſe, every one hoping, that a prince of this character would have no other view, than the cauſing his ſubjects to live in peace and plenty. After the king had done ſpeaking, the chancellor made a ſpeech to both houſes, much longer than the king's, but tending to the ſame end, namely, to perſuade them, that the king being extremely tender of his people, all his actions would be directed to render them happy. He forgot not to mention the pretended conſpiracy, for the ſubverſion of the preſent government. But without entering into any particulars, he contented himſelf with aſſuring, that the conſpiracy was real, and Ludlow, one of the fugitive regicides, deeply concerned in it. This inſinuation was neceſſary for two purpoſes. The firſt was, to convince the people of the neceſſity of putting the militia into the king's hands, to enable him to ſuppreſs the malecontents. The ſecond, to get a pretence for the breach of the king's promiſe, in his Breda declaration, by the indiſpenſable neceſſity of providing for the ſafety of the ſtate, againſt the ill deſigns of the ſectaries. This will appear more clearly hereafter. When the chancellor had ended his ſpeech, he declared the parliament diſſolved.

Thus ended this parliament, about eight months after the firſt meeting, and ſeven after the king's reſtoration. I have already obſerved, that moſt of the members were preſbyterians, or at leaſt, that party was ſuperior in the parliament. For this reaſon, no doubt, ſome writers magnifying what this parliament did for the king, and their diſpoſition in his favour, have inſinuated, it was a ſort of miracle, that they did not throw up at once all the liberties of the nation, upon the king's reſtoration. But this is a groundleſs exaggeration. For if all the acts of this parliament be conſidered, not one will appear to ſupport this opinion. They recalled the king, but certainly that will not be thought ſtrange. They voted a revenue of twelve hundred thouſand pounds for the king, but it was only a vote which was executed by the next parliament. They paſſed the act of indemnity at the king's preſſing inſtance, and which was indeed neceſſary. They granted the king a ſupply, to pay off the fleet and the army. But could this be avoided without endangering the public tranquillity? They preſented the king with, after all, an inconſiderable ſum, for his occaſions, and his brothers and ſiſters, with thirty ſeven thouſand pounds. But was any thing more juſt or more natural than to enable him to maintain his houſhold, till his revenues were ſettled? There is nothing therefore in the actions of this parliament which infers a diſpoſition, to throw up the liberties of the nation. But it will be ſeen, that this diſpoſition, which is groundleſly ſuppoſed in this parliament, was really and truly in the next: and that after doing too much, they were forced to alter their meaſures, and uſe extraordinary means to oppoſe the deſigns of that very king, to whom they had given an almoſt unlimited power. This ſecond parliament however has not been cenſured, whilſt the compliance of the firſt has been induſtriouſly aggravated. The reaſon of this difference is very obvious, namely, that the ſecond parliament beſt follows the views and principles of the writers, who have thus remarked on the former. In ſhort, if it be conſidered, that the firſt parliament ſat only ſeven months after the king's reſtoration, and that the ſecond continued eighteen years, it will be eaſily perceived, to which of the two may moſt juſtly be aſcribed the deſign of throwing up the liberties of the nation.

The concluſion of this year brought the king a new cauſe of affliction in the death of the princeſs of Orange his ſiſter, who died of the ſmall pox the 24th of December, at the age of twenty nine years [n]. She left but one ſon, who was afterwards king of England by the name of William III.

This ſame year died William Seymour, earl of Hertford, lately reſtored to the title of duke of Somerſet. He has been often mentioned in the reign of Charles I. Doctor Hammond, the famous divine, died a little before the king's reſtoration.

It was alſo this year that the royal ſociety was erected by the king's letters patents, who beſides granted it all the neceſſary encouragement towards a diſcovery of the ſecrets of nature, and of what is moſt curious and neceſſary in natural philoſophy and mechanics.

Before we cloſe this year, it will not be improper briefly to mention the tranſactions of Scotland, from the time of the king's reſtoration.

After the king left Scotland, with an army to invade England, the Engliſh entirely conquered that kingdom under the conduct of general Monk, who ſerved the parliament. If the king, after that, thought of Scotland, it was only to cheriſh the diſcontents, and try, by means of his adherents, to excite a revolt. For though he had been recognized and crowned in Scotland, he always conſidered his intereſts as directly oppoſite to thoſe of that kingdom, or at leaſt, of the governing party. He never loved the Scots, and his belief of their ſelling the king his father to the Engliſh parliament, greatly inflamed his prejudice againſt them, nor was it diminiſhed by his reſidence in that country. His reſtoration to the Engliſh throne rendered him doubly maſter of Scotland; firſt, becauſe he was their natural king, and had even been crowned there; ſecondly, becauſe Scotland had been conquered by the Engliſh. Nothing would have been eaſier than to leave Scotland in dependence upon England, there being no likelihood, that the Scots would ever be able to recover their liberty. It even ſeems, the king was not averſe to this thought, ſince he left Scotland to be governed by the Engliſh, more than two months after his reſtoration. But at laſt he reſolved to reſtore that kingdom to its antient form of government. For this purpoſe, Monk writ in the king's name to the Engliſh commiſſioners who had been employed as judges there, to diſcontinue their functions the 22d of Auguſt; and at the ſame time proclamation was made, for the convening of the committee of eſtates, till a parliament ſhould be called. The king named the great officers of the kingdom, and took care to chooſe for theſe poſts and for his council, ſuch as were believed moſt firmly devoted to him. The earl of Glencairn was made lord chancellor, the earl of Crawford, lord treaſurer, the earl of Caſſilis, juſtice general, the earl of Lautherdale, firſt ſecretary of ſtate, and general Midletoun, the king's commiſſioner. Theſe men, as well as thoſe who formed the council, had been always firmly attached to the king's intereſt. Thus the Scots, freed from the yoke laid on them by Cromwell, were exactly in their former ſtate, as before the troubles in 1637, that is, under the government of a king and miniſters of the very ſame principles with Charles I. and the miniſters of that time. But there was this diſadvantageous difference, that they were no longer able to make themſelves feared, being entirely ſubdued. They had ſoon occaſion to know what they were to expect. Some of their miniſters aſſembling for the drawing up a remonſtrance concerning their grievances, were ſent to priſon by the committee of eſtates, without any examination of the nature, motive, or language, of the remonſtrance, as if the bare deſign of preſenting it had been criminal. Moreover, a proclamation was publiſhed againſt all unlawful aſſemblies and ſeditious writings, on ſuppoſition, that the aſſembly of the miniſters and their petition were of that nature. This might have ſatisfied the preſbyterians, who were the body of the Scotiſh nation, what was preparing for them, and that they had no remedy but ſubmiſſion and patience.

They had ſtill another very convincing proof. The marquis of Argyle repairing to London to pay his duty to the king [o], was arreſted, ſent to the Tower, and afterwards to Scotland, to be tried on an impeachment of high treaſon [p]. The king in his declaration from Breda, had not mentioned Scotland. So, the Scots were expoſed to the reſentment and vengeance of their enemies. Amongſt theſe, chancellor Hyde was one of the moſt violent, as he has plainly diſcovered in his hiſtory of the civil wars, and, unhappily for the Scots, he was prime miniſter in England, and had the principal direction of the king's affairs. Some indeed of the Engliſh council were of opinion, it would be very advantageous to the king, to ſuffer the Scots to enjoy the benefit of the Breda declaration. But the contrary advice prevailed, whether from the king's animoſity, and that of his councilors, or from the hopes of ſuch as had faithfully ſerved the king in his troubles, of having the eſtates of the condemned.

This reſolution being taken, the king ſummoned a parliament in Scotland, to meet the 12th of December, and publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that he left it entirely to the parliament, to examine the conduct of his ſubjects of Scotland; and that after his honour was vindicated, and his prerogative eſtabliſhed, he would grant a pardon which would witneſs how much he deſired the happineſs of his people. It will appear what method he took to procure this happineſs of the Scots.

As for Ireland, the king committed the government of it to ſir Maurice Euſtace chancellor, and the earls of Orrery, and Montrath, in quality of lords juſtices, till a lord lieutenant ſhould be appointed.

[1660-1] The year 1661 was uſhered by an extraordinary event. This was an inſurrection of ſome fifth monarchy men, who believed themſelves bound in conſcience to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to advance the kingdom of Chriſt on earth. As I have elſewhere ſpoken of theſe men, and as their principles are ſufficiently known by the tragedies acted by them at Munſter, and other places of Germany, it will be needleſs to give a more particular account of their tenets [q]. The 6th of January, while the king was attending the queen mother, and the princeſs his ſiſter to Dover, in their return to France, about fifty of theſe men, under the conduct of one Thomas Venner, aſſembled in the evening in St. Paul's church-yard, and killed a man, who upon demand, had anſwered, "for God and the king." This giving an alarm to the city, ſome trained bands were ſent againſt them, whom theſe men quickly routed, and then marched through ſeveral ſtreets, and at laſt retired to Cane Wood[r], from whence a party of horſe and foot, ſent by general Monk, diſlodged them, and took ſome priſoners. But this did not prevent the reſt from returning to the city, where they fought furiouſly, till they were obliged to take ſanctuary in a houſe. They there defended themſelves like men fearleſs of death, or rather, as ſecure from all danger, under the protection of Jeſus Chriſt. Here it was that Venner, being wounded, and twenty of his men killed, with as many of the aſſailants, was taken with the reſt of his fellows. A few days after they were all tried, condemned, and executed, without any confeſſion of guilt, and perſiſting in their extravagancies to the laſt. Two young men only ſhewed ſome ſigns of repentance.

Between

Though this attempt could not juſtly be conſidered as the conſequence of a deſign formed by a whole party, and though the anabaptiſts had been all guilty, there was no reaſon to blame the other ſects, yet the court urged this inſurrection to confirm the rumours of a conſpiracy againſt the government. The king took occaſion to publiſh a proclamation, forbidding all meetings and conventicles, under pretence of religion, and commanding the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy to be tendered to all perſons diſaffected to the government, and in caſe of refuſal, they were to be proſecuted on the ſtatute of the 7th of James I.

It will, doubtleſs, be thought ſtrange, that by reaſon of the extravagance of ſome anabaptiſts, all the other ſects ſhould be included in the prohibition of all meetings on account of religion, contrary to the expreſs terms of the declaration from Breda. But it will be immediately ſeen, that the ruin of the preſbyterian party was now reſolved, and that pretences were ſeeking to execute this reſolution, particularly, pretences which might create a belief, that what was done was only for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government. The end propoſed was to inſinuate, that religion was no way concerned, but only the ſtate, and thereby obviate the objection which would naturally be drawn from the Breda delaration, wherein the king ſolemnly promiſed, that no perſon ſhould be moleſted for his religion. To ſucceed the better in this deſign, an admirable expedient was deviſed. This was to range under the ſame denomination, all the ſects differing from the church of England, in order to impute to the whole body conſiſting of all theſe ſects, what could have been imputed but to one, had they been diſtinguiſhed. This denomination was, that of diſſenters, or non-conformiſts, under which were comprehended, as well the preſbyterians, as the papiſts, anabaptiſts, and other ſects. Thus, by this affected confuſion, all the non-conformiſts were charged with the faults of one of the ſects compriſed under that name, and, as if they had made but one body, puniſhed without diſtinction, on pretence of keeping them in awe, and preventing them from diſturbing the ſtate. The catholics, the independents, the anabaptiſts, were non-conformiſts. Precautions therefore were to be taken againſt the non-conformiſts, and conſequently againſt the preſbyterians, becauſe their enemies were pleaſed to comprehend them under the ſame general appellation. Undeniable proofs of what I advance, will hereafter appear. The truth is, the preſbyterians only were properly aimed at, whoſe ruin was reſolved, notwithſtanding the declaration from Breda. For indeed, it is not likely, that a king, who had privately embraced the Romiſh religion, would turn perſecutor of the catholics. And the independents and anabaptiſts made then ſo inconſiderable a figure, that the king's miniſters had but little reaſon to fear them. But though there had been cauſe to ſuſpect them, why were they not diſtinguiſhed from the preſbyterians, who had given no room for ſuch ſuſpicions? All this was only to ſave, in ſome meaſure, the king's honour, at a time when his promiſes, contained in his declaration from Breda, were openly evaded. This name of non-conformiſts, is therefore to be conſidered as a very ambiguous term, which indeed ſignifies men who conform not to the church of England, but not in the ſenſe which was given it, namely, of a body of men inſeparably united, compoſed of all the diſſenters, and acting with the ſame views, and for the ſame intereſt.

Some of the preſbyterian miniſters obſerving, they were induſtriouſly confounded with ſects, with whom they had no relation, petitioned the king for a conference between them and the biſhops, in order to examine wherein conſiſted their differences, and the objections of the preſbyterians to the book of common prayer. The king granted their requeſt, and immediately named twelve biſhops, as principals, and nine other clergymen as aſſiſtants; and on the preſbyterian ſide, twelve miniſters as principals, and nine others as aſſiſtants, to confer together at the biſhop of London's houſe, who then lodged in the Savoy[s]. The commiſſion ran: "That the commiſſioners appointed ſhould act for four months, from the 25th of March, and particularly were ordered to adviſe upon and review the book of common prayer;——to take into their ſerious and grave conſiderations, the ſeveral directions and rules, forms of prayer, and things in the ſaid book of common prayer contained; and to adviſe and conſult upon and about the ſame, and the ſeveral objections and exceptions which ſhall now be raiſed againſt the ſame; and (if occaſion be) to make ſuch reaſonable and neceſſary alterations, corrections, and amendments, as ſhall be agreed upon to be needful and expedient, for giving ſatisfaction to tender conſciences, and the reſtoring and continuance of peace and unity in the churches under his majeſty's government and protection—And to certify to his majeſty in writing, under their ſeveral hands, the matters and things whereupon they ſhall ſo determine, to be by his majeſty approved, &c." Thus the king gave to theſe twenty-one miniſters, a power, they had not deſired, to decide, as well for themſelves as their brethren, who were more than two thouſand, and for the whole body of the preſbyterians, what was neceſſary to be altered in the liturgy, without empowering them to meet beforehand to ſettle their demands, in order to an union with the church of England.

[1661.] From the firſt day of the conference, it was eaſy to foreſee it would be fruitleſs. For though the miniſters had already acquainted the king and the chancellor that they could decide nothing, ſince they were not authoriſed by their brethren, Sheldon, biſhop of London, immediately told them, that as themſelves had requeſted this conference, they were to produce at once all their exceptions to the liturgy in writing, together with the additional forms and alterations which they deſired. The miniſters anſwered, as they had before done to the king and chancellor, That they could decide nothing, without having firſt conſulted their abſent brethren, and received from them a commiſſion in form. This tended to a requeſt, that they might be permitted to meet in ſynod, and debate together on theſe matters: but this was never intended to be granted. They were therefore urged, only to declare their own ſenſe, when it was ſeen, that they could not be brought to act as deputies of a body, by which indeed they were not commiſſioned. To this it was anſwered, That they were willing to give in writing their particular ſentiments, provided, at the ſame time, the biſhops would bring in their utmoſt conceſſions, that when both were compared, a judgment might be made of the ſucceſs. But the biſhops abſolutely rejected this propoſal. At laſt, the miniſters conſented to produce at once all their exceptions, reſerving to themſelves, however, a power to make additions according to the anſwers they ſhould receive, and their offer was accepted. Whereupon, the exceptions were drawn up, and an anſwer given in by the biſhops, who accepted a reply, and at length ſome ſlight alterations in the liturgy were agreed on. But, beſides that the miniſters conſidered theſe alterations as inſufficient, there was an invincible obſtacle to an agreement, which was, that the miniſters not being commiſſioned, whatever they ſaid, could be eſteemed but as their private opinion.

I ſhall enter no farther into this conference, becauſe, to underſtand it, requires a competent knowledge of the Engliſh liturgy, and the manner in which divine ſervice is celebrated, which cannot be ſuppoſed with regard to the generality of foreigners, for whom this hiſtory is deſigned[t]. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with ſome general remarks, to aſſiſt the reader to underſtand wherein conſiſted the differences betwixt the church of England and the preſbyterians, and the conduct of both ſides.

During the whole reign of king James, and the fifteen firſt years of Charles I. the preſbyterians were oppreſſed, or, at leaſt, may be ſaid, not to be treated by the church of England as chriſtian charity ſeemed to require. From the beginning of the parliament of the 3d of November 1640, the church of England was perſecuted in her turn, and epiſcopacy itſelf at laſt entirely aboliſhed. When the independents were become maſters of the parliament and army, the epiſcopalians ſtill continued under oppreſſion, and though the preſbyterian church government was outwardly preſerved, there was nevertheleſs an entire liberty for all proteſtant ſects, which the preſbyterians conſidered as a violent perſecution. This ſtate continued till the beginning of the year 1660, when Monk forming the deſign of reſtoring the king, believed, it could not be effected without a reſtitution of that very preſbyterian parliament which had aboliſhed epiſcopacy. This expedient was crowned with ſucceſs; and by the united endeavours of the preſbyterians and epiſcopalians, the king was at laſt replaced on the throne. The reſtoration of the king produced that of the church of England, which was at once in almoſt the ſame ſtate ſhe had been before the year 1640. There was, however, this difference, that, during the troubles, the number of the preſbyterians was exceedingly increaſed, and thereby they were grown much more formidable than under the reign of king James, and the firſt fifteen years of Charles I. It was therefore the intereſt of the church of England, either to ruin entirely the preſbyterian party, which could ſtill raiſe freſh troubles in church and ſtate, or oblige them to unite with the national church by ſome ſmall conceſſions. And for this laſt purpoſe, the conference now mentioned ſeemed to be intended.

But, ſuch conferences upon religion are ſeldom attended with a happy ſucceſs; firſt, becauſe the two parties muſt be equally animated with the ſpirit of peace and charity, which is rarely found amongſt men; and, if I may venture to ſay it, ſtill more rarely amongſt churchmen. Secondly, becauſe in theſe conferences, one of the parties is uſually ſuperior, and in poſſeſſion of power, and therefore not very ready to quit that advantage, to be reduced to an equality. So, no ſucceſs can be expected, unleſs one of the parties will yield every thing to the other. This recalls to my mind a ſaying of a French catholic, a man of wit, to a miniſter after the concluſion of the religious war in France: "If, ſaid he, you had come to a compoſition with us while the ſword was in your hand, we might have made you ſome conceſſions; but now that you are conquered, we would not yield you ſo much as the chriſtening of bells." The caſe was much the ſame in England, at the time I am ſpeaking of. We have ſeen the conceſſions of Charles I. in the treaty of Newport, with regard to epiſcopacy, which, if it was not entirely given up by him, was however reduced to a very ſmall matter. But after the reſtoration of Charles II. the uſe of the ſurplice was of too great conſequence to religion, to be relinquiſhed. Thirdly, the animoſity between the two parties, generally hinders the conferences from ſucceeding. The one cannot bear to receive law from the other, nor think of revoking what has been once advanced. Fourthly, inſtead of thinking ſeriouſly on peace, both parties ſeek only to ſurpriſe one another. Laſtly, it too often happens, that theſe conferences are granted by the prevailing, to the oppreſſed party, only to have it ſaid, that peace was offered but rejected by the contrary party. There is room to believe, that in this conference all theſe circumſtances met, therefore it is no wonder, it ſucceeded like the reſt of the ſame nature; for, in ſhort, it broke off without any effect, and, as too commonly happens, each party threw the blame upon the other. Mr. Baxter, in his relation of it, ſays, that the biſhops were abſolutely againſt all conceſſions. But in another relation it is ſaid, the preſbyterians were ſo obſtinately attached to their opinions, that they would not recede from a ſingle point, and that at laſt, upon the biſhop of Durham's propoſal, being required to declare in writing what they thought ſinful in the liturgy, they put into the liſt all the articles which kept them from joining with the church of England, without one exception. They thereby ſhewed, that they conſidered as ſinful, all the forms and practices of the church of England, even to the uſe of the ſurplice, and by conſequence their refuſal of an accommodation, unleſs their opinions were entirely conformed to. Theſe are the mutual accuſations of the two parties, on which I am far from deciding any thing as to the truth of the facts. All I can ſay, without wronging either party, is, that the preſbyterians ought to have receded from ſeveral points, which are manifeſtly indifferent; and that the biſhops ſhould not have ſcrupled to give up the ſame points. But people were then very far from being inclined to charity and condeſcenſion.

During this conference at the Savoy, the king was magnificently crowned on St. George's day, the 23d of April[a].

The parliament, which had been ſummoned for the 8th of May, met on the day appointed. The repreſentatives, for the moſt part, were elected agreeably to the wiſhes, and without doubt by the influence of the court. The greateſt part were high churchmen, that is, violent enemies of the preſbyterians, great aſſertors of the minuteſt ceremonies of the church, and moſt devoted to the king and the royal prerogative. They literally followed the principles of Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury, which had cauſed the troubles in the late reign. In a word, this parliament may be ſaid to be compoſed by chancellor Hyde, prime miniſter, and on the 20th of April created earl of Clarendon. Let it alſo be added, that this parliament was called the penſionary parliament, becauſe it was afterwards diſcovered, that many of the members received penſions from the court. It is true, many will not allow that this was ſo at firſt, but pretend, that by length of time, and changes upon death, the new members ſuffered themſelves to be bribed. I cannot however help remarking, that, at the very beginning, this parliament did things in favour of the king, which no other had ever done, and that it was not till afterwards that they retracted their extravagant maxims, concerning the royal prerogative. This ſhews, the parliament was bribed betimes, notwithſtanding the inſinuations of ſome to the contrary. However it be, it may be judged how favourable this parliament was to the king, ſince it continued almoſt eighteen years, on which account it was more juſtly called the long parliament, than that of 1640.

As religion, whether popery, or preſbyterianiſm, and the royal prerogative, are concerned in almoſt all the tranſactions of this reign, it is abſolutely neceſſary to acquaint the reader with ſome things concerning the hiſtorians. Otherwiſe, they will be extremely embarraſſed, when they read in ſome hiſtories things quite contrary to what they read in others. My deſign is, therefore, by a few remarks upon this ſubject; firſt, to prevent their being inſenſibly, and for want of examination, biaſſed by the opinions or prejudices of the hiſtorians. Secondly, to incline; and thirdly, to aſſiſt them, in ſome meaſure, to make this examination.

There are three ſorts of authors, who have writ the hiſtory of this reign. The firſt are thoſe, who profeſs to be high church with regard to religion; and with reſpect to the government, aſcribe to the king an almoſt unlimited power, provided the king be of their party. Theſe are, in a word, what are called the high fliers, or rigid tories. They are good proteſtants, but however, much leſs enemies of the papiſts than of the preſbyterians. For hardly will they allow the latter to be chriſtians, becauſe they have no biſhops. Now, according to their principles, no valid ordination can be had without biſhops, and conſequently no valid adminiſtration of the ſacraments; whence it follows, that preſbyterians baptized by miniſters unordained by biſhops, are not truly baptized.

There is another ſet of writers of this reign, who, being proteſtants, embrace not the extravagant principles of the former, either concerning the church or the government. Theſe are of the number of thoſe who are called whigs, among whom there is a mixture of churchmen and preſbyterians.

Laſtly, there are popiſh hiſtorians, whoſe tenets and principles are ſufficiently known.

Each of theſe authors has writ the hiſtory of this reign according to his principles; for this reaſon what is praiſed and approved by one hiſtorian, is blamed and cenſured by another. For inſtance, as to this ſecond parliament, ſome openly inſinuate, that the firſt years tranſactions, whether for extending the royal power, or oppreſſing the preſbyterians, were agreeable to reaſon, juſtice, and the good of the kingdom; but what was done, after the breach with the king, was only the effect of corruption and cabal. Others on the contrary maintain, that this parliament's zeal, whether for the king or againſt the preſbyterians, was an extravagant zeal, which threw them upon meaſures very detrimental to the nation, and unavoidably engaged them to favour the ill deſigns of the court; but perceiving at laſt the ill uſe the court made of this diſpoſition, they eſpouſed the true intereſts of the kingdom, in oppoſing the king's deſigns.

The popiſh hiſtorians are of the ſame principles with the high flying tories concerning the government. But, whereas king Charles's deſign of introducing popery into England is very unwillingly owned by the tories, the papiſts, on the contrary, make it a glorious deſign, as being very juſt and religious.

[a] For the greater ſplendor of this ſolemnity, the following titles of honour were conferred, ſir Arthur Annefley, was made earl of Angleſey; ſir John Greenvil, earl of Bath; Frederick Cornwallis, lord Cornwallis; ſir George Booth, lord de la Mere; ſir Horatio Townſhend, lord Townſhend; ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, lord Aſhley of Wimborne; John Crew, baron Crew; ſir Charles Howard, earl of Carliſle; Denzil Holles, lord Holles; Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon; Arthur lord Capel, earl of Eſſex; Thomas lord Brudenell, earl of Cardigan. See Dugdale's Baron. tom. II.

A man muſt therefore prepare himſelf to meet theſe contrarieties, if he reads ſeveral hiſtories of this reign, and to chuſe that ſcheme which appears moſt coherent and beſt ſupported. For this purpoſe it will be proper to adhere only to plain facts, without regarding the frequent inſinuations of the hiſtorians, moſt of whom ſupport without ceremony their own ſcheme, even in the facts they relate. I own this is difficult: but I ſuppoſe the reader's ſearch is after truth, which he will never attain, if he implicitly follows, without examination, the firſt hiſtorian which comes in his way. Wherefore, I thought it proper to inform him before hand of what he is to expect, and withal to leave him at liberty to examine my ſcheme as well as that of others. But to return to the parliament.

The king going thither the 8th of May, made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which, after ſome expreſſions of his great affection for his people, he recommended two bills, which he had prepared to confirm the act of indemnity. He repeated the ſame words he had ſaid to the laſt parliament. Adding, that they might be as ſevere as they pleaſed againſt new offenders, but he ſhould not think him a wiſe man or his friend, who ſhould perſuade him to infringe the act of oblivion, or to conſent to a breach of a promiſe ſo ſolemnly made when he was abroad. Laſtly, he communicated to them his intended marriage with the infanta of Portugal, which had been reſolved with the approbation of his whole council.

The earl of Clarendon, lord chancellor, afterwards enlarged on the particulars mentioned by the king in his ſpeech, but chiefly upon two points untouched by the king. The firſt related to the ſeditious ſermons of certain preachers, which tended to renew the old troubles, and whoſe licentiouſneſs it was neceſſary to curb. The ſecond point on which he inſiſted, was the late inſurrection, which he aggravated in the ſtrongeſt expreſſions, intimating, that by intercepted letters it might be concluded, that the combination reached very far, and if the vigilance of the lord mayor had not prevented it, the city had been in danger of being burnt to aſhes. He did not name the authors of the ſeditious ſermons, becauſe his deſign was not to accuſe this or that perſon, or any particular ſect, but only to obtain a general order againſt the preachers who were not of the church of England. As to the pretended conſpiracy diſcovered, as he aſſured, by a multitude of intercepted letters, it does not appear that any one was proſecuted in conſequence of theſe letters, or that others beſides Venner and his companions, were proved to be concerned in it. It is therefore manifeſt, this ſpeech tended only to incenſe the parliament againſt the ſectaries or nonconformiſts in general, under colour of providing for the ſafety of the king and the ſtate, in a ſuppoſition, that it was only from them any danger could be feared. This will appear hereafter to be more than a meer conjecture.

Sir Edward Turner, the duke of York's attorney general, being choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, at the recommendation of the court, both houſes unanimouſly voted their thanks to the king for the gracious communication of his reſolution to marry, and went in a body to congratulate him. Then the houſe of commons ordered all their members to receive the ſacrament according to the preſcribed liturgy within a certain time, upon pain of being expelled the houſe.

The 20th of May the two houſes jointly ordered, that the writing called the ſolemn league and covenant ſhould be burnt by the common hangman; which was performed with great triumph. Three days after, the following acts were alſo ordered to be burnt. The act for erecting a high court of juſtice for trying and judging Charles Steuart, &c. The act for ſubſcribing the engagement againſt a king and houſe of peers: the act for declaring the people of England to be a commonwealth, &c. The act for renouncing the title of Charles Steuart, and another for the ſecurity of the protector's perſon.

The zeal of the two houſes breeding a fear in the republicans, that the act of indemnity paſſed in the late parliament, would not be ſufficient for their ſecurity, if it was not confirmed by the preſent, they addreſſed the king for this confirmation. Upon their petition, the king writ to both houſes the 2d of June, earneſtly recommending to them to paſs the bill he had prepared for them. He even told them plainly, however neceſſary the bills might be, that were ready for the royal aſſent, he had no mind to paſs them till the act of indemnity was likewiſe preſented to him. This letter having produced the deſired effect, the king came to the parliament the 8th of July, and paſſed the following acts.

An act to confirm the act of indemnity paſſed in the late parliament.

An act to empower the king to receive from his ſubjects, a free and voluntary contribution for his preſent occaſions.

After this, the king made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, to remind them of his declaration from Breda, and of that ſigned by his adherents when his reſtoration began to be talked of, in which they promiſed to renounce all memory of former unkindneſſes, and vowed all imaginable good will to each other. "Therefore (continues he) let it be in no man's power to charge me or you with breach of our word or promiſe."

Theſe two acts being diſpatched, the parliament proceeded with vigour in finiſhing the other bills which were before them, and in particular, one for the confiſcation of the eſtates of twenty one regicides deceaſed, and to puniſh three, who were ſpared as to life, but liable to other penalties. Theſe were the lord Monſon, ſir Henry Mildmay, and Robert Wallop. It was ordered, that they ſhould, on January the 30th, be drawn upon ſledges with ropes about their necks to the gallows at Tyburn, and from thence conveyed to the Tower, there to remain priſoners during their lives.

The 30th of July the king came to the parliament, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts.

1. An act for the ſafety and preſervation of the king's perſon and government; which had three remarkable clauſes.

The firſt, that if any perſon ſhould compaſs, imagine, or intend the king's death, deſtruction, or bodily harm, to impriſon or reſtrain his royal perſon, or depoſe him, or ſhould levy war againſt him within or without this realm, or ſtir up any foreign power to invade him; or ſhould declare or expreſs ſuch his wicked intention, by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and adviſed ſpeaking, he ſhould, being thereof legally convicted, be adjudged a traitor.

The ſecond, that if any man ſhould maliciouſly or adviſedly publiſh or affirm his majeſty to be an heretic, or a papiſt, or that he endeavoured to introduce popery; or ſhould ſtir up the people to hatred or diſlike of his royal perſon or government; that every ſuch perſon ſhould be made incapable of any office or employment either in church or ſtate.

The third, that if any man ſhould maliciouſly and adviſedly affirm, that the parliament, begun in Weſtminſter the 3d of November 1640, is yet in being, or that any covenant or engagement ſince that time impoſed upon the people, doth oblige them to endeavour a change of the government either in church or ſtate, or that either, or both houſes of parliament have a legiſlative power without his majeſty, that then every ſuch offender, being legally convicted thereof, ſhould incur the penalties of a præmunire mentioned iu the ſtatute of the 16th of Richard II.

The other acts now paſſed were:

An act to repeal the law made in the 17th year of Charles I. for the excluſion of the biſhops from the houſe of peers.

An act to prevent tumults and diſorders committed under pretence of preparing, or preſenting petitions to the king or parliament.

An act to declare the ſole right of the militia to be in the king.

An act to impower his majeſty to diſpoſe of the land forces.

An act for the regulation and government of his majeſty's navies and forces by ſea.

An act to impoſe certain pains and penalties upon the perſons or eſtates of thoſe who had a hand in the horrible murder of the late king.

An act for the collection of the great arrears of the duty of exciſe.

An act for providing neceſſary carriages for the king in all his progreſſes and removals.

After theſe acts had received the royal aſſent, the king thanked the two houſes for them, and particularly for that which reſtored the biſhops to their ſeats in parliament, and that which concerned the militia. This done, he gave them leave to adjourn to the 20th of November.

When the king called this parliament, he had no intention to aſſemble the clergy in convocation, believing, the Savoy conference was equivalent to a convocation. But dr. Heylin, in a letter to a minister of state, shewed, that this conference ought not to hinder the king from assembling the clergy. He alledged, among other reasons, that the clergy could not be bound by the acts of the Savoy assembly. This was precisely what the presbyterian ministers, appointed by the king, had alledged, to shew they had no power to act for their brethren. This convocation did nothing considerable, except granting the king a benevolence by virtue of the act above-mentioned [w].

Savoy

While these things passed in England, the parliament in Scotland proceeded with no less vigour. Being assembled in January, they began first with abrogating and annulling the solemn league and covenant of the two kingdoms; and commanded that none of his majesty's subjects presume, on pretence of any authority whatsoever, to require a renewing, or swearing to the league and covenant, without his majesty's special warrant and approbation.

They next declared the power of the militia to be in the king alone, and the act of the 16th of January 1647, by which the late king was delivered to the English, to be infamous, disloyal, and contrary to all laws divine and human.

Episcopacy was restored in Scotland, and for that purpose, four presbyterian ministers, Sharp, Hamilton, Fairfoul [x], and Leighton came to London, where, after being ordained deacons and priests, they were consecrated bishops by the bishop of Winchester, with two other assisting prelates. All four renounced their first ordination as invalid, and before their departure for Scotland, obtained from the king a declaration of his pleasure to restore in Scotland the government of the church by archbishops and bishops, as it was in the year 1637. Upon this declaration, the privy council of Scotland strictly discharged all ecclesiastical meetings at synods and presbyteries, &c. till they should be authorised by the archbishops and bishops. An act was also passed in the Scotch parliament to prohibit all meetings and conventicles in private houses for religious worship. By another act the right of patronage was revived. And lastly, by another, it was ordained, that all persons in any public office, should sign a solemn declaration against the national covenant in 1638, and the solemn league and covenant in 1643, in which they declared it unlawful to subjects upon pretence of reformation, or any other pretence whatsoever, to enter into leagues and covenants, or take up arms against the king, or those commissioned by him.

The marquis of Argyle having been sent prisoner to Edinburgh, was there tried, and condemned; and beheaded the 27th of May. Many believed, that revenge, and the avarice of some persons [y], who hoped for the confiscation of his estates, were more powerful motives for his sentence, than justice. A few days before his death, the remains of the unfortunate marquis of Montrose were solemnly interred, and the head of the marquis of Argyle was set up in the place where his stood.

In England the bodies of sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle, who were shot at Colchester in 1648, were likewise honourably interred.

During the recess of the English parliament, the cavaliers or royalists made great complaints of the king's ingratitude, for suffering them to perish with hunger, while, by the act of indemnity, he procured his enemies the secure enjoyment of immense riches, acquired by illegal means. The city swarmed with libels on this subject. One, amongst the rest, writ by L'estrange, told the king bold truths with great freedom. But the king thought not proper to take notice of them, believing, the least he could do for the loyal sufferers, was to let them complain, since it was neither in his inclination nor power to reward them.

To suspend these complaints, the city was filled with rumours of projects and plots against the king's person and government [z]. But many believed this only an artifice to incense the parliament against the non-conformists in general, and the presbyterians in particular, and afford a pretence to proceed against them. The presbyterians were always confounded with the other sects, under the denomination of non-conformists, who were charged with ill intentions against the government, though hitherto the presbyterians had given no cause of suspicion, at least, nothing was proved against them. The most plausible thing urged, was, that the independents, anabaptists, and the other republicans, seeing the presbyterians no better treated than themselves, formed great projects, in hopes of being joined by the presbyterians at a proper time. Thus much is certain, the project of the act of uniformity, which will be mentioned hereafter, was now formed, and the rumours, true or false, of plots carried on by the non-conformists, might be very useful to palliate the breach of the Breda declaration, under colour of providing for the safety of the state. For the presbyterians could not be attacked on account of religion, without a most manifest violation of the king's promise.

The earl of Sandwich, vice-admiral, being sent with a fleet to Lisbon, to bring home the new queen, appeared before Algier to make a treaty with the corsairs, or reduce them to reason by force. But he found them so well prepared, that he was obliged to return to Lisbon without any thing done.

The parliament re-assembling the 20th of November, the king made a speech to both houses, without any necessity, as they had only been adjourned. He gave for reason, that it was to have the pleasure to see the bishops restored to their places in parliament. He then desired the commons, "To think seriously upon settling his revenue, and providing for the expences of his navy: adding, that he asked nothing for himself, but as his interest was united with that of his people." He told them, "that he was willing they should make a full inspection into his disbursements and receipts, but would not have them believe any loose discourses, of giving away eighty thousand pounds in a morning. That he had much more reason to be sorry, that he had not to reward those who had ever faithfully served the king his father and himself, than ashamed of any bounty he had exercised towards any man." After this, he told the two houses, "that he was sorry to find, the general temper and affections of the nation were not so well composed as might have been expected, after such signal blessings from God Almighty upon all, and after so great indulgence and condescensions from him towards all interests. That there were still many wicked instruments, who laboured night and day to disturb the public peace, and make all people jealous of each other. That it was worthy of their care and vigilance, to provide proper remedies for the diseases of that kind; and if they found new diseases, they must study new remedies. That the difficulties which concerned religion were too hard for him, and therefore he recommended them to their care and deliberation, who could best provide for them."

When the king published his declaration at Breda, and expressed so much zeal for passing an act of indemnity, agreeably to his declaration, he did not think it out of his power to give a positive promise, that no person should be molested on account of religion. But, in all appearance, since the elections of the members for his new parliament had been made, according to the wish of the ministry, in favour of high church, it was suggested to the king that the best expedient to obtain whatever he desired, was to sacrifice the non-conformists to the parliament. It is not very strange, that a prince of his character, who had secretly embraced the Roman catholic religion, or, to speak more properly, had no religion at all, should not think it a point of honour to support the presbyterians, at the hazard of losing the affection of his parliament. He visibly begins therefore, in the conclusion of his speech, to use evasions; and by talking in general of persons, labouring to trouble the peace of the kingdom, furnishes his parliament with a pretence of treating the non-conformists with rigour, as disturbers of the public tranquillity. As to religion, he leaves the care of it to the parliament, as of a thing too difficult for him. By this he entirely departs from his Breda declaration, and the act of indemnity, which till now he had so much insisted on.

This speech was as the signal to the persecution, which, soon after, broke out against the non-conformists, and particularly the presbyterians, for they alone were properly aimed at. We shall see presently, that upon rumours of conspiracies forming against the state by the non-conformists, without distinction of any sect, acts were grounded, which manifeſtly deſtroyed the Breda declaration, as well as that publiſhed by the royaliſts, when the king's reſtoration was in view.

I ſhall briefly ſtate the argument uſed to ſupport this perſecution. It is true, the king generouſly pardoned the offences committed before his declaration: but he did not promiſe to pardon ſuch as ſhould be afterwards committed. Now, ſince the king has been reſtored, the non-conformiſts are plotting to diſturb the government. It is therefore neceſſary to take all poſſible precautions, to diſable them to execute thair deſigns. In anſwer to this argument, it is needleſs to urge the ſlender foundation of theſe pretended plots, for which no man was ever puniſhed, or even proſecuted [a]. It ſuffices to remark, that it ſuppoſes, what is entirely falſe, that the non-conformiſts made but one body, becauſe their enemies had been pleaſed to give them all one common name. And yet, upon this ſuppoſition ſo notoriouſly falſe, it was thought lawful, to deprive all the ſects, and particularly the preſbyterians, of the benefit of the declaration from Breda, only becauſe their enemies were pleaſed to confound them with the independents and enthuſiaſts, under the ſame appellation of non-conformiſts. I do not think it neceſſary to ſtay any longer to demonſtrate the weakneſs of this argument. But it was ſufficiently valid, for men who had the power in their hands.

To prepare the way for the deſigned alteration, ſolely founded upon rumours of an imaginary conſpiracy, the parliament thought proper to ſupport theſe rumours, by a petition to the king for a proclamation, to order all officers and diſbanded ſoldiers to depart twenty miles from London. It was natural to infer from thence, that there were grounds for fear, which was indeed the deſign of the proclamation.

The ſame day, the commons voted the king a ſupply of twelve hundred thouſand pounds for his preſent occaſions, that is, to be diſpoſed of as he pleaſed. This was the firſt fruits of his condeſcenſion, with regard to the Breda declaration.

Then, the parliament reſumed the affair of the nineteen regicides, who had voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves upon the proclamation of the 6th of June, and yet had been ſentenced to death. They were aſked what they had to ſay, why judgment ſhould not be executed upon them? They alledged the king's proclamation, on which they had relied, believing it was his intention to pardon them. But this did not prevent a bill from being brought in for their execution, which was read twice, and then dropped, probably, on the king's powerful ſolicitation in favour of the condemned, who could not have been executed without great prejudice to his honour and faith.

The rumours, as I ſaid, of plots, were abſolutely neceſſary to ſerve for foundation to what was intended to be done. The earl of Clarendon had mentioned theſe plots at the cloſe of the late parliament, and the king at the opening of this. To ſtrike a greater blow, the earl of Clarendon, at a conference between the two houſes, affirmed poſitively, that there was a real conſpiracy, which had been forming ever ſince March, to diſturb the peace of the kingdom. He named ſeveral perſons engaged, and gave an exact account of the manner how it was to be executed. He ſaid, though the deſign ſeemed diſconcerted as to the city of London, where the officers and diſbanded ſoldiers had been invited to repair the 11th of the inſtant December, it was ſtill purſued in the country. The lords, upon this information, named a committee of twelve of their houſe, to whom they deſired the commons to add a proportionable number of their members, to examine the horrible deſign, that the execution of it might be prevented, and the peace of the kingdom ſecured.

Certainly, it cannot but appear ſtrange to all, who are not prejudiced by paſſion or party, that a plot, of which the court ſo well knew all the circumſtances, the parties engaged, the day of its deſigned execution in London, the endeavours ſtill uſed to promote it in the country, and concerning which a multitude of letters had been intercepted, that this plot, which was examined by a numerous committee of both houſes, ſhould not be attended with the death of any of the accomplices, nor even with the proſecution of one ſingle perſon. It was, however, upon this ſole foundation, that the corporation act, of which I am going to ſpeak, and all the proceedings againſt the non-conformiſts were built.

The 20th of December, the king came to the parliament, and paſſed the two following acts:

An act to grant the king twelve hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds, for his preſent occaſions, to be levied by a monthly tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds, for eighteen months.

An act for regulating corporations.

This act, which was called the corporation act, ran, That in order to perpetuate the ſucceſſion in corporations, in the hands of perſons well affected to the government, it was ordained, that every mayor, alderman, common-councilman, or any other officer in a corporation ſhould be obliged, beſides the common oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and a particular declaration againſt the ſolemn league and covenant, to take an oath, declaring, "that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatſoever, to take arms againſt the king; and that he did abhor that traiterous poſition, of taking arms by his authority againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe commiſſioned by him."

If the oath had imported, that it is not lawful, on any pretence, to take arms againſt the eſtabliſhed government, there had been nothing in it extraordinary. But in this oath, the king was ſuppoſed to be ſole maſter of the government, which is manifeſtly falſe, ſince he can neither make nor repeal a law, without the concurrence of the parliament, and conſequently, the ſovereign authority does not reſide in him alone. This ſuppoſition was exactly like that of the parliament of 1640, that the ſupreme authority reſided in the people, or their repreſentatives in parliament, the abſurdity of which was expoſed by Charles I. in almoſt every one of his papers. They are both equally falſe, and to ſhew that the people of England do not think them true, we need only obſerve, the abſurd conſequences they have produced, and which have been conſtantly rejected by the Engliſh. By the maxim of the parliament of 1640, that parliament believed, they had a right to aboliſh monarchy, and change the eſtabliſhed religion. By the maxim contained in this oath, James II. believed he had a right to introduce a new religion, and eſtabliſh an abſolute power. But the Engliſh nation thought themſelves bound by neither the one nor the other of theſe extravagant maxims. Charles II. was reſtored, notwithſtanding the deciſion of the parliament of 1640; and James II. was dethroned, notwithſtanding the deciſion of this parliament, which had ordered the oath we are ſpeaking of, though the king had concurred to the act. It is impoſſible in England to mark out the degree of obedience due from the people to the king, or the parliament, when they are diſunited. The reaſon is evident, becauſe in their union conſiſts the eſſence of the government. It is in the king and parliament united together, that the abſolute power, neceſſary to all governments, is lodged. Wherefore, to ſay, "that upon any pretence or reaſon whatſoever," it is not lawful to reſiſt the king or the parliament, is, properly throwing up the liberties of the nation to the mercy of the one or the other. The high-churchmen, of which this parliament was principally compoſed, had then extraordinary ideas of the royal authority. And I know not whether they have yet entirely loſt them. But it is certain, many of them at laſt opened their eyes, and ſaw the dangerous conſequences of their maxims, and even this parliament did not think fit to admit them all, as will hereafter appear.

When theſe acts were paſſed, the parliament was adjourned to the 10th of January.

Elizabeth Steuart, daughter of James I. electreſs palatine, and queen of Bohemia, died at London the 13th of February [b].

[1661-2] The parliament being aſſembled the 10th of January, the firſt thing the lords did, was to receive the report of the committee, appointed to examine the conſpiracy, ſuppoſed to have been forming now almoſt a year, but which had yet produced no effect. The earl of Clarendon, who made the report, ſays, that two perſons, namely, Wildman and Salmon, were particularly engaged, and that a liſt of one hundred and forty officers of the late army had been found with Salmon; that it was further diſcovered, that the conſpirators were to have had a meeting at London the 10th

[b] She came from the Hague to London, May 17, 1661, and died February 13, 1661-2, aged ſixty-ſix years. She was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, in the ſame vault with prince Henry her brother. She had eight ſons, and five daughters, of whom the youngeſt ſurviving, the princeſs Sophia, mother of the late king George, was, in 1701, declared heir to the crown of Great Britain.—March 9, died the famous cardinal Mazarin. of December, and designed to have secured Shrewsbury, Coventry, and Bristol, by the end of January: That where they were prevalent, they were to begin with horrible assassinations, which moved one of them to relate, that the fugitive judges of the late king were entertained in France, Holland, and Germany, and held a strict correspondence with the English conspirators, and were encouraged by foreign princes: that they had bought a large quantity of arms, and boasted, if they could once set foot in England, they should not want means to carry on their work. That this had been discovered by one of the accomplices, and confirmed by such intelligence from abroad, as never failed: that many met at Huntington, and rode about the town in the night, to the great terror of his majesty's good subjects: that it might be wondered, that some proposals were not made to remedy the impending evil, but the king, having conferred with the duke of Albemarle, had ordered two troops of horse to Shrewsbury, and as many to Coventry, who, in their way, had dispersed a great knot of thieves, and taken twenty: that a rumour was spread, that the appointing this committee was only a plot of the court to govern by an army, but the committee was very sensible of the reality of the danger, and hoped the two houses would be so too: that since their enemies were united for their destruction, they should also be united for their own preservation.

When it is considered, that after a strict examination of this conspiracy by a numerous committee of both houses, the whole amounted only to a list of one hundred and forty officers found upon a man, without any other circumstance; and concerning one of the accomplices not named; to secret intelligence that never failed; to a company of men assembled about Huntington, in the night for some unknown reason. That not any of these pretended conspirators, who might have been known by one of their party who had discovered the whole plot, was either punished or prosecuted for this supposed crime: that in short the noise of this conspiracy ceased at once after the uniformity act had passed: when these things, I say, are considered, who can help thinking it a mere invention, to give some colour to this act. The government durst not attack the presbyterians directly on account of their religion. The declaration from Breda was too express on that article. But they were to be charged with new crimes, in order to be deprived of the benefit of that declaration. They were not even accused of attempting to disturb the state, since the king's restoration; but the non-conformists in general were accused in order to punish the presbyterians, as if they made but one body with independents, anabaptists, enthusiasts, because to all these sects was given the common name of non-conformists.

The first of March, the king sent for the commons to Whitehall, and reproached them, though very civilly, with having done nothing towards the settling of his revenues. He artfully insinuated, that the late troubles had principally been owing to the wants and necessities of the crown, thereby intimating, that this had obliged his father to stretch the royal prerogative. He added, that there was still in the kingdom a republican party, who promised themselves a second revolution, and therefore the only way to disappoint their hopes, was to enable the crown to support itself, and secure them. He continued his speech in this manner:

" ——Gentlemen, I hear you are very zealous for the church, and very sollicitous, and even jealous that there is not expedition enough used in that affair. I thank you for it, since I presume it proceeds from a good root of piety and devotion: but I must tell you, I have the worst luck in the world, if after all the reproaches of being a papist while I was abroad, I am suspected of being a presbyterian now I am come home. I know you will not take it unkindly, if I tell you that I am as zealous for the church of England, as any of you can be, and am enough acquainted with the enemies of it on all sides: that I am as much in love with the book of common prayer as you can wish, and have prejudice enough to those who do not love it, who, I hope, in time will be better informed, and change their minds; and you may be confident I do as much desire to see an uniformity settled as any amongst you. I pray trust me in that affair: I promise you to hasten the dispatch of it with all convenient speed; you may rely upon me in it. I have transmitted the book of common prayer, with those alterations and additions, which have been presented to me by the convocation, to the house of peers, with my approbation, that the act of uniformity may relate to it: [c] so that I presume it will be shortly dispatched there: and when we have done all we can, the well settling of that affair will require great prudence and discretion, and the absence of all passion and precipitation."——

The king's design in this part of his speech, was to obtain, that the execution of the act of uniformity, when it should be passed, might be left entirely to him, in order to have it in his power to dispense with whom he pleased. This he afterwards discovered in words more clear and precise, though the parliament would not grant his desire.

The commons being returned to their house prepared several bills, and amongst the rest one against the quakers, for refusing the oaths. Not that they believed themselves freed by this refusal from the obligations imposed by these oaths, but because they considered all oaths as unlawful. This act and another for the repairing of the streets and high ways in and about London, were passed by commission.

At last, on the 17th of May, the king coming to the parliament, gave his assent to several acts, of which I shall only mention the most important.

An act for the uniformity of public prayers, and the administration of the sacraments.

An act for the better regulation and ordering of the standing forces of the nation.

An act for laying a perpetual and annual tax of two shillings on every chimney hearth in each house, alms-houses excepted.

An act to empower his majesty to levy, for the next ensuing three years, a tax of seventy thousand pounds per month, if necessity shall so require.

Moreover, the house of commons ordered sixty thousand pounds which exceeded the sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds, granted by a former act, to be distributed among the poor cavaliers, who had been sufferers in the late troubles.

After the passing of these acts, the parliament was prorogued to the 18th of February.

Amongst these acts three are particularly remarkable.

By the act of uniformity, every minister was obliged, on pain of losing all his ecclesiastical preferments, to conform to the worship of the church of England, according to the new book of common prayer, before the feast of St. Bartholomew next, from whence it was called the Bartholomew act. Every minister was also obliged to sign the following declaration: " I do here declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing contained and prescribed in and by the book intitled, the book of common prayer, &c." Besides this, every person was obliged to sign a declaration contained in the militia act, in which declaration he was not only to promise to conform to the liturgy of the church of England, but likewise to renounce the solemn league and covenant, declaring it to be an unlawful oath, and imposed upon the subjects of this realm against the known laws and liberties of the kingdom.

The penalties annexed to this act were many, particularly, ——" No person should be capable of any benefice, or presume to consecrate and administer the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, before he be ordained priest by episcopal ordination, upon pain to forfeit for every offence the sum of one hundred pounds."

I shall make but three observations upon this act; the first shall be in the very words of the declaration from Breda. " And because the passion and uncharitableness of the times have produced several opinions in religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed or better understood; we do declare a liberty to tender consciences, and that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that we shall be as ready to consent to such an act of parliament, as upon mature deliberation shall be offered to us for the full granting that indulgence."

[1662] Let this clause be compared with the act of uniformity, and it will easily be seen, what care the king's own mini-

[c] There were added some new collects, as the prayer for all conditions of men, and the general thanksgiving, and the prayer for the high court of parliament, and a new office was made for baptism of such as were of riper years, and two more, one for the 30th of January, the other for the 29th of May. In the collect for the parliament, the king was stiled, our most religious king, an epithet that gave great offence, and occasioned much indecent raillery. Some new holidays were added also, as St. Barnabas, and the conversion of St. Paul, and more lessons were taken in out of the Apocrypha, particularly the story of Bell and the dragon. Burnet, p. 183. ſters, who were the real authors or promoters of the act, had of his honour, and what regard he himſelf paid to his promiſe. Notwithſtanding all this, ſome did then and do ſtill conſider this act as the great ſupport and bulwark of the church of England, and extol the authors as deſerving the everlaſting praiſes and bleſſings of the church; whilſt others, perhaps, no leſs ſincerely attached to the church of England, looked upon it as her reproach.

My ſecond remark is, that to this came the promiſes made to the preſbyterians by the king's party, upon the aſſurance of which they had ſo chearfully laboured for his reſtoration, according to the directions received from his friends.

My third obſervation is, that by an artifice the moſt groſs, not only conſpiracies were invented which had no reality, but which, though they had been true, could not have been imputed to the preſbyterians, who were not to anſwer for the crimes of the other ſects.

It will perhaps be imagined, that being a preſbyterian, I ſpeak out of intereſt and paſſion. But I proteſt, I have always had, and ſtill have, a profound reſpect and extreme veneration for the church of England, to which I always conformed during my reſidence there, and am ready to do it again, were I to return. But this does not oblige me to conſider all her members as free from failings, paſſions and prejudices; eſpecially on the preſent occaſion, wherein, as a hiſtorian, truth requires of me to ſhew clearly ſo material a point of hiſtory, as the treachery which was uſed to the preſbyterians. For at their ruin it was that the uniformity act was principally levelled [d].

The act concerning the militia, intitled, "An act for the better regulating and ordering the ſtanding forces of the nation," contained amongſt others the following clauſe.

"Foraſmuch as within all his majeſty's realms and dominions, the ſole and ſupreme power, government, command and diſpoſition of the militia, and of all forces by ſea and land, and of all forts and places of ſtrength, is and by the laws of England ever was, the undoubted right of his majeſty, and his royal predeceſſors, kings and queens of England; and that both or either of the houſes of parliament, cannot, nor ought, to pretend to the ſame; nor can, nor lawfully may raiſe, or levy any war offenſive or defenſive againſt his majeſty, his heirs or lawful ſucceſſors, &c."

It was ordained by this act that all lord lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, officers, and ſoldiers, ſhould take the following oath:—"I do declare, and believe, that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatſoever to take arms againſt the king; and that I do abhor that traiterous poſition, that arms may be taken by his authority againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him, in purſuance of ſuch military commiſſions."

When in the latter part of the oath the words, "commiſſioned by him," came to be debated in the houſe of commons, a great lawyer [e] moved, that the word "lawfully" might be added to make all clear. But the attorney general ſir Heneage Finch anſwered, "That it was not neceſſary, for the very word commiſſion imported it; ſince if it was not lawfully iſſued out to lawful perſons and for a lawful reaſon, it was no commiſſion." And the whole houſe aſſented to this interpretation. The ſame difficulty, offered in the houſe of lords [f], was removed in the ſame manner [g]. But in ſuppoſing that by commiſſioned could be only meant lawfully commiſſioned, where would have been the hurt to add the word "lawfully" in order to take away all obſcurity, if the parliament had intended to put any reſtriction upon the royal power?

Suppoſe now, the king inveſted with ſuch a power, had attempted to abrogate all the old, and ſubſtitute new laws, at his pleaſure, to aboliſh the uſe of parliaments, and force his ſubjects to embrace the popiſh religion; which way could they have maintained their liberties and religion, ſince there was no ſupreme court to call the king to an account, and ſince by this oath it was high treaſon to take up arms againſt him upon any pretence whatſoever? Theſe are the uſual effects of factions in a ſtate. Each party, when ſuperior, thinks only of doing the contrary to what the other has done, without conſidering the conſequences, and generally both parties run into extremes. The parliament of 1640, incenſed againſt Charles I, for attempting to ſtretch his prerogative, are not content to reduce him within due bounds, but aſſume alſo privileges inconſiſtent with the conſtitution, and proceed at laſt entirely to deſtroy the monarchy. The parliament of 1661, not ſatisfied with reſtoring the king to his juſt rights, inveſt him with an unlimited power, and render him as abſolute as any monarch in the univerſe.

The annual tax of two ſhillings upon every fire hearth, not only to this king for his life, but to his ſucceſſors for ever, ſhewed, that this parliament acted not upon a bare motive of zeal and affection for the reigning king, but alſo ſeemed to have an intention of putting the kings of England in a condition to ſupport themſelves without parliaments, by ſo great a power aſcribed to them. And indeed, this ſingle tax amounted to about two hundred and fifty ſix thouſand pounds a year, which, together with the tunnage and poundage, exciſe, and other duties, made the revenue of the king double to any of his predeceſſors; ſo fearful was this parliament of not ſufficiently ſhewing their zeal for monarchial government, which had been, many years, ſo unworthily treated.

The ſeſſion of parliament being ended, the court was wholly employed in preparing for the reception of the new queen, who was daily expected. She left Liſbon the 15th of April, and arrived at Portſmouth the 14th of May, where the king went to receive her [h]. A report was ſpread, that the marriage was ſolemnized by Sheldon, biſhop of London, though others, who believe themſelves better informed, ſay, the queen refuſed to be married by any but a catholic prieſt; that the king conſented to it, and that very few perſons were preſent at the ſolemnity [i]. This marriage had been propoſed by d. Franciſco de Mello, the Portugueſe embaſſador, to general Monk [k], at the time that he was labouring the king's reſtoration. The embaſſador's aim was to procure Portugal a powerful aſſiſtance from England, ſince by the Pyrenean treaty, the king his maſter had no farther expectations from France. To prevail with Monk, and by his means, with the king, he engaged that the king of Portugal ſhould give with the princeſs his ſiſter, three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, the town of Tangier upon the coaſt of Africa, and the iſle of Bombaim in the Eaſt Indies. Monk, pleaſed with theſe offers, propoſed the marriage to the king immediately after his arrival [l]. The king approved of it, and accordingly it was concluded in the year 1661 [m]. Some pretend, that chancellor Hyde ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the marriage, upon information that the princeſs of Portugal, by ſome natural infirmity, was incapable of having children, but that the king took this for an artifice of the court of Spain to prevent a marriage, which could not but prove prejudicial to their great deſigns upon Portugal. Others ſay, the chancellor was the chief author of the match. Before the conſummation of the marriage, the king, in a treaty with Portugal, engaged to aſſiſt that kingdom againſt Spain [n], and in the nineteenth article, obliged himſelf never to reſtore Dunkirk to that crown.

When the marriage was compleated, the queen mother arrived in England [o], with deſign, as it ſeemed, to ſpend there the reſidue of her days. The king aſſigned Somerſet Houſe for her reſidence, and gave her wherewithal to keep a ſplendid and magnificent court. But ſhe did not, it ſeems, find

Spain had only two infantas; the eldeſt whereof was married to the king of France, and the ſecond was to go to Vienna. So the houſe of Portugal only remained to furniſh the king a wife.——France ſtrenuouſly promoted this marriage, and to ſucceed the better, offered the earl of Clarendon a penſion of ten thouſand pounds a year; but the earl rejected that offer with great indignation. Though in England, the ſatisfaction ſhe expected, for after three years ſhe returned to France.

The moſt conſiderable tranſaction at the Engliſh court, in the remaining part of this year, was the ſale of Dunkirk. The king looked upon this place as his property, ſince it was ſurrendered to Cromwell by France, in conſideration of the ſuccours ſhe had received in her war with Spain. Whether this reaſon was ſolid or not, it is certain, the king believed he had a power to diſpoſe of the town as he pleaſed. The two years large ſupplies granted him by parliament were all conſumed, and his coffers empty, though his extraordinary occaſions had been only the diſbanding of the army, and payment of the arrears due to the fleet. Whatever were the king's motives to part with this important place, he reſolved to ſell it to France, by whom it was gladly purchaſed. The negotiation for this ſale began in July 1662, and ended the following October. The king's firſt demand was, twelve millions of livres, and count d'Eſtrades, who managed the affair for Lewis XIV. offered but fifteen hundred thouſand. This great difference between the ſum demanded and offered, was the ſole ſubject of the negotiation. Each feigned, however, to be unwilling to recede, though both were equally impatient, the one to ſell, and the other to purchaſe, and knew one another's intention. Charles told count d'Eſtrades by his chancellor, that four ways were propoſed for the diſpoſal of Dunkirk. The firſt was, to ſurrender it to the Spaniards, who offered what price the king ſhould be pleaſed to demand. The ſecond was, to treat with the Dutch, who offered immenſe ſums. The third was, to put it into the hands of the parliament, who would keep it without any diminution to the king's pretenſions as ſovereign. The fourth, which he thought moſt juſt, and ſuitable to his intereſts, was to ſell it to the king of France. There was alſo a fifth way propoſed by the earl of Sandwich, which was to demoliſh it, and fill up the harbour, to render it entirely uſeleſs.

The king of France anſwered, he much doubted the offer of the Spaniards, who had not yet been able to pay his queen's portion, though on that payment depended the validity of her renunciation: that it would be more advantageous to the king of England, to make a free gift of the place to the Spaniards, than to receive for it twenty millions from the Dutch, which, moſt certainly, they would not give. And as to delivering it to the parliament, the king knew better than he, how dangerous it was to increaſe the parliament's power.

In ſhort, Charles came to ſeven millions of livres, and the count d'Eſtrades offered him two, then two and a half, and at laſt three. But the king his maſter had given him power to offer four, at the very time that Charles conſented, that the ſale ſhould be fixed at five millions. The king of France was obliged to come up to his price, when he found nothing would be abated, and that he run the riſk of being diſappointed, if he ſtood out any longer. There was alſo ſome difficulty about the time of payment; the king of England would have all the money at once upon the delivery of the place, and the king of France offered to pay it at ſeveral times. At laſt it was ſettled, that one half ſhould be paid down, and the other in two years, at two ſeveral payments.

Dr. Burnet, in the hiſtory of his own times, ſays, that Charles ſquandered away the money, received for Dunkirk, among his miſtreſs's creatures [p]. Others aſſure, that with one part he diſcharged his ſiſter the ducheſs of Orleans' dowry, and with the other aſſiſted Portugal.

The motives alledged by the chancellor to the count d'Eſtrades, to ſhew, the king was under a neceſſity to ſell Dunkirk, were, that, his coffers being empty, he could only by that means be enabled to aſſiſt Portugal. But in England, this reaſon was not to be urged, becauſe all knew what vaſt ſums the king had received from the parliament. To cover therefore the diſhonour of this ſale, it was pretended, that the garriſon and repairs of the fortifications coſt the king immenſe ſums to no purpoſe; that "the ſea was ſo tempeſtuous, and the grounds ſo rolling upon every ſtorm, that there would never remain a certain ſteerage to that port [q]." On this occaſion ſeveral pamphlets were publiſhed, tending to ſhew the injury done to the nation in the ſale of Dunkirk to France, and others to palliate, or to demonſtrate the neceſſity of this ſale.

But the greateſt diſpute concerning this ſubject, was upon two queſtions, Whether the propoſal came from France or England? And whether the earl of Clarendon, as he was generally accuſed, was the author and promoter of the ſale, or as ſome pretend, proteſted he would not be concerned? I find Mr. Echard, in his hiſtory of England, and Dr. Burnet, in that of his own times, entirely clear the earl of Clarendon. It is however a fact, as certain as a fact of this nature can be, that the earl of Clarendon propoſed it, negotiated the ſale, and concluded it. To prove this truth, I need only quote the letters of count d'Eſtrades, who was commiſſioned to manage the affair, and conſequently knew more of it than any other. It muſt however be ſaid, in excuſe of Mr. Echard and Dr. Burnet, that when they writ this part of their hiſtories, count d'Eſtrades' letters, concerning the Dunkirk negotiation, were not publiſhed, and that they knew no more of the affair, than what they had received from the earl of Clarendon's friends.

Count d'Eſtrades, being embaſſador at London the beginning of the year 1662, had ſecretly agreed with the king, that the French king ſhould ſupply him with a certain ſum of money, to enable him to aſſiſt Portugal. But this was to be kept very ſecret, becauſe of the Pyrenean treaty, by which Lewis had ſolemnly engaged to give no aſſiſtance to Portugal, either directly or indirectly. This ſecret, however, took air, and occaſioned a letter from Lewis to count d'Eſtrades, dated the 4th of March, in which are theſe words: "———You may tell the king of England, that what is known here of the money of Havre, came from Fox himſelf, who has not been very careful to keep the ſecret. This was partly the cauſe of all the ſenſeleſs noiſe made in Paris, which doubtleſs muſt have reached London, that I am treating for Dunkirk with the ſaid king for a ſum of money, in order to exchange it with the king of Spain, for Cambray, or Aire, and St. Omer. You know better than any man, whether I had ever ſuch a thought."

It is not unlikely, that this was an inſinuation which begot in Charles the thought of ſelling Dunkirk to France; but the ſale was not mentioned till ſome months after. Count d'Eſtrades being returned to France in April this year, was appointed embaſſador extraordinary to Holland. But as he was on his journey, he received a letter from the king of England, of the 17th of July, to deſire him to come to London, where he wiſhed to communicate to him an affair propoſed by the chancellor. Count d'Eſtrades, with his maſter's leave, went to London, and there received from him a letter, in which he told him, "—You may gueſs with what impatience I expect the arrival of your packet, which is to inform me of the reaſon of the king of Great Britain's deſiring to ſpeak with you, and obliging you to defer your journey to Holland, &c.

As all the other letters, till October, ſhew, the count d'Eſtrades was employed only in this negotiation during his ſtay at London, there is no reaſon to doubt, that the firſt propoſition for the ſale of Dunkirk, came from England.

As to the ſhare the earl of Clarendon had in the affair, it clearly appears in a letter of the 17th of Auguſt, writ by count d'Eſtrades, to the king his maſter, wherein he gives an account of a conference he had with the earl of Clarendon. Theſe are his words: "The chancellor added, that the thought of this treaty came from him, and did not conceal, that the neceſſity of the Engliſh affairs had inſpired him with it. That the king, the duke of York, and himſelf, were alone of this opinion, and that Monk, the lord treaſurer, and the earl of Sandwich were ſtill to be managed, whom he could not hope to gain, but by the great ſums which would accrue to the king: that having already propoſed it to them from the urgent occaſions of the ſtate, they had offered an expedient to preſerve the place for the king, and eaſe him of this expence.———I muſt not forget to tell your majeſty, that the chancellor hinted to me, that the king had precautions to obſerve with the queen his mother on this affair: that therefore the king had told the queen, that his ſending for me into England, was to deſire my application to your majeſty, for a ſum of money to be lent him in his preſſing neceſſities, and that he had ordered the chancellor to confer with me upon it. The chancellor added, that the king and he were agreed, that the king ſhould complain much of my non-compliance, with regard to this loan, and that the chancellor particularly ſhould tell the queen, by [p] Though the king promiſed, That he would lay up all the money in the Tower, and that it ſhould not be touched, but upon extraordinary occaſions. Burnet, p. 172.——The miſtreſs here mentioned was Barbara Villiers, the king's firſt miſtreſs, afterwards created dutcheſs of Cleveland. See Burnet, p. 94.

[q] Theſe were the words of the earl of Sandwich, according to Echard. Burnet ſays, count Schomberg, who was lately come into England, adviſed, in oppoſition to all this, that the king ſhould keep it, for, conſidering the naval power of England, it could not be taken, and that the holding it would keep both France and Spain in a dependence upon the king. But he was ſingular in that opinion. Clarendon ſaid, he knew nothing of thoſe matters, but appealed to Monk's judgment, who was for ſelling it, p. 173. He way of ſecret, that I was a ſtrange man, and he very much miſtaken, if by what I had ſaid to him, I did not intend to demand for ſecurity of this loan, ſome cautionary town, as England had formerly done by France and Holland, in a like caſe; but that he had pretended not to underſtand me, as being a demand to which he would never adviſe his maſter to conſent. All this diſguiſe is uſed to prepare the queen to believe, that ſhe knew ſomething of the treaty, if it ſhould come to a concluſion, and that neceſſity was the motive to it. I am likewiſe to complain of the chancellor, as of a man who blindly deſires to procure advantages for his maſter, without regarding the intereſt of your majeſty. The whole proceeding confirms me in the opinion, that they have a mind to a treaty, and that they are reaſonable in every thing but the price."

In another letter of the 21ſt of Auguſt, count d'Eſtrades writ to the king, that the chancellor told him,—" That when it ſhould be known for how ſmall a ſum this treaty was to be made, the king could not avoid reproach, and that, at leaſt, he (the chancellor) would be liable to public cenſure, which might endanger his life. That therefore it was his opinion to make a preſent of it to your majeſty, and leave the reward to your generoſity: but as he was not maſter, and was highly concerned to take care of himſelf in ſo nice an affair, he was obliged to conceal his ſentiments, and pretend to adhere to thoſe of others, that he might not be taken for the principal author of the treaty.—He farther enlarged upon the importance of this place, and the advantages which your majeſty might receive from it, if you ſhould ever deſign to make conqueſts upon Flanders," &c.

Theſe letters demonſtrate, that the earl of Clarendon, ſon of the chancellor, was ill informed, when he told doctor Burnet that his father kept himſelf out of that affair entirely. It may be ſaid however, in the chancellor's juſtification, that poſſibly the thought of ſelling Dunkirk came firſt from the king; that perhaps the chancellor endeavoured to diſſuade him from it, and not ſucceeding, had a mind to give him a proof of his obedience, in taking the negotiation upon himſelf, in order to manage it to the king's advantage. For dr. Burnet, in his character of this miniſter, obſerves, that though a reſolution was taken contrary to his ſentiment, he executed it with the ſame zeal, as if propoſed by himſelf. But this is only a bare poſſibility, which every one will regard as he pleaſes.

While this negotiation employed the king and his firſt miniſter, three of the late king's judges, who had found means to eſcape out of the kingdom, were publicly executed at Tyburn. They had, after wandering through Low and High Germany, ſettled for ſome time at Hanau under borrowed names, and returned in the ſpring to Delft in Holland, having appointed their wives to meet them there, in order to learn the ſtate of affairs in England, and what hopes were left for them; but ſir George Downing, the king's reſident at the Hague, and formerly of their party, having intercepted their letters, obtained the conſent of the ſtates to ſeize and put them on board an Engliſh ſhip, which brought them to England, where they were executed. The names of theſe three regicides were Corbet, Okey, and Berkſtead.

This execution was followed with the trials and condemnation of ſir Henry Vane and general Lambert, who had been particularly excepted in the act of pardon, though they were not amongſt the king's judges, becauſe they were conſidered as the chief authors of the troubles. Vane had been confined, ſhortly after the king's arrival, on a bare ſuſpicion of framing ſome plot againſt the government. But though he was excepted in the act of indemnity, he had, by means of his friends, found ſo much favour from the ſame houſe of commons, who had excepted him, that they petitioned the king, jointly with the peers, that he might not ſuffer death, which was granted by the king. He was therefore kept in priſon without being tried, till the time I am ſpeaking of. But this ſecond parliament being compoſed of men of a different character from the firſt, the commons addreſſed the king to bring him as well as Lambert to their trials. In vain did he alledge in his defence the petition of the firſt parliament; and many other reaſons; he was ſentenced to die as a traitor. Lambert was alſo tried and condemned, but was reprieved at the bar, juſt as he was going to receive ſentence. He was confined in the iſle of Guernſey, where he lived a priſoner thirty ſix years[q]. Sir Henry Vane met not with the ſame favour from the king. This, it is pretended, was owing to his inſolent behaviour at his trial. But many believed him a ſacrifice to the manes of the earl of Strafford, to whoſe death he had greatly contributed. His indiſcretion and inſolence, as well at his trial as his execution, have been extremely aggravated. But it is eaſy to ſee, it was only to ſave the king's honour, who, having poſitively promiſed a pardon to all except the king's judges, could not avoid granting a pardon to Vane, without violating his promiſe, and eſpecially after ſparing his life at the requeſt of the late parliament[r]. It was ſo feared that he would inſiſt upon this point in his laſt ſpeech, that drummers were placed under the ſcaffold, who, as ſoon as he began to ſpeak, upon a ſign given, drowned his voice with their drums. All the favour he could obtain from the king, was to be beheaded. Great care was taken after his death to publiſh the king's inclination to pardon him, if he had not been provoked by his inſolence. But this is a thing very hard to be proved.

St. Bartholomew's day being come[s], on which the act of uniformity was to take place, two thouſand preſbyterian miniſters choſe rather to quit their livings, than ſubmit to the conditions of the act. It was expected that a diviſion would have happened amongſt them, and that a great number would have choſe rather to conform to the church of England, than ſee themſelves reduced to beggary. It was not therefore without extreme ſurpriſe, that they were all ſeen to ſtand out, not ſo much as one ſuffering himſelf to be tempted[t]. As this is a conſiderable event of this reign, it will not be improper to enquire into the cauſes of this rigour againſt the preſbyterians: I ſay the preſbyterians, becauſe it was not the other ſects that the church of England moſt dreaded.

1. It cannot be denied, that the high-churchmen, who prevailed in the parliament, acted in a ſpirit of revenge. But this revenge ſhould not appear very ſtrange, conſidering the perſecution, and at laſt, the entire deſtruction brought upon the epiſcopal church by the preſbyterians, if honour had not been wounded, nor any promiſe made to the preſbyterians. The church of England was the national church, which had flouriſhed from the reformation to the time of the war between Charles I. and the parliament, when the preſbyterians entirely ſubverted it. It was therefore but juſt to reſtore it to its former condition. But it was injuſtice to violate the promiſe made to the preſbyterians, eſpecially as they had greatly contributed to the king's reſtoration, and withal, to that of the very church, which perſecuted them after being re-eſtabliſhed by their aſſiſtance.

2. But revenge was not the ſole cauſe of the preſent rigour exerciſed againſt the preſbyterians. The deſire of ſelf-preſervation was no leſs concerned. Experience of what had paſſed, taught the church of England, that if the preſbyterians ſhould ever find an opportunity like that which they once had, they would not fail to improve it. They were always irreconcileable enemies, though, in the preſent juncture, they were unable to do any hurt, and obliged to ſue for mercy. It was therefore, undoubtedly, the intereſt of the church of England, to uſe all poſſible precautions to hinder the increaſe of a party already too powerful, and which, probably, would never ceaſe contending for the ſuperiority.

3. We have ſeen what were the notions of this parliament and of high-church, concerning the royal prerogative, and to what height it was carried. The preſbyterians, as well as the other ſects, were known to follow quite contrary max-

[q] He is ſaid to live and die a papiſt. It was the popiſh intereſt that ſaved his life, and it is thought he died of that perſuaſion in order to eſcape the puniſhment others met with, who were no more guilty than he was. Old Mr. Barker, a papiſt and dependent on the Norfolk family, knew the particulars. He was reckoned one of the fineſt and beſt bred gentlemen in England.

[r] His friends perſuaded him to make ſome ſubmiſſion to the king, in order to ſave his life; but he ſaid, "If the king did not think himſelf more concerned for his honour and word, than he did for his life, he was very willing they ſhould take it. Nay I declare, ſaid he, that I value my life leſs in a good cauſe, than the king can do his promiſe." State-trials, tom. II. p. 455.

[s] The preſbyterians remembered, what a St. Bartholomew's had been held at Paris ninety years before, which was the day of that maſſacre, and did not ſtick to compare the one with the other. Burnet, p. 185.—There was a great debate in council, a little before St. Bartholomew's day, whether the act of uniformity ſhould be punctually executed or not. Some moved to have the execution of it delayed till the next ſeſſion of parliament. Others were for executing it in the main, that is, to let ſome eminent men preach in their churches, till they ſhould die, and to put curates to read the common prayer. The earl of Mancheſter laid all theſe things before the king with much zeal: Sheldon, on the other hand, preſſed the execution of the law. Id. p. 192.

[t] Burnet inſinuates, that their leaders took great pains to have them all ſtick together, infuſing it into them, that if great numbers ſtood out, that would ſhew their ſtrength, and produce new laws in their favour. ——— So it was thought, that many went out in the crowd to keep their friends company, p. 292.

ims, and if they were not entirely republicans, at leaſt, they endeavoured to reduce the royal power within very narrow bounds, as appeared in the reſolutions and conduct of the parliament of 1640. But while the church of England had no ſuſpicion of the king's religion, and believed him a zealous member, it was her intereſt to ſupport and extend the prerogative, and conſequently to diſable the preſbyterians to proſecute their maxims.

4. The church of England's intereſt required, that ſhe ſhould improve ſo favourable an opportunity, which perhaps might never return. It was ſeen how greedy the king was of money, to throw it away with the greateſt profuſion, and that he could not be without the aſſiſtance of his parliament, and the church had the good fortune to have a parliament conſiſting of her moſt zealous members, and diſpoſed to ſacrifice to the king a little of the nation's treaſure, provided the king would, in his turn, make them a ſacrifice of the preſbyterians. Though he was not ſuſpected to be a papiſt, it could not be thought he would, from a pure principle of honour and honeſty, quarrel with a parliament ſo favourable to him, for the ſake of the preſbyterians, whom he neither did, nor had reaſon to love. There was nothing therefore but what might be expected from his complaiſance: provided care was taken to ſupply him with money. Such a juncture was not to be neglected.

5. But there was another ſtill more powerful cauſe of the parliament's ſeverity againſt the preſbyterians. This was the intereſt of the papiſts, who had ever a great influence during this reign. Some made an open profeſſion of their religion, and yet were looked upon with a very favourable eye by the court. Others, after the king's example, pretended to be good proteſtants, and zealous members of the church of England, in order to be more ſerviceable to their party. The firſt uſed their utmoſt endeavours to incite the parliament to a ſevere treatment of the preſbyterians, in order to deſtroy a party which had ſo openly declared againſt the royal power. The others concealing themſelves under a falſe zeal for the proteſtant religion, laboured with the ſame ardour, to excite the enmity of the heads of the church of England, and of thoſe whom they knew to be moſt warm, againſt men, who would not ſpare them, if ever they were in a condition to ruin them, as they had manifeſtly ſhewn. But while they were thus zealouſly labouring to bring things to extremities, they were endeavouring, on the other hand, by their emiſſaries, to encourage the preſbyterians, and exhort them to the cloſeſt union, by inſinuating it to be the moſt effectual means to defeat the meaſures of their enemies. They were told, their number was ſo great, that, in all likelihood, it would deter the parliament from attempting the ruin of ſo many at once, for fear of exciting new troubles. Whereas, if their party ſhould divide, they would be inſenſibly and irrecoverably ruined. In ſhort, to induce them the more eaſily not to deſpair, they were told, the king, provoked with the ill treatment they received, notwithſtanding his promiſe to them, would protect them openly if they would remain united; but a diviſion would put it out of his power to do them any ſervice. It is certain, the court was in this diſpoſition, not from any pity to the preſbyterians, or regard to the king's honour, but from the hopes that the union amongſt the non-conformiſts would procure them more favourable conditions, of which the papiſts might make an advantage. But when I ſay the court, I do not pretend to include the earl of Clarendon, though prime miniſter. This juſtice muſt be done him, to ſay, that not only he did not contribute to the deſigns of the king and the papiſts, but was the man that broke their meaſures, by ſecret intrigues, well knowing what was concealed under this feigned moderation of the king to the preſbyterians. However, the king, the duke of York, and the other leading papiſts, believed it neceſſary, to puſh the preſbyterians, and then encourage them to hold together, that the danger ariſing from their union might prevail with the parliament to grant to all the non-conformiſts in general, a toleration which ſhould extend to the papiſts. This is not a bare conjecture. All the king's proceedings demonſtrate this was the ſcheme he had formed.

I have already mentioned the corporation act, made to prevent diſſaffected perſons from being admitted into offices. For the better executing this act, the parliament appointed commiſſioners, who were employed all this year in viſiting corporations, and inſpecting the conduct of the members. A very extenſive power was given to theſe commiſſioners, with abſolute authority to turn out of the corporations, all members who were ever ſo little ſuſpected. For the deſign of this act was to diveſt of all credit, every perſon not entirely devoted to the king and the church of England. This power was exerciſed with all imaginable rigour: ſo that the corporation had not one member left, who was not of the ſame principles with the houſe of commons. Moreover, the walls of Glouceſter, Coventry, Northampton, Leiceſter and Taunton were, by order of theſe commiſſioners demoliſhed, becauſe theſe towns had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their fidelity to the parliament.

About the end of the year a conſpiracy was diſcovered, formed by the fifth monarchy-men, and upon the informations of ſome of the accomplices, ſix were executed. Nevertheleſs, many believed, this was only an artifice to excuſe the ſeverity practiſed againſt the non-conformiſts. The ground of this ſuſpicion was, that in a plot formed to ſeize and kill the king, the duke of York, and general Monk, and to ſeize the tower and caſtle of Windſor, only ſix conſpirators were diſcovered, namely, George Phillips a ſerjeant of foot, Thomas Tonge a diſtiller, Francis Stubbs a cheeſemonger, James Hind a gunner, John Sellers a compaſs maker, and Nathaniel Gibbs a felt maker. Few could believe that ſuch men ſhould ever think of ſucceeding in a deſign of that nature. It is true, that to render the conſpiracy more probable, it was ſaid, the old colonels were to aſſemble their diſbanded forces, and Ludlow, then in Switzerland, to come and head them. But though ſuch an undertaking required perſons of ſome diſtinction, yet only theſe ſix wretches who were executed [u], could be diſcovered. At leaſt, if the conſpiracy was real, the plotters had yet made no great progreſs [w].

To finiſh the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this year, I ſhall briefly add, that after the earl of Sandwich left Liſbon, to conduct the queen into England, vice admiral Lawſon ſailed with a ſquadron to Algier, and forced the Algerines to a peace with England. As the king was in poſſeſſion of Tangier, they doubtleſs believed it would not be advantageous to have him for their enemy. Shortly after, the king declared Tangier a free port, and inveſted it with great privileges [x].

1662-3.] The king had already diſcovered, how agreeable it would be to him to have the management of the uniformity act, but the parliament had returned no anſwer to his deſire. Before this act, the preſbyterians had behaved in a manner which gave no juſt cauſe of complaint againſt them, and the king had made them a poſitive promiſe, either that he would never conſent to the act, or procure them a particular exemption, but he performed neither, his aim having been only to keep them united, by giving them hopes of his protection. After the act was paſſed, he ſtill continued to feed their expectations, and hence it was, that they addreſſed the king and council, for a diſpenſation from the penalties annexed to the act of uniformity. The petition would doubtleſs have been rejected, if the king had not ſignified to the council the obligation he was under to grant their requeſt. Some time after he publiſhed a declaration, dated the 26th of December, but which appeared not till the beginning of January 1662-3. In the declaration, after an aſſurance of his firm adherence to the act of uniformity, he ſaid, however, that for the ſake of others, he was willing to diſpenſe with ſome matters in it [y]. Upon the declaration, Mr. Calamy, a preſbyterian miniſter, being in the church of Aldermanbury, of which he had the cure before the execution of the act, and ſeeing the miniſter, who was expected, did not come, aſcended the pulpit and preached, for which he was committed to Newgate by the lord mayor of London. But in a few days, he was diſcharged by the king's expreſs order.

The king, as we have ſeen, meant to procure ſome advantages for the preſbyterians, in order to procure the ſame for the papiſts. This was his ſcheme, and as it was directly contrary to the earl of Clarendon's principles, mortal enemy

[u] Only Phillips, Tonge, Gibbs, and Stubbs, were executed. John Sellers was afterwards made the king's Hydrographer, and publiſhed ſeveral maps, charts, &c. See Heath, p. 513.

[w] However, as Ludlow obſerves, this ſerved the court for a pretence to ſeize five or ſix hundred perſons; to diſarm all thoſe they ſuſpected; to make thoſe they had taken give bonds not to take up arms againſt the king; and to increaſe their ſtanding guards. Tom. III. p. 114.

of the preſbyterians, and no friend of the papiſts, it is not ſurpriſing it ſhould be formed without the privity of this miniſter, whoſe credit, for that reaſon, began now to decline. Nay, the king had plainly ſhewn he had not the ſame affection for him, by obliging his intimate friend ſecretary Nicholas, worn out with age, to reſign his poſt to the chancellor's profeſſed enemy, ſir Henry Bennet, afterwards earl of Arlington. This ſufficiently diſcovered, that his credit with the king was ſenſibly diminiſhed. On the other hand, though the king affected a great zeal for the proteſtant religion, the choice of Bennet to be ſecretary of ſtate, ſhewed his inclination for the Roman catholics, as Bennet was ſtrongly ſuſpected of being a papiſt in his heart, and known for their protector. It is ſaid, he and the earl of Briſtol had induced the king to change his religion at Fontarabia, and that Bennet durſt not return into England till after the death of the lord Culpeper, who had threatned him to diſcover it to the parliament. Be this as it will, Bennet being the chancellor's enemy, this laſt could not but look upon his enemy's advancement to the poſt of his intimate friend, as a prelude to his diſgrace.

The king's declaration in favour of the preſbyterians, was a farther indication of the chancellor's fall. This declaration had been reſolved and prepared, without his knowledge, at Somerſet-houſe, where the queen mother reſided, and probably by a catholic junto, or by ſecret favourers of that religion. Thoſe who knew the chancellor's principles, eaſily judged, he had no hand in it. They had reaſon to be afterwards confirmed in that opinion, when every one evidently ſaw the king, in his pretended compaſſion for the preſbyterians, deſigned only to procure a toleration for the catholics. The chancellor, however, kept his poſt for ſome years, though with a great diminution of credit.

The parliament meeting the 18th of February, the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he confined himſelf to one ſingle point, namely, his declaration concerning the act of uniformity. His words were theſe:

"——To cure the diſtempers, and compoſe the different minds among us, I ſet forth my declaration of the 26th of December, in which you may ſee, I am willing to ſet bounds to the hopes of ſome, and to the fears of others; of which, when you ſhall have examined well the grounds, I doubt not but I ſhall have your concurrence therein. The truth is, I am, in my nature, an enemy to all ſeverity for religion and conſcience, how miſtaken ſoever it be, when it extends to capital and ſanguinary puniſhments, which I am told were begun in popiſh times: therefore, when I ſay this, I hope I ſhall not need to warn any here, not to infer from hence, I mean to favour popery. I muſt confeſs to you, there are many of that profeſſion who having ſerved my father and myſelf very well, may fairly hope for ſome part of that indulgence I would willingly afford to others who diſſent from us: but let me explain myſelf, leſt ſome miſtake me herein, as I hear they did in my declaration: I am far from meaning by this, a toleration or qualifying them thereby to hold any offices or places in the government; nay, further, I deſire ſome laws to be made to hinder the growth and progreſs of their doctrines. I hope yon have all ſo good an opinion of my zeal for the proteſtant religion, as I need not tell you, I will not yield to any therein, not to the biſhops themſelves, nor in my liking the uniformity of it, as it is now eſtabliſhed; which being the ſtandard of our religion, muſt be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from all other mixtures: and yet, if the diſſenters will demean themſelves peaceably and modeſtly under the government, I could heartily wiſh, I had ſuch a power of indulgence, to uſe upon occaſions, as might not needleſsly force them out of the kingdom, or ſtaying here, give them cauſe to conſpire againſt the peace of it.

"My lords and gentlemen, it would look like flattery in me to tell you, to what degree I am confident of your wiſdom and affection in all things, that relate to the greatneſs and proſperity of the kingdom. If you conſider well what is beſt for us all, I dare ſay we ſhall not diſagree."——

This ſpeech, with the declaration of the 26th of December, alarmed the houſe of commons. It may almoſt be affirmed, that whatever the commons had done in favour of the king, was only to procure his aſſent to the act of uniformity, and yet, they ſaw him not only diſpenſe with that act, but even deſire a power to diſpenſe with it, that is, to ſet it aſide as often as he pleaſed: that this was not only in favour of the preſbyterians, who had a better claim to indulgence than the other ſects, but moreover, in favour of all the non-conformiſts. Nay, it was eaſy to perceive, from what he ſaid concerning the catholics, that his intention was to prevent their being diſtinguiſhed from the proteſtant ſects, in caſe his deſires were complied with. This juſtice ought to be done to the high church party, that though their enemies frequently brand them for papiſts, on account of their extreme attachment to certain forms and ceremonies, yet are they as far removed from the eſſence of popery, as the other epiſcopalians, and even the preſbyterians themſelves. This they have demonſtrated on ſeveral very remarkable occaſions. The houſe of commons, which, as I ſaid, was chiefly compoſed of high church-men, found in the king's demand, two articles equally oppoſite to their principles, namely, indulgence for the preſbyterians, and indulgence for the catholics. Wherefore, they reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the king, wherein, after the neceſſary compliments, they proceeded in the following manner.

"——It is with extreme unwillingneſs and reluctancy of heart, that we are brought to differ from any thing which your majeſty has thought fit to propoſe: and though we do no way doubt, but that the unreaſonable diſtempers of ſome mens ſpirits, and the many mutinies and conſpiracies which were carried on during the late intervals of parliament, did reaſonably incline your majeſty to endeavour by your declaration, to give ſome allay to thoſe ill humours, till the parliament aſſembled; and the hopes of indulgence, if the parliament ſhould conſent to it; eſpecially ſeeing the pretenders to this indulgence, did ſeem to make ſome titles to it, by virtue of your majeſty's declaration from Breda. Nevertheleſs, we your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, who are now returned to ſerve in parliament from thoſe ſeveral parts and places of your kingdom, for which we were choſen, do humbly offer to your majeſty's great wiſdom, that it is in no ſort adviſeable, that there be any indulgence to ſuch perſons who preſume to diſſent from the act of uniformity, and the religion eſtabliſhed: for theſe reaſons we have conſidered the nature of your majeſty's declaration from Breda, and are humbly of opinion, that your majeſty ought not to be preſſed with it any farther; 1. Becauſe it is not a promiſe in itſelf, but only a gracious declaration of your majeſty's intentions, to do what in you lay, and what a parliament ſhould adviſe your majeſty to do; and no ſuch advice was ever given or thought fit to be offered, nor could it be otherwiſe underſtood, becauſe there were laws of uniformity then in being, which could not be diſpenſed with but by act of parliament. 2. They who do pretend a right to that ſuppoſed promiſe, put the right into the hands of their repreſentatives, whom they choſe to ſerve for them in this parliament, who have paſſed, and your majeſty conſented to the act of uniformity. If any ſhall preſume to ſay, that a right to the benefit of this declaration doth ſtill remain after this act paſſed; 3. It tends to diſſolve the very bonds of government, and to ſuppoſe a diſability in your majeſty and the houſes of parliament, to make a law contrary to any part of your majeſty's declaration, though both houſes ſhould adviſe your majeſty to it.

"We have alſo conſidered the nature of the indulgence propoſed, with reference to thoſe conſequences which muſt neceſſarily attend it. 1. It will eſtabliſh ſchiſm by a law, and make the whole government of the church precarious, and the cenſures of it of no moment or conſideration at all. 2. It will no way become the gravity or wiſdom of a parliament, to paſs a law at one ſeſſion for uniformity, and at the next ſeſſion (the reaſons of uniformity continuing ſtill the ſame) to paſs another law to fruſtrate or weaken the execution of it. 3. It will expoſe your majeſty to the reſtleſs importunity of every ſect or opinion, and of every ſingle perſon alſo, who ſhall preſume to diſſent from the church of England. 4. It will be a cauſe of increaſing ſects and ſectaries, whoſe numbers will weaken the true proteſtant profeſſion ſo far, that it will at leaſt be difficult for it to defend itſelf againſt them: and which is further conſiderable, thoſe numbers, which by being troubleſome to the government, find they can arrive to an indulgence, will, as their numbers increaſe, be yet more troubleſome, that ſo at length they may arrive to a general toleration, which your majeſty hath declared againſt, and in time ſome prevalent ſect will at laſt contend for an eſtabliſhment; which, for ought can be foreſeen, may end in popery. 5. It is a thing altogether without precedent, and it will take away all means of convicting recuſants, and be inconſiſtent with the method and proceedings of the laws of England. Laſtly, it is humbly conceived, that the indulgence propoſed will be ſo far from tending to the peace of the kingdom, that it is rather likely to occaſion great diſturbance. And on the contrary, that the aſſerting of the laws and the religion eſtabliſhed, according to the act of uniformity, is the moſt probable means to produce a ſettled peace and obedience throughout your kingdom; becauſe the variety of profeſſions in religion, when openly indulged, doth directly diſtinguiſh men into parties, and withal gives them opportunity to count their numbers; which, conſidering the animoſities that out of a religious pride will be kept on foot by the ſeveral factions, doth tend directly and inevitably to open diſturbance. Nor can your majeſty have any ſecurity, that the doctrine or worſhip of the ſeveral factions, which are all governed by a ſeveral rule, ſhall be conſiſtent with the peace of your kingdom. And if any perſon ſhall preſume to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, we do in all humility declare, that we will for ever, and on all occaſions, be ready with our utmoſt endeavours and aſſiſtance to adhere to, and ſerve your majeſty, according to our bounden duty and allegiance."

This addreſs, notwithſtanding the weakneſs of the reaſons alledged in it, produced the effect, the commons expected, which was, to let the king ſee, it would be in vain to endeavour to obtain from the parliament a power of diſpenſing with the uniformity act. He anſwered in writing, about three weeks after, that he was unwilling to reply to their reaſons, though he found he had been miſunderſtood, but renewed his thanks for their declaration to aſſiſt him againſt any perſon, that ſhould preſume to diſturb the peace of the kingdom.

As in the king's ſpeech and declaration, there were two articles which gave an alarm to the parliament, the one relating to the non-conformiſts in general, the other concerning the papiſts in particular, the commons, after acting againſt the former, reſolved alſo to proceed againſt the latter. To that end they obtained the concurrence of the lords, for an addreſs to be jointly preſented to the king, wherein both houſes ſaid, "That his majeſty's lenity towards the papiſts, had drawn into the kingdom a great number of Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits: they were therefore humble ſuitors to him, to iſſue out a proclamation to command all jeſuits, and all Engliſh, Iriſh, and Scotiſh popiſh prieſts, and all ſuch other prieſts as have taken orders from the ſee of Rome, or by authority thereof, (except ſuch foreign jeſuits or prieſts, as by contract of marriage are to attend the perſons of either of the queens, or by the law of nations to attend foreign embaſſadors) to depart this kingdom by a day, under pain of having the penalties of the law inflicted upon them." The king anſwered in writing: "That he was not a little troubled, that his lenity and condeſcenſion towards many of the popiſh perſuaſion (which were but natural effects of his generoſity and good nature, after having lived ſo many years in the dominions of Roman catholic princes; and out of a juſt memory of what many of them have done and ſuffered in the ſervice of his father and himſelf) had been made ſo ill uſe of, and ſo ill deſerved, that the reſort of jeſuits and prieſts into this kingdom, had been thereby increaſed, with which his majeſty was and is highly offended. But that he would iſſue out a proclamation as he was deſired, and take care it ſhould be more effectual than any proclamation of that kind had ever been. He declared farther to both houſes, and all his loving ſubjects, that as his affection and zeal for the proteſtant religion, and the church of England, had not been concealed or untaken notice of in the world, ſo he was not, nor ever would be, ſo ſolicitous for the ſettling his own revenue, or providing for the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, as for the advancement and improvement of the religion eſtabliſhed, and for the uſing and applying all proper and effectual remedies to hinder the growth of popery, both which he in truth looked upon the beſt expedients to eſtabliſh the peace and proſperity of all his kingdoms."

The proclamation was accordingly publiſhed, but no better obſerved than all thoſe publiſhed for the ſame purpoſe, ſince the beginning of the reign of James I. As it was not then known that the king was a catholic, his aſſurances of zeal for the proteſtant religion were taken for ſo many truths, which removed all ſuſpicion of his having the leaſt deſign to reſtore the catholic religion in England. As we are now better informed, we are better able to judge of his intentions.

This affair being ended, the commons proceeded next to examine the ſtate of the king's ordinary revenue, and to think of means to raiſe it to twelve hundred thouſand pounds, according to their promiſe[z]. But as this affair required a long diſcuſſion, the king, who deſigned an immediate prorogation of the parliament, thought proper to make an attempt for a ſpeedy and extraordinary ſupply from the commons, till his revenues ſhould be ſettled. For that purpoſe he ſent for them to the banquetting-houſe, and in a ſpeech, the moſt flattering, pathetic, and affectionate, he had ever yet made, demanded a preſent ſupply of money, without which he aſſured them it was impoſſible to ſtruggle with the difficulties, he was preſſed with. He offered to ſhew, that the twelve hundred thouſand pounds formerly granted him, had been to the laſt penny, diſpoſed for the public ſervice. But he well knew there was no danger in the offer, though it was not eaſy to imagine to what public uſe the money had been applied. However that be, the commons moved with the king's great affection for his people, and his ardent zeal for the proteſtant religion, granted him four entire ſubſidies, and the clergy in convocation, following their example gave him the ſame.

Mean time the chancellor's credit daily declined, not that his affection for the king was leſſened, but, probably, becauſe the king, entering into new projects advantageous neither to the ſtate nor religion, did not believe that miniſter a proper inſtrument to aſſiſt him in the execution thereof. If the chancellor's enemies had met with encouragement from the king, he would have been already diſgraced, but his ſervices, affection, and fidelity, as well during the king's exile, as ſince his reſtoration, could not eaſily be forgot. Wherefore he was continued, not only in his poſt, but even in ſome degree of favour, which made the papiſts fear, he would at laſt recover his credit, and break all their meaſures. This probably engaged the earl of Briſtol, a profeſſed papiſt, to endeavour utterly to ruin the chancellor, by impeaching him before the lords of high treaſon, believing doubtleſs, the king would not be diſpleaſed to ſee him fall by that means, without his having any hand in it. But if it was eaſy to accuſe the chancellor, it was difficult to draw an impeachment ſo plauſible and coherent as to make him appear criminal. The articles exhibited againſt him by the earl of Briſtol, were to this effect:

"1. That he had endeavoured to alienate the hearts of his majeſty's ſubjects, by artificially inſinuating to his creatures and dependants, that his majeſty was inclined to popery, and deſigned to alter the eſtabliſhed religion.

"2. He had ſaid to ſeveral perſons of his majeſty's privy council, that his majeſty was dangerouſly corrupted in his religion, and inclined to popery: that perſons of that religion had ſuch acceſs, and ſuch credit with him, that unleſs there were a careful eye had unto it, the proteſtant religion would be overthrown in this kingdom.

"3. Upon his majeſty's admitting ſir Henry Bennet to be ſecretary of ſtate, in the place of ſir Edward Nicholas, he ſaid, that his majeſty had given ten thouſand pounds to remove a zealous proteſtant, that he might bring into that place of high truſt a concealed papiſt.

"4. In purſuance of the ſame traiterous deſign, ſeveral friends and dependants of his have ſaid aloud, that were it not for my lord chancellor's ſtanding in the gap, popery would be introduced into this kingdom.

"5. That he had perſuaded the king, contrary to his reaſon, to allow his name to be uſed to the pope and ſeveral cardinals in the ſolicitation of a cardinal's cap for the lord Aubigney, great almoner to the queen: In order to effect which, he had employed Mr. Richard Bealing, a known papiſt; and had likewiſe applied himſelf to ſeveral popiſh prieſts and jeſuits for the ſame purpoſe, promiſing great favour to the prieſts here, in caſe it ſhould be effected.

"6. That he had likewiſe promiſed to ſeveral papiſts, he would do his endeavour, and ſaid, he hoped to compaſs the taking away all penal laws againſt them; to the end they might preſume and grow vain upon his patronage, and by their publiſhing their hopes of a toleration, increaſe the ſcandal endeavoured by him to be raiſed throughout the kingdom.

"7. That being intruſted with the treaty betwixt his majeſty, and the royal conſort the queen, he concluded it upon articles ſcandalous and dangerous to the proteſtant religion: moreover he brought the king and queen together, without any ſettled agreement about the performance of the marriage rites: whereby the queen refuſing to be married by a proteſtant prieſt, in caſe of her being with child, either the ſucceſſion ſhould be made uncertain for want of due rites of matrimony, or elſe his majeſty be expoſed to a ſuſpicion of his being married in his own dominions by a Romiſh prieſt.

"8. That having endeavoured to alienate the affections of the king's ſubjects upon the ſcore of religion, he made uſe of all malicious ſcandals and jealouſies to raiſe to himſelf a popular applauſe of being the zealous upholder of the proteſtant religion.

" 9. That he further endeavoured to alienate the affections of the king's ſubjects, by venting in his own diſcourſe, and thoſe of his emiſſaries, opprobrious ſcandals againſt his majeſty's perſon, and courſe of life, ſuch as are not fit to be mentioned, unleſs neceſſity ſhould require it.

" 10. That he endeavoured to alienate the affection of the duke of York, from his majeſty, by ſuggeſting to him, that his majeſty intended to legitimate the duke of Monmouth.

" 11. That he had perſuaded the king, againſt the advice of the lord general, to withdraw the Engliſh garriſons out of Scotland, and demoliſh all the forts built there, at ſo vaſt a charge to this kingdom; and all without expecting the advice of the parliament of England.

" 12. That he endeavoured to alienate his majeſty's affections and eſteem for his preſent parliament, by telling him, that there never was ſo weak and inconſiderable a houſe of lords, nor never ſo weak and heady a houſe of commons; and particularly, that it was better to ſell Dunkirk, than to be at their mercy for want of money.

" 13. That, contrary to a known law made laſt ſeſſions, by which money was given and applied for the maintaining of Dunkirk, he adviſed and effected the ſale of the ſame to the French king.

" 14. That he had, contrary to law, enriched himſelf and his creatures by the ſale of offices.

" 15. That he had converted to his own uſe vaſt ſums of publick money raiſed in Ireland by way of ſubſidy, private and public benevolences, and otherwiſe given and intended to defray the charge of the government in that kingdom.

" 16. That having arrogated to himſelf a ſupreme direction of all his majeſty's affairs, he had prevailed to have his majeſty's cuſtoms farmed at a lower rate than others offered, and that by perſons, with ſome of whom he went a ſhare, and other parts of money reſulting from his majeſty's revenues."

Without entering into the particulars of this charge, I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, it was unanimouſly rejected, as improbable, and even contradictory[a]. For, beſides that the earl of Clarendon was known to be no leſs prejudiced againſt the papiſts than againſt the preſbyterians, it could not but appear ſtrange, that an open and declared papiſt, as the earl of Briſtol was, ſhould accuſe the chancellor of favouring the Romiſh religion, and on the other hand, of inſinuating, that the king was a papiſt, in order to alienate the affection of his ſubjects. But what was ſtill more extraordinary in the impeachment, is, that the inſinuations the chancellor was accuſed of, concerning the king, were true in themſelves, and that the earl of Briſtol pretended to repreſent them as ſlanders.

In this ſeſſion, the parliament granted the duke of York the revenues of the poſt office[b], and wine licenſes. Theſe revenues, which afterwards conſiderably increaſed, enabled the duke of York to keep a ſeparate court, and live independent of his brother.

The 27th of July, the king gave his aſſent to the ſubſidy act, and ſome others, after which he prorogued the parliament to the 16th of March the following year 1663-4.

Shortly after, the king and queen made a progreſs into the weſt, where they were received with great pomp and magnificence, particularly at Oxford. This was only a journey of pleaſure, and after five or ſix weeks ſpent in it, they returned to London in October.

While the king was upon his progreſs, a conſpiracy was diſcovered, carried on by the old republicans and independents, to reſtore the commonwealth. It is pretended, they were to ſeize ſeveral towns, particularly in the north, where they believed themſelves ſtrongeſt, and then raiſe a general inſurrection. But being diſcovered by one of the accomplices, many were apprehended, and one and twenty convicted and executed the January following. It was aſſured, that Ludlow and Lambert were to head theſe rebels, though the firſt never ſtirred out of Switzerland, where he had fled for refuge. As for Lambert, beſides that he never left the iſle of Guernſey where he was confined, if any proofs had appeared againſt him, he would, doubtleſs, not have been ſpared. It is true, Ludlow, in his memoirs, ſeems to own, there was, this year, ſome project ſet on foot by the republicans in England.

This year died Dr. Juxon archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was ſucceeded by Gilbert Sheldon biſhop of London[c].

[1663-4.] The parliament meeting the 16th of March, the king, in a ſpeech to both houſes, demanded a repeal of the triennial act made in 1641. To come to this demand, he enlarged on the late conſpiracy, which he ſaid was ſtill on foot, and that there were men, who, on pretence that the parliament was at an end by ſome clauſe in the triennial bill, fancied they might aſſemble themſelves, and chuſe new members. He deſired the two houſes not to leave an act in being, which paſſed in a time very uncareful of the dignity of the crown, or ſecurity of the people. Laſtly, he told them, he loved parliaments: that never king was ſo much beholden to them as himſelf, nor did he believe the crown could ever be happy without frequent parliaments: but he would never ſuffer a parliament to come together, by the means preſcribed by that bill. He then told them, that the four ſubſidies granted the laſt ſeſſion, had fallen very ſhort of what he expected, or they intended: that the revenues of the exciſe and tunnage and poundage were greatly diminiſhed by the frauds of brewers and merchants, and the tax upon chimnies declined, the laſt half year having brought in leſs than the former. He therefore prayed them to let him have the collecting of this tax by his own officers.

[1664.] The commons returning to their own houſe, proceeded immediately upon a bill to repeal the triennial act, and made another in its room, namely, that the ſitting of parliament ſhould not be diſcontinued above three years at moſt. This bill being ready, and paſſed by the lords, the king came to their houſe the 5th of April, and gave it the royal aſſent.

The king had ſome time ſince reſolved upon a war with Holland: but it is difficult to know the true motive of this reſolution. For the cauſes alledged were only general, except the taking of two ſhips in the Eaſt Indies, valued at the moſt but at eight or ten thouſand pounds ſterling. If ſome Engliſh hiſtorians are to be credited, the king had no thoughts of this war: the Dutch were the aggreſſors, and being encouraged by promiſe of great aſſiſtance from France, ſought a quarrel with England. They alſo pretend, it was ſolely at the preſſing inſtances of the parliament, that the king was drawn into this war: to revenge the wrongs and damages done by the Dutch to the Engliſh in India, Africa, and elſewhere. But as theſe hiſtorians deſcend not to particulars, but keep to generals, the reader would be very ill informed, if he adhered only to what they ſay. I ſhall therefore relate here what I meet with in others, who more fully explain the affair.

The 27th of April 1662, the ſtates general of the United Provinces made a treaty with the king of France, by which both parties engaged to aſſiſt one another, in caſe of any attack upon either in Europe. The ſame year they made a like treaty of league and alliance with the king of England. This had relation to another made in 1659, between England and the ſtates before the king's reſtoration, and ſeemed to be renewed only to remove the defect of that of 1659, made on the part of England by an unlawful authority. However, it happened, in the interval between the two treaties, that the Dutch had ſunk or taken in the Indies two Engliſh ſhips, called the Bonadventure and the Good-Hope, which occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the two nations[d]. The Engliſh pretended, theſe two ſhips were attacked without any juſt cauſe, and the Hollanders maintained the contrary. In the treaty of 1662, the affair of theſe two ſhips was again debated; but as their value was inconſiderable, it was not thought proper to delay a treaty advantageous to both nations. It was therefore agreed, that the Engliſh ſhould be allowed to proſecute the proceſs commenced on account of their ſhips, and the ſtates depoſited fourſcore thouſand florins by way of ſecurity to pay the full value in caſe the affair was decided againſt them. Some time after another diſpute aroſe upon the ſame ſubject, and this was, the king pretended, that the ſtates general were judges of the proceſs, to which the ſtates replied, that it belonged to the cognizance of the admiralty of Amſterdam,

[a] Upon their being rejected, the earl of Briſtol ſaid, " Thoſe articles were not intended by him as a charge, but as an information." As ſoon as he had delivered them, he, it ſeems, either repented of it, or at leaſt was prevailed with to abſcond. Burnet, p. 197.

[b] Which then brought in twenty one thouſand pounds a year. Hiſt. of taxes, p. 307.

[c] This year alſo died, Jerome Weſton earl of Portland, and judge Jenkyns, who had been queſtioned and impriſoned by the long parliament.

[d] De Wit told count d'Eſtrades, that the difference between the two nations aroſe on account of Downing's intereſts only, who had bought the pretended rights of the merchants concerned in thoſe two ſhips, for a trifle; that to this end he inflamed the king of England's council, raiſing imaginary grievances and injuries received at ſea by the Engliſh, which they never ſuffered. D'Eſtrades' letters of June 5, 1664.

who only had a right to decide it. The affair remained in this ſtate till April this year 1664, when the commons after an inquiry into the obſtructions of the trade of the nation, voted, and obtained the concurrence of the lords to their vote, " That the wrongs, diſhonours, and indignities done to his majeſty by the ſubjects of the United Provinces in India, Africa, and elſewhere; and the damages done by them to the Engliſh merchants, are the greateſt obſtructions of the trade of England. That the ſame be ſpeedily preſented to his majeſty, and he be moved to take ſome effectual courſe for redreſs of theſe injuries, and all other of the like nature, and for prevention of the like for the future. And in proſecutiont hereof, they will with their lives and fortunes aſſiſt his majeſty, againſt all oppoſitions whatſover." In purſuance of this reſolution, the two houſes preſented, the ſame day, an addreſs to the king, to which, on the morrow, they received this anſwer in writing: " That he was pleaſed with their zeal for the advancement of trade, and the removal of all obſtructions which might hinder the ſame; being convinced, that nothing would more contribute to the honour of the nation, and the proſperity of his people. That he would examine the particular complaints which had been repreſented by his parliament, and order his miniſter in Holland to demand ſpeedy reparation, and in caſe of a denial, he relied on their promiſe and declaration to ſtand by him."

It is eaſy to ſee, that no particulars were ſpecified either in the addreſs or the anſwer, and that hitherto all was confined to generals. It will afterwards appear, that the Engliſh always kept to the ſame expreſſions, till the negotiation of the peace, when they were obliged to declare wherein conſiſted the injuries they complained of, the principal of which was found to be the loſs of the two ſhips beforementioned. It is now time to ſhew, that when theſe complaints were brought to the parliament, the king had already reſolved on the war, and that theſe complaints were only deſigned to furniſh a pretence, and engage the parliament to grant him the neceſſary ſupplies to ſupport it.

Since the treaty of 1662, the ſtates had great cauſe of complaints againſt the Algerines, notwithſtanding the peace concluded with them in 1661. England was no leſs concerned than the ſtates in the depredations committed by the Algerines upon all ſorts of ſhips, and therefore the ſtates deſired the king of England to join a ſquadron of his ſhips with a fleet they were equipping, to oblige the Algerines to a more exact obſervation of the peace. The king anſwered, he had rather act ſeparately.

After this anſwer, the ſtates ſent Ruyter into the Mediterranean, with a ſquadron of twelve ſhips, and the king ſent thither a fleet of twenty ſail under the command of Lawſon. Theſe two fleets departed in May this year, and about the ſame time the duke of York, as governor of the royal African company, ſent vice-admiral Holms to Cape Verde, with a ſquadron of fourteen men of war, to take all poſſible advantages againſt the Dutch Eaſt India company. Lawſon meeting Ruyter in the Mediterranean, was ſaluted by the Dutch admiral, but returned not the compliment, contrary to what had been ſtipulated in the treaty of 1662. It is not neceſſary to take notice here of the little ſucceſs Lawſon and Ruyter had againſt the Algerines. What Holms did at Cape Verd is much more material.

In the months of Auguſt and September, Holms made himſelf maſter of fort St. Andrews, and moſt other places belonging to the Dutch in the neighbourhood of Cape Verde, and, after taking the fort built on the cape itſelf, he gave it the name of York. He erected a fort in the mouth of the river Gambia, and then ſailing for Guinea, ſeized all the forts the Dutch had on that coaſt, except fort Achin and fort St. George de Mina. After this, he returned to England. Now, if it be conſidered, that Holms ſailed from England in May, or at the lateſt, in June: that ſome time was required to equip this fleet, and that the parliament's addreſs was preſented to the king but the 27th of April, it will be eaſily perceived, that the war was reſolved in England before any complaints of depredations committed by the Dutch were repreſented to the parliament, and that theſe complaints were only pretences for the war. It muſt be obſerved, that not a ſingle Engliſh hiſtorian ſpeaks of the hoſtilities committed by Holms at Cape Verde and Guinea, long before any declaration of war[e].

But what clearly ſhews, the king, ſince his reſtoration had ever intended this war, is, his conduct whilſt the treaty between France and the ſtates were negotiating at Paris: for he did his utmoſt to obſtruct it. The principal condition of that treaty conſiſted, in a reciprocal guaranty of what the two parties poſſeſſed, or ſhould afterwards lawfully acquire. In this general clauſe, the ſtates comprehended the article of the fiſhery, as an eſſential article, and the king of France made no objection to it. But Charles oppoſed it, and endeavoured to hinder the king of France from agreeing to that article. Lewis, in complaiſance to Charles, ſought expedients to ſatisfy him, by confining himſelf to a general guarantee, which ſhould include all without exception. But the ſtate refuſed to conclude the treaty, unleſs this article of the fiſhery was expreſly inſerted in the guaranty. Charles finding, the king of France would at laſt conſent, ordered count d'Eſtrades, the French embaſſador at London, to be told, that he had reſolved to oblige the ſhips of all nations without exception, to ſtrike to his. But perceiving, the king of France, inſtead of being intimidated by this menace, anſwered it in a high ſtrain, he let him know, he would deſiſt from this pretenſion as to him, provided he would deſiſt from the guaranty of the fiſhery in favour of the Dutch. But Lewis, being ſenſible, the Dutch would never recede from that particular clauſe, agreed to it at laſt, and the treaty was concluded.

Hence it appears, that Charles was then ſeeking a quarrel with the Dutch, on the article of the fiſhery. But finding, France had expreſly engaged to be guaranty of it, he himſelf concluded, that very year, a treaty of alliance with the Dutch, in expectation of ſome other occaſion to begin a war with them.

This deſign was no longer deferred, than till the beginning of the year 1664, when a fleet was preparing in England, to act at Cape Verde, and in Guinea, under the command of Holms. Shortly after, ſome Engliſh merchants complained to the parliament of the horrible depredations of the Dutch. But it was never known wherein conſiſted the injuries received by the Engliſh. This extraordinary proceeding is a clear evidence, the court was in a good underſtanding with thoſe who complained to the parliament. For, naturally, and according to the uſual practice in ſuch caſes, they ſhould have firſt brought their complaints to the king, who ſhould have applied to the ſtates for redreſs, and, in caſe of refuſal, demanded the aſſiſtance of his parliament. But here the order was inverted. The parliament was firſt addreſſed to, who prayed the king to demand immediate reparation, and offered their aſſiſtance to carry on a war againſt the ſtates, before it was known whether theſe complaints had any foundation, or whether the ſtates were inclinable to repair the pretended damages. All this demonſtrates, the war was reſolved, before the parliament was informed of the cauſes and grounds of it. For it was May before the king, by his embaſſador Downing[f], demanded of the ſtates reparation for theſe pretended injuries.

What I have been ſaying, is farther confirmed by the ſpeaker's ſpeech to the king, at the prorogation of the parliament, wherein he ſaid, the houſe, upon examination of the reaſons of the decay of trade, had found, that the Dutch, within a few years, had ſpoiled his ſubjects to the value of ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds, though Downing had not yet preſented his memorial to the ſtates, nor, conſequently, received any anſwer.

The 17th of May, the king coming to the parliament, the ſpeaker preſented the bills that were ready, and amongſt the reſt, one for empowering the king to levy the chimney money by his own officers, as he had deſired. This bill was afterwards the cauſe of great vexations, complaints, and murmurs, which obliged king William III. to drop the tax, though, as it was levied in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. it amounted to above two hundred and fifty ſix thouſand pounds a year. After the ſpeaker had mentioned this bill, he told the king:

" — Whilſt we were intent upon theſe weighty affairs,

[e] King Charles II. the next year after his reſtoration, viz. 1661, ſent ſir Robert Holms with a ſquadron of men of war and ſome ſoldiers to America, with which he reduced New York, and all that which the Dutch had taken from the Engliſh in Long Iſland. And from thence, ſir Robert Holms ſailed to Africa, and took Cape Verde, and ſome other places where the Dutch had factories. Coke's detection, &c. t. II. p. 135.——Echard ſays, only the Dutch embaſſador complained of ſome hoſtile attempts of captain Holms on the coaſt of Guinea. Tom. III. p. 121.

[f] Biſhop Burnet gives Downing this character. " He was a crafty fawning man, who was ready to turn to every ſide that was uppermoſt, and to betray thoſe, who by their former friendſhip and ſervices, thought they might depend on him. He had been Cromwell's embaſſador in Holland, where he had offered perſonal affronts, both to the king and the duke. But he had, by Monk's recommendation, found means to get into favour." P. 198.—Count d'Eſtrades ſays, he was a prateful ſeditious fellow. Letter of January 24, 1664.

we were often interrupted by petitions, and letters, and motions, repreſenting the unſettled condition of ſome counties, by reaſon of fanatics, ſectaries, and non-conformiſts: they differ in their ſhapes and ſpecies, and accordingly are more or leſs dangerous, but in this they all agree, they are no friends to the eſtabliſhed government either in church or ſtate, and if the old rule be true, qui eccleſiæ contradicit non eſt pacificus, we have great reaſon to prevent their growth, and to puniſh their practice. To this purpoſe, we have prepared a bill againſt their frequenting of conventicles, the ſeed-plots and nurſeries of their opinions, under pretence of religious worſhip. The firſt offence is made puniſhable with five pounds, or three months' impriſonment, and ten pounds for a peer: the ſecond offence ten pounds, or ſix months impriſonment, and twenty pounds for a peer: but the third offence, after a trial by jury, and the trial of a peer by his peers, the party convicted ſhall be tranſported to ſome foreign plantation, unleſs he lays down an hundred pounds. Immedicabile vulnus enſe reſcindendum ne pars ſincera trahatur."——

The preſbyterians were more numerous than all the other ſects together. Since the king's reſtoration, they had never been accuſed of an inſurrection againſt the goverment, or of entering into the plots of the anabaptiſts and republicans; and yet, by this act they were made liable to the ſame penalties as the other ſects; and, on pretence that their religious meetings were nurſeries of their opinions againſt the government in church and ſtate, they deſerved to be tranſported to America, if they had the boldneſs to aſſemble three times. It ſeems, that by this extreme rigour, it was not ſo much deſigned to puniſh their pretended tranſgreſſions, as to drive them to deſpair, that they might render themſelves guilty indeed.

After paſſing theſe acts, the king prorogued the parliament to Auguſt, ſignifying withal, that it ſhould not meet till November, unleſs ſome affair obliged him to aſſemble it ſooner.

This affair was the Dutch war, which the king had reſolved. For that purpoſe, Downing preſented to the ſtates a memorial, drawn in very high terms, wherein he demanded, on the part of the king, reparation for the damages done to to the Engliſh, which, by his calculation, amounted to ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. After the moſt diligent ſearch, I have not been able to diſcover the particular articles of theſe damages, except the two ſhips beforementioned, and another article concerning the iſle of Poleron, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Wherefore, in imitation of the Engliſh hiſtorians, I am forced to leave the reader in the dark, with regard to the particulars of the damages on which the war was founded.
